This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

On all subjects relating to your Grace's command, you will be pleased to correspond with me or with my Military Secretary for my information, and your Grace will regularly communicate to me all military transactions in which you may be engaged, reporting to me all vacancies that may occur in the troops under your command; and as the power of appointing to commissions is not vested in you, you will be pleased to recommend to me such officers as may appear to you most deserving of promotion, stating the special reasons where such recommendations are not in the usual channel of seniority.

Should your Grace have occasion to recommend any gentleman for an Ensigncy, you will at the same time make known his address, in order that, if His Majesty should be pleased to confirm the recommendation, he may be directed to join the corps immediately on his appointment.

Your Grace will transmit monthly returns of the troops under your command to the Secretary at War, and to the Adjutant-General, for my information; and you will strictly adhere to His Majesty's regulations in regard to the pay, clothing, and appointments of the troops; and your special attention must necessarily be directed to their discipline and to the interior economy of the different corps, which is so essential not only to the comfort of the soldier, but to the preservation of his health under every change of climate to which he may be exposed.

Your Grace will be vested with the usual powers of convening general courts martial, upon which subject I have to observe, that as great inconvenience has arisen to the service from officers commanding on several foreign stations having permitted prisoners to return to England prior to the proceedings and opinion of the court martial having been submitted to the King, I have to request that in all cases where any person whatever may be tried by a general court martial, and where your powers are not sufficient to enable you to decide finally upon the proceedings, opinion, and sentence of the court, that you do not permit the prisoner to return to England until His Majesty's commands shall have been duly communicated to you through the proper channel for that purpose.

I have likewise to acquaint your Grace that as many General officers, from the best motives, have taken upon themselves to commute sentences of capital punishment to transportation for a term of years, or for life, when it is found that no such power is delegated by His Majesty, and consequently that the whole of the proceedings may be thereby rendered nugatory, it will be necessary that your Grace's particular attention should be given to the powers granted to you by His Majesty's warrant on this subject, in order to prevent you from inadvertently falling into a similar irregularity.

Several instances occur wherein General officers commanding abroad are induced to send officers home for misconduct, with a view to exchange and as a relief to the local service to which such individuals may be attached; and as the impossibility of bringing them to punishment, from the absence of evidence, is the cause of considerable embarrassment to me, and leads to the necessity of the delinquent's return to his station without the ends of justice being answered or the discipline of the service preserved, I have to request that your Grace will be pleased in all such cases to cause previous investigation to be made into the misconduct of an individual before he shall be permitted to quit the army, and that you will transmit the report to me, for my information and guidance, if the subject of investigation shall have been by a court of inquiry; and in the usual channel of transmission, if by a general court martial.

It is particularly desirable that the officer at the head of the Quarter-

Commander in Chief of our Forces in our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being, according to the rules and discipline of war, and in pursuance of the trust We hereby repose in you. Given at our Court at Carlton House, the twenty-eighth day of March, 1815, in the fifty-fifth year of our reign.

By the Command of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty,

BATHURST.

Field-Marshal his Grace the Duke of Wellington, K.G. and G.C.B., Commander of the Forces on the Continent of Europe.

Earl Bathurst to Lieut.-Gen. Lord W. Bentinck.

MY LORD, War Department, London, 29th March, 1815.

So long as the result of Buonaparte's attempt appeared doubtful, I felt it necessary to delay giving instructions regarding His Majesty's forces in the Mediterranean, which must have been imperfect and inconclusive.

The actual state of affairs renders necessary the utmost vigilance and exertion to defend those points which are the most valuable to this country and her Allies. The British troops in the Mediterranean are at present unequal to do more than garrison certain fortresses, which are so distant from each other, and unconnected in their interests and systems of defence, that it would be rather embarrassing than convenient to consider the troops stationed in these different places as forming one whole, or united under one commander.

The security of Malta must be the first object with His Majesty's government. The garrison is at present very insufficient; and I am to desire that your Lordship would lose no time in sending the 1st battalion of the 10th regiment from Sicily to Malta.

To provide for the general protection of Sicily is far beyond our present means; but it is desired that the whole of the British troops which His Majesty's government can spare in support of His Sicilian Majesty should be assembled in and near Messina, under the command of Lieutenant-General M'Farlane, and should undertake only the defence of that fortress and its dependencies. The troops appropriated for this service are to be as noted in the margin.* That part of Roll's regiment which has remained in Sicily is to be sent immediately to the Seven Islands, and the 20th Light Dragoons (dismounted) are to return to England.

Lieutenant-General Campbell must be instructed to collect as large a proportion of his force as possible in Corfu, to which place great importance is attached. He will provide everything necessary for defending that fortress to the last extremity. His force is estimated at the numbers stated in the margin:* and it appears advisable that he should have two General officers under his command. No change is to be made until further orders (except under urgent circumstances) in the troops stationed at Genoa. Every measure tending to allow the officers and soldiers of the Italian levy to pass into the service of His Sardinian Majesty is to be suspended immediately; and the most effectual steps are to be taken for securing to Great Britain the services of that corps. If good recruits are to be obtained at a low rate, I am to desire that the levy may be augmented to a number not exceeding 5000 men. The conduct of Sir John Dalrymple, under very delicate circumstances, has given so much satisfaction to His Majesty's government, that I am to desire this officer may be continued in the command of the British troops stationed in Genoa.

Your Lordship will be so good as to give the necessary orders for carrying into immediate effect the above instructions, after which you will consider the Mediterranean army as being broken up, and yourself and the officers of the general staff will be at liberty to return to England.

I am, &c.,

BATHURST.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Brussels, 30th March, 1815.

I think it necessary to acquaint your Lordship that we have accounts from Paris to Sunday last.

The whole of Buonaparte's disposable force are certainly marching by three different roads towards Lisle and the frontier, and he is forming a considerable camp in the vicinity of Amiens.

It is reported that Caulaincourt will be sent to Vienna with proposals to the Congress.

The accounts from Ostend of the 29th mention that the inhabitants of Dunquerque had risen upon the garrison on the preceding day; that they had struck the tricolor flag, and hoisted the colours of Louis XVIII.

The carriages containing the crown jewels and that part of the treasure which had been converted into gold have been rescued from the hands of the populace and conveyed in safety to Tournay.

In addition to the particulars related in the enclosed letter, I can inform your Lordship that the works of Tournay and Mons are in sufficient forwardness to place those towns in a state of security if we are not attacked before the expiration of a fortnight.

The Prussians have manifested some ill humour upon the King's refusal to allow them to pass the Meuse: as they appear, however, now to confine their demand to the admission of one battalion into Namur, I do not think their feelings will give rise to any change of measures on the part of General Kleist.

I shall send a courier this evening to the Duke of Cambridge, requesting him immediately to bring up the 10,000 Hanoverians between the Ems and the Weser.

Your Lordship's presence is extremely necessary to combine the measures of the heterogeneous force which is destined to defend this country.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect,
My Lord, your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
CHARLES STUART.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Brussels, 30th March, 1815.

Since I finished the accompanying letter the Prince sent me yours of the 22nd March.

You will see that I have spared no efforts to keep the Prince quiet, which object has indeed been the principal motive of my journey to Brussels. The army under his command is, however, so weak and so ill-composed that it is impossible to place great confidence in their exertions unless we can depend upon the cordial co-operation of the whole Prussian corps under Kleist, being the result of directions from his Court, which entrust that officer entirely to your control.

Under these circumstances, I leave you to judge of the extreme importance we all attach to your early arrival.

Buonaparte refuses passports to quit France by this frontier: FitzRoy Somerset and all your people therefore embarked at Dieppe.

Ever sincerely yours,
CHARLES STUART.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 31st March, 1815.

I have just seen your private letter to Lord Castlereagh, exhorting us to send whatever we can to the Netherlands.

I can assure you orders were given to that effect immediately. With respect to infantry, all will have arrived which could possibly go, except the Guards, which were necessarily detained for a time, but they will now be able to go. As to cavalry, it has been reduced a good deal; but I hope we shall soon be able to send more than is now under orders.

As for artillery, we have sent to our utmost; but there was a great reduction of that force (7000) also since the peace.

Yours very sincerely,
BATHURST.

Colonel Colborne will give you an exact account of what has been sent and is under orders.

All accounts concur in doubting the fidelity of the Belgian troops.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 31st March, 1815.

The wonderful and unexpected events which have occurred in France are likely to place the fate of Europe once more under your guardianship, and in hailing your appointment to the command in the Low Countries I trust I may not be considered too presumptuous in laying my humble services at your disposal towards the furtherance of every wish on your part that may be connected with the situation I hold. In expressing an earnest anxiety to forward your wishes, I am not only actuated by an inclination arising in the high respect and humble regard I have ever entertained for you personally, but by a sense of duty proceeding from a knowledge that it is the desire of my Royal master that I should do so in all things.

It were to be wished that you had a more efficient army, composed of British materials; but I earnestly hope that the Prussians will be placed under your orders, and by degrees we shall be enabled to augment our own forces in the Netherlands. Empty tonnage has been despatched to bring home the army from America, and we may expect the troops that composed the Mississippi expedition to arrive very soon.

Enclosed is a copy of the list transmitted in the Duke's letter of the troops placed under your orders,* and I have remarked upon the progress of those that have been held in preparation since the Revolution took place; and I regret to say that, exclusive of about 1500 Guards, and perhaps two more brigades of cavalry, nothing further can be furnished until the arrival of the American army.

If the Irish government were not so apprehensive of the state of that country, more infantry could be taken from that establishment; but, as the matter stands, nothing of the kind can be done until the militia are called out again.

The Guards will march for embarkation about Tuesday or Wednesday next. They were unfortunately but unavoidably delayed in their preparation, owing to a wish not to weaken London until every symptom of riot was at an end.

As to General officers and Staff, I have the Duke's command to request that you will be pleased to express your wishes. In the mean while, however, His Royal Highness was obliged to make appointments, some of which have arisen in the actual necessity and others in the justice due to individuals. Among the former are Lord Hill, Sir Charles Colville (who is preparing to set out), Major-General Vivian, commanding the Hussar brigade, and Major-General Vandeleur, appointed to the brigade of light cavalry. This officer was originally appointed to the command of a brigade in Brabant, at the request of Sir H. Clinton; and the Duke thought it fair, as he was on the spot, that he should have the first brigade of cavalry sent over.

Major-General Johnston was embarked for some weeks at Cork with a reinforcement for America, and when the destination of the chief part of his troops was changed for Brabant it was impossible to withhold employment from him. He is said to be a good officer, and he came home from the Cape of Good Hope with the view of seeking service in the Peninsula. The Duke had long promised to give Major-General Adam the command of a brigade, and, as he happened to be in the Netherlands, His Royal Highness had him appointed to that Staff in consequence of the additional brigade of infantry (23rd, 51st, and 3rd 14th) which has been sent from hence. He is a very distinguished and intelligent officer, and I have not the least doubt but that he will give you satisfaction. The force in the Netherlands is so much detached, and as it is impossible to foresee what may be left in garrison, His Royal Highness has forborne from naming any particular officer to a brigade, particularly as you would, of course, wish to make your own organization. But, in whatever manner you may employ Lord Hill, I presume there will be a division for Colville, who, by the bye, has been urgent for the rank of Lieutenant-General on the Continent; and as the removal of Vandeleur to the brigade of cavalry will, even according to the old establishment, leave the vacancy of a Major-General, His Royal Highness hopes you will have no objection to the employment of Major-General Donkin. With a brigade of troops I think he will be in his proper sphere, as he is by no means fitted for the situation of a Staff officer. He has been cruelly used by Admiral Hallowell; and as the Mediterranean army is to be broken up, and he deprived of his appointment, the Duke really cannot resist his desire to serve with troops in the field, and particularly under your command.

As to your Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General, I believe you know them both: at least you are well acquainted with Major-General Barnes, and I imagine you must have heard much of the talents of Sir Hudson Lowe.

I have written for Murray to return immediately from Canada.

I presume you will want many of the assistants in the Quartermaster-General's department who served in the Peninsula.

Believe me to remain, my dear Lord Duke,

Ever most faithfully and sincerely yours,

H. TORRENS.

The 2nd battalion of the 59th arrived from Ireland in the Downs a few days ago, in order to afford a draft of 300 men for the 1st battalion in India. They were too late for the fleet, and therefore I have had them transferred to Antwerp to relieve any corps there that may be more fit for field duty. The 59th want equipments of all kinds, which will be sent to Antwerp.

H. T.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 1st April, 1815.

When a force was first established in Brabant, the Commander-in-Chief was so good as to appoint Lieut.-Colonel Torrens, a relation of mine (and whom you may remember with the 19th Dragoons in India), to the situation of Deputy Quartermaster-General. The immediate object of this appointment was of course to give Torrens the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, and I believe he is in every respect well worthy such a favour. The service to which he is attached has now assumed the appearance of permanency and magnitude, which could never have been anticipated at the period of his nomination; and although he might in fair justice be allowed the advantage of this unexpected turn of affairs, yet I am certain it could not be his object, and it certainly is not my wish, that he should in any manner embarrass you or the public service, if it is your opinion that he should give way to officers of more experience in the department.

You will, I am certain, have the goodness to consider this with your usual liberality; and I am certain that if he is to be removed, you will effect it in the manner least hurtful to his feelings. I only wish you to believe that I can never be desirous of any private view of mine embarrassing the public service.

I have heard that he has conducted himself with great propriety.

There appears to be a very general wish, on his own part as well as that of others, that Lord Uxbridge should be appointed to your cavalry. Will you have the goodness to let me know your confidential wishes and opinion on this subject.

Ever, my dear Lord Duke, most sincerely yours,

H. TORRENS.

General Lord Cathcart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 1st April, 1815.

I send under flying seal my private letter to Lord Castlereagh, giving an account of a military conference at which I was present yesterday.

I made what interest I could to obtain the Hessians (Cassel and Darmstadt) for you, but it was vigorously resisted, and you know from what motives, by my friend the Prussian.

I cannot help mentioning that something having been said about the command of the Prussians on joining you when that may occur, the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg exclaimed with great eagerness that he should consider it a great honour and a great piece of good fortune to serve under you.

The Emperor assented, and said he should consider it so for any General.

I send this by my third son, George,* who is most proud and most obliged to you, as I also am, for taking him into your suite. I am sure his best exertions will not be wanting towards meriting your applause.

With best wishes, I have the honour to remain,

My dear Lord, most faithfully yours,

CATHCART.

[ENCLOSURE.]

General Lord Cathcart to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 1st April, 1815.

Field Marshal Prince Schwarzenberg sent me an invitation yesterday in the morning to meet the Emperor of Russia at his office at noon the same day.

* Afterwards Sir George Cathcart (killed at the battle of Inkerman).

Having previously communicated with Lord Clancarty, I went to this appointment. There were present at this conference, His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg, Field Marshals Prince Schwarzenberg and Prince Wrede, myself, Lieutenant-Generals Knesebeck and Prince Volkonsky, and Major-General Langenau to hold the protocol.

After reciting the matters which had been considered at the former military conferences at which Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington was present, it was stated that the object of the present assembly was to settle as far as possible the composition of the several armies, and of the garrison of Mayence, and the quarters, marches, and communications of the several corps.

It was agreed to begin with the left army, which is to assemble on the Upper Rhine. This army is to consist of upwards of 140,000 men, viz. :—

Bavarian Force under Field Marshal Prince Wrede	65,000
Under His Royal Highness the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg:
Wurtemberg Troops	25,000
Baden Troops	8,000
Coloredo's Austrian Corps	8,000
Prince Hohenzollern's Corps, all Austrian	40,000
	146,000

Field Marshal Prince Wrede to be on the right, with the Bavarians extending from Hanau, or opposite to Worms, to Brücksahl, and so construct works and têtes-de-pont at Mannheim and Philipsburg; the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg in the centre, from Durlach, or between Durlach and Brücksahl, to Offenburgh; and Prince Hohenzollern on the left, from the last named place towards Lorach.

The head-quarters are to be in the first instance at Heilbronn on the Necker. The officers of the staff are appointed to meet, in order to define these cantonments and the routes by which the corps are to move into them, with more precision, which will be entered on this protocol. Marshal Wrede is to move part of the Bavarian army through Heilbronn and Heidelberg. Orders were to move last night by courier, to put the Bavarian army in motion. Coloredo's corps is moving upon Ratisbon: as soon as its head shall reach that point, the Prince Royal will move the Wurtemberg force into their position. Mayence is to be garrisoned by detachments. It was proposed that the detail should be made up by Austrians 4000, Prussians 4000, Bavarians 3000, and that Hesse Cassel should be required to make up the remainder to the complement of 21,000; that the use of this fortress should be given to the several armies in proportion to their exigencies; and that the great road leading to it should be kept unincumbered. [It has been very strongly reported that the Archduke Charles will take the government of Mayence.] General Knesebeck insisted very much on the expediency of giving to the centre army, viz., the Prussians, the preference in regard to Mayence and the roads to it, because the passages lower down gave to that army a portion of a circle to move upon for their communications, instead of a straight line; but it was answered that they must make têtes-de-pont at Coblentz or at Düsseldorf, as was the case above Mayence, and that it would be time enough to resort to Mayence in preference when circumstances rendered it necessary. I understood that the Prussian army will consist of 63,000 men in three weeks.

The Prussian force when complete will be in six corps, with a reserve, in all upwards of 153,000 men; but the Landwehr are embodied with the regiments of the line, and it will therefore require some time before the Landwehr of the distant provinces can reach the army; but the whole are marching.

The Prussian General vehemently objected to any idea of appropriating the contingent of the Northern and Centre States of Germany generally to the Duke of Wellington's army. He said it would be impossible to convince the lower orders of people in these states that they were fighting their own battles; and on the other hand, that the people in Prussia would think the whole weight of the war thrown on their shoulders unfairly if no other troops are mixed with their army. He did not object to giving up the contingents of Hanover, Brunswick, Oldenburg, and of the Hanseatic Towns, but most strenuously deprecated giving that destination to Hesse Cassel. This discussion, however, went no further, as being premature.

I learn this day that it has been proposed in Congress at the Conference of five Powers to give to the Duke's army Hanover, Brunswick, Oldenburg, Hanseatic Towns, Nassau, except its proportion of the garrison of Mayence, and with their contingents, that of the kingdom of Saxony, stated at 14,000 men, but not that of the Duchy of Saxony.

General Knesebeck stated that Field Marshal Blücher has the King's order to join the army, and that General Gneisenau has authority to join the Duke of Wellington if circumstances require it.

The cantonments of the first Russian army are from Bamberg by Nuremburg to Achstadt.

As soon as the protocol of this conference is signed, I will not fail to send a copy.

CATHCART.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Vienna, 1st April, 1815.

The question of command of the lesser states in Germany came on to-day at Conference. Desirous of having your wishes pushed upon this subject, I had a tolerably warm discussion, and have at length succeeded only to the extent of the accompanying paper, in which W. stands for your Grace, and B. for Marshal Blücher. Had it been practicable, I would have done more.

The four propositions following up the above arrangement were proposed by Humboldt, approved by all the others, and only combated by me: however, as it was fully admitted in the course of the discussion that we had full liberty to choose to whom we should pay the sums due for the deficiency of our quota, and that they consented to the saving for the Hanoverian Legion, we practically lose nothing by assenting to what was the general sentiment, and on these grounds I ultimately acquiesced in the first proposition.

To the third I peremptorily objected in its original shape, which went not only to prejudge the question of subsidy, but also to decide upon the division to be made of it. It is now freed from these objections, and the object of silencing the jealousies of the little Princes, for which it is calculated, is politic.

We shall be most anxious for accounts from you after your arrival at Brussels. We have nothing from England since you left us.

To my despatches I refer you for all that has passed here.

Yours, my dear Duke, very sincerely,

CLANCARTY.

1. Que comme les questions de la guerre exigent que les contingents de quelqu'un des provinces du Nord de l'Allemagne soient réunis à l'armée Anglaise sous le commandement du Duc de Wellington, on éloignera de cette mesure tout ce qui pouvoit donner lieu à la faire regarder comme si ces troupes étoient à la solde de l'Angleterre, tandis qu'elles ne recevoient d'après l'exigence des circonstances cette distinction en co-opérant à la guerre commune, par quoi néanmoins il ne sera rien chargé à tout ce qui est relatif aux troupes Allemandes qui font actuellement partie de l'armée de la Grande Bretagne.

2. Que l'armée Prussienne, sous le commandement du Prince Blücher, réunit également à elle au nombre proportionnel de troupes Allemandes.

3. Que les Cours de Vienne, de Pétersbourg, et de Berlin employent leurs bons offices auprès la Cour de Londres à l'effet de faire obtenir d'elle des secours communs à tous les Princes de l'Allemagne qui fournissent des contingents.

4. Que tout ce qui est arrêté à présent sur la distribution ou l'organisation militaire des troupes Allemandes ne sera d'aucune conséquence pour l'organisation qui sera convenue dans la suite pour la Fédération Germanique, et ne pouvoit n'en préjuger à cet égard.

MEMORANDUM RELATIVE TO THE DUTCH ARMY.

2 Avril, 1815.

L'armée Hollandaise peut mettre en campagne 30 mille hommes, et garder encore une réserve pour mettre dans les forteresses de 15 à 18 mille hommes. Sa force effective est actuellement de 42 mille hommes. Par un décret du Roi du 27 Février, la milice, qui manque sept mille hommes, doit être mise de suite au complet; et comme le recrutement de la milice se fait par conscription, la réserve sera dans peu de temps au delà même de 18 mille hommes. Le recrutement dans les régiments de ligne, étant volontaire, va plus lentement, et la composition des troupes de ligne n'est pas si bonne que celle de la milice. L'esprit de l'armée Hollandaise est très bon: on peut être assuré qu'elle fera son devoir. Beaucoup de chefs et d'officiers subalternes ont à la vérité servi la France, mais généralement ils étoient si mal traités, et puis l'idée d'être sous un joug étranger, de ne plus faire une nation, a produit sur eux un très bon effet. J'excepte de ceci quelques méchants, tels qui ont donné par goût dans la révolution. Toute l'armée est enthousiasmée du Lord Wellington, et aussi du Prince Héréditaire d'Orange. Le Lord Wellington prenant le commandement général de toutes les troupes dans la Belgique, et le Prince Héréditaire celui de l'armée Hollandaise, on peut être assuré d'heureux résultats.

L'esprit public est dans toutes les provinces si bon, si prononcé contre la France, qu'on peut en confier la garde sans le moindre risque à la bourgeoisie armée dans toutes les villes. Il y a aussi un Landstorm dans les villages; et si on travaille un peu l'esprit du peuple, je suis assuré qu'une grande quantité de la garde bourgeoise et du Landstorm se joindront à l'armée et marcheront contre l'ennemi.

Le Ministère de la Guerre, à la tête duquel se trouve le Général Janssens, est mal composé. La conduite passée de ce Général ne sauroit inspirer une grande confiance, surtout puisqu'il est si mal entouré. Tous les chefs des différents bureaux sont connus pour être des gens attachés au système révolutionnaire et à la France. L'administration militaire dans la Belgique, sous le Lieutenant-Général Tindal, n'est pas moins mauvaise.

Il seroit difficile de changer tout cela dans le moment actuel. Le seul moyen de prévenir que ces administrations ne nuisent pas beaucoup, c'est de tâcher d'empêcher que ni les Généraux Janssens et Tindal, ni le Colonel Briatte, chef de l'état-major du Général Janssens, ni un nommé Pipers, chef de l'administration, ne soient point placés à l'armée mise en activité; et puis de remettre le plutôt possible le commandement général au Prince Héréditaire. Directement sous ses ordres, tous ces employés feront par crainte leur devoir. Mais je le repète, il est essentiel de les tenir éloignés de l'armée.

Le corps d'Artillerie est très bon, très bien composé; le corps des Ingéneurs offre moins de ressource. L'officier qui a le plus d'expérience dans cet arme, c'est sans contredit le Colonel Van der Wyck, aide-de-camp du Roi. Le Général Ingénieur Krayenhoff connoit la défense de la province d'Hollande, la force des inondations, mais hors cela il n'a pas de connaissance ni expérience.

Les forteresses sont en mauvais état, et l'on doit insister qu'on travaille avec activité à mettre en état de siége, à fournir d'artillerie de gros calibre, Maestricht, Venloo, Bois-le-Duc, et Breda. Les forteresses de Bergen-op-Zoom, Grave, Gorcum, Naarden, toute la défense du Helder, ont fournis beaucoup d'artillerie de siége à leur reddition. Il y a en Hollande un grand manque de fusils, et je suis assuré qu'on n'en a pas vingt mille en réserve en Hollande et au Brabant. Il est de la plus grande conséquence de remédier à ceci.

Le choix des commandants des places doit être recommandé, étant d'une conséquence majeure. Le Général Vander Maison, commandant de Maestricht, est bon. Valckmaer, commandant de Grave, bon. Bruce, commandant de Venloo, bon. Van der Plaat, commandant de Breda, médiocre. Drabbe, commandant de Bergen-op-Zoom, médiocre. Van Hauy, commandant de Bois-le-Duc, aussi médiocre.

Les Généraux à employer sont le Prince Héréditaire; le Prince Frédéric d'Orange; le Lieutenant-Général du Pont; les Généraux-Majors Perponcher, actuellement Ministre à Berlin; Panhuys, destiné pour Surinam; Authing, destiné pour Batavia; Stedman, Van Merle, et Tripp pour la cavalerie.

Tout le reste est trop vieux, ou sans moyens. Constant de Villars trop vieux, de même que Cornabé, Fandyck, Stirum, etc., etc.

Il y a quelques Colonels qu'on peut avancer au grade de Général, tel que Guillaume Byland, Van der Wyck, Van Houy, Van Ostrée.

Le Général-Major Constant de Rebecque, Quartier-maître-Général, est un homme non-seulement bon pour ses principes, mais très actif. C'est le meilleur choix qu'on pouvoit faire pour cette place importante.

Le Roi a les meilleures intentions : il vient d'ordonner que 30 bataillons d'infanterie et chasseurs, 10 batteries, 10 escadrons de cavalerie, doivent de suite marcher en campagne, et se rassembler entre Venloo et Maestricht; que les forteresses suivantes, Maestricht, Venloo, Nimeguen, de Graaf, Bois-le-Duc, Breda, Bergen-op-Zoom, et Anvers, doivent immédiatement être approvisionnées et mises en état de siége. Sur l'Escaut on doit aussi incessamment rassembler une flotille assez forte pour servir aussi en cas de nécessité à la défense des autres fleuves. On doit insister que le corps d'armée qui est mis en activité soit de 30 mille hommes effectifs en campagne, et ne pas comprendre dans ce nombre les troupes qui resteront dans les forteresses ni les troupes Belges.

L'armée Hollandaise doit et peut fournir 30 mille hommes hors ce qui reste dans les forteresses, dont on peut, en cas de nécessité, toujours augmenter les garnisons. Une trop grande économie a toujours tout gâté en Hollande; aussi il faut travailler le gouvernement toujours exiger rendre le mal, s'il est possible, plus grand, plus pressant qu'il ne l'est déjà effectivement. On peut compter sur le Baron de Nagel, Ministre des Affaires Etrangères; Van der Hoop, Ministre de la Marine; Hoogendorp, Vice-Président du Conseil d'Etat; Roel, Ministre de l'Intérieur; Van der Capellen, destiné pour Batavia; Linden van Huevelaken, le Baron de Herdt, et plusieurs autres, sont tous gens bien puissants. Je ne connais pas assez M. Falck, mais d'après l'opinion de bien du monde le Roi lui donne trop de confiance.

Les troupes Belges sont mauvaises : on ne doit pas y compter. Le meilleur parti à prendre est de les mettre en seconde ligne le plus que possible.

Quel fond faire sur le Général Evers, aussi sur tout le corps d'officiers, qui sont de système Français par goût et par habitude?

Je crois qu'il y a des exceptions à faire, mais bien peu. En général on ne doit compter sur aucune ressource dans la Belgique; on veut y lever 20 bataillons de milice. Si l'on en confie le commandement à des officiers sortants du service de la France, cette formation ne produira que du mal. On devroit y placer d'anciens officiers de service d'Autriche et d'Hollande; il y en a un assez grand nombre; et puis des jeunes gens du pays. Dans les provinces de Luxembourg, du Limbourg, et dans les environs de Maestricht, le peuple est bien disposé, mais toute la Flandre est mauvaise.

Le plus grand inconséquence seroit de remettre le commandement des places dans la Belgique à des officiers Hollandais. On ne doit céder aucune de ces places, surtout pas Anvers. Pourquoi ne pas éloigner ces Généraux inutiles et dangereux, tel que M. Chassé, Storm de Grave, Matuscwitz, gens sans moyens, et des plus mauvaises principes? A quoi bon ces commandants de places Hollandais dans les forteresses de la Flandre? On peut actuellement dire qu'on n'en a pas besoin dans ces places, et que le Roi pourra les employer ailleurs, soit pour le commandement des dépôts, du recrutement. Quelques uns peuvent même commander des bataillons de milice: partout il seroit mieux, et moins dans le cas de faire du mal, que sur la frontière de la France, où ils se trouvent actuellement.

Si le Prince Héréditaire place un officier Belge à l'état-major de sa personne, on doit être prudent sur le choix, prendre un jeune homme de famille, et plutôt regarder sur son opinion que sur ses talents. Prenant un bon officier, le choix doit tomber sur quelqu'un qui vient du service de la France, ce que seroit dangereux dans ce moment, où l'on ne peut être trop circonspect. En général il seroit à désirer qu'on agisse avec plus de prudence.

Le trop de confiance dans le moment actuel à l'égard des personnes dont la façon de penser n'est ou n'a pas toujours été bonne, peut avoir les plus malheureuses suites.

Si, comme il paroît naturel, l'expédition destinée pour Batavia et Surinam sera différée, on trouvera assez de matelots pour équiper une bonne et forte flotille sur l'Escaut et sur les autres points où l'on en aura besoin.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 3rd April, 1815.

The importance of a full explanation and knowledge of your sentiments upon all the points, political and military, of our existing situation is felt by the Cabinet to be so important and so imperfectly attainable by letter, that we have prevailed upon two of our colleagues to pay you a visit and return to us without delay.

They will inform you, that whatever qualification of the first assurances of support as given to the King of France on Napoleon's landing the disastrous change in France suggested in order to keep the question in its altered shape fairly open to concert with our Allies, there is no hesitation on the part of the Prince Regent's government (notwithstanding that the King has been obliged to leave his kingdom without a struggle) in prosecuting the war against Napoleon, if the Allies continue to consider it as the best course to be pursued, and will embark heartily in the contest.

Whatever technical difficulties we may have in arguing the declaration in Parliament, we shall have none in making the country feel that it is a most important bond of union amongst the Powers for the salvation of Europe. I only delay the official approbation till you send me the document officially in its altered form. My despatches written subsequent to the receipt of yours of the 12th, enclosing the projet of declaration, will have enabled you to give the fullest assurances of our readiness to go heart in hand with the Continent.

I am, my dear Lord, ever faithfully yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

The Earl of Mulgrave to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 3rd April, 1815.

I avail myself of the opportunity of Sir Henry Torrens's departure to write a few words to you. He will fully explain to you my readiness to endeavour to meet all your wishes; but as the reduction of the artillery (in compliance with the system of economy adopted by the government) nearly to a peace establishment considerably limits my means, and in some degree renders delay in making up companies of artillery for service unavoidable, I wish to know all you want, that all may, if possible, be provided; but at the same time I wish you to distinguish, 1st, what proportion of all is indispensably necessary; 2ndly, what next desirable, the residue being as much as you want.

A third troop of Horse Artillery is in forwardness; and as you may wish to equip your horse brigades with nine-pounders, I have ordered spare brigades of nine-pounder guns to be sent, that you may have the option of using either sixes or nines. I have appointed Lieutenant-Colonel Dickson to a vacant troop of Horse Artillery, in the hope that it may be acceptable to him and satisfactory to your Grace. This will not interfere, of course, with any mode of employing him, either as Adjutant-General of Artillery to your army, or in any other way when he comes home.

Men and horses are the only difficulty I have; but I hope that will not stand in the way of anything you wish to have till the army returns from America: I shall then be in force to meet your demands. In matériel there is no deficiency: guns, arms, powder, and ammunition of all descriptions, I can fully supply.

I am sending out another company of Sappers and Miners. The Engineer has asked that they should be sent out armed with muskets; but as I feel apprehensive that they may waste much time and labour in the care of their arms, and as those arms must frequently add to the baggage of the army, and as the employment of Sappers and Miners as escorts and guards in their own branch of service might materially diminish the number of available artificers and scientific labourers, I have demurred to the applicain rank, has been ordered thither from Sicily, your Lordship will consider my late instructions regarding Sir John Dalrymple as being cancelled; and I am to recommend that (in case it shall be his intention to remain in the Mediterranean) he should repair to the Seven Islands, where he will be placed upon the Staff as Brigadier-General.

The arrangements regarding the troops, as communicated in my despatch of the 29th ultimo, are to be carried into effect; and I am particularly to desire that no time may be lost in reinforcing the garrison of Malta by the 10th regiment.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

BATHURST.

MEMORANDUM BY MAJOR-GEN. SIR HENRY TORRENS.

Dover, 4th April, 1815.

The army in Belgium under the command of the Prince of Orange was formed of such weak corps and inefficient second battalions as had been originally sent to Holland upon a sudden emergency and in the absence of better troops; and also of the corps of cavalry and infantry of the King's German Legion which were collected in Brabant upon the close of operations in the south of France, with the ulterior view of being marched to Hanover for reduction. The troops thus composed, in addition to the Hanoverian levies, were considered a sufficient auxiliary force for the military possession of the Netherlands pending the deliberations of the Congress at Vienna; and as it was impossible to foresee that any active service would be required of this nominal force, no measure was adopted for its augmentation or for the relief of any of the corps by more efficient regiments, which were necessarily appropriated to the pressing demands of the American war. The termination of the period of service of several of the men of the German Legion also rendered many of the regiments of that corps nearly as inefficient in point of numbers as the British battalions; and owing to a stop having been put to the recruiting, this evil has had a daily increase.

The force under the Hereditary Prince thus composed consisted altogether, exclusive of the Hanoverian levies and native troops, of the numbers stated in the margin;* and upon the unexpected prospect of a war with France, it became a question, first, how this army could be immediately reinforced under the difficulties and limited means arising in the absence of the chief part of the troops in America; and secondly, what prospect could be held out of a further augmentation in the course of the ensuing summer.

The reduction of the militia, with the exception of some regiments in Ireland, had left the most confined means of performing the common garrison duties throughout Great Britain. But upon the first intimation of the change of government in France, the utmost disposable force (according to the annexed statement)* that could at that moment be fixed upon was held in readiness for embarkation, though the precautions necessary at the close of the riots in London unavoidably delayed the preparations of some of the corps of cavalry and of the Foot Guards.

In addition to this, a brigade† which had been embarked at Cork for America, under the command of Major-General Johnston, was ordered to the Netherlands.

At the period of the definitive treaty of peace with France last year, all the Dragoon regiments in the service were reduced to the amount of 320 men and 400 horses each, and the Hussars to the amount of 480 men and 560 horses each. The reduced state of these corps has, therefore, rendered it totally impracticable to afford a field establishment beyond three squadrons of 120 men and horses and five dismounted men each, for every regiment of cavalry ordered on service.

Immediate orders were, however, given for the augmentation of all the cavalry regiments intended for service by a fifth squadron and twenty men and horses per troop, and all the other cavalry corps have likewise been ordered an augmentation of ten men and horses per troop; and the bounty has been raised and the standard lowered for both cavalry and infantry.

It now remains to be seen what force can be further collected before the arrival of the troops from America; and it is difficult to speak with any accuracy on this subject, unless it were ascertained in the first place whether the English and Irish militia which still remain embodied in Ireland can be legally kept up without a fresh ballot; and secondly, whether the government decide upon the reassembly or ballot of all the militia that have been already disembodied.

Could the militia now in Ireland be retained, an immediate reinforcement of at least a brigade of cavalry and another of infantry could be drawn from that country, and a sufficient force would be left to answer all the measures of policy and precaution required by the Irish government. If, on the other hand, the militia were immediately and even partially embodied, a considerable portion of troops of the line in that country would be rendered disposable, as well as a further portion of cavalry from Great Britain.

Without looking, however, to these eventual means, three regiments of heavy cavalry, as in the margin,* will be in immediate readiness for service.

Upon the first arrangements of a peace with America, government sent instructions that the force which had been employed in the Mississippi should return to England upon Sir Alexander Cochrane obtaining information that the Treaty of Ghent had been ratified by the government of the United States.

It may, therefore, be calculated that these troops will reach England by the middle of next month at furthest; and as the corps stated in the margin † did not materially suffer in their recent operations, they may be in early readiness to proceed to Brabant.

The remaining corps of this force, consisting of the 21st, 44th, 85th, and 93rd, which have suffered in the Mississippi, will however answer for the relief of more efficient regiments in Ireland; and thus the return of the force now under Sir John Lambert may afford a reinforcement for Brabant of about 6000 men in the beginning of June.

The next reinforcement may be expected by the arrival of the troops from Nova Scotia, which, as the orders went for their recall about the middle of last month, and as there is tonnage on the spot, may take place about the middle of June; but little can be looked for from this force beyond the two regiments named in the margin. ‡

Orders were at the same time sent to Canada for the troops to be marched down to Quebec and to be in readiness for embarkation upon the immediate opening of the St. Lawrence. It is difficult to speculate with any accuracy upon the period of their arrival in England, and still more upon their state of efficiency for field service after having gone through so much in Canada. But it is presumed that they cannot arrive before the beginning of August; and if 10,000 men out of the 17,000 ordered home can be landed in Brabant by the first week in September, it is the utmost that can be looked for.

According to this rough calculation, the British force that may be assembled in Brabant by the autumn will amount as follows:—

Of which 6765 will be cavalry.

In this rough statement the reinforcements of artillery are not named, but they will be found in the accompanying memorandum.

Memorandum.

Office of Ordnance, 3rd April, 1815.

Embarked and about to be embarked for the Netherlands:
Three troops of Horse Artillery, with three brigades of 6-pounders.
Six companies of Artillery, with six brigades of 9-pounders.
Two companies of Sappers and Miners.
Four brigades of 9-pounders, with 300 rounds of ammunition for each gun.
An equipment of rockets to complete Captain Whinyates' troop, and a large proportion as a reserve.
30 drivers and 50 horses for the rocket troop.
6,000,000 of musket ball cartridges.
500,000 of carbine ditto.
500,000 of rifle ditto.
6000 barrels of powder.
20,000 stand of arms sent to Antwerp and Ostend, 30,000 embarked and waiting at the Nore, with 200 rounds of ammunition for each musket.

For arming Tournay, Ypres, and Menin:
62 24-pounders, 113 18-pounders, 113 12-pounders, 52 9-pounders, 11 10-inch howitzers, 11 68-pounder carronades, 17 13-inch mortars, 17 10-inch ditto, 19 8-inch ditto, 37 coehorns; with 1000 rounds of ammunition for each gun, 500 for each 13 and 10 inch mortar, 700 for each 8-inch and coehorn mortar, and for each howitzer and carronade. Half the proportion to be sent with the guns, and the remainder at a future opportunity.

S. R. CHAPMAN.

Three brigades of 9-pounders are preparing in case the Duke of Wellington should prefer them for the three troops of Horse Artillery, and I have recommended a battering train to be prepared so as to anticipate such a demand from his Grace.

MONSIEUR LE BARON, A Paris, le 4 Avril, 1815.

L'espoir qui avoit porté Sa Majesté l'Empereur, mon auguste Souverain, au plus magnanime des sacrifices, n'a point été rempli. La France n'a point reçu le prix du dévouement de son monarque. Ses espérances ont été douloureusement trompées. Après quelques mois d'une pénible contrainte ses sentimens concentrés à regret viennent de se manifester avec éclat; par un mouvement universel et spontané elle a invoqué pour libérateur celui de que seul elle peut attendre la garantie de ses libertés et de son indépendance. L'Empereur a paru, le trône royal est tombé, et la famille des Bourbons a quitté notre territoire sans qu'une goutte de sang ait été versée pour sa défense. C'est sur les bras de ses peuples que Sa Majesté a traversé la France: depuis le point de la côte où elle en a d'abord touché le sol jusqu'au milieu de sa capitale, jusqu'au sein de ce château, rempli encore comme tous les cœurs Français de nos plus chers souvenirs, aucun obstacle n'a suspendu la marche triomphale de Sa Majesté. Au moment où elle a remis le pied sur le territoire François, elle avait déjà ressaisi les rênes de son empire. A peine son premier règne semble-t-il avoir été un moment interrompu. Toutes les passions généreuses, toutes les pensées libérales se sont ralliées autour d'elle. Jamais nation ne présenta le spectacle d'une plus solennelle unanimité.

Le bruit de ce grand événement aura, Monsieur le Baron, déjà retenti jusqu'à vous. Je suis chargé de vous l'annoncer, au nom de l'Empereur, et de vous prier de porter sa déclaration à la connaissance de votre Souverain.

Ce seconde avénement de l'Empereur à la couronne de France est pour lui le plus beau de ses triomphes. Sa Majesté s'honore surtout de le devoir uniquement à l'amour du peuple Français, et elle ne forme plus qu'un désir, c'est de payer tant d'affection non plus par des trophies d'une trop infructueuse grandeur, mais par tous les avantages d'une honorable repos, par tous les bienfaits d'une heureuse tranquillité. C'est à la durée de la paix que tient l'accomplissement des plus nobles vœux de l'Empereur. Disposée à respecter les droits des autres nations, Sa Majesté a la douce confiance que ceux de la nation Française sont au-dessus de toute atteinte. La conservation de ce précieux dépôt est le premier comme le plus cher de ses devoirs. Le calme du monde est pour longtems assuré si tous les autres Souverains s'attachent comme Sa Majesté à faire consister l'honneur dans le maintien de la paix en plaçant la paix sous le sauvegarde de l'honneur.

as had been proposed by your Lordship, or to confine their demand to one for an alternative in the nomination of the governor, or to the demand of the nomination at some future distant period. Upon this the discussion ended, neither party having consented to anything that was proposed.

I have, &c.,

Wellington.

General Gneisenau to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duc, Aix-la-Chapelle, ce 6 Avril, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur d'accuser la réception de la lettre du 5 Avril,* dont vous avez bien voulu m'honorer. Je donnerai les ordres de faire avancer l'armée Prussienne autant qu'il est possible; mais Votre Excellence jugera mieux que persoune que je ne saurois m'éloigner de la Meuse sans danger, et ce ne sont que ses sentiments de loyauté connus et appréciés qui m'inspirent la confiance de me porter à ses désirs, et de faire un mouvement qui ne pourroit être justifié sous un point de vue purement militaire.

Daignez, My Lord Duc, agréer la considération respectueuse avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être,

My Lord Duc, de Votre Excellence

Le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

Comte de Gneisenau.

The Duke of Cambridge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duke, Hanover, 7th April, 1815.

I seize the earliest opportunity of expressing to your Grace the great satisfaction I have felt at hearing that you had been appointed to the command of the army in the Netherlands.

Lieutenant-General Decken, who commands the corps of Hanoverians now on its march to Belgium, is the bearer of this letter. I have thought it desirable that he should precede the corps in order to take your commands upon such further arrangements or alteration in the march of these troops as your Grace might think it necessary to make, as well as to afford such information upon any points concerning the corps as you may require. I shall therefore not enter into any further details in this letter, but only add, that although this corps has been raised about a year, the men have been together hardly above six weeks, having been upon the peace establishment, according to which the greater part of the men are upon furlough for eleven months of the year: they are, therefore, not in that state of drill I could wish them; the officers for the most part have never served; and indeed many vacancies have been kept open for officers of the Legion, whom I hoped to place as soon as that corps was reduced. The present circumstances are such, however, that I think every exertion ought to be used to check the monster who has invaded France; and I have therefore not hesitated to send the troops as they are: indeed I must do both the officers and men the justice to say that there is the greatest good will in them, and I have every reason to hope they will do their duty, though at the same time I have thought it right to make this statement to your Grace. The corps is not so well equipped as I could have wished, both from want of means and of time, and I have desired General Decken to explain this subject fully to your Grace.

With respect to provisioning the corps, I have already written to Sir Charles Stuart upon that point, and I have no doubt he will have spoken to your Grace upon it; and I trust you will see the justice of the representation I have made thereupon.

Before I conclude I must observe to your Grace that Lieutenant-General Decken is senior to Lieutenant-General Charles Alten, who commands the Hanoverian corps which has been, in British subsidy, in the Low Countries during the last year. As the latter was appointed by the Prince Regent to that particular command, I have thought it right to report the case to His Royal Highness, and I expect to receive an answer in the course of a fortnight, the purport of which I shall not fail to communicate to your Grace.

I remain, my Lord Duke, yours very sincerely,

ADOLPHUS FREDERICK.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 7th April, 1815.

Lord Castlereagh has told me that you have suggested, in a private letter to him, the expediency of bringing some Portuguese troops to reinforce those which are now under your command in Flanders. Torrens will probably tell your Grace that this idea had occurred already, and I will now state to you what, in conversing with my colleagues, has been stated as an objection to this description of augmentation to your forces. First, the expense of transport. I have now ascertained that we may reckon on transporting 10,000 men for 50,000*l*., which I think is somewhat less than was expected. Secondly, the time which may elapse before their arrival. On conversing with the Transport Board, it appears that the requisite number of transports for 10,000 men could be certainly procured in less than three weeks. I should doubt whether the troops, on notice now given, would not require nearly that time to be equipped ready for the voyage. The time which the voyage there and back to Ostend would require is necessarily uncertain; and the uncertainty is perhaps one of the greatest objections to the proposition. At an average, however, I think you ought to allow five weeks from the time the transports are reported ready to the time they might arrive at Ostend; but this presumes on the troops being ready to embark as soon as the transports arrive. It would, therefore, require two months from the time the orders are given to the conclusion of the voyage, and, of course, very possibly longer. The third objection which was urged was, that taking into consideration the expense of transporting them to Flanders, of transporting them back, and their pay, &c., you could have more than double the number of Germans for the same money; and it is feared that your thus preferring 10,000 Portuguese to more than double of Germans would give offence, and occasion reproaches for our partiality towards the Portuguese. Having thus given you the reasons which induced me to doubt of its expediency when I suggested the measure, I shall leave it with you to decide whether, upon consideration, you wish me to press it. If so, I am sure it will not be objected to; and I will now give such orders to the Transport Board as may tend to quicken the collection of the transports.

I am yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

I understand you have written to Marshal Beresford on the subject.

J. Frissell, Esq., to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Brighton, 7th April, 1815.

I am just arrived here from Paris, which I left the 4th of this month; and though I have not the honour of being known to your Lordship, I hope you will not take amiss my desire of giving you the latest information on the state of things in France. I perhaps know that country better than most Englishmen, having been detained there during the whole of the last war, with a permission of remaining in Paris, where I formed many French acquaintances. Mr. Curwen, a relation of mine, sent me last year a letter of recommendation to your Lordship, which I delivered to Mr. Planta; but as your Lordship went away a few days afterwards, I had not the honour of seeing you. I mention this merely that your Lordship may place reliance on the veracity of my character as well as the exactitude of my information.

With respect to the state of Paris, your Lordship must already know that almost the whole of the population of that city is against Buonaparte. The national guards are so much indisposed, that he is afraid to review them, and it is even thought he will try to disarm them. Even the inhabitants of the Faubourg St. Antoine are in low spirits, and are sorry for this new revolution, not so much from a love of the King as from the loss of trade, the fear of a foreign war, and of Paris being taken and burnt by the Allies. This fear of a foreign war has as great an effect in the provinces as in Paris. When Buonaparte was on his road to Paris, and the day he entered that city, he gave out he had signed a truce of twenty years with England and Austria, and that ridiculous news made the funds rise 6 per cent.; but since the contrary is well known, a general despondency prevails among the Buonapartists and the Jacobins who have joined them. As soon as Carnot was named Minister, his first question to Buonaparte was, "Avez vous quelques assurances de la part des Puissances, ou même de l'Autriche seule?" and upon Buonaparte's negative answer, Carnot shook his head, and said, "Vous avez encore plus à faire que vous n'avez fait." What may appear more surprising is, that the troops are by no means as satisfied as their infamous conduct would make it appear. They were quite astonished at the cold and silent reception they met with from the Parisians: many of the soldiers say aloud, "Nous croyions que la nation seroit contente de ce que nous avons fait, mais puisqu'il en est autrement nous pourrons défaire ce que nous avons fait." Two regiments of cuirassiers refused the other day to cry "Vive l'Empereur!" and it is an absolute fact that many soldiers have already deserted. As numbers of them are lodged by billet in private houses, I have heard them say, "Nous aimons mieux le Père la Violette [Buonaparte] que le gros Papa [le Roi] que nous ne connoissons pas, mais nous sommes las de guerre, et s'il faut pour cela nous battre avec toute l'Europe, nous reprendrons le gros Papa." The Old Guard, which has come from Metz to Paris, is extremely discontented. They thought Buonaparte would give them still more than what the King had promised them; but finding the contrary, many of them said aloud, if they had known that, they would have fought for the King. Their behaviour was so mutinous that Buonaparte had a moment the thought of disbanding them. The French army is now what the Roman legions were under Galbus. Nineteen Colonels have given in their "démissions," and Macdonald and Oudinot have declared they will not serve. Oudinot's letter to Buonaparte is that of an honest man: "Sire, je resterai à Metz tant que le Roi sera en France; aussitôt qu'il quittera le sol Français, je m'en irai chez moi, et arrachant mes épaulettes je m'estimerai plus heureux de vivre dans la retraite avec honneur que de rester Maréchal de France parjure." His aide-de-camp assured a friend of mine that he had delivered this letter to Buonaparte.

The opinion of several people I know in the present French council of state is that Buonaparte cannot remain six months Emperor. The greater part of his ministry, which his present weakness has obliged him to compose against his will, is against him. Fouché, Carnot, all the old Jacobins now grown rich, and all the partisans of liberal ideas, know him too well to put any confidence in him, and look up secretly to the Duke of Orleans. Luckily, notwithstanding his new pretended love of liberty, and the hum of his abolition of the slave trade which he hopes will give him partisans in England, the violence of his character has already broken out, and occasioned a very serious discussion between him and his new ministry. After having declared the liberty of the press, he has named Etienne secret censor of all the newspapers, and not an article can be inserted without the permission of that fellow. The next day, as a proof of his respect for personal liberty, he exiled twenty-five persons, the greater part of whom are most respectable judges and members of his council of state, who refused to sign the late addresses presented to him. This measure has done him more harm than if he had exiled a hundred old nobles. He has besides sequestered the estates of all the members of the provisory government, and of several officers of the King's household who have remained in France. The day before I left Paris it was a general report he had given orders to arrest all the officers of the Maison du Roi, and I know several of them who went away secretly. The best informed people about his government think that as soon as the Congress declares war (which by the way should be done as soon as possible) he will endeavour to organise the Jacobinism of 1793, hoping by that means to crush the rich Jacobin party of Fouché, &c.; and if he succeeds by revolutionary measures in preventing his being dethroned, he will then crush the sansculottes Jacobins by the army and establish a pure military despotism. I can at least give assurance as a fact, that he has had a long conversation with Real on the manner the clubs and revolutionary committees were organised in 1793. But he will not be more able to revive the Jacobinism of 1793 than the Royalists the Vendée of the same year. The low class of people have learned by long experience that they will gain nothing by new revolutions. However, Buonaparte will either get rid one way or other of the Fouché and Carnot party, or, which is as probable, he will be assassinated by them. In this latter case it is almost certain they will tell the Allied Powers, "We have got rid of the tyrant you have put out of the pale of nations, and against whom alone you are making war: now allow us to choose a prince in the Bourbon family capable of governing us, and thus keep your word, and don't interfere with our internal government, which will offer a guarantee for the peace of Europe." It does not belong to me to judge of what the Allied Powers should do, but in my humble opinion they should declare on the onset of the war they will maintain the Treaty of Paris in every article with respect to the limits of France and the rights of the Bourbon family as then established. By that means a number of people in France who might join from fear the Orleans party, which is more considerable than your Lordship perhaps imagines, would remain faithful to the King; at the same time the silly dread the French have in general of the secret views of the Allies would be done away, and Buonaparte would find no way of making the war national. The King personally is very popular, but his ministers are by no means so, and Count de Blacas is universally execrated.

With regard to the situation of the provinces in France, your Lordship knows already that all the south of France from Bordeaux to Marseilles is in arms for the King. In Provence especially the national guards are perfectly organised, and commanded by the Duke of Angoulême, who has been received at Toulon. At the same time it is evident, if the Allies don't immediately attack France, Buonaparte with 10,000 men will put an end to these Royalist dispositions in a short time. General Grouchy left Paris last Saturday to take the command of the troops who are marching against the Provençals, and General Morand is in march against Bordeaux. A few thousand English troops landed immediately at Marseilles would do more good to the House of Bourbon and to Europe than an army of 50,000 men in three months' time. The jealousy of the French would perhaps not allow the English to take possession of Toulon, and it might be wrong to attempt it: at all events the English as well as the other Powers should declare they come as auxiliaries of the King of France.

I was told lately in Paris by a person who ought to be well informed that the French army, which amounted to 85,000 men under Soult's ministry, is now of 125,000 men, and will be shortly of 200,000 men. I am certain that secret orders have been sent to the Prefects to execute the decrees of January, 1814, for levying 300,000 men on the anterior conscriptions and 120,000 on the conscription of 1814, besides a new conscription ordered for this year; but none of these measures will appear in the Moniteur. I know the Prefect of Rouen is gone to Paris to remonstrate against the execution of these decrees. However, if the Allies delay a few months attacking France, or, which would be the source of endless misfortunes, waited till Buonaparte attacked them, all these decrees would be executed and the Royalist party entirely crushed; whereas if the war is pushed on immediately with vigour, Buonaparte will not be able to raise men or money but in Paris and the neighbourhood, and that in a very small degree. He wants particularly arms, but even them he will have in a few months. As to his finances, I am certain that Gaudin, Duc de Gaëte, said last week that there were in the different caisses 150,000,000 of francs, of which only 40,000,000 in the treasury. This will last but a very short time, and if the Allies prevent the Royalist party being crushed, the richest provinces in France will be for the King. Buonaparte the other day wanted to raise a loan of 30,000,000 of francs on the city of Paris; but the Conseil Municipal told him it would be impossible to effect it.

I have thus given you, my Lord, a short and rapid sketch of the information I obtained in Paris within this last fortnight. As an Englishman and a lover of the principles which direct the Ministry of which your Lordship is a principal member, as a friend I may say of humanity and morality, I think it my duty to communicate it to you, such as it is, though probably your Lordship may have no occasion for it, and may even think it less than useless. In case, however, any part of my letter may be deemed by your Lordship worthy attention, I shall sign my name and give my bankers' address, whom I shall see to-morrow in London, that your Lordship may not at least think this is the composition of a person who tells idle stories for his pleasure.

I have the honour to be, my Lord, with great consideration,

Your Lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

J. FRISSELL.

*The Earl of Harrowby to Viscount Castlereagh.

DEAR LORD CASTLEREAGH, Brussels, Friday, 7th April, 1815.

As you will, of course, be anxious to have the earliest intelligence from us, I take up my pen in order to send you by the messenger of this evening a very hasty and imperfect summary of the intelligence we have hitherto been able to collect, desiring that you will understand it to be such, and reserving ourselves for future corrections and additions.

We arrived at Ostend on Wednesday forenoon, but were detained by want of horses till near four. We then left General Torrens behind us to take a look at the works, and reached Ghent between two and three in the morning, where we slept at Lord F. Somerset's. The next day we waited upon the King of France, who kept us an hour and a-half in conversation. Though nothing passed much worth your notice, I enclose a memorandum which we made in the chaise on our road.† Comparing it with his language to Sir C. Stuart, we were somewhat struck with two omissions of an opposite tendency: one, that of the proposed declaration of the Allies of their intention not to impose any form of government upon France; and the other, of the wish that their troops should mount the white cockade. We were, as became us, chiefly listeners. On leaving Ghent we again met the King on his return from his airing, and at the same moment met Monsieur and the Duc de Berri on their return from Brussels. The latter both got out of their carriage, and in our conversation on the road Monsieur told me, in a manner which implied that he had it from the Duke of Wellington, that Blücher and 80,000 Prussians were to be under his command. I only mention this to show how hastily and loosely he takes up information.

On our arrival at Brussels at ten, we went to the Duke of Wellington's, who soon came in, and learnt from him all the particulars of what had been passing at Vienna since the last despatches we had seen. We hope that his despatches, containing all this information, will have reached you before the debate on the Message, as they will enable you to hold a more decided language on many of the points which remained in doubt when we left London.

This morning we have again had a long conversation with him, with both your papers of memorandums in our hands. He will write his answers to all the queries; and those answers, together with such explanations and additions as we may be enabled to furnish, will, we trust, give you all the information which can at present be collected; but, en attendant, I have left Pole and Torrens with him to talk over some points of military detail, and will endeavour to give you a short aperçu. I shall take your paper of queries as my text, and to save time, refer to them by numbers, as I conclude you have kept a copy.*

1 and 2. You will find answered in great measure by the Duke's despatches, which you have already received. He thinks the spirit and decision of the Allies perfectly good; much beyond what could have been expected, and their own; not formed in consequence of any urgency on his part, as he had always stated that we should be ready to act with them, but that it was more their business than ours, as we had shown sufficiently that we were individually equal to our own defence. The obstacles to cordial union were, or might be, our refusal to add to the Russian subsidy, a refusal which the Duke thought quite necessary. The addition was asked upon the plea of an extent of exertion and a provision for a succession of armies of reserve, which, considering the forces of the other Allies, would not be wanted. 2. The vague projects of the Emperor of Russia for the disposal of the Crown of France, which seem, however, to be quite set aside, or at least thrown into the background, by his signing a treaty which has for its object the restoration of Louis XVIII.

3. The personal ill-humour of the King of Prussia, who is certainly very sore at the decision of so many points against his wishes; but the Duke thinks all this will be set right, and that his hatred and fear of Buonaparte leave no doubt of his steadiness.

4. The points in contest between Austria and Bavaria, which are, however, on the eve of a satisfactory adjustment by the abandonment of the Austrian pretensions upon Salzburg.

With respect to the amount of the subsidy, it is, of course, wished to make it larger; but that being impossible, it had been suggested by the Duke that, leaving 1,500,000*l.* to each of the great Powers towards enabling them to furnish their quotas according to the treaty, the remainder might go to some of the smaller Powers, such as Bavaria and Wurtemberg, in the same proportion to the quotas which they might engage to furnish upon their accession. With respect to the division of the 6,000,000*l.* to cover the British contingent, we stated to the Duke the ideas entertained at home, that as about 4,000,000*l.* would be required for 50,000 men, to be supported entirely by Great Britain, the remainder, of about 2,100,000*l.*, must go to assist in providing 90,000 infantry and 10,000 cavalry. He does not allow that the 50,000 men can cost near so much as 80*l.* per man, everything included; and if he can succeed in convincing the government of this, he hopes that whenever the numbers can be enlarged, it will be done. He observed, also, that the 150,000 men for which we engaged were exclusive of garrisons; and that the men in Ostend and Antwerp (of which I do not recollect the number) might be kept there as cheap, if not cheaper, than in England and as their supplies might come chiefly from thence, would not require specie. His idea of the distribution of the remaining 2,100,000*l.* is to apply a part in the first instance, perhaps to the amount of two-thirds, to the support in part of Dutch (including Belgians) and Hanoverians, exclusive of the Hanoverian Legion, which he considers as part of the British army, and to be paid exclusively by us. The rest to go partly to Hessians, Brunswickers, &c., if they can be detached from the Prussian command, and partly to Bavarians and Wurtembergers (whom he thinks Austria would be more ready to give up than Prussia to give up her dependents in the North), in case it should be thought better not to give these two Powers any share in the 5,000,000*l.* of direct subsidy, and to quarter them upon the British contingent. The Duke had opposed any definitive arrangement as to the Powers in the north of Germany so as to place them without their consent under the command of Prussia, and left this to be settled by common consent. He thinks that the distribution of this sum had better be left to his arrangement here, and is of opinion that he can prevent the troops acting with us, and only partially paid by us, from being any burden upon our finances beyond the sums stipulated to be paid.

3. Whatever may be held out, it will be impossible to prevent such an army from subsisting de facto at the expense of the invaded country; but the Duke is decidedly of opinion that the contrary principle ought to be professed, and, as far as possible, acted upon. He thinks that a plan may be concerted with the King of France for issuing bons on his account in payment of requisitions; that some French authorities might accompany the army to take the place of those which may retire; and does not foresee from this plan the inconveniences pointed out by Sir C. Stuart. I understood his sentiments on this point to be those of the Allies. He added, that even with this system it would still be necessary, with respect to the British troops (whom it was impossible to keep in order without regular supplies), to take along with them supplies for ten or fifteen days, which they would keep up as well as they could by requisitions. On these points the Duke intends to have a conference with the King of France (I believe to-morrow), and fuller explanation will be given.

4. He considers the Allies to be perfectly determined upon war, it having been decided not to receive any overtures from Buonaparte. The Prussians on the Lower Rhine, i.e., Aix la Chapelle, Mayence, Luxembourg, may be expected to amount to near 200,000 men by the beginning of May; about 100,000 Austrians on the Upper Rhine a week or ten days sooner, with 30,000 Bavarians, and a smaller proportion of Wurtembergers and other lesser Powers; the British, Hanoverian levies, Dutch and Belgians, about the same time, are calculated at 60,000 men in the field; 280,000 Russians may be expected on or near the Rhine by the 10th of May. Great, however, as the force would be (supposing it as high as 300,000 or 350,000 men), still the Duke thinks it would not be advisable to enter France before the arrival of the Russians, as the consequences of a partial check might be dangerous, and the enterprise should not be undertaken without such an overwhelming force as to ensure success as far as possible. He thinks this consideration of still more weight than the additional means which this delay would give to Buonaparte of increasing his own forces.

5. The Allies have settled no declaration, but the substance of any declaration he considers to be comprised in the treaty they have signed. The great object to be the demolition of the power of Buonaparte, as inconsistent with the general security. If the King of France accedes as a contracting party to the treaty, it seems impossible to avoid stating as the object also the re-establishment of his authority.

6 and 7. Left for concert with the King of France: more cannot be said at present.

8. The same.

9. To be fully considered, but may wait.

10. In this case the Duke thinks Buonaparte ought to be pursued wherever he may go; and if he sets up the seat of the government at any other town, Paris must be the seat of the government opposed to him.

11. If the Allies are forced to give up the prosecution of the war previous to the complete destruction of Napoleon's power, it does not seem probable they should be in such a commanding situation as to extort either dismemberment, contribution, or surrender of fortresses. If the King is replaced, any such idea would be highly impolitic.

12. The option has been made at Vienna; but though it is impossible to calculate the dangers of an unsuccessful attempt, there appears so great a probability of success with the force now about to be collected, that the attempt appears decidedly preferable to a temporary inaction. Although the forces to be maintained according to the defensive system of Chaumont might be sufficient for a very short time to overawe Buonaparte from making an attack with his present means, the expense would be very great; and as he would be perpetually and rapidly increasing his means of offence, the means of defence must be proportionably increased, with the certainty after all that he must make war, would make it at the moment of his choice, when the Sovereigns would have been separated, their armies further removed, and means afforded of sowing amongst them the seeds of dissension.

13. No plan of campaign is definitively settled. The general idea is that the whole force should enter between the Rhine and the Sambre, the Prussians composing the centre, the Austrians the left, the British the right, the Russians chiefly as a reserve. This plan is adopted with a view of making it impossible for Buonaparte to attack them in detail. The plan is to be settled, de commun accord, when the Sovereigns come down to Frankfort or Augsburg, by the Emperor of Russia with Volkonsky, the King of Prussia with Knesebeck, Prince Schwarzenberg on the part of Austria, and some person on the part of England.

14. The Allies consider themselves as being in an intermediate state, and will not declare till their forces are assembled. The Duke considers a temporary delay on this point as desirable for Belgium.

15, 16, 17, 18. Have already been answered by the Duke in his preceding despatches.

I am obliged to go to dine with the King, and must conclude, begging you to excuse the very hasty and imperfect manner in which I have executed my intention. It is not, however, I trust, materially erroneous, as the Duke, who happened to come in as I was on the point of concluding it, has read the whole of it, and does not wish to correct any part, though much remains for future explanation. I wrote without the advantage of Pole's assistance, but have had that of his subsequent inspection.

Believe me, my dear Lord Castlereagh, ever faithfully yours,

HARROWBY.

P.S.—I have not been able even to read this over myself.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

MEMORANDUM (A.) BY LORD LIVERPOOL.

London, 1st April, 1815.

At the commencement of a contest so serious and critical as that which is about to take place, it may be material to look to every contingency with a view of endeavouring to form beforehand some judgment of what may be proper to be done in each particular case as it may occur.

Considering the amount of the Allied force to be assembled on the frontier of France, and the present condition and numbers of the army of that country, as well as the unsettled state of its government, there is every reason to hope that the military operations of the Allies, if combined with prudence, may be attended with complete success. In this respect, however, our expectations may be disappointed; and they may be disappointed from various causes of a different nature, for which different remedies will be required.

First. The Allied armies may be defeated in their invasion of France. This is a contingency which, however improbable in this case, must always be considered as possible.

In such case we shall be reduced to a defensive, and in what way that defensive is to be carried on must depend on circumstances which can only be decided at the time.

But secondly, supposing the Allies to penetrate into the interior of France, and to obtain again possession of Paris, and supposing Buonaparte to retire with his army beyond the Loire, what course of military operations would it be then practicable and prudent to adopt? and what are the best means of guarding against the consequences of such an event? On this point the Duke of Wellington's opinion would be particularly desirable.

Thirdly. Supposing the French army to be so completely defeated as to make their retreat in force impossible, and supposing Buonaparte to escape personally, and to embark on board a ship of war in any of the French ports with a view of going to America; in such case he would have the same chance of returning again to France as he has lately had, and a crisis not very different from the present might again occur.

Can the two latter contingencies be guarded against in any other way than by endeavouring to get possession of some of the large fortresses in France; say, Lille, Metz, and Strasbourg, to be restored in case of complete success (viz., the destruction of Buonaparte), but in any other contingency to be held by the Allies at least for a given number of years as a security against the renewal of the same dangers to Europe?

Is it necessary for any such purpose that the movement of the Allies in force into the interior of France should be delayed? If so, this might constitute a serious objection to the proposal. But if the force of the Allies shall really amount to between 800,000 and 900,000 men, might not such an arrangement be made as would secure the acquisition of some of the most important fortresses of France before the close of the present campaign, particularly considering the defective state of defence in which some of them are at the present moment?

LIVERPOOL.

II.

MEMORANDUM (B.) BY LORD LIVERPOOL.

1st April, 1815.

1. What the sentiments and determinations of the Powers are likely to be, under the adverse circumstances which have occurred since their declaration of March 13th, 1815.

2. May it be presumed that they will cordially unite and persevere in a contest against France for the overthrow of Napoleon, under the new circumstances, upon the scale of subsidy which the Duke of Wellington has been authorised to propose to them?*

3. Supposing the Powers determined on war, within what time may offensive operations against France be entered upon generally or partially, regard being had to the supposed strength and state of the preparations of the enemy, and the importance of acting vigorously before Napoleon can have the means of calling forth the resources of France?

4. What system is it proposed to adopt on entering France, with respect to the maintenance of the Allied troops?

5. What declaration should the Allies adopt, or is the King prepared to adopt, in the present conjuncture, towards his subjects, on the entry of the Allies into France?

6. What system to be adopted with respect to organising, arming, or paying French subjects offering to enrol for the King?

7. What with respect to officers and soldiers withdrawing from Napoleon and declaring for the King?

8. What with respect to individuals or districts on the advance of the Allies declaring for the King?

9. What in case Buonaparte is obliged to fly, and should succeed in withdrawing to a neutral country, suppose America?

10. What in case the Government Archives, Courts of Justice, and Works of Art, covered by the army, should be removed from Paris, before the Allies reach that capital, either beyond the Loire or elsewhere?

* 5,000,000*l.* Subsidy; 6,000,000*l.* to cover British Contingent.

11. What measures of security, consistent with the laws of war, may the Allies look to, either upon a principle of dismemberment, contribution, or surrender of fortresses, in the event of their not obtaining the main object of security, viz., the destruction of Napoleon's power?

12. What may be presumed to be the dangers of an unsuccessful attempt by invasion to re-establish the King's authority, as compared with those of the European Powers being united in a defensive engagement, with stipulated succours, to repel any attack by France upon the limits as settled by the Peace of Paris?

13. What plan of campaign has been decided upon by the Allies, or, if not settled, by whom and when is this to be settled?

14. Do the Allies consider themselves under their declaration as at war with France, or for what further deliberation does this decision wait; and when may it be expected to be decided?

15. Where are the Sovereigns now supposed to be, and what are their intended motions?

16. What is likely to be their policy about Naples?

17. What about Switzerland?

18. How far have the arrangements agreed upon at Vienna been carried into final execution?

LIVERPOOL.

III.

MEMORANDUM (C.) BY LORD HARROWBY OF HIS INTERVIEW WITH LOUIS XVIII.

The King stated briefly the circumstances which had led to his present situation, and what he thought of the actual state of affairs. The army generally, but not universally, against him. In many regiments there were a considerable number of officers and soldiers well disposed: he believed some whole regiments; but only mentioned one, the 1st, which bore his own name, and which has since kept within the barracks. The people, excepting the countries where the Allies had chiefly acted (Alsace, part of Lorraine, Champagne, Burgundy, Franche Comté), he believed to be in his favour. His retreat was more of a triumph than his entry, because, though the people knew he was on his retreat, they showed as many overt proofs of enthusiasm as at his coming. He had little knowledge of what was passing at this moment in the south or the west; that the first attempt of the Duke de Bourbon had failed, from a misintelligence with D'Autichamps, who was not a man to be trusted.

He was aware that the general disposition in his favour was an inert disposition; and that, even where the strongest, it could not act effectually without support; but that his cause stood in some respects better than it did last year, because it might then be doubted what were the real inclinations of the people towards him, whereas now they were certain.

He had had great hopes of retaining Lille, but when it became necessary to quit it, Dunkirk was his object; that he should have succeeded from the influence of the mayor, the good disposition of a great majority of the inhabitants, and even of a part of the troops, but attributed the failure partly to the interception of some orders, and partly to the impossibility of keeping together the household troops, who, as well as their horses, were done up. His coming to Ostend was with a view to Dunkirk, and not with any idea of coming to England, although he had no doubt of the reception he should have met with.

Lord Harrowby said there could be no doubt of that, but acknowledged that his arrival there had excited considerable apprehensions that such might be his intentions, and that our fears arose from the persuasion that his retreat into England particularly might have the worst effects upon his cause in France. The King fell in with this idea most cordially, and said, "C'est là, la véritable amitié." He added that he had the greatest gratitude to, and the fullest confidence in, the Prince Regent, his government, and John Bull. Lord Harrowby said he might be perfectly sure that England would never be behindhand in the general effort of the Continent, but that we could do nothing effectual alone. He stated his perfect satisfaction in this degree of assurance, and his sense of the absolute necessity of a general and immediate effort. On the last point he laid great stress, frequently mentioned Buonaparte's great activity, and that though now to a considerable degree unprepared, he could do more in less time than another man, and that time would cool the present enthusiasm of the people. The last accounts from Vienna were excellent, but he did not particularise or mention any intelligence as from Talleyrand. A lady had heard the Emperor of Russia say that he was sensible he had been too generous to that scoundrel, but that it was the more his business to repair the fault, and that he and all his nation would use the utmost efforts to replace the King on the throne.

He urged the necessity of avoiding sieges, and making straight to Paris. Referring to the excellent effect which had been produced by the conduct of the troops under the Duke of Wellington in not living upon the country, and the bad consequences of a different conduct on the part of the Allies, in the same terms he had used to Sir Charles Stuart, he expressed a hope that the same conciliatory system might be pursued. Lord Harrowby said that even if it were possible for England to support this expense with respect to the troops under English orders, this would only aggravate the odium of a different system on the part of the other belligerents; that the march of 300,000 or 400,000 troops into France, if they were all on a plan of forbearance, would incur an expense totally out of the question; that although England would not be behindhand, it would be deceiving His Majesty to allow him to suppose that she was capable of efforts to such an extent as she had made in the two last years, during the last of which she had spent 30,000,000*l.* on the Continent. On Lord Harrowby adding that the ideas His Majesty had stated were what came naturally from the father of his people, but that we had done the impossible already, and could not do it again, he acquiesced with apparent conviction, as if he had pressed the topic from a sense of propriety rather than from a feeling of practicability, and dropped it with the expression of "We must try to consider if any arrangements can be made."

Recurring in the course of the conversation to his stay at Ostend, he said he had been happy that so many packets had left it for England, as this was a proof that, having the power of going there himself, he had not the intention. Lord Harrowby said then, and on other occasions, that what we felt to be most important was, that His Majesty should himself be able to raise his own standard in some part of France; but this never produced any indication on his part of an intention of going to the west or the south. He always recurred to his hopes of Dunkirk; and on asking him on what they rested, and with what force he meant to keep it, he referred to what he had said before, that he should have had force enough if he could have kept together his household troops, but that even now there might be force to keep it; that he should not like to introduce English troops there, although he should willingly see them in Lille, because, Dunkirk having once been English, he should be said to have sold it.

In referring to the conduct of different persons, he attributed the chief mischief to Ney. "Marmont est avec moi; il est capitaine de ma garde, et c'est fort bien. Victor est ici. Macdonald est rentré en France; a déclaré ne vouloir plus servir Buonaparte, et m'a dit que si je reviendrois en France, jé le retrouverois toujours. Mortier fait peut-être une distinction entre attachement à ma personne et au Roi, mais il a été bon pour moi. Je me flatte encore d'Oudinot par la manière dont, après avoir été attaqué dans sa maison par la populace et les soldats, il avoit simplement donné la permission d'arborer l'étendard tricolor." Of Masséna he had also hopes, on account of the troops he had sent to Gap, but had nothing to oppose to the grounds we stated for doubting him. As to Buonaparte's present means, he did not think he could bring more than 40,000 men into the field; but that unless the south and the west made a strong diversion, he would very soon have 150,000, with ample supplies of artillery for that number.

He said that the plot for carrying off the young Buonaparte, and perhaps the Archduchess, had been arranged with Madame de Montesquiou (who had asked his leave to remain six months with un enfant), and was within two days of its execution, relays of horses being ordered all the way to Paris, when it was discovered by a gendarme, who overheard a conversation, which led to the interception of some letters. That this was a most fortunate event, and it would be a great disappointment at Paris. He expressed the great pleasure he had in learning that the Duke of Wellington was to have a very extensive command. In talking of the troops to form his army, he said he thought the Belgian levies by no means to be trusted; that most of the officers and soldiers had served under Buonaparte; that even the people had a strong inclination towards France, having belonged to it for twenty years, and derived great advantages from the sale of their manufactures, of which they felt the loss; that he had been personally very well received, and they would probably have preferred being French under his government to that of Buonaparte, but might wish even for that. He did not follow these observations by any remark as to the convenience or inconvenience of his remaining here, nor stated any notion of jealousy on that account.

He said nothing of pecuniary assistance, but expressed great anxiety for arms, particularly to furnish the inhabitants in the rear of the invading army. On this topic we did not think it right to dwell, as it was a point to be discussed with the Duke of Wellington; but when he added his confidence that our arsenals were amply supplied, we said they certainly were so, though far from being what they had been, as the immense supplies to the Continent had much reduced their amount.

He repeated the hope that some vessels might be kept at his disposal to send persons to the west, and was still persuaded the Duke de Bourbon must have crossed the Loire, and must have gone into the réel Vendée. He has sent La Roche Jaquelein, I think, to Bordeaux, and was glad to hear that Colonel Jenkinson and M. de Montalembert had gone there.

He went at some length into the motives of his general conduct in France; his sense of the indisposition of the army; his hopes of attaching it; the necessity he was under of employing persons whom he could not trust, because none whom he could trust were fit to be employed; the extreme inconvenience of changing all public offices, and putting them into incompetent hands. "If it were to do over again, I do not know how I could act otherwise." "J'ai été bien trompé, il est vrai, mais je ne suis pas certain que je me suis trompé. J'aurois pu me faire tuer, il est vrai; cela m'importoit peu; 'uno avulso non deficit alter;' mais je craignois d'être fait prisonnier; peut-être m'auroit-il laissé vivre, mais ma situation comme prisonnier auroit embarrassée les affaires."

He seemed cheerful, and conversed much at his ease. On leaving him, Monsieur de Blacas, in a few moments' conversation, only expressed the horrors of their situation in never having been sure for a moment whom they could trust, so as to form a noyau; that the Garde du Corps might have been one, but they had been dispersed by the mal entendus; "des ordres interceptés, des méprises, et de la trahison."

HARROWBY.

The Earl of Harrowby to Viscount Castlereagh.

DEAR LORD CASTLEREAGH, Brussels, Friday, 7 P.M., 7th April, 1815.

I should have written to you separately on the subject of the Duke of Wellington's command, his present relations with the Prussians, and his feelings concerning it, if I had not found that he would have time himself to communicate to Lord Bathurst the cordial answer he has received from General Gneisenau, and that Pole, from whom such an explanation would come with much greater weight than from me, would also write fully on the Duke's feelings as to that point. They are, what his feelings always will be, free from any personal bias, and looking solely to the public good.

The King was extremely cordial. I had a good deal of conversation with him, both before and after dinner; but nothing occurred worth reporting, except that he took pains to let me understand that he was quite sensible of the necessity of a cordial co-operation with the Prussians, and that the inconvenience of their devouring his country was far less than that of allowing it to be devoured by the French. He expressed strongly his satisfaction at the Duke's appointment and arrival.

Lally Tolendal tells me that by the last accounts from Paris there are already great bickerings between Buonaparte and the Jacobins; that at the Council, when he puts himself into one of his old passions, he has been told that it will not do, for he is no longer what he was; and that Fouché was ready (or as some say had done so) "de lui jeter son portefeuille au nez." I only give you this for what it may be worth.

The King of France also told us yesterday that La Houssaye had stated to the person who reported it, his sense of the instability of Buonaparte's situation in the interior of France, particularly in the south and the west.

Believe me, my dear Lord Castlereagh, ever faithfully yours,

HARROWBY.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Earl Bathurst.

MY DEAR LORD, Brussels, 7th April, 1815.

We arrived here last night, and I have been so much engaged all day with the Duke of Wellington as to leave me only a few minutes to write a hurried line by the mail of this evening.

Considering that no arrangements have been made at Vienna whatever for giving the Duke any command beyond the British, Dutch, and Hanoverians, I had the satisfaction to find him altogether much pleased with the prospect before him, and perfectly satisfied of being enabled to carry all his objects into effect, by the good understanding which he can, and in fact has established, with the Prussian Commander, equally as if the latter were actually placed under his orders.

An instance of this has been afforded to-day in the ready acquiescence of General Gneisenau to move up his force to Charleroi, &c., so as to be in an immediate line of communication with our position. All this, and the difficulties which have offered in the Duke's having a more extensive command, will be explained to you by Lord Harrowby.

Your Lordship will have found by the Duke's last letter to you what force he actually requires from us, and I have explained the limits which must be put upon the immediate fulfilment of his expectations. He presses much the embodying of the militia, even in a partial degree, for the purpose of relieving all the efficient corps of the line in Ireland; and suggests whether the yeomanry of that country could not be made of use in its internal military duties.

He is anxious for a full hospital equipment from the Waggon-train only. He will depend upon the country for the other purposes to which this corps was applied in Spain.

I shall write to your Lordship more fully this evening. In the meanwhile I beg to say that I have touched upon the subject of Lord Apsley; and I find from the Duke that nothing would afford him greater pleasure than to receive his Lordship at his head-quarters. In answer to my explanation of your views respecting Seymour, the Duke has desired me to assure you that he will certainly take an opportunity of making him an aide-de-camp; but he will, notwithstanding, think it advisable to leave him to do duty with his regiment.

I remain, my dear Lord, most sincerely yours,

H. TORRENS.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Earl Bathurst.

MY DEAR LORD, Ghent, 8th April, 1815.

In my short and hurried letter of yesterday from Brussels, I stated to your Lordship in general terms that I had entered into an explanation with the Duke of Wellington of the almost insurmountable difficulties which must attend the formation of the force he states to be essential for the service of the approaching campaign. In order that he should have under his immediate view the very defective means which we possess of forming an army, I prepared at Dover a rough Memorandum of the general state of our troops, and the progressive facilities which might be afforded in the course of the next few months of forming a British army in Brabant. I enclose you a copy (No. 1) of this paper,* in which I hope you will not think that I have ventured to hold out any expectations that cannot be realized. Indeed it is more prudent in every point to avoid giving any sanguine view of our resources, considering that, from the manner in which our disposable force is scattered about the world, and the desultory services in which it has been recently employed, the chances are that any loose and favourable speculations on the subject would be attended by disappointment. Finding, however, that his Grace had estimated a force consisting of British and German Legion troops to the amount of 15,000 cavalry and 40,000 infantry, exclusive of garrisons, I have thought it essential to state the extraordinary measures which must be resorted to in order to furnish such a force, even at the close of the approaching summer. In doing this I hope your Lordship will acquit me of presuming upon any pledge as to what ought to be done to meet the difficulties of a case which comes under the peculiar consideration of the government: but the embarrassments attending the assembly of a military force at the present crisis are best explained by a statement of the measures which would be necessary to its accomplishment; and it is with this view that I have stated the embodying of the militia to be the only means of rendering the force in Great Britain and Ireland disposable for the field.

I enclose your Lordship the copy (No. 2) of a Memorandum which I have given to the Duke of Wellington,* in which I have stated, according to the principle I have now explained, how far it may be possible to meet his demand.

Looking upon this statement of our force in the most favourable point of view, it is impossible to feel easy at the present state of its reduced numbers and defective composition, considering that the military character of the country is committed by the general impression that all the troops with the Duke of Wellington come under the denomination of a British army; and it is for this reason that I feel extremely disappointed at finding that none of the Allied forces but the Dutch and Hanoverians are placed under his command. The objections and difficulties attending this desirable arrangement will have been so ably explained to you by Lord Harrowby and Mr. Pole, that I need not touch upon them, or upon any other points connected with the military and political arrangements of the Allies. But though it is not absolutely settled that the Duke is to have an addition to his present command, yet I must repeat what I said to your Lordship yesterday respecting the gratification we must all derive from his satisfaction with the existing arrangements, and his confidence in a cordial co-operation with the Prussians.

The Hanoverian levies are much superior to what I expected. The Duke means to mix them, as well as the Dutch, with our troops, according, in some degree, to the arrangements adopted with the Portuguese; and though this formation is opposed at present by the King of the Netherlands, I imagine His Majesty will yet be induced to accede to it.

I shall communicate fully with the Commander in Chief upon the Duke of Wellington's wishes respecting his staff. I am in hopes that an arrangement may eventually be made for the employment both of Lords Uxbridge and Combermere. Upon this point the Duke has been perfectly fair and reasonable, but I shall reserve the details of what he proposes until I can personally communicate with His Royal Highness. With regard to the

* See p. 49.

Prince of Orange, the Duke does not think it would at all answer to give any one the rank of a Field Marshal with the view of superseding him; but he thinks that upon any augmentation of our troops that would sanction such an appointment, it would be desirable to place a General, if not two, upon the staff of this army, senior to the Prince. The arrangement, however, which the Duke of Wellington would like of all others is the transport here of 15,000 Portuguese infantry under Lord Beresford, whose rank of Marshal on the Continent would supersede that of General, which the Prince holds in the Dutch service, without touching the old difficulty of British Generals being superseded by others in our service who have foreign rank. I ought to have mentioned before that the Portuguese plan of reinforcing this army is one upon which the Duke lays a deal of importance, and he wishes government to consider it seriously.

I found the Prince of Orange considerably cured of his huff at the interference with his generalship. Indeed he talked the matter over with me very goodnaturedly, and only complained of having been misunderstood. His explanation is too detailed, however, and this letter is already too long, to admit of my giving it to your Lordship now.

As you were somewhat anxious about Sir Hudson Lowe, I must apprise you that he will not do for the Duke. He will go on with him, however, until Murray shall arrive.

I remain, my dear Lord, ever most sincerely yours,

H. TORRENS.

We leave this to-morrow, and I shall probably be in England as soon as this letter.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Foreign Office, 8th April, 1815.

You will perceive from the enclosed that Buonaparte is trying to make mischief on the subject of our Treaty of January 3rd. I do not think he can succeed. I only mention it that you may be on the watch. My own notion is, that it is better to be silent, unless Russia or Prussia should inquire as to the fact, in which case there can be no difficulty in producing the Treaty, which, coupled with Prince Hardenberg's declaration in Conference, explains and justifies the whole. If you concur in this view of the question, I have to beg you will send a copy of this despatch with your sentiments upon it to Lord Clancarty.

Believe me to be ever, my dear Lord, very sincerely yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Sir Charles Stuart to Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Brussels, 6th April, 1815.

Although M. de Blacas assures me that, upon further inquiry respecting the papers which have been left at Paris, the original copy of the Treaty signed on the 3rd of January has been brought away from the Foreign Office, and the ratifications are still at Vienna in the hands of Prince Talleyrand, there is strong reason to believe that the person who drew out the copy for ratification has stated everything he knows upon the subject to the present government.

M. de Butiagin, the Russian chargé d'affaires, shortly after Buonaparte's arrival at Paris, requested General Vincent to inform him whether a communication he had received from Caulaincourt, which states the fact, accompanied by details which leave no doubt that the information is derived from an authentic source, may be believed, or whether it is merely to be considered an invention calculated to sow disunion among the Allies.

General Vincent having positively denied the truth of the whole, there is reason to believe that Caulaincourt's communication did not obtain that credit from M. de Butiagin in the first instance to which it is really entitled.

CHARLES STUART.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Foreign Office, 8th April, 1815.

Our discussions in both Houses last night were sufficiently satisfactory. Until we can open the whole extent of our confederacy, we must have a reserve, and it is better that our friends should be brought by degrees to look at the prospect of a renewed contest.

My despatches by this messenger to Sir Charles Stuart will give you Caulaincourt's overture and my answer. The general intelligence from France agrees with the enclosed Report, and justifies a hope that the Allies, if enabled to move early, may keep alive an important diversion in the south and west.

You will best judge whether any and what steps can be undertaken to encourage early exertion. If war is actually decided on, a movement into the interior cannot be too soon made: so far as it can be pushed forward without military improvidence, its effect must be proportionably decisive.

I have received your renewal of the Treaty of Chaumont. It will be immediately ratified; but we mean to accompany it with a declaration of the nature herewith sent. The latter branch of Article 3, which you very properly endeavoured to qualify, we think may be sustained, as declaratory of the object of the concert; and it is an engagement, although onerous in its nature, taken between parties who have a common interest in its execution. That which arises out of Article 8 stands somewhat on different grounds. In inviting the King of France, more especially when out of France, to accede to the Treaty, we deem it material to mark that the object of the alliance and concert is to destroy Buonaparte's authority, and not to impose on France any particular Sovereign or form of government. We deem this declaration not less advantageous to the King's interests in France than to the maintenance of the contest in Parliament against Buonaparte.

The Russian note you sent us contains a most magnificent display of military strength. It is before Lord Liverpool, but I am not authorized to admit that the Treasury can go beyond the 5,000,000*l.* subsidy, and the 6,000,000*l.* for our quota of 150,000 men. Out of the latter fund something may possibly be done for Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Hesse, Hanover, &c. I doubt the policy of preferring an excess of Russian force to the vigorous employment of Germans to fight for what they are hereafter to defend.

We must also recollect that the Austrian force is likely to be far beyond its quota, and that a similar claim on the part of that Court may be brought forward. I will talk this over further with Lord Liverpool, but at present we must adhere to your reserve.

Lord Bathurst writes to you about the Portuguese troops, and we rely upon your judgment for comparing the advantages of a force somewhat British against the delay of bringing and the expense of supporting and keeping it complete from so distant a point. I am not myself enabled to judge whether the Regency would take upon themselves to send them on so distant a service without express authority from the Brazils. The Prince Regent has signified his intention of not at present coming to Europe.

I do not write to Lord Harrowby or your brother, as they may be on their return. You will have the goodness to make my excuse, and communicate what I forward.

Our earnest wish was to have seen you here, even for the shortest time; but conceiving your absence might be prejudicial, we made what appeared to us the best arrangement for obtaining the advantages of a full explanation.

Whitbread did not make much last night of his attack upon your declaration.

Ever, my dear Lord, very sincerely yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

The undersigned, on the exchange of the ratifications of the Treaty of the 25th of March on the part of his Court, is hereby commanded to declare that the eighth article of the said Treaty, wherein His Most Christian Majesty is invited to accede under certain stipulations, is to be understood as binding the contracting parties, upon principles of mutual security, to a common effort against the power of Napoleon Buonaparte, in pursuance of the third article of the said Treaty, but is not to be understood as binding His Britannic Majesty to prosecute the war with a view of imposing upon France any particular form of government.

This declaration, however solicitous the Prince Regent must feel to see His Most Christian Majesty restored to his throne, His Royal Highness considers himself nevertheless called upon to make, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, as well in consideration of what is due to His Most Christian Majesty's interests in France as in conformity to the principles upon which the British government has invariably regulated its conduct.

Baron Hartemberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Bruxelles, 8 Avril, 1815.

Depuis vingt et deux ans j'ai donné à la cause qui doit à Votre Grâce les plus beaux triomphes des preuves continuelles d'un zèle ardent et d'un dévouement sans bornes. Je l'ai servie de tous mes foibles moyens, souvent au péril de ma vie, et toujours au détriment de ma fortune et de ma tranquillité. J'ai échappé à la mort comme par miracle, mais, persécuté par tous les oppresseurs de ma patrie, j'ai langui plus de cinq ans et demie dans les prisons d'Etat de Buonaparte. J'y aurois probablement passé le reste de ma vie si les troupes coalisées victorieuses n'eussent brisé mes fers le jour de leur entrée à Paris.

Mon zèle et mon dévouement ont été connus de la plupart des Ministres de Sa Majesté Britannique depuis 1794 jusqu'en 1809, et à cette dernière époque de l'illustre frère de Votre Grâce, le Marquis de Wellesley.

En cette circonstance je crois ne commettre aucune indiscrétion en m'enorgueillissant de l'honneur d'être connu personnellement de Sa Majesté le Roi des Pays-Bas, mon gracieuse Souverain, et que S.A.R. le Prince d'Orange, et le principal Secrétaire d'Etat pour les provinces Belgiques, Baron de Capellen, voudroient, j'espère, donner à Votre Grâce des renseignements très satisfaisants à mon égard.

Que Votre Grâce me pardonne ce préambule, qui m'a paru indispensable pour oser lui offrir le hommage de mes respects et de mes humbles services. Je serai aussi concis que possible pour ce qui me reste à dire.

Je suis propriétaire d'un domaine dans la principauté de Chimay et de Beaumont, et j'y avois mon habitation ordinaire.

Ce pays, intéressant sous plusieurs rapports essentiels, a été arraché de la Belgique par le Traité de Paris, et livré à une domination étrangère, justement détestée par toutes les classes des habitans. Ils sont robustes et braves; il n'y a peut-être pas un seul qui n'ait une ou plusieurs armes à feu. Ils s'en servent avec beaucoup d'adresse. Je jouis parmi eux d'une considération méritée et d'une confiance que je n'ai trompé dans aucune circonstance.

Je pourrois à volonté disposer d'un certain nombre, dont j'ai éprouvé l'intelligence et la fidélité de long tems, pour explorer en tems utile la frontière, les cantonnements, et les forteresses ennemies, et me rendre un compte très exacte de tout ce qu'il importe de connoître avec quelque certitude.

Le pays est presqu'entièrement couvert de vastes forêts. Je pourrois réunir, à un jour, à une heure et un lieu convenu, plusieurs centaines d'hommes, dont au moins cinquante à soixante d'élite et bien montés.

Un détachement de troupes régulières des environs de Charleroi pourroit être conduit avec le plus grand secret au même point, pour surprendre ensemble la place de Philippeville ou de Rocroi, qui d'ordinaire sont fort mal gardées, mais surtout la première. Cette entreprise sagement combinée me paroît immanquable.

Je n'entrerai pas dans des plus grands détails avant de savoir si Votre Grâce juge cet objet digne de son attention.

Monseigneur, l'Europe vous a proclamé le plus grand homme de votre siècle; les plus grands capitaines vous reconnoissent pour leur maître, les plus célèbres hommes d'Etat pour leur modèle. Vous êtes devenu le commun et digne objet de l'admiration et de la reconnoissance de tous les hommes, de tous les pays, quelque soit du reste la différence de leurs instincts et de leurs opinions. Recevez avec bonté l'hommage des sentimens que je partage avec le reste du monde, mais que j'ai peut-être le bonheur d'éprouver plus vivement.

Je suis, avec le plus profond respect, Monseigneur, de Votre Grâce

Le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

FRÉDÉRIC BARON DE HARTEMBERG.

General Röder to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Bruxelles, le 8 Avril, 1815.

Quoique l'armée Prussienne du Bas-Rhin ne refusera jamais de contribuer conjointement avec l'armée Anglo-Batave à la défense des Pays-Bas, elle est cependant chargée en même tems de veiller à la sûreté du pays situé entre la Meuse, la Moselle, et le Rhin, et pour réunir ces deux différents points de vue, autant que les circonstances le permettent, elle n'ose pas s'éloigner de la Meuse et des routes qui lui donnent la possibilité de marcher en cas de besoin dans une ou dans l'autre de ces deux directions, d'ailleurs la nouvelle formation et l'organisation de l'armée Prussienne en plusieurs grands corps d'armée exigent des changements, des marches par bataillons ou régiments, qui ne pourront s'exécuter qu'avec des grandes difficultés en quittant les cantonnements actuels.

Malgré toutes ces raisons et tous ces obstacles, il nous suffit que le Duc de Wellington désire nous voir plus en avant, et l'armée Prussienne obéit à ses ordres avec plaisir et confiance, heureuse de prouver par là son respect et sa soumission à un Général révéré de tout l'univers.

En conséquence les ordres sont donnés pour que le corps du Lieutenant-Général de Zieten se concentre le 10 d'Avril à Namur et environs, et de se mettre en marche le 11e pour occuper des cantonnements entre Charleroi (inc. la ville) et Namur (exc. la ville), et dans l'espace enclavée par la Meuse, la Sambre, et l'ancienne voie Romaine qui va de Binch par Ramelles à Avenne.

Le corps du Lieutenant-Général de Borstel prendra le même jour les quartiers que celui du Général Zieten occupe dans ce moment, y compris la ville de Namur.

Le corps du Lieutenant-Général Thielmann sera concentré à Liège et aux environs.

Le quartier-général se rendra à Liège le 11.

Il sera pourvu à l'évacuation du district sus-mentionné, destiné pour les cantonnements du corps commandé par le Général Zieten.

Son Excellence Monsieur le Duc de Wellington est supplié de vouloir accorder son intervention pour assurer la subsistance des troupes Prussiennes cantonnants sur la rive gauche de la Meuse, tant en vivres qu'en fourrages.

Son Excellence Monsieur le Duc n'a prononcé jusqu'ici qu'en général le désir de voir l'armée Prussienne à portée de pouvoir se joindre à l'armée

Anglo-Batave dans peu de marches, ce qui a souffi au Général de Gneisenau, confiant entièrement à la loyauté et les grandes qualités de Son Excellence, et le même sentiment lui fait espérer que Monsieur le Duc daignera l'informer du plan des opérations ultérieures, de la position actuelle de l'armée Anglo-Batave, de l'endroit où on compte de livrer bataille, de la part que l'armée Prussienne y doit prendre, et des dispositions à prendre en cas de revers, afin de le mettre à même d'entrer dans les vues de Son Excellence, et de pouvoir ordonner d'avance toutes les mesures nécessaires pour contribuer au bien de la cause commune autant qu'il dépend de lui.

LE GÉNÉRAL DE RÖDER.

[858.] To the Earl of Clancarty.

MY LORD, Brussels, 9th April, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose the copy of a letter of the 6th instant which I have received from General Gneisenau, in answer to that which I wrote to him on the 5th instant in regard to the position of the troops under his command.*

I have, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

[859.] To the Earl of Clancarty.

MY DEAR CLANCARTY, Brussels, 9th April, 1815.

It will probably be agreeable to the three great Powers to know that the King's government will be able to accommodate them with a subsidy at the rate of five millions sterling per annum. I am not, however, yet certain that it will not be necessary to give a proportion to Bavaria.

I have not yet got the official authority upon this subject, but I believe it is intended to leave the whole arrangement to me. As for the contingents of the North of Germany, it appears that Metternich has as usual left us in the lurch, notwithstanding his promises. However, I am very well satisfied if it is thought I have troops enough.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

* See p. 26.

By the present returns,

The infantry in Brabant, composed of British troops and King's German Legion, consist of	15,511
Expected immediately, and not included in these returns, viz.:
Foot Guards	1,800
14th Foot, 2nd Battalion	600
71st Do.	800
91st Do.	800
56th, 2nd Battalion	500
Total infantry	20,011
Deduct for garrisons	2,500
Total disposable infantry ..	17,511
Required	40,000
Infantry wanting	22,489

If a limited portion of the Militia should be immediately called out, the measure could not be carried into effect so as to render disposable any of the troops in Great Britain and Ireland at an earlier period than the latter end of next month, when it has been already shown that 6000 infantry may be obtained by the probable arrival of the force under Major-General Sir John Lambert.

Should government, however, determine upon embodying the Militia, it does not appear that the measure could be attended by the relief of more than four regiments of cavalry from Great Britain, and three from Ireland; and it is only by the early accomplishment of an augmentation of a fifth squadron to each regiment that so much cavalry could be spared from the interior and coast duties of both countries.*

Supposing this Militia arrangement to be immediately adopted, it might possibly afford a reinforcement of 2800 cavalry and about 4000 infantry † for Brabant.

It is just possible that an arrangement may be made for relieving two battalions of the line at Gibraltar, either by veteran battalions or weak 2nd battalions of the line. I cannot speak, however, with confidence on this point, as the garrison only now consists of 3600 men, and there are only two corps in it fit for field service. Perhaps by ordering a corps down from the Mediterranean this arrangement could be effected, and, if so, it would afford 1800 disposable infantry.

Beyond this exertion I cannot anticipate the feasibility of assembling any disposable force previous to the arrival of the army from Halifax and St. Lawrence.

The following is accordingly the state of these possible reinforcements, including what has been already stated to be expected from America :

Cavalry ‡	2800

* Such a reinforcement of cavalry would only leave three regiments in Ireland, and five in Great Britain, including the Life Guards.

† From Ireland.

‡ Consequent upon embodying the militia.

Infantry *	4,000
Do. from Gibraltar	1,800
Do. expected in May from the Mississippi	6,000
Do. from Halifax in June	1,500
Do. from Canada in September	10,000
Infantry	23,300

It will thus be seen that by deducting the above proposed reinforcement of 2800 cavalry from the number † wanting to complete the Duke of Wellington's proposed force, there will still remain the immense deficit of more than 4000 cavalry; † and with regard to the infantry, there could be little more collected by the month of September than what his Grace would require for the commencement of operations in the middle of May; and no notice is herein taken of the casualties which even in the ordinary course of the service must occur in the existing force in Brabant, and to meet which we can only depend on the recruiting.

H. TORRENS.

N.B.—The force would be eventually as follows:

Cavalry:
Present and expected	7,892
Reinforcements	2,800
	10,692
Infantry:
British and Germans, deducting 2500 for garrisons..	17,511

Bruxelles, le 9 Avril, 1815.

Vous avez lu, mon très cher Général, le petit mémoire que j'ai adressé hier à Milord Duc Wellington. Ne le trouvant pas chez lui, je n'ai pas pu le présenter moi-même, et je l'ai laissé à son hôtel. Vous y avez vu les points sur lesquelles le Général Gneisenau désire d'être informé, et j'ose vous inviter d'employer tout votre crédit pour que le Duc y réponde le plus tôt que possible, parceque je crois que cela est de la plus haute importance pour le bien de la cause commune.

Vous n'ignorez pas les raisons qui obligent l'armée du Bas-Rhin de ne pas trop s'éloigner de la Meuse, et vous conviendrez qu'elles sont bien fondées: ces mêmes raisons lui font plus craindre que désirer une bataille entre Bruxelles et les frontières, qui en cas de revers auroit les suites les plus fâcheuses pour elle, en lui coupant sa retraite derrière la Meuse, et en laissant à l'ennemi la liberté de s'avancer par Liège vers le Rhin, où se trouvent tous les points de rassemblement pour la formation des armées

* Ditto, exclusive of what will be drawn from Ireland.
† Wanting, 7108; deduct, 2800; remaining deficit, 4308.
‡ Blank in manuscript.

Prussiennes venantes de l'intérieur, et destinées à faire la guerre de ce côté-ci—vous sentez vous-même, cher Général, sans que j'ai besoin d'en développer des détails, quel malheur affreux ce seroit pour nous tous, si ces formations seroient interrompues et dérangées avant d'être finies; et que probablement cela nous ferait perdre les avantages de toute une campagne, peut-être de toute la guerre.

Ces considérations doivent nécessairement gêner le Général commandant en chef l'armée du Bas-Rhin, et lui donner des vives inquiétudes sur les chances d'une bataille, aussi longtems qu'il est chargé de la responsabilité des suites. Le Général Gneisenau a bien prouvé qu'il désire sincèrement d'opérer de concert avec Milord Duc Wellington en faisant avancer les troupes sous ses ordres sur les points où on les a demandés, sans même attendre qu'il fut instruit du plan général: cependant cette condescendance à la volonté du Duc, suite d'une confiance sans bornes accordée à la personne du plus grand général de l'Europe, ne doit pas être considérée encore comme le consentiment décidé de s'exposer dans tous les cas au sort d'une bataille en avant de Bruxelles, et dont les suites, supposant la possibilité qu'elle fut perdue, seroient trop funestes pour nous.

Le Général Gneisenau espère que le mouvement en avant de l'armée Prussienne, et son rapprochement à l'armée Anglo-Batave, suffira pour imposer à l'ennemi et pour l'empêcher de tomber sur celle-ci avec toutes ses forces; et c'est en partant de ce point de vue qu'il y a consenti, sans cependant s'engager au delà. C'est ce que j'ai l'ordre de vous dire de sa part; mais j'ose y encore ajouter de la mienne qu'il me paroît que toute cette affaire dépendra des communications que le Duc Wellington daignera faire à M. de Gneisenau, et que par conséquent je reviens à la nécessité et l'importance de ce qu'elles se fassent le plus tôt que possible.

L'amitié et la confiance que vous avez inspiré à nos chefs, et à tous les Prussiens qui jouissent de l'avantage de vous connoître, leurs font espérer que vous ne refuserez pas d'être l'interprète de nos sentiments auprès de Milord Duc Wellington, dont toute l'armée Prussienne est jalouse de mériter la bienveillance et le contentement. C'est pour cela que je suis chargé positivement de m'adresser à vous dans toutes les circonstances, ce que je fais avec le plus grand plaisir, rien n'égalant la haute et parfaite considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être,

Mon très cher et très honoré Général,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

F. RÖDER.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Colonel J. Colborne.

MY DEAR SIR, Mons, 9th April, 1815.

By one of the confidential persons employed by me, just returned from the frontiers, I find the French have not yet assembled anywhere in our neighbourhood a considerable corps. The regiments are marching forwards and backwards so often that it is difficult to follow their movements, particularly as it happened several times that regiments on their march received contre ordre, and returned; so that you got a report from one man such a regiment is marching in such a direction, and from another man you got a contrary report, which is equally true. The man I am now speaking of, found at Maubeuge, on the 6th instant, the 13th dragoons, 3rd and 76th line; and the 4th Chasseurs à cheval, and 1st of the line, on their march to Maubeuge. The 1st of the line has since been marched again to Valenciennes, and from thence to Douai; the 76th line was also under orders yesterday to march to Valenciennes. Some squadrons of the 4th Chasseurs arrived yesterday at Salre sur Sambre and Beaumont.

The above mentioned man found at Cambrai, the 7th instant, from 4000 to 5000 infantry, and two regiments of cavalry, of which one was the 9th Chasseurs; the same day at Douai, the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 57th line, and three regiments of Cuirassiers, one of which had orders to march to Metz. At Lens he found, on the 8th instant, about 4000 infantry. I forgot to mention at Douai a train of field artillery, and all the troops under the command of General Cosselly.

By another man I learn this morning that several regiments entered yesterday at Valenciennes, which is represented as very crowded this moment.

Several French officers on half-pay are returned from Paris without having been employed.

Believe me, my dear Sir, most faithfully yours,

DÖRNBERG.

Sir C. Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Brussels, 9th April, 1815.

I have the honour to transmit your Grace the accompanying copy of a letter I have received from His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, announcing the march of the Hanoverian army of reserve to Antwerp, and requesting that measures which are necessary to ensure their regular supplies should be adopted as early as the time will admit.

Presuming that the general arrangements of the army under your Lordship's command will be applicable to the Hanoverians, I cannot better forward His Royal Highness's wishes than by adding the enclosed march route and the returns of this corps.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

CHARLES STUART.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

The Duke of Cambridge to Sir C. Stuart.

SIR, Hanover, 4th April, 1815.

The messenger Vick arrived here this morning at half-past six o'clock, and delivered me your letter dated Brussels, 30th March, containing one enclosure.

I have in consequence given the necessary orders for the immediate march of the troops, which they will begin on the 9th instant: they are directed upon Antwerp, where they will expect to receive further orders from the Duke of Wellington.

There are two brigades of artillery already marched, and two fitting out, which I trust will be ready in a very short time.

There is, however, a point which I find it my duty to press most seriously upon your attention, which is the provisioning this corps. The expense of its outfit has, you will easily conceive, been enormous, and a very severe drain upon the funds of this country.

All the troops of the German Sovereigns have, the moment they left their own country, lived at the expense of that in which they were serving, or, at most, given bonds for future payment.

This corps, being the contingent of Hanover for the army of Germany, is entirely paid by this country, and it will therefore be an injustice towards Hanover to make it incur an additional expense for provisioning these troops, which the other countries do not.

Should, however, His Majesty's government have exempted Belgium from this burden, I trust that it will also provide for this Hanoverian corps from the time it enters the Netherlands. In the mean while I trust they will be furnished with provisions by the Belgic government, and I request you will make the necessary arrangements upon this head with that government.

A requisition for the passage of the troops through Holland has been sent to the Secretary of State, Baron Nagell, at the Hague.

I enclose a list of the troops, which I have been prevented from sending before, with their route.

I remain, &c.,

ADOLPHUS FREDERICK.

Bruxelles, le 9 Avril, 1815.

COUP D'ŒIL sur l'Esprit Public à Paris et en France en général depuis l'arrivée de Buonaparte dans cette Capitale; sur les Forces actuelles de l'Armée; et sur l'Opinion que le Peuple manifeste tant à l'égard de Louis XVIII. que de Buonaparte.

Je ne dois résumer les événemens que depuis le 26 Mars, jour où Lord FitzRoy Somerset, Ministre Plénipotentiaire de Sa Majesté, a quitté Paris, et auquel au moment même de monter en voiture j'ai fait remettre ma dernière note (No. 40).

Les dix jours qui suivirent l'arrivée de Buonaparte dans la capitale ont été employés à passer en revue les nombreuses troupes qui se succédèrent tous les jours. L'enthousiasme qu'elles faisaient éclater dans ces occasions tenait plutôt de l'ivresse que d'une joie raisonnable et fondée sur une perspective assurée d'un avenir certain. En un mot, ces scènes réitérées tous les jours, et les réjouissances bachiques qui ont eu lieu jusqu'au 5 de ce mois, de la part d'environ dix ou douze mille officiers, qui se rassemblaient dans les endroits publics, en chantant la gloire de Buonaparte, avec cette joie bruyante qui ne convient qu'à des soldats rassemblés dans un cabaret—ces scènes, dis-je, ont parfaitement rappelé l'image des premières époques de la Révolution. Je puis pourtant assurer que les habitans de la capitale gémissaient sur ces extravagances, et gardaient un morne silence. Dimanche dernier a été réservé pour la scène la plus scandaleuse, qui met bien bas le caractère de Buonaparte, et qui annonce la faiblesse de ses moyens, tout en prouvant qu'il n'y a pas de sorte d'humiliation à laquelle, dans l'incertitude de son entreprise, il ne s'expose pour gagner l'amour des militaires.

Je ne parlerai point de cette scandaleuse procession que Votre Excellence connait déjà par les journaux; j'ajouterai seulement que, dans l'état d'ivresse où était cette troupe d'officiers, elle inspira aux spectateurs le plus profond mépris pour celui qui était l'objet de cette fête bachique. Buonaparte sait fort bien comment exciter l'enthousiasme des soldats, en leur prodiguant l'argent dont il peut disposer. Les officiers en demi-solde ont reçu des gratifications, dont un mois leur a été sur le champ payé, en attendant le reste.

Le palais des Tuileries est environné de la plus profonde tristesse. On dirait qu'il est couvert d'un crêpe funèbre; la luxe, la représentation en sont bannis, et il ressemble plutôt à un camp avant la bataille qu'à un séjour destiné à la Majesté royale. On y voit tristement arriver quelques voitures dont les maîtres sont mandés pour recevoir des ordres. Les journaux, au dépit de la liberté de la presse, représentent tout cela en beau, et les mêmes mensonges y sont débités dont on voyait autrefois fourmiller ces papiers mercénaires d'un gouvernement éminemment fourbe et trompeur. Néanmoins, toutes ces fanfaronnades n'en imposent point au peuple Français; naturellement inconstant, il revient bientôt de son illusion, et se met à la portée de mesurer le profond abîme qui s'entr'ouvre sous ses pas. Buonaparte, qui craint la lumière de la vérité, craint aussi que le peuple ne découvre la nullité des moyens que cet usurpateur voudrait employer pour le tromper de nouveau. C'est pourquoi il fait répandre et renouveler chaque jour le mensonge de la prochaine arrivée de l'Archiduchesse Marie-Louise; parcequ'il sait que son salut tient à ce mensonge. C'est encore pour cette raison qu'il fait parler dans les journaux des équipages qu'on prépare pour cette princesse, des préparatifs qu'on fait dans ses appartemens, de l'arrivée et du départ de courriers pour Vienne. Enfin il a fait répandre dans les sociétés de la capitale le retour de Madame de Montesquiou et du Comte Bausset, Chambellan de Marie-Louise, pour faire accroire que ces deux personnes ne faisaient que devancer cette Princesse.

Il est vrai de dire que le peuple attache un si grand prix au retour de Marie-Louise, que dans tous les endroits où j'ai passé depuis Paris jusqu'à Valenciennes on se portait en foule sur mon passage pour savoir si elle était déjà arrivée; et lorsque je répondis qu'elle était encore à Vienne, je lisais la consternation sur le visage des questionneurs, qui s'écrièrent, "Oh! si elle ne vient pas, nous sommes perdus; son père sera contre nous." On cherche à accréditer la nouvelle de la prochaine arrivée de Marie-Louise même parmi les troupes, et j'ai entendu dire à des officiers à Valenciennes qu'il n'y avait rien d'aussi sûr que son arrivée. Mais lorsqu'une fois ce prestige sera dissipé, leur langage changera avec leur opinion.

Le gouvernement de Buonaparte s'efforce de feindre la plus parfaite sécurité, ce qui fait que les neufs-dixièmes de la population ne croient point à la guerre. Aussi le premier coup de canon tiré de la part des Puissances Alliées sera-t-il un coup de foudre pour toute la nation.

L'état des forces de l'armée Française, tel qu'il m'a été communiqué par un employé de la guerre, était, le 1er de ce mois, porté à 200 mille hommes effectifs; mais les hommes qui devaient compléter les cadres des régimens pour produire ce nombre n'étaient pas encore répartis dans leurs corps respectifs, et leur complétement exige encore environ trois semaines.

Le matériel de la guerre, le train d'artillerie, les chevaux, les fusils, manquent en grande partie; aussi à peine évalue-t-on la cavalerie actuellement montée à 20 mille hommes. Cependant, on voit presque tous les jours arriver une petite quantité de remontes, qu'on envoie des provinces.

L'état obéré des finances cause encore un plus grand embarras, et l'on pense que si la guerre a lieu, Buonaparte sera forcé d'émettre du papier-monnaie, ce qui achevra de le ruiner entièrement dans l'esprit du peuple.

Cependant, il ne faudrait pas laisser beaucoup de tems à cet homme actif et entreprenant. Le coup qui sera porté le plus promptement sera aussi le plus décisif. Quoiqu'il n'ait pas encore osé rendre un décret pour faire revivre la conscription, il a néanmoins envoyé aux préfets des départements l'ordre de faire rentrer dans l'armée tous les hommes qui ont servi, et d'employer en outre le moyen de procurer le plus grand nombre d'hommes possible par une espèce d'enrôlement volontaire, mais qui en effet devient coërcitif.

Il cherche aussi à rendre la guerre tout-à-fait nationale par la déclaration qu'il a faite que le peuple était tout, et que le Souverain n'était sur le trône que pour servir le peuple, maxime dont il compte tirer le meilleur parti en armant toute la nation. Déjà il cite l'exemple de 1792; déjà il jette l'alarme parmi les acquéreurs des biens nationaux, afin de trouver dans cette classe des citoyens de bras et de l'argent.

Quant à l'opinion générale sur l'état actuel des choses, elle est certainement contre Buonaparte. On est convaincu et on l'avoue hautement que sans l'existence de cet homme la France allait jouir tranquillement de son commerce et son industrie, et qu'elle aurait gagné en prospérité ce qu'elle a perdu en gloire. Cependant, je dois dire ici avec la même franchise qui préside à tous mes rapports, que l'opinion publique n'est pas non plus en faveur des Bourbons. On plaint sincèrement le Roi ; mais il n'y a pas de Français, si j'en excepte les émigrés et les personnes qui espèrent des places, qui désire le retour des Bourbons. Ils se sont perdus dans l'esprit de la nation par l'abandon qu'ils ont fait aussi légèrement d'un trône sur lequel ils n'ont point été appelés. Le Roi, malgré ses excellentes qualités, que tous les Français reconnaissent en lui, a malheureusement repoussé l'amour de la nation en s'entourant de ministres qui n'ont cherché qu'à le rendre odieux, en faisant revivre d'anciennes haines et d'anciennes animosités.

L'armée surtout montre de la répugnance pour les Bourbons, répugnance à laquelle le Duc de Berri a principalement contribué par sa conduite exaspérante. De l'autre côté, les officiers et les soldats parlent avec éloge du Duc d'Orléans, qui a acquis beaucoup de popularité dans les derniers événemens. On répète de bouche en bouche ses derniers paroles à la garnison de Lille : "Soldats," disait-il, "si en vous quittant je dois regretter quelquechose, c'est de ne pouvoir pas compter parmi les généraux Français. Vous savez que, jeune encore, j'ai combattu avec vous et pour vous, et vous pouvez être persuadés que vous ne me trouverez jamais dans les rangs des ennemis de la France."

Cette dernière phrase a, dit-on, excité parmi la garnison le plus vif enthousiasme, et le Prince fut couvert des cris "Vive le Duc d'Orléans!" On ajoute que dans toutes les forteresses où il a passé il a recommandé de n'en rendre aucune à l'étranger, de quelque part que vinssent les ordres de le faire.

Mais pour revenir sur l'objet principal, il faut dire que quel que soit le sort réservé à la France, les événements qui ont eu lieu depuis le 30 Mars, 1814, jusqu'au 20 Mars de cette année, ont prouvé que la nation Française, tant qu'elle aura quelque consistance de force, ne laissera point en repos le reste de l'Europe. Sous le règne court des Bourbons le langage du gouvernement commençait déjà à prendre un ton qui ne ressemblait pas mal à celui qu'aurait pris Buonaparte s'il avait continué de régner suivant le Traité de Paris. Le peuple Français, aujourd'hui sans caractère moral, avide de nouveautés, tourmenté par le présent et inquiet de l'avenir, doit être renfermé dans des bornes qu'il ne puisse pas franchir ; autrement point de paix durable, point de repos. Voilà la langage des Français eux-mêmes qui ont encore conservé un jugement sain et de la rectitude.

Lignes occupées par l'Armée Française.

Toute l'armée est repartie en six divisions ou corps d'armée.

La 1ère s'étend sur la ligne de Lille, Douai, Arras, etc., et est commandée par le Général Excelmans.

La 2ème va depuis Calais jusqu'à Dunkerque, sous les ordres du Général Reille.

La 3ème, commandée par le Général Erlon, est tracée depuis Dunkerque jusqu'à Verdun.

La 4ème s'étend depuis Verdun jusqu'à Landau, sous les ordres du Général Lobau.

La 5ème, commandée par le Général Girard, va jusqu'à Strasbourg. Enfin,

La 6ème est confiée au Maréchal Suchet, et s'étend jusqu'à Huningue. (C'est à tort que les journaux ont donné ce commandement au Maréchal Ney.)

Sur toute la route, depuis Paris jusqu'à Péronne, je n'ai pas rencontré un seul soldat, un seul chariot de munitions, ou tout autre objet qui indiquerait des préparatifs militaires. A Péronne, qui nage pour ainsi dire au milieu des eaux, il n'y a qu'un bataillon. Le 8ème régiment de dragons, qui y était, est parti pour Lille, le 5. Je n'ai aperçu que deux pièces de canon dans la partie de la place où je suis entré.

On travaillait à des batteries à Cambrai, et les palissades devant la porte de Bouchain n'avaient été commencées que depuis quelques jours. La porte de sortie était déjà condamnée le 6. La garnison était composée de deux régimens d'infanterie, dont le 23e, et d'un régiment d'artillerie. Il paraît que toutes ces places manquent de canons de gros calibre ; car je n'ai vu en batterie que des pièces de campagne.

Valenciennes, qui est dans un bon état de défense, ne renferme que 4000 hommes de garnison, dont le 1er régiment d'infanterie, ou régiment du Roi, et le 7e de hussards font partie. Les soldats de ces deux régimens se livrent souvent des combats. C'est ce régiment de hussards qui, le sabre à la main, a forcé les habitans à arborer la cocarde tricolore ; et comme le 1er régiment manifeste quelque attachement au Roi, il s'ensuit de fréquentes querelles, et il a déjà péri des deux côtés plusieurs militaires.

Du reste, la sécurité de Buonaparte est inconcevable sur cette partie ; il porte toutes ses forces sur Lille et aux environs, qu'on évalue à 40,000 hommes, et je puis assurer que dans ce moment dix mille hommes se rendraient les maîtres de tous les pays aux environs de Valenciennes, sans coup férir.

Bordeaux s'est enfin rendu, parcequ'il ne savait ou il ne voulait pas se défendre. Si l'on avait encore laissé quelque tems au Duc d'Angoulême pour armer les corps qu'on rassemblait depuis Toulon jusqu'à Nîmes, les affaires dans le Midi de la France auraient pris une tournure favorable. J'ai vu une lettre du chef de l'état-major à Nîmes, en date du 25 Mars, qui disait, entre autres : "Nous avons avec nous depuis huit jours le Duc d'Angoulême, et nous nous occupons à former un corps de cent mille hommes, si Buonaparte nous en laisse le tems."

En dernière analyse, si, d'un côté, la masse des soldats est entièrement portée pour Buonaparte, de l'autre il y a beaucoup d'officiers généraux et autres qui ne favorisent que faiblement le projet de ce chef ; et je puis affirmer avec assurance que la nation en général n'est pour rien dans ce changement inattendu du gouvernement. C'est la force armée qui a fait tout, et par cette même raison la nation paraît concentrer en elle-même la force qu'elle pourrait déployer dans toute autre circonstance qui ne serait point contraire à ses sentimens ; et voilà précisement c'est qu'il faudrait prévenir par un coup prompt et décisif.

MONSIEUR, Paris, ce 9 Avril, 1815.

Je ne doute nullement où vous aurez reçu ma dernière, du 6. Depuis il n'y a rien de nouveau; tout le monde croit à l'arrivée de l'Impératrice et du Roi de Rome. Tout est très tranquille. On n'entend parler de Buonaparte que par les gens attaché à son service, et quelque écume du bas peuple que l'on croit payé pour le prôner. Toute la journée l'on voit au palais de Tuileries un rassemblement de 400 personnes, qui ne cesse de crier. Veuillez me faire savoir si je dois encore demeurer ici, pour prendre mes arrangements en conséquence. En attendant, j'ai l'honneur d'être, avec la plus parfaite considération, Veuillez me répondre par la même voie que la présente, et si toutefois que je dois rester, pour lors il serait très nécessaire d'avoir un homme qui reste dans une autre ville, car le chemin a trop de distance pour travailler avec assurance.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 10th April, 1815.

A battalion of veterans, one thousand strong, will be collected and sent to Ostend the beginning of next week, and another will, I hope, be collected of the same force the following week. Your Grace will give what directions you think proper for the disposition of the first, and inform me whether the second shall be sent to Ostend also, or to Antwerp. They will both serve to relieve more efficient corps which may be in garrison at Antwerp, Ostend, &c.

The 2nd battalion 59th, which sailed from Ireland full three weeks ago for Ostend, but had not since been heard of, I am happy to say have arrived in Wales, and have again sailed for Ostend.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Major-Gen. T. O'Loghlin to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, London, 10th April, 1815.

The kind attention which I have at all times experienced from your Grace emboldens me to trouble you on the present occasion; and I feel persuaded that my motive in doing so will be a sufficient apology for the liberty I take.

When I was first appointed to the staff of the army, then in the Peninsula, my health was in a very bad state; and before I could proceed to join it, I was seized with a dangerous complaint, which prevented the possibility of my doing so at the time. Immediately upon my recovering sufficiently to undertake a sea voyage, I solicited and obtained my real-pointment long before my state of health justified it in a prudential point of view. It is not necessary for me to express the anxiety I felt to have an opportunity of upholding my former military character, nor the mortification I experienced at being deprived of such opportunity by accidents which in no way depended on me, and ultimately by the abrupt termination of a campaign at a period when your Grace gave me reason to hope that one would speedily occur.

Having now had the honour of being known to your Grace upwards of twenty-five years, and trusting that you may retain some recollection of my long service in the Line, more particularly in Flanders, I avail myself of the circumstance of the Military Secretary to the Commander in Chief being on the spot, to request that your Grace will be pleased to name me (either through him or in any other manner that your Grace may think proper) to His Royal Highness to be employed on the staff of the army under your Grace's command. This distinction, which I solicit at your hands, would be so gratifying to my feelings as a soldier, that I should not readily forget the obligation, nor, I trust, eventually discredit your Grace's recommendation.

I have the honour to remain, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most faithful and obliged humble servant,

T. O'LOGHLIN.

[I am very sorry that the army is very small and the staff very numerous, and there are no means of employing him.

WELLINGTON.]

[860.] To Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

MY DEAR LORD, Brussels, 11th April, 1815.

Lord Harrowby will have informed you that a person had spoken to me on the night before we quitted Ghent, on the part of Fouché, as well as of the impression which that person's conversation made upon me.

I have since seen Monsieur, who had sent that person to me, having previously informed me that he wished to speak to me; and he told me that the truth was that the Jacobin party in France, and a great proportion of the army, looked to place the Duc d'Orléans on the throne. Monsieur protested repeatedly that he entertained no suspicions of the Duc d'Orléans, but that he was certain the subject had been more than once mentioned to the Duc, and that he could not help thinking that his conduct in absenting himself from the King at the present moment was very extraordinary. I told him that I thought he ought to attribute his conduct to two motives: first, his desire to see his family; and, secondly, his feeling that he was unjustly suspected by the persons about the King, and his desire to keep out of the way on that account.

I think it proper to mention this circumstance immediately to you, in order that you may be prepared with a decision, or that at all events you may make me acquainted with the principles on which you think our language and conduct ought to be guided in regard to it.

I entertain no doubt that the Duc d'Orléans is thought of. I heard of such a notion when I was at Paris; and you will observe that the calling the Duc d'Orléans to the throne is the only acceptable middle term between Buonaparte, the army, and the Jacobins on the one hand, and the King and violent émigrés on the other. I understand that the army showed a good disposition towards the Duc d'Orléans on his journey to and from Lyons and in the northern departments; and that the commanding officer of one regiment in particular, on its march to join Buonaparte while the Duc was returning from Lyons, said to him that, as he could not accept them, they were under the necessity of taking the step they had taken. Marshals Macdonald and Mortier, I understand, likewise expressed themselves very strongly to him, and their expectations that they should see him again in less than six months under happier circumstances. Notwithstanding the respect and regard I feel for the King, and the sense which I entertain of the benefits which the world would derive from the continuance of his reign, I cannot help feeling that the conduct of his family and of his government during the late occurrences, whatever may have been his own conduct, must and will affect his own character, and has lowered them much in the public estimation.

There is another circumstance bearing upon this subject which deserves your serious consideration. The Emperor of Russia detests and is decidedly against the Bourbons. If Buonaparte should be assassinated or killed in battle, or in any other manner put out of the way, he will in my opinion adopt any third person instead of the King; and I know he has gone so far as to think of marrying the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg to his sister, and of making him King of France. That such third person will be proposed by the army, and those who have conspired with the army to overturn the King's government, there cannot be the smallest doubt; and it is necessary that you should be prepared with a decision in what manner you will receive the proposition.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

[861.] To Earl Bathurst.

MY LORD, Brussels, 11th April, 1815.

I enclose copies of a further correspondence which I have had with General Gneisenau.

Having learnt that General Gneisenau had found upon M. Reinhard, the Under Secretary in the Foreign Department at Paris, who had been arrested at Aix-la-Chapelle, a copy of the Treaty of Vienna of the 3rd of January last, which had created a good deal of jealousy and ill-temper in the minds of the Prussian officers, I thought it proper to send Colonel Hardinge,* who is here, to remain at General Gneisenau's head-quarters; and I have desired him to explain confidentially the circumstances under which the treaty had been concluded, and to show that the alliance terminated with the circumstances which had occasioned it, if the subject should ever be mentioned to him.

I have likewise desired him to tell General Gneisenau that if he is not satisfied with the position in which I have placed his troops, I beg he will place them as he thinks proper, as from the arrival of reinforcements from England and Holland I shall find myself secure in my position in front of Brussels.

I have, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

[862.*] G. O. Brussels, 11th April, 1815.

1. His Royal Highness the Prince Regent having appointed Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington to be Commander of His Majesty's forces on the continent of Europe, all reports are in future to be made to his Grace.

* * * * *

49. It being desirable to amalgamate the two armies, Anglo-

* Afterwards Lord Hardinge.

Hanoverian and that of the Netherlands, in order that the troops which are to act together may be accustomed to each other, and that the whole consolidated force may with facility move in one uniform manner, having one great object in view:

50. The infantry and artillery, therefore, of the allied armies will for the present be divided into two great corps; the first of which will be under the orders of His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, and the second under the command of Lieutenant-General Lord Hill.

51. The 1st corps will be composed of the troops Anglo-Hanoverian, as follows, viz.:—The 1st and 3rd divisions of infantry, with the artillery attached to them, and the following troops of the Netherlands, viz., the 2nd and 3rd divisions of the army of the Netherlands, with a battery of foot artillery, and a battery of horse artillery, and the division of cavalry of the Netherlands.

52. The 2nd corps will be composed of the troops Anglo-Hanoverian, as follows, viz.:—The 2nd and 4th divisions of infantry, with the artillery attached to them, and the 2nd brigade of cavalry of the King's German Legion, and the troops of the Netherlands as follows, viz., the Indian brigade and the 1st division, with a battery of foot artillery, and a battery of horse artillery.

53. His Royal Highness Prince Frederick of Orange will command the troops of the Netherlands in the 2nd corps, under the orders of Lieutenant-General Lord Hill.

54. The Staff of the army of the Netherlands will remain attached to His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, and His Royal Highness will have the goodness to make arrangements for attaching to the 2nd corps such staff officers as may be necessary.

55. Notwithstanding this amalgamation, everything which regards the discipline of the officers and soldiers of each nation, the provisioning, the clothing, the equipping, the means of transport, &c., &c., will be under the direction of the officers, civil and military, of each nation. The General commanding each corps d'armée will give orders for all other matters.

56. The mails for England are to be made up and despatched from Brussels at eleven o'clock A.M. on Tuesdays and Fridays, until further orders.

WELLINGTON.

Notes from Ghent.

11 Avril, 1815.

Le nombre de troupes qui composaient les garnisons de Bouchain, Cambrai, et Valenciennes est estimé à environ 5600 hommes. On dit que ces troupes doivent former un camp près de Valenciennes, à Famars.

Quesnoy était sans troupes le 4 Avril. Il n'y avait qu'une dixaine de Lanciers à Comines.

Rear-Admiral T. B. Martin to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Brussels, 11th April, 1815.

Admiral Martin is arrived in the Scheldt with a small squadron of ships to cooperate with His Majesty's land forces, and he is instructed to open a communication with the Commander in Chief of the Forces, to ascertain the nature and extent of the cooperation that he may be likely to require for maintaining the naval defences of the line which the Commander in Chief may take for his operations.

Whenever the Commander in Chief of the Forces will point out the nature, extent, and particular places of cooperation, the force and disposition of the ships will be regulated accordingly.

In the mean time it is desirable that a particular place should be fixed upon for the transports which daily arrive with military stores and provisions; and twelve vessels so laden are now waiting off Flushing for orders.

Admiral Martin begs to submit to the consideration of the Commander in Chief, whether the anchorage at the mouth of the Ghent Canal, or Turneuse, will not be the most convenient place of rendezvous for the transports, from whence the Admiral believes (according to the accompanying replies to his inquiries) that there may be found means of conveying stores to Ghent, if required; and any transports which may be wanted at Antwerp can go there generally in one day from the anchorage in question.

Admiral Martin having placed the men-of-war at such distances as to keep up a telegraphic communication between Antwerp and Turneuse, any message respecting the movement of the transports may be communicated by this means, or by handing despatches on from ship to ship, so that the wishes of the Commander in Chief, if forwarded to Admiral Martin at Antwerp, may be speedily executed.

The Dutch have a very considerable naval force in a state of forward equipment for the naval defences of the river.

The following is a list of His Majesty's ships now in the Scheldt:

	Guns.
Akbar	60
Désirée	36
Tartarus	20
Mercurius	18
Actæon	16
Zephyr	16
Pioneer	10

It is submitted to the Commander in Chief of the Forces, what number of men-of-war he would deem sufficient to meet his views of naval co-operation.

T. B. MARTIN.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Questions and Answers respecting the Communication with the Army by the Ghent Canal.

Q. Which is the best place for transports to anchor with a view to the most expeditious and safe conveyance to the army?

A. Ships of 15 feet ought to go up the channel of Ghent as high almost as Beevolict or Phillipine; but larger vessels ought to lay at Hogsplaat Roads, and vessels from Flushing ought to be engaged to transport them up the Canal.

Q. How far is it from the anchorage under the Hogsplaat up to Ghent?

A. From Phillipine San vas Yeal is 4 miles, difficult except with a fair wind, as it is narrow, and horses cannot be used. Sasvaat Ghent to Ghent is 17 miles, inland navigation; horses can be used. From Hogsplaat to Phillipine is 10 miles: in all 31 miles.

Q. Is there any difficulty or inconvenience in the navigation up to Ghent in boats large enough to carry heavy guns?

A. No vessel can be had on Ghent Canal; they must be hired at Flushing; 5 feet is always in the canal; the Commandant Grobeous can apply to Antwerp for vessels to carry guns.

Q. What is the distance from Turneuse to Brussels by land?

A. About 36 miles; most of the road is good.

T. B. MARTIN.

II.

Van der Werff, 50-gun frigate—nearly ready, wants his complement of men, daily expected.

Maase, 44; Maria Zeygersbergen, 36—expected from the Texel, under sailing orders with all winds.

Irene, 16—ready; wants only a few hands.

Graver, 10; Lightning, 8; Idus, 8—expected from Antwerp.

Shark, 8—expected from Rotterdam.

Brave: No. 1, fitting out at Flushing, nearly finished; No. 2; carrying seven 18-pounders each.

Thirty gunboats getting ready, carrying each two guns aft and in the bow.

This number independent of those getting ready in this place.

The submentioned gunboats, as coming by inland navigation from the Texel —Medemblik, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam—will take some days more; but the whole I suppose to be collected in a fortnight.

[Just at present it appears to me that there is no prospect of our being attacked in this country; and I would recommend that the Admiral should reconnoitre Ostend, and see how far gun-vessels and other craft could cooperate in the defence of that place; and that he should station a small force at the entrance of the Scheldt to observe that river.

I will communicate the Admiral's observations regarding Flushing and Cadsand * to the King and the Prince of Orange.

WELLINGTON.]

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 11th April, 1815.

I received your private letter of the † inst., and immediately communicated to Lord Mulgrave your wishes with regard to what falls within his department, and he will, I am sure, make every possible exertion to comply with them.

In your letter you regret our not having called out the militia,‡ in order to relieve the regiments of the line now in Ireland; and by the manner in which Torrens expresses himself in his letter to me on the subject, I am afraid he has not made your Grace aware how that question at present stands. The Crown has not the right to call out the militia except in time of actual war or insurrection. As soon as the war takes place, it will be called out; but I am afraid it will not afford us that relief which you naturally expect from such a measure; for the fact is, that all the balloted men whose term is expired, and all the substitutes of such balloted men whose term shall have expired, are entitled to their discharge. After these deductions shall have been made, there will not, it is computed, remain more than 20,000 men of the British militia forthcoming; and we have now near 17,000 militia still out, under the late war, of whom your Grace must be aware none will remain except such as have not served their time; for the calling out the militia on the new war can only affect those of the militia who are still out, who would have been called out had they been (as the rest have been) already disbanded. The gain, therefore, will only be the difference between the 20,000 and the 16,000 or 17,000 men out; and with this difference, that the 16,000 or 17,000 whose services we now have are complete regiments, whereas the 20,000 will consist of regiments incomplete.

The usual mode of completing the militia is by ballot. This is a more certain and expeditious way perhaps than recruiting by beat of drum; but the latter has been found to interfere so much less than ballots, that the inclination of our minds is to prefer that mode of recruiting to that of balloting. It was indeed in contemplation to have begun balloting immediately; but there were two objections: first, it was desirable at all events to try the effect of the new bounty in recruiting the army, as it is hoped we shall thereby get back very soon many of the old soldiers who have been disbanded, and who otherwise would have gone first, at least as substitutes, in the militia, trusting to a bill to enable us to recruit from the militia; secondly, there was some difficulty in commencing the measure of balloting in some counties, while the militia of others remained out, unless we allowed the men of those militia regiments also whose terms were out to be disbanded, which would have reduced our force at a very critical time.

You may depend upon our availing ourselves, as much as the law will allow us, of the militia.

Yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

REAR-ADMIRAL MARTIN'S REPORT ON FLUSHING AND CADSAND.

Brussels, 12th April, 1815.

Flushing.

The works at Flushing are in a good state, but the guns almost all dismounted; and it appears to be the intention to trust entirely to the armed vessels of different descriptions for its protection.

It appears desirable that a proportion of the guns should be remounted, that in case of accident of any sort to the flotilla the place should at least be able to make defence until succour could be thrown in.

There are about 150 French persons, and some of suspicious characters, who ought to be sent off the island.

It would be well if a militia and volunteers were enrolled, and exercised with a view to the defence of the place.

All ships and vessels in a sea-worthy state should be ready to depart at the shortest notice.

The ships expected from Antwerp may safely remain at the anchorage before Flushing during the summer months, instead of going into the basin. This will add to the defence of the river, and under any adverse circumstances they are prepared to depart.

Cadsand.

There are at Cadsand four strong works, but all dismantled, and the artillery and stores ordered over to Flushing.

The fort called Frederick Henry is extensive and remarkably well calculated for defence, and may be capable of containing a large body of men, probably 6000.

Whether this or any other of the works on Cadsand should be preserved with an idea of covering or receiving any division of the army which might be forced to retreat in that line will be best decided by military officers; but it is presumed in this case that it ought not to be left in so entirely a dismantled state.

At present the works on Cadsand, and the unremoved artillery, will enable an enterprising enemy to push troops along shore, and establish themselves, so as to maintain the place; and if the works should not be deemed material with a view to receiving any retreating troops of our own, there can be no doubt that the whole ought to be immediately levelled; for they can never be of use to the King of the Netherlands, but to the French of great importance.

Batz should either be put into a state of defence or destroyed.

It is submitted whether an engineer officer should not be sent to decide on the best measures to be taken upon the matters referred to in this paper; and with authority from the Dutch government for the Dutch commanding officers and Admiral Martin to act forthwith upon his suggestion.

T. B. MARTIN.

[Refer this paper to His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange.

The government of the King of the Low Countries must be the best judges what should be done with Cadsand and Flushing; but it appears to me that in case of misfortune both places are of the utmost importance to the security of Holland.

MONSIEUR, Paris, ce 12 Avril, 1815.

Depuis la mienne du 9 tout est dans le même état de chose. Dimanche Buonaparte a passé en revue une partie de ses troupes de ligne, tant d'ici que ceux qui se trouvaient dans les environs. Elle était composée de six régiments d'infanterie et cinq de cavalerie. On évaluait le nombre à 8 à 9 mille hommes. Après la revue les officiers se sont réunis en banquet aux Champs Elysées, où de tostes ont été portés à toute la famille de Buonaparte. Après le dîner finit, ils se sont promenée en cortège, la musique en avant, avec le buste en plâtre de Napoléon, parmi la ville, et ont parcourus les principaux quartiers et places publiques. Arrivés sur la Place Vendôme à neuf heures du soir, ils ont placé le buste dans le balcon de la Colonne Trajane. Après ils ont exigé que toute la place fut illuminé, et le personne qui n'était pas leste pour le faire, on arrachait leur sonnette ou brisait le carreau de fenêtre. Il y a eu ce soir plusieurs rixes dans différentes cafés entre bourgeois et militaire, et dans plusieurs endroits publiques. Afin il n'y a que le militaire qui est porté pour lui, et autres employés qui sont sans places; le reste du peuple se plaint de n'avoir aucune occupation. Rien d'autre à vous marquer dans ce moment.

Je suis, avec le plus parfait dévouement,

Sir James M'Grigor to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duke, No. 2, Cleveland Row, St. James's, 12th April, 1815.

But for the circumstances under which I am placed, I would have been happy to have presented myself to your Grace with an offer of my services, as it continues to be my ambition to serve and meet your approbation, and I can never be insensible of my obligations to your Grace.

By an arrangement which has for some time been in agitation it is intended to place me as Director-General of the Medical Board, and I have reason to think that this arrangement is now in a state of forwardness. When in that situation I hope to be able to obviate many of the inconveniences felt on the late Peninsular service, and to meet your wishes and the wants of the hospital department of your army.

I beg to add, that if, after being appointed Director-General, it be at all agreeable to your Grace, I will feel proud to go out for some months to know your wishes, and put into execution arrangements in regard to the hospitals and health-concerns of the army.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient, faithful, and attached humble servant,

J. M'Grigor.

[I am very much obliged to you for your letter. I hope you will take care that we have a good and efficient inspector of hospitals. I don't know the gentleman now at the head of the concern, but he appears to me to be very young.

Wellington.]

Notes from Ghent.

13 Avril, 1815.

On mande de Lyon, en date du 5 Avril, ce qui suit :—

"Les Marseillais sont à quelques lieues de notre ville. L'on a affiché depuis ce matin que la ville est en état de siége. Tout le monde est dans la plus grande consternation."

Lieut.-Gen. Count Gneisenau to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duc, Liège, ce 13 Avril, 1815.

J'ai eu l'honneur de recevoir la lettre que Votre Excellence a bien voulu m'adresser en date du 10 Avril.

D'après la lecture de cette lettre je dois souhaiter que ce que j'ai avancé sur les dangers qui pourroient résulter pour l'armée Prussienne si elle livrait bataille à une trop grande distance de la Meuse ne puisse être expliqué autrement que dans le sens suivant.

Ce n'est pas mon intention d'envoyer au secours de l'armée sous les ordres de Votre Excellence seulement le corps d'armée du Général Zieten, et de laisser le corps d'armée du Général Börstel à Namur pour garder le défilé ; mais vous pouvez, my Lord Duc, en cas d'attaque, compter sur l'assistance de toutes nos forces disponibles ici, et nous sommes décidés à partager le sort de l'armée sous les ordres de Votre Excellence.

Mes inquiétudes sur un mouvement qui pourrait nous entraîner trop loin de la Meuse furent dictées par la supposition que Votre Excellence pourroit avoir des raisons impératives pour baser vos opérations sur la mer. Dès que Votre Excellence est résolue d'abandonner la mer en cas de revers et de manœuvrer sur la Meuse, toute difficulté disparoît.

La forte position qui se trouve derrière le confluent de la Meuse et de l'Ourte est de nature à éloigner la supposition que nous puissions être obligés à retrograder jusqu'à Juliers. Dans le cas que, après un revers, Votre Excellence approuveroit cette position, nous y pourrions réunir toutes nos forces sans laisser un corps d'armée à Namur, qui seroit en quelque danger dès que l'ennemi passe la Meuse entre Liège et Huy (ce qui ne lui peut être disputé). Ce corps d'armée verroit alors ses communications directes avec nous menacés, vu la difficulté des chemins entre la Meuse et l'Ourte, le manque de ponts sur cette dernière rivière, et l'impraticabilité de ses deux rives, et devroit les regagner par Bastogne et la forêt des Ardennes. Toutes les communications des habitans du pays de la rive droite de l'Ourte avec Namur se font par Liège, ce qui démontre les difficultés du terrain entre la Meuse et l'Ourte.

Des gros renforts pour l'armée Prussienne ici vont passer le Rhin et nous joindront à commencer du 20 Avril. Trois corps d'armée, fort chacun de 35 mille hommes, seront alors entre Luxembourg et Liège, et un quatrième va suivre immédiatement après.

Le Lieutenant-Général de Zieten m'annonce que la nouvelle se confirme que les garnisons de Philippeville et de Givet se sont mises en marche vers l'intérieur de la France, et n'ont laissé dans la première de ces villes que 40 et dans la seconde 80 à 100 invalides, avec 100 artilleurs. Ce même Général ajoute qu'il a reçu l'information très positive que l'insurrection du midi de la France gagne consistance, et que Vendredi dernier cinq régimens d'infanterie ont quitté Paris à la hâte pour se diriger sur Lyon.

Je vous prie, my Lord Duc, de bien vouloir agréer l'expression des sentimens distingués avec lesquels

J'ai l'honneur d'être, my Lord Duc, de Votre Excellence

Le très obéissant serviteur,

COMTE DE GNEISENAU.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 13th April, 1815.

The treaty of quadruple alliance founded upon that of Chaumont, and signed by your Grace on the 25th ultimo, has been received and laid before the Prince Regent, and I am directed to acquaint your Grace that orders have been given for the ratification of the same.

In pursuance of your recommendation, I am authorised to acquaint you that the Prince Regent is prepared to enter into engagements with the three Allied Courts for furnishing them with a subsidy of five millions sterling, to be payable by monthly instalments in London, in equal shares, to the credit of the three Powers, the same to commence on the 1st of April.

With respect to the quota of 150,000 men to be furnished by Great Britain under the treaty, independent of the subsidy of five millions above alluded to, I am directed to inform your Grace that in the present state of the military force of this country it is not considered practicable to assemble an effective corps of troops actually in the service of Great Britain of more than 50,000 men, exclusive of officers. There will then remain from 90,000 to 100,000 still to be supplied, or paid for at the rate specified in the additional article to the treaty.

Taking this expense at 20*l.* and 30*l.* for infantry and cavalry, there will remain a charge of somewhat more than two millions, say 2,100,000*l.*, to fall upon the British government in satisfaction of its engagements, the appropriation of which it is competent for them to decide on.

The first and most obvious application of this aid is to give it to such Powers as will agree to furnish the number of troops required to complete the British contingent under your Grace's orders to the full quota of 150,000 men, exclusive of garrisons.

If there are amongst the Powers who may have acceded to the treaty those who, having furnished their own quota to the alliance, may nevertheless be disposed to supply an additional number of troops beyond their own contingent upon this scale of allowance, there seems every just motive for encouraging such exertions.

Your Grace will, however, perceive from the enclosed proposition, this day received from Prince Hardenberg, that the three leading Powers having secured their own subsidy of five millions, are now disposed to interpose their good offices to secure a subsidiary arrangement from Great Britain in favour of all the minor Powers, especially those of Germany. A similar demand has been preferred by the Spanish ambassador in favour of his own Court; and your Grace has transmitted also a request from the Russian plenipotentiaries, urging on the part of their government an additional subsidy of above 2,000,000*l.* sterling.

After the unexampled efforts of Great Britain in the two last years of the war, it is not surprising that all Europe should hope to derive aid from her resources; but the extent to which those exertions were pushed is only an additional reason why they can now only be called forth within certain limits. These limits have been stated to your Grace, and it is the pleasure of the Prince Regent that your Grace should decide how the means which are available can best be applied to the service of the war.

His Royal Highness's government have only to annex as a condition to the exercise of this discretion that your Grace will so regulate the distribution as to indemnify the British government against any further claim under the articles of the treaty which impose upon them the obligation to supply 150,000 men, or to pay for deficiencies at a certain rate.

If, after securing the British quota of troops, the completion of which is connected with the efficiency of your Grace's own army, any aid can out of the residue of the sum of 2,100,000*l.* be appropriated to the relief of the minor Powers, so much the better; but it is impossible to admit the general claim brought forward by Bavaria and other acceding Powers that they should all be subsidized by Great Britain in proportion to the three principal Powers, without considering what gross charge may thus be brought upon Great Britain.

Your Grace will perceive that Prince Hardenberg, foreseeing the embarrassment that will arise from the superior advantages which the contingents serving with the British army are likely to derive, desires to equalize throughout the whole army these advantages, and then to distribute amongst the different armies the troops so subsidized. Your Grace can best judge of the convenience or inconvenience of giving effect to these conflicting principles as connected with the means which are disposable; and it is the intention of the Prince Regent not only to rely on your Grace's judgment for making the best use of these means, but it is also His Royal Highness's wish that any influence arising from their disposal should contribute to strengthen your authority with the Allied Powers in concerting with them the operations to be carried on.

Whenever your Grace has made arrangements for the distribution of these means you will notify the result to me, when directions will be immediately given to the Treasury for the appropriation of the credits to the respective Powers. The realizing of these credits on the Continent without prejudice to the exchange is an arrangement of considerable delicacy, upon which the Treasury propose to send Mr. Herries to arrange with your Grace.

The diplomatic part of the arrangement, as soon as the quota of each Power is settled, can easily be effected by the signature of an additional article, either to the treaty or the act of accession, on the part of each State.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

P.S. Your Grace will observe Prince Hardenberg estimates the probable gross force of the secondary and minor states at 170,000 or 180,000 men. Possibly this does not include Dutch or Sardinians, certainly not Portuguese; but even adding these, it does not appear impracticable to give to all an equalized payment equivalent to what the three great Powers receive, which is at the rate of rather more than 11*l.* per man.

It certainly would be a great feature of strength to the confederacy if all the Powers, great and small, got something, and fared alike. In return, however, for such a concession, the three great Powers ought to secure to you your full amount of the force. If you give them your money for their confederates, they ought to give you such a share of them as will effect the same result as might be obtained by an exclusive application of your means to the augmentation of your own army. This is very deserving of consideration.

C.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

1. Que, comme les opérations de la guerre exigent que les contingens de quelques-uns des Princes du Nord de l'Allemagne soient réunis à l'armée Angloise sous le commandement du Duc de Wellington, il est bien entendu que ces troupes ne sont point données à la solde de la Grande Bretagne, mais qu'elles reçoivent d'après l'exigeance des circonstances cette destination en co-opérant à la guerre commune, de manière qu'on éloignera tout ce qui pourroit donner lieu à ne pas faire envisager cette mesure sous le point de vue véritable ; par quoi néanmoins il ne sera rien changé à tout ce qui est relatif aux troupes Allemandes qui font actuellement partie de l'armée de la Grande Bretagne.

2. Que l'armée Prussienne sous le commandement du Prince Blücher réunira également à elle un nombre proportionnel de troupes Allemandes.

3. Que si l'Angleterre donne des subsides ou fournit la paye à des troupes Allemandes, ces avantages soient entièrement communs aux Princes Allemands qui fournissent des contingens communs.

4. Que les Cours de Vienne, de Pétersbourg, et de Berlin employeront leurs bons offices auprès de la Cour de Londres à l'effet de faire obtenir d'elle des secours communs à tous les Princes de l'Allemagne qui fournissent des contingens.

5. Que tout ce qui est ou sera arrêté à présent sur la distribution ou organisation des troupes Allemandes ne sera d'aucune conséquence pour l'organisation qui sera convenu dans la suite pour la Fédération Germanique, et ne pourra rien préjuger à cet égard.

II.

Prince Hardenberg to Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Vienne, le 1 Avril, 1815.

Les papiers publics ont annoncé votre heureuse arrivée à Londres. Nos vœux vous y ont suivis. A peine aurez-vous revu vos pénates que la nouvelle du débarquement de Buonaparte en France, et de ses progrès, aussi rapides qu'inattendus, vous sera parvenue. Elle change tous nos calculs, et nous rejette dans une mer orageuse, tandis que nous croyions entrer pour longtems dans le port, et jouir de la paix et du repos.

Vous aurez été informé des résolutions qui ont été prises sur-le-champ par les Puissances rassemblées au Congrès, et vous apprendrez qu'un nouveau traité d'alliance vient d'être signé par celles qui ont signé celui de Chaumont, qui doit servir de base et de noyau pour tous les autres. Il est fort heureux que nous étions encore tous rassemblés ici. Que seroit devenu de l'Europe si un chacun, dans la certitude de la paix, avoit été retiré chez soi, si les armées avoient été licenciées sur le pied de paix ? Elles ont été incessamment mises en marche vers le Rhin, et le Duc de Wellington est parti pour se mettre à la tête de l'armée de la Belgique.

Le Général Gneisenau remplace le Général Kleist sur le Rhin, et reçoit l'ordre de se concerter avec le Duc de Wellington.

Enfin, tout est en activité, et un très bon esprit semble animer tous les Cabinets pour une cause véritablement commune. Je vous envoye ci-jointe une liste des différens corps d'armée que nous mettons sur pied. Les quatre premiers corps se portent sur le Rhin, où il y a maintenant à peu près 60,000 hommes. Le reste prendra d'abord poste sur l'Elbe. Tous ces efforts ne peuvent cependant pas être soutenus sans l'assistance de l'Angleterre.

Vous connoissez notre extrême dénuement. La Prusse, de toutes les Puissances, a été le plus privée de ses ressources. Débarrassé de toute autre dépense pour la guerre, l'Angleterre remettroit elle pas de son côté tout son soin à terrasser l'homme qui se plait à troubler l'Europe ? Vous trouverez juste sans doute, my Lord, d'accorder des subsides aux trois Puissances, mais il en faudra encore pour les Princes Allemands, qui ne pourroient être appelés aux mêmes efforts que les Alliés sans ce secours.

Je vous communique l'extrait d'un protocole sur lequel nous nous sommes réunis aujourd'hui.

Les corps dont l'Angleterre aura besoin pour compléter les 150,000 hommes qu'elle doit fournir pourront être pris sur les troupes du Hanovre, de Saxe Royale, de Brunsvic, de Nassau Luxembourg, des Villes Anséatiques, de Oldenbourg, et du Roi de Dannemarc, ce qui fourniroit 65,000 à 75,000 hommes. L'armée Autrichienne auroit celles de Bavière, du Wurtemberg, de Bade, et de Darmstadt. L'armée Prussienne, celles de Saxe Ducale, de Hesse Cassel, de Mecklenbourg, de Nassau Weilbourg et Usingen, de Schwarzbourg, Anhalt, Reuss, Waldeck, Lippe.

Il seroit de la plus haute nécessité de donner des subsides à tous les Princes Allemands sans distinction des corps d'armée où ils serviront. Cela pourroit aller à 170,000 à 180,000 hommes, y compris les troupes Danoises.

Nous pressons tant que nous pouvons les affaires du Congrès, mais malgré tous nos soins celles de la Bavière ne sont pas encore terminés. Il faut espérer qu'elles le seront dans peu.

Maintenant il est très important pour la Prusse de se pourvoir avant toute chose des fonds qui résultent de nos anciennes transactions des billets de crédit, de la Convention de Londres, et de ce qui nous revient de la convention pour la Légion Allemande, dont je prends la liberté de vous envoyer également copie. Nous enverrons pour liquider ces objets M. le Conseiller Berger à Londres. Je l'ai muni d'une lettre séparée pour vous, my Lord, et vous prie de vouloir l'écouter et lui accorder votre protection.

J'espère que vous persistez dans l'intention que vous eûtes la bonté de manifester avant votre départ d'ici, de nous donner le subside entier de la Convention de Londres, et que le Sieur Berger pourra recevoir le plutôt possible une somme qui suffise à nos pressans besoins.

My Lord, etc.,

HARDENBERG.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 13th April, 1815.

Your Grace's despatch of * , transmitting the declaration signed by the Allied Plenipotentiaries on the 13th ultimo at Vienna,† has been received and laid before the Prince Regent; and I am commanded to acquaint your Grace that His Royal Highness approves of the considerations which induced your Grace and the other Plenipotentiaries acting on the part of Great Britain to concur in the said declaration.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and regard,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

[Send copy to Lord Clancarty.

WELLINGTON.]

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 13th April, 1815.

I consider the importance of keeping down, in such a confederacy as we are engaged in, ill-humour and jealousy, to be such that if you see the advantage of a common and moderate scale of subsidy pervading the whole, as it strikes me, and if, upon weighing the whole, you should find some additional means necessary to give complete effect to your principle, although I have no authority to say so, yet I think I can venture to promise that Lord Liverpool would not refuse you 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* more for so great an object. I throw this out confidentially for your consideration; and if you wish me, I will propose it for his consideration.

I have been talking with Pole, and we are very anxious, if we can, to get you without delay the 4000 infantry and 2000 cavalry from Ireland, and also the 5000 men coming from America. It will leave Ireland weak for the moment till the troops arrive from Canada, but they will be there before Paddy can prepare for mischief, and force in your hands at the outset is everything.

Yours, my dear Lord, ever most faithfully,

CASTLEREAGH.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 14th April, 1815.

I will state to you shortly what is to be done in Great Britain and Ireland for the purpose of reinforcing you.

Great Britain.—The militia to be called out, as soon as by law it is allowed. To be recruited at first by beat of drum at a low duty, that the recruiting service for the line may not be injured. A bounty of six guineas to be given to those substitutes who are entitled to their discharge, on re-enlisting into the militia; ten guineas on enlisting into the line.

* Blank in manuscript.

The local militia of Kent, Hampshire, and Devonshire to be called out. By law they cannot be moved out of their own county, or kept out (except in case of actual invasion) for more than twenty days; but by dividing them into three corps each (as the counties are large), they may serve to assist in garrisoning the dockyards in each county for three months, by which time our militia may have recruited enough to supply the deficiency. By this measure we may get about 2000 of the line for your Grace. The time must depend on the time when the locals can be assembled; I hope by the first week in May. I have also to tell you that you shall have three squadrons of the Blues (say 360) in about ten days, by which time they will be replaced in their Windsor duty by another regiment.

Ireland.—4000 infantry will be sent out (say in ten days) from Cork. They are to be replaced by such part of Lambert's corps on its arrival as shall be found least fit for foreign service. If there should not be that number unfit for foreign service, and Ireland remains quiet, we will not withdraw from you out of Lambert's corps what you might otherwise have of the whole 4000, but wait to pay our debt until the troops from North America arrive. In order to keep Ireland quiet, the yeomanry are to be kept on permanent duty. The yeomanry cavalry in Ireland is, I am sorry to learn, entirely reduced; but we shall, notwithstanding, send you from Cork three regiments of cavalry (1200) in less, I hope, than a fortnight from hence.

The Irish militia will be called out when the law allows of it. Those of the Irish militia who are entitled to their discharge now will, on bounty, be enabled to re-enlist into the militia.

If you shall decide on applying for the Portuguese, the transports for conveying them shall not wait for the answer, but shall be sent without delay. I shall have tonnage enough for 14,000 men in less than ten days from hence. Lord Castlereagh will immediately write to prepare the Regency for the application.

I am yours ever sincerely,

BATHURST.

DEUXIÈME MÉMOIRE POUR SON EXCELLENCE MONSIEUR LE GÉNÉRAL DUC DE WELLINGTON.

Gand, le 14 Avril, 1815.

Tous les renseignemens que le Roi de France a reçu depuis son arrivée à Gand font connaître que lorsque les Puissances Alliées de Sa Majesté Très Chrétienne entreront en France pour soutenir sa cause, elles seront secondées par les vœux des habitans, si l'on parvient surtout à maintenir une discipline sévère parmi les troupes, et à éviter autant qu'il sera possible les abus et les excès que redoutent les habitans des pays que les armées doivent parcourir.

Dans un précédent mémoire on a fait voir que les 90 régimens de ligne et les 15 régimens d'infanterie légère, qui sont en France, ne pouvaient fournir à Buonaparte que 105,000 hommes au plus, fesant 210 bataillons. Il est plus vraisemblable que chaque bataillon ne présentera qu'une force de 400 hommes, et non de 500.

Toute la cavalerie Française n'avait au 20 Mars que 21,000 chevaux et 26,000 hommes. Il se peut que Buonaparte réussisse à faire monter les hommes qui manquaient de chevaux. Si l'Alsace et la Lorraine sont promptement attaquées, cette remonte deviendra bien plus difficile, parceque la plupart des dépôts de troupes à cheval sont dans ces provinces.

Le corps de l'artillerie présente en ce moment plutôt 12,000 que 15,000 hommes.

On a évalué à 6000 hommes le total de l'ex-Garde Impériale à pied et à cheval. Si Buonaparte forme de nouveaux corps pour sa Garde, ainsi qu'il vient de l'ordonner par un décret, ils seront en grande partie composés d'hommes qui seront extraits de l'infanterie de ligne ou légère. Ce n'est donc pas une augmentation réelle de force.

Buonaparte compte, il est vrai, sur les anciens soldats qui, depuis Avril, 1814, sont rentrés dans leurs familles. L'espérance qu'il a conçue qu'ils reviendraient sous ses drapeaux l'a porté à former dans chaque régiment d'infanterie le cadre, en officiers, d'un 4ème bataillon. Ces régimens avaient au 1er Mars dernier deux bataillons, plus ou moins complets en hommes, et le cadre, en officiers, d'un 3ème bataillon, qui devait composer le dépôt. Ainsi le 4ème bataillon, dont il forme le cadre en ce moment, n'est à vrai dire qu'un bataillon de dépôt. Mais il rendra disponible le 3ème bataillon, si Buonaparte parvient à le compléter en hommes, ce dont il est permis de douter fortement.

Les 204 bataillons de Grenadiers et de Chasseurs des Gardes Nationales qu'il vient de mobiliser par un décret présentent une force presqu'illusoire : si les habitans des provinces du Nord en particulier, et des autres provinces, ne changent pas de façon de penser (et les excès des armées pourraient seuls les engager à en changer, s'ils avaient lieu), presque personne ne se présentera pour remplir les 204 bataillons ci-dessus mentionnés.

Des renseignemens transmis de Paris, et auxquels on croit devoir ajouter foi, distribuent les forces de Buonaparte, suivant un ordre qu'il aurait donné le premier de ce mois, de la manière suivante :—

Corps.				Commandans.
1er	4 divisions	d'infanterie	Autour de Lille ..	Comte d'Erlon.
	2 „	de cavalerie
2ème	5 „	d'infanterie	Valenciennes ..	Comte Reille.
	3 „	de cavalerie
3ème	2 „	d'infanterie	Mézières	Duc Charles de Plaisance (Le Brun).
	1 „	de cavalerie
4ème	3 „	d'infanterie	Metz, avec le commandement de Metz et de Nancy, c.-à-d. de la Lorraine et des 3 Evêchés.	Général Gerard, ancien aide-de-camp du Prince Royal de Suède.
	1 „	de cavalerie
5ème	3 „	d'infanterie	Strasbourg, avec le commandement de l'Alsace.	Général Rapp.
	2 „	de cavalerie

Plus 3 divisions de Cuirassiers, ainsi qu'il suit :—

1ère division de Cuirassiers à Douai, pour faire partie du 1er corps, Général Milhaud.

2ème division de Cuirassiers, y compris les Carabiniers, à Metz.
3ème division de Cuirassiers en Alsace.

4ème division de cavalerie, de 4 régimens, à Metz.

Corps de Réserve de Paris.

3 divisions d'infanterie.
2 divisions de cavalerie.

En évaluant à 4 régimens de 1000 hommes chacun, et formés des deux premiers bataillons de chaque régiment, le total de chaque division d'infanterie sera de 4000 hommes, et les 17 divisions d'infanterie mentionnées ci-dessus emploieront 68,000 hommes.

On estime chaque division de cavalerie à 1200 hommes, fesant 4 régimens de 2 escadrons chacun à 150 hommes. La totalité des 15 divisions n'offre guère en ce moment que 18,000 hommes.

Le 6 Avril l'artillerie avait très peu de chevaux pour ses attelages, mais des marchés venaient d'être passés pour 3000 chevaux. On doit croire qu'il en aura été passé de nouveaux depuis cette époque.

D'après un rapport de la police de Gand, une soixantaine de pièces ou voitures d'artillerie se serait dirigée de Douai vers Valenciennes.

Il est évident que le reste des troupes de Buonaparte est destiné à la garde de ses places, qui emploieront environ 35,400 hommes, et pour la défense de la France du côté des Alpes et des Pyrénées.

LE DUC DE FELTRE.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 15th April, 1815.

I have the honour, by direction of the Commander-in-Chief, to acquaint your Grace that the Prince Regent has been pleased, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, to approve of the following force and staff being placed under your command in Flanders.

Force.

Under the command of Major-General SIR COLQUHOUN GRANT.

From Ireland:—13th Light Dragoons, three squadrons; 15th Hussars, three squadrons.
23rd Light Dragoons, three squadrons.

From Ireland:—Royal Scots, 3rd battalion; 28th, 32nd, 42nd, 79th, and 92nd Foot.
13th Veteran Battalion to be placed in garrison at Ostend.

Staff.

(The officers marked thus * are to be attached to the cavalry.)

Lieutenant-General the Earl of Uxbridge, G.C.B., to command the cavalry.
Major-General Sir James Kempt, K.C.B.
Sir John Byng, K.C.B.

Major-General Sir Colquhoun Grant, K.C.B.

Lieutenant-Colonel Sir J. Dickson, K.C.B.; Lord Greenock;* Assistants Quartermaster-General.

Captain Thornton, 78th Regiment; Captain Brunton, 60th Regiment; Deputy Assistants Quartermaster-General.

Colonel Elley,* Royal Regiment Horse Guards, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Guy Campbell, 6th Foot; Major W. L. Darling, half-pay; Assistants Adjutant-General.

Captain Blanckley, 23rd Foot, Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,

H. TORRENS.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 15th April, 1815.

I had the honour of delivering your Lordship's letter to General Gneisenau on the morning of the 12th.

After some expressions of compliment to your Lordship on the Peninsular war, he entered into general conversation, and rather laid a stress on the policy of making the French nation feel the effects of this war, and the necessity of humbling their military spirit. General Gneisenau did not advert to any part of your Lordship's letter, nor did he make the slightest allusion to the treaty found in possession of the French General: and as in this interview I thought it proper that the conversation should originate with him, I had no opportunity afforded me of entering into explanation; and if the opportunity be afforded, I shall take care to avoid the appearance of putting forward a justification.

I am much obliged to the terms of your Lordship's recommendation for the personal attentions I have received. Whilst no movements are carrying on, my communications will probably only contain the opinions to be gathered from the conversation of the Generals and other officers.

Of this description is General Gneisenau's idea of the plan of operations, which, if I have understood right, is to have three armies, of 200,000 men each, assembled on the Upper Rhine, Middle Rhine, and Netherlands, with an army of reserve behind the central army. Reckoning upon a great numerical superiority over the enemy, each of these three armies, he proposes, should move independently upon Paris: if attacked, to act defensively; if beaten, to fall back on the reserve. The other two armies to continue their advance, and by preference to keep three or four days' march distant from each other, in order to have due notice and preparation against the next probable attack; and, in short, to have no mutual dependence until near Paris.

General Baron Müffling, the present Chief of the Staff, has nearly the same idea, but rather leans to the policy of immediately commencing operations, to assist the rising spirit in the South, and to leave Napoleon no time to organise a system of national defence. He adverted to the badness of the communication along the Meuse, and stated some inconvenience, of marching to and fro, had been occasioned by a new organization of the army into corps d'armée, made by the King, for the purpose of intermixing the old and the young troops together. On the 21st instant the corps at Charleroi and Namur are to go into bivouac for their assembly in the new order; and in a fortnight he states these corps will be complete, that of General Zieten 38,000, and General Börstel's 40,000.

It perhaps scarcely deserves notice to mention the intimate correspondence which appears to exist between the Generals of the army and persons well informed in the Prussian Minister's Cabinet at Vienna. There is some surprise and jealousy expressed at the signature of Bavaria to a treaty in which Austria and Prussia are parties. The third article has been received, which relates to the three regiments which Bavaria is to have in Mayence, and the purposes of convoy, &c., to which she is to be entitled to use them. There is also a report from Vienna, and easily credited here, that Austria entertains the idea of a Regency in France, and the intention of putting forward the claims of the Archduchess Marie Louise and her son. I merely mention these reports to show that this army appears to have a political weight, and almost interference, as if it were a part of the government.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 16th April, 1815.

I have communicated to my colleagues your private and secret letter of the 11th.* Various circumstances have come to our knowledge tending to confirm your Grace's information that the Duke of Orleans has a very considerable party, both civil and military, in his favour; and without impeaching His Highness's honour to the King, it is not less evident that the line he is now taking has a tendency to distinguish, and so far to separate himself from the other branches of the family.

With respect to the course to be pursued by the British government, we are of opinion that we must not be pledged beyond the main object of our concert, viz., the destruction of Buonaparte's power. That, on the other hand, in conducting the alliance, we must and can only prudently look to the King as the immediate object of our support. In the course of the struggle a necessity may arise requiring the Allies to submit to have another branch of the family placed upon the throne as a middle term, better calculated to allay the internal divisions of the country. This case, should it arise, which is by no means improbable, must be judged of at the time. The only object now to be supported is the King: any appearance of hesitation on this would divide and chill the south and west. The dissolution of the alliance between Buonaparte and the Jacobins may produce other combinations. Our hands must not be tied, however cordially we may desire to employ them in support of the legitimate Monarch, so as to preclude us from adopting a different course of policy under other and adequate circumstances.

I shall be anxious to hear from your Grace further upon this subject. I apprehend we now see it altogether in the same point of view, and I join in your regret that the King's virtues do not give him the ascendency which his position requires; but with the single exception of Buonaparte, whose influence is derived from a thousand sources, the individual in power, whosoever he may be, is likely, in a country so corrupted as France, to have to sustain the shock of a great combination of interests. The King's habits, unfortunately, do not easily amalgamate with the existing order of things; but were the Duke of Orleans in power, more especially if brought forward improvidently, his authority probably would soon prove incompetent to repress the factions of the country, and it is not the interest of the Allies, if obliged to enter upon war, to encourage an early and hollow compromise.

Yours, my dear Lord, ever most sincerely,

CASTLEREAGH.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 16th April, 1815.

I should be glad to know how far, from what has passed, you consider yourself bound to give the Austrian government the 70,000*l.* per month for four months for Italian service, in addition to and exclusive of the third of the five millions subsidy. Lord Liverpool, wishing to keep the expense within the six millions and the five millions, desires me to express his hope that this advance may be reckoned as subsidy in part.

Have you answered the Russian note? If not, perhaps, without giving a formal negative, it may be as well to desire Clancarty to explain to Nesselrode that the British government, having to wind up an expensive war and to pay for from 90,000 to 100,000 men in addition to the heavy charge of her own immediate troops, cannot undertake to supply more than five millions, under all the pressure to which they are subject under present circumstances. It might be stated that, feeling what was due to the Emperor's zeal in the common cause, we thought a confidential explanation of this nature would be more acceptable than an official refusal. The proposition to be made to Parliament on the Dutch loan ought also to weigh.

Ever, my dear Lord, yours most sincerely,

CASTLEREAGH.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 16th April, 1815.

Having been ordered by His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, when Commander of the Forces, to try to get all possible information from the interior of France, the movements and strength of the troops, and to communicate this information to his Military Secretary, Colonel Colborne, I beg your Lordship may be pleased to let me know his Grace the Duke of Wellington's commands, if I am to go on in the same manner in communicating it to you.

By the report of a man I sent to Paris, and whose original report I send herewith, it appears that no camp, neither at Beauvais, Amiens, nor Abbeville, has been formed, and that no more troops are put in motion towards this frontier.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Le 6 Avril j'ai vu sur les glacis de la ville de Valenciennes la garnison, qui manœuvroient, le 1er régiment de ligne, le 2ème légère, le 29ème de ligne, le 7ème régiment d'Hussards. Dans un grand village entre Valenciennes et Cambrai, le 23ème Chasseurs à Cheval. Y étoit aussi à Cambrai il y avait deux régiments d'infanterie incomplets. A Péronne il y avait tout au plus de la troupe assez pour le bon ordre. Le 7 il n'y avait point de troupes à Roye. La bourgeoisie, très mécontente des événements, se prononce assez ouvertement. Enfin, jusqu'à Paris je n'ai plus rencontré de militaire. J'arrivais à Paris le 8 au soir. Le lendemain, 9, j'ai parcouru les cafés, pour y reconnoître l'esprit publique, et j'ai visité plusieurs correspondants où j'ai pu découvrir leurs pensées. Le Faubourg St. Antoine est plus Napoléoniste que les autres. Cependant, ils n'ont nullement l'intention de prendre la défense de l'homme qu'ils paroissent aimer. A une heure de l'après midi je me suis trouvé près la Place du Carrousel, où j'ai vu Buonaparte, qui passoit en revue dans les grilles de cette place, qui étoit fermée, les régiments suivants : le 2ème Chasseurs à Cheval, le 6ème Dragons, le 8ème Chasseurs à Cheval, le 10ème Dragons, et environ quatre ou cinq cent gendarmes, moitié à pied et moitié à cheval. Buonaparte a fait un reproche au 8ème régiment de Chasseurs de ce qu'il avait tardé à se ranger sous ses drapeaux.

Buonaparte a donné l'ordre que l'on rétablissent la manufacture d'armes, et qu'on y emploient 6000 ouvriers, pour qu'il puisse sortir de cette manufacture 1000 fusils chaque jour. La police envoie dans des certains maisons des fusils sans que cela paroissent, mais un bourgeois, chez qui on en avait porté un la veille, m'a fortement assuré que lui ni ceux qu'ils connoissent n'avait seulement l'intention de s'en servir.

Je suis parti de Paris le 11 pour Beauvais, où je n'ai trouvé qu'une brigade de gendarmes, et fort peu de troupes de ligne. J'ai continué ma route vers Breteuil, où l'on m'avait dit à Paris que l'on formait un camp. Je n'y ai rien trouvé qui peut en avoir l'apparence. Je m'informerai aux habitants s'il n'en avaient point entendu parler ; ils me disent que non, mais qu'on devaient en faire un à Abbeville. Je suis allois. Je n'y ai trouvé qu'un dépôt de Cuirassiers. En revenant vers Amiens j'ai rencontré le Général Vandamme avec trois cents gendarmes, qui alloit vers Dunquerque, où, suivant le dire d'un voyageur qui venoit de ce côté, l'on avait jetoit le drapeau tricolor à la mer, et que l'on avait arboré le drapeau blanc ; que la moitié de la garnison étoit avec la bourgeoisie, qui étoit royaliste.

Nota.—C'est la seule marche et rencontre de troupes que j'ai fait en mon voyage de 170 lieues de poste.

Arrivé à Amiens, j'ai rien trouvé que des bourgeois, qui montoient la garde pour le bon ordre. Cette ville et tous les environs se déclarent très ouverte-ment. Les maires des communes avoisinants ont adressé une circulaire au préfet du département de la Somme, pour lui demander ce qu'ils auraient à faire des saques, fusils, gibernes, et sacots qu'ils trouvaient sur les campagnes.

Je suis parti d'Amiens pour Lille le 13, à une heure du matin. J'ai passé à Arras, où je n'ai trouvé que fort peu de monde. Je suis arrivé à Lille le même soir, où j'ai couché. La bourgeoisie est tous les jours menacée d'être pillée par la garnison, qui étoit forte de 8000 à 9000 hommes au plus. Je n'ai pu être certain des régiments qui se trouvent dans cette ville à cause des changements qu'on leur faisoient faire. Le 21ème de ligne et le 14ème Cuirassiers y étoient. Alors la bourgeoisie est dans un état de perplexité terrible. Animée du meilleur esprit pour Louis XVIII., elle ne désire que le moment de se prononcer ouvertement.

On devait le Samedi quinze y renvoyer des ateliers quatre mille ouvriers à cause de la stagnation du commerce. On ne rencontre dans toute la France que très peu de voyageurs. On diroit avoir les routes désertés, que tout le monde est disparu.

La garnison de Lille est portée à un excès terrible envers une dame de cette ville. Le 12 elle lui a arrachée son bonnet et mit en pièces, en protestant qu'il y avoit dessus ce bonnet une cocarde blanche.

J'ai dû faire la route de Lille à Tournay à pied, aucun maître de poste n'ayant voulu m'y conduire. Au faubourg de Tournay j'entendis dire que deux piquets Français étoient venu jeter dans les bras des troupes Anglaises.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 16th April, 1815.

The constant occupation which has attended me since my return on Wednesday last has prevented me from writing to you so soon as I had intended. Had I not known that you were duly acquainted with all that had been done towards making arrangements for your reinforcements, I should have considered a communication to you the most essential point to give early attention to.

You will have learned that government have consented to take 4000 infantry and three regiments of cavalry from Ireland, in anticipation of the means that will offer for their relief by the arrival of the troops under Sir John Lambert. I should hope, however, that we will not be required to make this repayment in actual numbers, and that the first arrival from America may be the means of giving you one way or other 4000 more, which is 2000 beyond what I estimated in my paper.

Referring to what you said upon the formation of a third corps, when you should be reinforced by 4000 or 5000 British troops as a foundation, I should imagine that the reinforcement from Ireland will afford the means of doing this, and the opportunity of appointing senior officers. The question of the Duke of Richmond, which has been one of great embarrassment here, has been decided unfavourably to his wishes; and I enclose for your information the copy of a letter which I have addressed to him. I fear his Grace will be much dissatisfied, but I am commissioned by the Duke of York and Lord Bathurst to request your cooperation in setting his mind at ease. In every point of view his employment would be unadvisable; and a due regard to his feelings, and a consistency towards the reason I have been authorized to assign for his exclusion, would prevent the possibility of any other full General being appointed to your command. Under these circumstances, and in the view of the reinforcements now going enabling you to form a third corps, I have the Commander-in-Chief's commands to say that Sir Edward Paget or Lord Dalhousie appears to His Royal Highness the most eligible to command it, with Sir Thomas Picton and Sir Lowry Cole for the two divisions. An uncertainty, however, as to your means or wishes regarding the formation of this corps will induce His Royal Highness to suspend acting upon the arrangement until I hear from you in reply to this letter, which he requests may be by the return of post. Picton and Cole are most urgent for employment, and I trust this will afford the means of gratifying them both; and as it would appear by your last communication that there is no time to be lost, it would be necessary that they should be held in readiness as soon as possible, and therefore I hope I shall soon hear from you.

I mentioned to Sir James Kempt what you said respecting him, and he immediately expressed his desire of going out in any capacity, even with the view of commanding only a brigade, which I explained to him was all that his rank would admit. You will recollect that it was agreed at Ghent that you had room in your existing force for one Major-General, and that Major-General Donkin was to fill the vacancy. The anxiety of Kempt, however, to join you, and your wishes to have him, could not fail of giving place in the Duke's mind to the pretensions of the former; and besides, His Royal Highness observed that Major-General Donkin was senior to Cooke, who commands a division. His Royal Highness has, therefore, provided otherwise for the latter, and Kempt is making preparations to join you without delay. With the force from Ireland, Sir D. Pack will be among the Major-Generals sent to your army.

I have given to Lord Combermere a full explanation of the circumstances attending the appointment of Lord Uxbridge, and I have no reason to think that he is dissatisfied with it. The former is in great delight at the prospect of serving under you, and I have little doubt but that he will give you satisfaction. It has been arranged with him by the Commander-in-Chief that Elley shall be Assistant Adjutant-General and Lord Greenock Assistant Quartermaster-General to the cavalry. De Lancey is going out to you immediately.

Two squadrons from the Blues and two from each of the regiments of Life Guards are to form a brigade for your army immediately under Major-General O'Loghlin, who says he is a great favourite of yours. I have recollected what you said about the Life Guards; but under the difficulty of making up your force in cavalry, the Duke of York has no doubt but you will be glad to have them, though the brigade will be a very small one in the first instance.

I remain, my dear Lord Duke, yours most sincerely,

H. TORRENS.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duke, Horse Guards, 16th April, 1815.

I have it in command from the Commander-in-Chief to convey to your Grace His Royal Highness's wish that the division of Guards now in Flanders should be commanded as follows, viz.:

Major-General George Cooke.

1st Regiment, 2nd and 3rd battalions, Major-General P. Maitland.

Coldstream, 2nd battalion; 3rd Regiment, 2nd battalion; Major-General Sir John Byng.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's faithful and very obedient servant,

H. Torrens.

Baron de Hartemberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Monseigneur, Louvain, le 16 Avril, 1815.

En me conformant avec un respectueux empressement à la teneur du billet, daté 15 Avril, que votre Grâce m'a fait l'honneur de m'adresser, je la supplie de permettre que je me réfère pour le principal exposé au contenu de ma lettre du 9 de ce mois, et d'y ajouter seulement:

Que d'après des informations sûres et récentes, les garnisons de Philippeville et de Rocroi n'étoient point encore augmentées le 10 après midi.

Qu'à cette époque ces places continuoient d'être gardées avec la négligence accoutumée et remarquable.

Qu'à la vérité, d'après le décret de Buonaparte du 10 Avril, Philippeville doit recevoir une garnison de 1500, et Rocroi une de 1000 hommes, pris dans la garde nationale mobile, formée par le même décret; mais que, malgré toute la célérité qu'on pourra mettre à l'exécution de ce décret, il est à présumer qu'il se passera bien encore quinze jours ou trois semaines avant qu'une distribution même partielle de cette garde nationale puisse avoir lieu.

Qu'avec le nombre et l'espèce d'hommes dont je suis sûr de pouvoir disposer dans les principautés de Chimay et de Beaumont, j'oserois entreprendre à mes risques et périls, et avec une grande probabilité de succès, à me rendre maître de l'une ou de l'autre de ces places, mais plus facilement de la première.

Qu'enfin, je ne demande pour me soutenir dans cette entreprise que trois cent hommes de troupes régulières, dont une trentaine de cavalerie légère, à prendre dans les environs de Charleroi, d'où elles peuvent être conduites en quelques heures, et avec le plus grand secret, au point convenable.

Que je ne demande ni fonds, ni crédit, ni secours d'aucune espèce, excepté quatre mille cartouches, qui seroient mises à ma disposition à Charleroi.

Si l'exécution de ce projet pouvoit entrer de quelque manière dans le plan d'opérations de votre Grâce, en cas d'hostilités prochaines, il seroit nécessaire que je me rendisse, sans perte de tems, à mon habitation près de Chimay, tant pour prévenir tout soupçon que pour prendre sur les lieux mêmes les informations, mesures, et précautions convenables; faire parvenir à votre Grâce, ou à l'officier qui me serait indiqué par elle, le plan détaillé, ainsi que l'énoncé des voies et moyens de cette entreprise; de m'entendre avec le commandant du petit corps de troupes régulières destinés à me soutenir; et enfin de me tenir prêt et en état d'exécuter mon projet dans les trois jours, au plus tard, de l'ordre reçu.

L'honneur d'avoir donné à mon Souverain et à votre Grâce cette nouvelle preuve de mon zèle et de mon dévouement, celui d'avoir contribué essentiellement à délivrer mes braves compatriotes d'une domination détestée, est la seule récompense que j'ambitionne.

Daignez me faire connoître si je dois poursuivre ou abandonner l'idée de cette entreprise, et recevez avec bonté l'hommage du profond respect avec lequel je suis,

Monseigneur, de Votre Grâce

Le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

BARON DE HARTEMBERG.

Lieut.-General C. Alten to Major-General Sir Hudson Lowe.

SIR, Lens, 17th April, 1815.

Agreeable to your letter of the 14th instant, I have the honour of transmitting you the accompanying return of field equipment of the Hanoverian corps. His Grace the Duke of Wellington will perceive they have no pioneers on the establishment, nor any intrenching tools. The former are soon formed, if the appointments can be got; and as I have yesterday got an authority from Hanover to purchase as many more horses as are necessary for the equipment, I could also order each battalion to purchase a horse for the carriage of intrenching tools, if the latter can be supplied. Although I have been always sensible of these and many deficiencies in the field equipment of the Hanoverian troops, I could only report them to their government at Hanover, who, from the long distance, cannot send them for a long time; and the impossibility for me to calculate, on our lately taking the field, how long we were to remain in some degree stationary, made it impracticable for me to order them in this country, had I even found means to do so, and been willing to take the responsibility upon myself without previous authority from Hanover.

Pay and Allowances.

With respect to the pay and allowances of the officers, I beg to enclose you a comparative statement of the Hanoverian field-pay with the British pay. One baggage-waggon has always been attached to each corps for the conveyance of regimental and officers' baggage; and as that was found insufficient, a second waggon has been granted for each corps, for which the horses are already distributed and the waggons now making at Antwerp and other places.

One month's pay was granted by the Hanoverian government as outfit money to every officer, on their troops being put on the war establishment in 1813; and on my suggestion as to the necessity of establishing a permanent field allowance, the Hanoverian government have lately granted another month's pay to every officer as outfit money for the current year, which for the subalterns particularly, as his Grace will perceive from the accompanying statement, are very small. I have, however, given out in General Orders, that after the second baggage-waggon is completed, which I trust will be in a very short time, no more requisition waggons can be allowed for the officers' baggage; and as the baggage-waggons must, under many circumstances, remain several days in the rear of the army, I have recommended to the officers to carry a small portmanteau on their own horse, or those who cannot afford to purchase one to club together and keep a bât-horse.

Ammunition.

One ammunition-waggon, holding 18,000 ball-cartridges, is attached to each corps. Independent of this, no establishment of reserve ammunition exists with the Hanoverian corps.

Means of Transport.

The number of waggons and carts to move with a Hanoverian brigade, therefore, will be as follows:

Private Property.—One waggon for the Brigadier, as allowed by General Orders.

For each Battalion of Infantry.

Public Property.—One ammunition-waggon, drawn by 6 horses; two baggage-waggons, drawn by 4 horses each; one medicine-cart, drawn by 2 horses.

Private Property.—One waggon for the Paymaster.

As the Hanoverian Paymasters, who also do the function of Quartermasters, have no public horse for the conveyance of their papers and money, I conceive they ought to be indulged with keeping a waggon; the more so as the money-chest, until it is provided with its own means of conveyance, remains at Antwerp, and will always be some distance in rear of the army, where the Paymasters will have to go occasionally for money.

One spring-waggon or cart, according to General Orders, for the conveyance of 12 sets of bedding and the knapsacks of the weakly men.

As the Hanoverian troops have no establishment of that kind, and it being improbable that the British will attach spring-waggons to them, I beg to be informed whether the British Commissariat is to take carts into pay and attach them to the Hanoverian battalions, or whether they are to be allowed a requisition waggon each for that purpose.

Moveable Hospitals are very deficient, particularly in medical officers. The few officers of the hospital staff and the stores (with the exception of the 12 sets of bedding, which remain with each corps) which we had at Ghent were necessarily sent to Antwerp for the formation of the general hospital at that place; so that the Deputy Inspector, who moves with my head-quarters, has only one assistant with him, and a public waggon with 4 horses, filled with medical stores for the occasional supply of the medicine-cart which moves with every corps: consequently, no reserve of medical officers exists to form field-hospitals, and the battalions cannot spare any, particularly the militia, who have only one Assistant-Surgeon each, with a sort of assistant under him, and a full Surgeon to each militia brigade. This is one of the many points on which I made the strongest representations by a courier I despatched to Hanover the same day I got the order to prepare the corps for taking the field; but, with every inclination on the part of the Hanoverian government to supply the deficiency, they find it impossible at this moment, when they want so many for the reservé, and can get no assistance from adjacent countries who likewise complete their armies.

I should be glad to be favoured with his Grace the Duke of Wellington's directions with respect to the Hanoverian sick and wounded, particularly of those brigades already incorporated with British troops; whether the British Commissary, who I apprehend will be attached to each Hanoverian brigade, is to be applied to for means of conveyance to the hospitals; and whether the hospitals may be formed in the same or most adjacent villages with the British, to facilitate the means of supply and to get assistance for the attendance of the wounded as long as we are so very destitute of medical officers.

With respect to the orderlies and detachments accompanying the sick to the rear, I have, as much as practicable, adopted his Grace the Duke of Wellington's regulations in the Peninsula.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

CHARLES ALTEN.

I have just had a letter from General Decken from Brussels, where I shall go immediately to try getting some of our wants supplied from the reserve. I shall be back for his Grace's inspection of my division on the 19th, and probably meet the Duke at Mons.

AUG. HEISE, Major and Military Secretary,
Corps of Hanoverians.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 17th April, 1815.

I have this morning received your Grace's letter of the 12th instant,* on the subject of the Portuguese troops.

In my letter of the 7th I told you that no time should be lost in getting the transports ready, in case it should be decided to send to Lisbon for the troops; and I have the satisfaction to inform your Grace that transports for twelve or fourteen thousand men will be prepared to sail by the end of this week.

Lord Castlereagh will instruct our ambassador at Lisbon on the subject, and I hope we shall have no difficulty on that side; but the transports shall sail without waiting for the answer, although I shall be rather laughed at if they return empty.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 301.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 18th April, 1815.

I have desired Lord Castlereagh to send you a copy of his instructions to Mr. Canning. Lord Castlereagh has seen the Portuguese Ambassador, who has promised to support the proposition. We go, you see, upon the presumption that the Portuguese plenipotentiaries have acceded to the Treaty of Chaumont.

Lords Liverpool and Castlereagh seem to doubt whether the Portuguese government will consent. I have promised that they shall find new clothing at Ostend on their arrival. This may be some little temptation, as I know they want clothing.

Yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

I have just received the enclosed from the Foreign Office.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Right Hon. G. Canning.

SIR, Foreign Office, 17th April, 1815.

The importance of strengthening as much as possible the Duke of Wellington's army at the outset of the campaign has suggested to his Grace the advantage of obtaining the support of a limited amount (viz., to the extent of 12,000 or 14,000 men) of Portuguese troops.

Their services during the last war, the advantage of such a Commander as Marshal Beresford at their head, and the number of valuable British officers connected with their organization, have rendered it extremely desirable that the auxiliary force should, with the concurrence of the Portuguese government, be conveyed to the Low Countries with the least practicable delay.

In order that no time may be unnecessarily lost, transports for their conveyance have been ordered to proceed forthwith to the Tagus; and I am to signify to your Excellency the Prince Regent's pleasure that you do use your best exertions with the Portuguese Regency to induce them not only to direct but to accelerate their departure.

His Royal Highness presumes with confidence upon the sanction of the Regency to this measure, the Portuguese plenipotentiaries at Vienna having acceded to the treaty signed at Vienna on the 25th ultimo by Austria, Russia, Great Britain, and Prussia, copy of which I have the honour to enclose, binding their government to furnish a corps of 20,000 men to the common cause.

In proposing to the Regency to employ the above proportion of their contingent in concert with the British army, with whom on former occasions they have so honourably distinguished themselves in the field, your Excellency may observe that although the scene of operations is somewhat more distant, the facility of arriving at once by sea renders the theatre of their employment, in fact, more convenient than if they were again to re-enter France after a laborious march through the interior of Spain.

Your Excellency will receive enclosed a memorandum of the allowances that will be made by the British government to this corps whilst on service. They are calculated upon the same scale as what the British government proposes to allow to the other Allied troops, and the Duke of Wellington seems clearly of opinion that this sum, as all necessary supplies of provisions and forage will be furnished gratis to the troops when in France by His Most Christian Majesty's officers, will cover the extra expense of these troops whilst on service, the British government charging itself with the expense of their conveyance to and from the place of debarkation.

It must be further observed, that as the 12,000 or 14,000 men proposed to be sent to Flanders will be considered as part of the contingent of 20,000 men which the Portuguese government have been bound to furnish to the common cause by their accession to the above-mentioned treaty, the 11*l.* per man will come in aid of the charge to which the Portuguese government is, at any rate, liable for the maintenance of their contingent.

The Prince Regent fully relies on the success of your Excellency's exertions to overcome any hesitation which the Regency might feel in detaching Portuguese troops, without express orders from the Brazils, upon so distant a service; but as the case is equally unforeseen and urgent, they will no doubt feel that their conduct will be approved by their own Court, in proportion as it is marked by that decision and energy which the security of Europe and the exigency of the conjuncture demand.

I am, &c.,

CASTLEREAGH.

II.

Memorandum as to Subsidy.

The British government grants a subsidy of 5,000,000*l.* to the three Allied Powers, each respectively engaging to bring into the field 150,000 men, exclusive of garrisons. 5,000,000*l.* for 450,000 men is at the rate of rather more than 11*l.* per man.

The British government is also bound to furnish 150,000 men as its own contingent, exclusive of the above subsidy; in default, to pay 20*l.* for each infantry soldier and 30*l.* for every cavalry soldier deficient.

Assuming the British troops actually serving at 50,000 men, there remain 100,000, the number of men for which a commutation in money must be paid. Taking this sum at 2,100,000*l.*, it is proposed to apply it so as to afford aid to the minor Powers, as nearly as may be, at the same rate per man which the three great Powers are to receive, viz., 11*l.*

The distribution of this fund of 2,100,000*l.* is left altogether at the disposal of the Duke of Wellington, his Grace undertaking so to arrange as to secure, in applying the same, the quota of troops which the British government is bound to furnish, extending at the same time some aid to the other acceding Powers.

The rate of 11*l.* per man may be considered as the minimum allowance; but any material excess above that sum should not be calculated upon.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 18th April, 1815.

The proposition contained in your letter of the 13th, which I received and acknowledged yesterday, was submitted to the Duke of York after the messenger was gone. He very much approved of it; but on calling on him this morning he showed me his letters of the 14th from Brussels, by which it appeared that the Regent had not the authority to allow the recruiting from the Hanoverian militia, that body being raised by the States, whose consent was necessary, and, for the reasons given, not to be expected. The proposition which the Duke showed me was, it was stated, approved by you, in consequence, I presume, of your having seen that the first could not be acted upon.

I have also seen the Regent, who gave me your Grace's letter, with an enclosure from Count Münster.

I trust that the alterations which have been made in this second proposition will improve it, as they will enable you to have the application of all the officers of the King's German Legion who shall be reduced, thereby materially improving the militia. I think the large bounty to be given to the Hanoverian government, without inquiring into its application, will induce them to transfer the militia to get the money.

The Regent has engaged to give his authority for the transfer of the officers from the King's German Legion to the militia, and the whole of the instructions are to go out to-night. I gave the order for recruiting for the King's German Legion some days ago; but upon inquiring yesterday evening, nothing had been done upon it.

I am yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

War Department, Downing Street,
18th April, 1815.

MY LORD,

I have received from Lord Castlereagh the copy of a despatch from Sir Charles Stuart, dated the 5th instant, enclosing two notes which have been addressed to him by the Duke of Feltre. These notes contain applications to His Majesty's government for supplies of arms, clothing, &c., to the following amount, viz.:—

1st. 15,000 stand of arms for the forces of His Most Christian Majesty in the Netherlands.

2ndly. 6000 to be sent to Jersey for the use of the Duke of Bourbon's followers.

3rdly. 10,000 for the use of La Vendée.

4thly. 12,000 for Bordeaux and the coast of Gascony.

5thly. Clothing and necessaries complete for 15,000 men to be sent to the Netherlands.

I do myself the honour to enclose, for your Grace's information, a copy of the answer which I have caused to be returned to Lord Castlereagh's Under-Secretary; and I will direct that as large a supply of arms and clothing as can be spared conveniently for this particular service shall be sent to Ostend. They will be consigned to your Grace's order, and I am to request you will cause such deliveries to be made as you shall see necessary from time to time for the service of His Most Christian Majesty. It is desirable that a separate and particular account should be kept of all such deliveries, in order that the amount of their value may be carried hereafter to the debit of the French government.

I have the honour to be
Your Grace's most obedient and most faithful servant,
BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Major-General Sir H. E. Bunbury to J. P. Morier, Esq.

War Department, Downing Street,
SIR, 18th April, 1815.

I have lost no time in laying before Earl Bathurst your letter of yesterday's date, together with a copy of Sir Charles Stuart's despatch, and the accompanying notes received from the Duke de Feltre. His Lordship directs me to acquaint you in answer, for the information of Viscount Castlereagh, that he conceives the following answers may be given on the part of His Majesty's government to the several demands of the French Minister:—

1st. With regard to the muskets which may be required in the Netherlands for the service of His Most Christian Majesty, measures will be taken which will enable the Duke of Wellington to furnish the necessary supplies as occasions may require.

2nd. A vessel laden with arms, accoutrements, and ammunition shall be sent to Jersey for the eventual supply of the Royalist forces in Brittany.

3rd. Preparation will be made of arms and ammunition for the service of His Most Christian Majesty in La Vendée whenever authentic information shall have been obtained with regard to the actual state of that country, and the means of appropriating such arms in a useful manner.

4th. Nine thousand stand of arms, with ammunition, &c., were sent some time ago, under Colonel Jenkinson's care, to the Gironde. No report has been yet received from Colonel Jenkinson; but it is feared that the recent events at Bordeaux and Bayonne will have prevented the distribution of these arms.

5th. With regard to the clothing which is desired for the service of His Most Christian Majesty in the Netherlands, exertions will be made to forward such of the articles as can be speedily procured to Antwerp, where they will remain at the disposition of the Duke of Wellington, and be held applicable to the service of His Majesty as they may be required.

I am, &c.,
H. E. BUNBURY.

The Duke of York to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 18th April, 1815.

Referring to the report of the expected arrival from Hanover of the corps of Landwehr under the command of Lieut.-General Baron Decken, I have to acquaint your Grace that it would not suit the arrangements of the army to place that officer upon the Staff in Belgium; and as his services are of very material consequence to the Duke of Cambridge and the executive government in Hanover, it is the Prince Regent's command that the Lieutenant-General shall return thither when he shall deliver over the command of the corps in the manner required by your Grace.

I take this opportunity of acquainting your Grace that, by the Prince Regent's command, I have made a proposal to the Hanoverian government, through the Duke of Cambridge, that the recruiting of the King's German Legion shall be carried into effect by them under a bounty granted by this country.

Although it may be considered an infraction of the Germanic law, as well as in violation of the Prince Regent's engagement to provide his Hanoverian contingent, to make any transfer from the Landwehr for the purpose of completing the Legion in Brabant, yet I hope that this desirable arrangement may be carried into effect by the Hanoverian States consenting to make the transfer in the first instance, and to apply the recruits raised for the Legion to make up the deficiency in the Landwehr.

I enclose to your Grace the copies of two letters which I have written to the Duke of Cambridge on this subject.

In the present weak state of the corps of cavalry and infantry of the German Legion, I have, according to your Grace's recommendation, taken the pleasure of the Prince Regent upon your forming the cavalry and infantry regiments into eight troops and companies each, in order that you may apply the supernumerary officers to the duties of the Landwehr. I find by your communication to Lord Bathurst that your Grace would wish the formation of the infantry battalions into six companies; and should you think this a more desirable arrangement, I have to request that your Grace will use your discretion accordingly.

I am, my Lord Duke, yours,

FREDERICK, Commander-in-Chief.

Richard Hart Davis, Esq., to Major-General Sir H. Torrens.

DEAR TORRENS, Piccadilly, 19th April, 1815.

I spoke to Lord Castlereagh this morning upon the subject of a Spanish division, to be commanded by Whittingham, and sent to the Low Countries.

He said it was a question which must be decided by the Duke of Wellington, because the government here had given him a limit to expense, and his Grace was to raise the largest force he could with the money allowed him.

Lord Castlereagh said that General Whittingham must apply directly to the Duke, and make his own statement. Perhaps you would have the goodness to enclose Whittingham's letter to the Duke, merely saying that the government had received an offer from General Whittingham of a Spanish corps, but that he had been referred to the Duke of Wellington.

Lord Castlereagh said that it was impossible to say at present whether Spanish and Portuguese troops would or would not be wanting in the Mediterranean; but he thought it not improbable that the events of war might call for them there.

I am, dear Torrens, most truly yours,

R. H. DAVIS.

Have the goodness to send Whittingham's letter when you have read it. Not a moment should be lost in forwarding it.

General Whittingham to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, 39, Piccadilly, Green Park, 19th April, 1815.

Had not your Grace allowed me to hope that my conduct during the late war in Spain had merited your approbation, I should not venture to intrude myself upon your time and attention at a moment when both must be so entirely occupied.

From the first formation of the division of Majorca, my anxious desire was to serve under your Grace's immediate orders. This happiness I was not so fortunate as to attain: but having now understood that it is possible a division of Portuguese troops may be sent to Belgium to form part of the army under your command, I cannot help throwing myself upon your Grace's kindness, by submitting that a division of Spanish troops, either infantry, cavalry, and horse artillery, or infantry alone, would be obtained from the Spanish government upon the slightest hint from your Grace; and I am most fully convinced that, forming part of your Grace's army, they would do their duty most brilliantly.

The pay of these troops, as your Grace may recollect, amounts to 5000 dollars per month for every 1000 men, including officers.

Should this idea merit your Grace's approbation, and you should think me worthy to command this division, I have no doubt that, by going instantly to Spain, I could get the troops formed by me, and augmented, if necessary, to 8000 or 10,000 men, ready for embarkation in the shortest possible time.

If, however, your Grace should not approve of Spanish troops being sent for, I still hope you will have the goodness to keep in mind my extreme anxiety to serve under your immediate orders, in whatever situation you may be pleased to place me, and that you will grant me this favour whenever an opportunity may offer.

I have the honour to be, with respect,

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

SANDFORD WHITTINGHAM.

G. Feilding, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Brussels, 19th April, 1815.

When I left Milan on the 10th instant with despatches from Lord William Bentinck and Mr. Hill, I was directed to stop and communicate to your Excellency that, in consequence of Murat's having commenced hostilities against the Austrians, Lord William had sent to inform him that he considered the armistice concluded with him as at an end, and had given instructions accordingly to our military and naval officers.

Murat had published at Rimini a very inflammatory proclamation, calling upon the Italians in the North to rise and throw off the yoke of foreign oppression, and to assist him in establishing the liberty and independence of their country: the inhabitants of the King of Sardinia's States are included in this address. Colonel Sir John Dalrymple, who left Murat's head-quarters, I believe, on the 3rd, states the spirit of that part of Italy to be very bad: great numbers of men were out upon the road to meet Murat, and in the towns the inhabitants had spontaneously provided provisions, carts, forage, &c., previous to his arrival. The same spirit exists in all the States occupied by the Austrians. The Piedmontese are believed by the authorities at Turin to be in general well affected, but the army, though 30,000 in number, is greatly in want of discipline, artillery, horses, arms, military stores, and equipments.

Your Excellency has probably seen the Austrian account of the action on the Panaro on the 4th. Sir J. Dalrymple, who passed just afterwards, says the bridge was forced by the Neapolitans with inferior numbers, and that the loss of the Austrians was about 1200 men, including 400 prisoners; that of the Neapolitans 400 or 500. There was another action on the 8th, in which, according to the reports at Milan on the 10th, the Austrians were defeated. Lord W. Bentinck, who was at the Austrian head-quarters at Mantua on the 9th, told me he knew there had been something the preceding day, but could get no account of it, and therefore concluded it had been unfavourable. At the Innsbruck Police-office I was told the Austrians had on that day lost a great many men. Their army was concentrated at Casal Maggiore, and their reinforcements, which till the 11th passed through Verona 2000 or 3000 daily (I could not learn the probable number), were directed upon Ferrara. I trust your Excellency will have the goodness to excuse the haste in which I have written the above, and have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

G. FEILDING,
Attached to H.M. Mission at Turin.

MY LORD DUKE, Antwerp, 19th April, 1815.

In compliance with the wish signified in the note which I had the honour to receive from your Grace, dated the 11th instant, I have been to Ostend, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of naval co-operation in the event of that place being attacked; and I beg to submit to your Grace's consideration a statement of my observations, together with a map, showing the outline of the works at Ostend and the anchorage in front of it.

I send a duplicate of the statement, one of which I request your Grace will have the goodness to return to me with such observations in the margin as you may deem it desirable to make, which will serve for my guidance in proposing to the Admiralty the equipment of such a force as may meet your Grace's wishes; and in the mean time I have already recommended that 2 bombs, 2 brigs, and 6 gun-boats should be forthwith fitted.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,
Your Grace's obedient, humble servant,
T. B. MARTIN.

[Let my notes on one of the Admiral's papers be copied on the other, and given to him.

W.]

[ENCLOSURE.]

OBSERVATIONS ON OSTEND, RELATING TO NAVAL CO-OPERATION IN THE DEFENCE OF THE PLACE.

Ostend, 15th April, 1815.

A ridge of sand-hills, extending along the shore on each side of Ostend, will enable troops to advance unobserved by vessels on the coast; but their fire may be directed by compass signals from the town, so as to annoy the enemy, by throwing shells over the sand-hills.

The most direct and convenient way for troops to approach Ostend from the westward is along the beach when the tide begins to ebb; but as this may generally be prevented by the gun-vessels, the enemy would be reduced to the necessity of taking the road within the sand-hills, which is loose and deep, or to make a détour, and come by the chaussée leading from Gristet to Ostend, which, it is presumed, might in some measure be destroyed on the prospect of an attack.

At the commencement of a siege naval co-operation will be useful in keeping the working parties of the enemy in check, and gun-vessels may be employed with good effect in support of the new battery now constructing between Fort Royal and Ostend, besides being generally serviceable in the defence of the place.

The material points therefore to be considered will be the description and number of vessels to be prepared, and the nature of the anchorage they have to enable them to maintain their stations.

[I should doubt the practicability of making these compass signals. The bearing must be stated between the ships supposed to be stationary, and the troops either a moving or stationary body, by a person at a third distant station.

W.]

I should recommend that there be prepared and held in readiness 2 bombs, 2 brigs, with 2 long 18-pounders each, and 6 heavy gun-boats; all of them to be provided with Shrapnell shells, and the number of vessels to be increased as the Commander-in-Chief of the troops may represent to be necessary.

Vessels anchoring before Ostend are, of course, much exposed when the wind blows directly on the shore at N.W.; but they appear to be relieved both by the flood and ebb-tide, which, by taking a direction each way along shore, tends in some degree to counteract the effect of the wind and sea.

There is a shoal extending some distance immediately in front of Ostend, called the "Stone Bank," between which and the shallow water from the shore there is a passage, two cables' lengths, or 1200 feet in breadth, which the pilots consider unsafe as an anchorage, because there is no room for a ship if she drives. This shoal has a considerable effect in breaking the violence of the sea after the tide has ebbed for two hours; and if small vessels with heavier anchors than those properly belonging to them were to take a position under the bank, as at A, while the weather was moderate, they would be able to ride out a heavy gale of wind; but I so far agree with the pilots that it would never do as a place of egress and regress when blowing fresh, nor would it be safe for the gun-boats to lay there in any bad weather.

It certainly appears advisable that vessels employed on this coast should have heavier anchors than those commonly allowed to them.

There is an anchorage without the Stone Bank, where I observed a transport laying for the last twenty-four hours in a strong gale of wind, and apparently relieved as before described by the tide, though exposed to a heavy sea; but the way in which this vessel has stood the gale seems to justify an opinion that men-of-war would lay there under more trying circumstances.

Naval co-operation may be considered as generally certain during the fine weather season; and though, of course, much more precarious in the winter, yet in moderate weather, or with the wind off from the shore, the larger vessels may act with safety and effect, and can stand out to sea or anchor in the offing when there is any change unfavourable for their operations; but the service of the gun-boats can only be available while the enemy's position and the cover of our own batteries may leave the harbour open to them.

In the event of the place being closely besieged, I think boats may still pass up and down the river in the night-time, so as to convey supplies or to withdraw men from the basin without any unreasonable hazard, if done near the time of high-water.

It will have to be decided whether the vessels proposed for this service should be held in readiness in the Downs or at Sheerness, or be sent at once to Ostend.

It appears that at present the service is suffering much inconvenience from the detention of transports at Ostend, by their not being able to get out (even in moderate weather) when the wind is from the north-west, because they cannot clear the point at E; and to remedy this it is necessary that two anchors of 24 cwt. each should be placed, as at F, from whence the vessels will always be able to make sail.

[The co-operation of these vessels in case Ostend should be attacked would be very desirable; but that event is now so improbable, that I cannot think it desirable to keep in preparation these ships in contemplation of the necessity of their being so employed.

W.]

The harbour of Ostend is stated to be filling up very fast, and from the best information I can collect there is seven feet less water on the Bar now than there was when the British troops were here in 1793; and to check this growing evil (if our use of the port can possibly be of such duration as to make it desirable) the basin G, originally made as a reservoir for a back-water, should be brought again into use. The French, seeing the injury done by depriving the river of this cleansing process, had intended to restore the back-water to its proper purpose, and 30,000 francs were levied on those whose interest is connected with the preservation of the harbour, for some repairs which are necessary before it can be made serviceable, and possibly this appropriated; but unapplied money may yet be forthcoming if called for by the proper authorities.

The transports best calculated for coming into this river are those of about 170, or not exceeding 200 tons, and of such a construction as not to draw more than ten or eleven feet of water.

T. B. MARTIN.

[I have spoken to the King on this subject, and he has told me that measures have been ordered which will clear the harbour.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

St. James's Square, 19th April, 1815.

Lord Castlereagh presents his compliments to the Duke of Wellington, and transmits to his Grace five letters from Paris containing interesting intelligence.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Paris, 31st March, 1815.

Situated as I am, I can only get at things by chance, or guess from their complexion; but as the next month must be fertile in great events, I shall devote myself entirely to one object, the getting as distinct and clear a view as I can of affairs here. If it does no other good, it will put us both au courant.

The interests of England are deeply affected by whatever turn things may take, and in justice to English statesmen I must say they are the only men deserving that name that I have seen; and I know something of them in all countries. For this reason a great political fault just now committed or connived at by them might be fatal to Europe; but I feel secure on that head.

The last accounts from the departments prove that France is not all in the hands of Buonaparte.

Your letter of the 20th arrived safe on the 27th. Buonaparte has not yet shown himself in public but at a review: no illumination, no symptom of rejoicing, but a general morne inquiétude.

2nd April.

I conversed to-day with a man of some consideration; and amongst other things he observed, that as Paris was fertile in novelties, why should we not see a Republican government administered by the Emperor Napoleon? "Il a avalé la souveraineté du peuple: point de guerre au dehors, point d'actes arbitraires. La noblesse abolie, la libre circulation de la pensée, et pardi! il en avalera bien d'autres avant deux mois." He said this with a most sardonic grin and a visible rage concentrée.

There are some odd reports of Masséna, whose name has not appeared in the papers. Ney is suspected; Augereau à ses terres; Macdonald retired from service. I believe Buonaparte cordially hates all his Marshals except Davoust, and he has often insulted him.

3rd April.

An act to disarm the inhabitants has given much umbrage, and will have the exact contrary effect. Buonaparte wants an army of 300,000 men. The military about him push this. The Jacobins will have no army or means of aggression in his hands, and they seem at issue on this point.

Read what General Caffarelli said to the troops at Rennes: "Les premiers actes qui ont suivi le retour de l'Empereur annoncent à la France une administration sage, ferme, et le Cabinet le plus fortement constitué qui existe en Europe." The names of this Cabinet justify all that I wrote to you on the 21st and 22nd March.

5th April.

Fouché's letter to the préfet is well worth reading. The people talk more openly and loudly now that the dazzle of Buonaparte's coming is over; and they regret the King. We have various accounts from the south, but "la libre circulation" de la vérité is not yet established. The Duchesse d'Angoulême is a model for French princes. A purely civil war will not do much good, though it would unite the curses of all against the cause of it. You may see how Buonaparte dreads it from Savary's address to the gendarmes of the 2nd April :—

"Ecoutez les ordres de Napoléon. Soldats ! vous marcherez le fusil en bandoulière ; vous ne chargerez pas vos armes ; vous n'userez jamais de la force ; vous respecterez partout les citoyens ; vous ne commettrez jamais le crime de tirer contre des Français ; et quand nous sommes en présence je me charge d'arrêter les malheurs d'une guerre impie et parricide." He does not tell us how, though.

II.

Paris, 8th April, 1815.

A decree came out to-day that has raised much consternation and anger amongst the people. It is directed against the Bourbons and their adherents, and will force to quit Paris several thousands of persons. Contrasted with the former douceur of the acts of the Tuileries, it appears truly Jacobinical.

A plot is supposed to be discovered which gave rise to it. I rather think they invented the plot for the decree. Nobody ever suspected the poor Bourbons or their adherents of much plotting here.

The papers of the 4th are come. La marche des Alliés, though it could not be doubted, alarms them, as well as the unanimity at home and the 36 millions.

Buonaparte is certainly the creature of two men, and would infallibly sink under them, even if the Allies did nothing. It is said he insists on going to the field. Fouché said it was impossible. B. : "Ils ne se battront pas sans moi." F. : "Si vous quittez Paris, vous êtes perdu." These two phrases tell you more than all I could write.

I believe there is nothing maturely settled here yet. They look with anxiety to the 1st May, and it may produce things that even they don't foresee. From the best judgment that I can form generally of the present state of feeling, the thing will be soon over. There is no army to resist the Allies. The people will not rise in any case. No great force can be had without conscription, and no one dare name the word.

Buonaparte cannot command in person. He has no great captain that he can trust. The esprit militaire is on the wane in France. Even the word "gloire" is getting out of fashion. How should it be otherwise, when all the Sovereigns came to this capital and had the whole population of Paris at their feet? The Bourbons, with a laudable delicacy to France, put aside in a corner the few eagles that escaped, and Buonaparte now drags them to light to make the recollection of their defeat more glaring ; and his chief accusation against the Bourbons is for endeavouring to make the people forget them. Generals who want to be Marshals, Colonels who want to be Generals, and all the young men in the service, who from the Lycée have known or heard of nothing but Buonaparte, are his only military supporters, and these are sincere. The civil ones are all the men to whom he gave great and small employments, and who are now entirely replaced in them. I can find in the whole range of France no other real Buonapartists. With the Jacobins he is only an instrument : but though the same men, they are not the Jacobins of '92 ; they are not Republicans ; they will have a free constitution ; and I believe that impression is now general, and in that they will have the people with them. I am persuaded, that end as things may, they must end in a free government. The Bourbons consented when it was too late.

It is to this, in my mind, inevitable result that I look at present as the most important consideration of the whole; and you will understand me when I say that Louis XVIII. and his Charte constitutionnelle would have suited us much better.

Buonaparte gives me, just now, the idea of a chained monkey in the Tuileries, and the well-dressed people who stand all day looking up at the windows seem to think so too. True to his likeness, he has lately broken all the glasses and china in his way. When the news arrived of the Empress being stopped, a tradesman assured me that he broke 40,000 livres worth of the finest glaces in his apartments.

It will be soon seen whether they will sacrifice the idol to the country, or the country to the idol—de la Garde Impériale!! I should like to argue this question with Carnot, entre quatre murailles.

4 o'clock.

I received this moment your three lines, without date. I shall go on as long as I can; but when papers stay long by me for want of an opportunity, I am obliged to destroy them, for there is no trusting these gentlemen a single hour. I can assure you very sincerely that everything personal to myself is forgotten in the wish to render service. We are not on a bed of roses here, but it is interesting to be near Vesuvius, though an eruption might swallow us.

I have collected all the interesting printed things, but events must now succeed each other so rapidly that everything will appear old that is not quite fresh.

Buonaparte has gone out for several days, but he loses in consequence and reputation.

The civil war fails totally, I fear.

Believe me,

III.

Paris, 10th April, 1815.

I have taken no small pains to procure as accurate ideas as possible upon many points touched on in my last. Opinions lightly or hastily formed on the present critical state of France would be highly unpardonable even in notes from me to you.

I have already told you who are really for Buonaparte, but all the others must not be taken as against him. Those who would tolerate him make a large number; the indifferent a still greater; and the lukewarm, who only boil over for the successful, are perhaps the greatest of all. But there are certain points upon which I am fixed, as far as all the reflection and judgment I possess can fix me, and I shall repeat them here because it is probable that many persons gone to England may have had different impressions. Buonaparte has no army fit to contend with or resist the force which I conceive to be coming down with the Allies. He has no money; he can get no such army. The National Guards will not disarm, nor will they fight for him, and he has completely disgusted them by putting officers of the line in the place of their own officers. The army he has is not all with him: some of them, I am told, have white cockades ready.

Paris will not be defended, nor will the people allow it to be fortified. There is no public feeling, out of the troops, against the entrance of the Allies. If the Bourbons did at first as they did at last, Buonaparte would never have been sent for; but he was on the French territory, and it was then too late. The present "Cabinet" took him because they could bind him, and they could not the King, who refused the Constitution offered, and the Jacobins were for ever deprived of all power to serve the country in their way. Even now, in the King's proclamation, which has just transpired, there is not a word of the slightest promise of a free government (they never will know the bearings of the public mind!), and without a free constitution the Bourbons would not reign long, if they were here to-morrow. The class of men I speak of are of the highest talents and influence. They don't like the Bourbons, because they see they never can be forgiven; but they have no repugnance to them, because the nation has none. Their preference, however, is for the Duke of Orleans: it was not stated why.

War is not in the contemplation of these men: they want personal security and independence, the impartial distribution of the graces and favours of a Court; and they have made long and great sacrifices to public freedom. These are their sentiments, as far as I have been able to discover them; and I believe they will act upon them.

Such do I conceive to be the true state of things here at this hour, but he would be a bold man who would say that this or any other state of feeling would have duration at Paris.

Events, as they rise, may alter them all.

I am afraid Maréchal Gouvion St. Cyr is taken at Lyons. Baron Vitrolles was arrested at Toulouse, and he is one of the proscrits. Let us see whether Buonaparte will venture to execute him.

11th April.

A telegraphic despatch brings worse news in the defeat and capture of the Duc d'Angoulême at Montelimart. Without a foreign diversion in the south they can do nothing; and these little advantages, true or falsely given, help Buonaparte with the military, who get insolent accordingly, as well as enthusiastic, and certainly will increase his army. If it is true, however, which God forbid! that the Duc d'Angoulême is in their hands, it is no trifling hostage, though I should have no doubt of the safety of his person, notwithstanding the late decree against the Bourbons.

All the printed things worth reading shall be annexed to these notes.

If the Allied Powers have published anything, we have not seen it here.

Buonaparte said of the Duchesse d'Angoulême, "C'est le seul homme de cette famille."

IV.

Paris, 12th April, 1815.

I thought that the points of most material interest to communicate to you were: How Buonaparte stands here as to support and public estimation? How are the army and the people as to their sentiments? What are the principles and views of the leading men? What is the feeling of the people in respect to the entrance of the Allied Powers into France, and what the probable force that Buonaparte could send to oppose their entrance?

Upon all these questions I have told you something in the way of opinion and calculation. I cannot tell what may happen on either side to alter the present feeling; but I am strongly persuaded that my view of it, as far as it goes, is well founded.

I believe further that no declaration will have any effect that does not precisely inculcate not only all disapprobation of interference as to the form of their government, but an assertion that they are entitled to a free government, and that the choice of a sovereign is left to the free, unbiassed consideration of the people; that the single exception of this man is not only because he broke all public faith, but that he also betrayed, humiliated, and nearly ruined France; and that a solemn act of all the great Powers of Europe cannot be rescinded as easily as a French oath of allegiance; preceded by some such declaration as this (leaving out the last words if you insist on it): "I should march into their country, because, without doing so, they cannot get rid of Buonaparte at this moment."

It must not be forgotten that they are most extraordinarily clever men who now govern; that they can give a great impulse to the people on certain points; and to destroy Buonaparte you must counteract the promises made in his name by, at least, the same promises, and guaranteed by all the Allied Powers, which he cannot do. This takes all excuse away from the supporters of freedom at Paris, and any great deviation from it, I fear, would fail.

Such a measure, coupled with another declaration on the part of the Bourbons to consolidate, with the same men who planned it, this great work of a solid and constitutional act of freedom, would give Louis XVIII. the only chance he has that I can see. By the word coupled, I mean of course politically, not virtually coupled. All this I have no doubt is done, and better done, while I am amusing you, like the cobbler in the farce, with "what he should do if he was king."

What vexes one the most is, that such a man should create such a bouleversement. If it were not for his outrage of all law or treaty that can bind nations, and consequently the legitimacy of war against him and all who support him; if it were not for the consistency as well as dignity of the Allied Powers, and that such outrage must be punished as an example to posterity, I should be inclined to tell them that the country they vanquished and the victim they spared are alike unworthy of their arms.

Buonaparte has no cavalry that deserves the name.

V.

Paris, 13th April, 1815.

The Duc d'Angoulême, having capitulated, is safe, I hear, and embarked at Cette. I send you an extraordinary paper of yesterday, which must be read with attention. Buonaparte intended to review the National Guards, and several days were appointed and as often put off. He now only "desires to see them," and they may come as they like. I spoke to one of them, a respectable tradesman, whom I knew: "Eh! bien, vous voilà enrôlé; il faut marcher." He shook his head; "mais vous vous battrez, j'espère, pour l'Empereur." "Oui," dit il; "comme nous sommes battus pour notre Roi." We both understood each other, and he spoke the sentiments of them all. If there is any printed manifesto in French, pray send it to me if possible. The French papers lie worse than ever; but in every page of them you see Buonaparte's terror. They don't lose a single opportunity of harping on "a war for the establishment of the Bourbons," and there is nothing here to contradict them. They put forward strongly enough their right to do as they please chez eux, and the people join in the cry; but they don't say what I wish to say for them, that Buonaparte is a felon returned from transportation, and that he has committed a second felony in taking a crown, after his life had been saved on the condition of his abdicating. I would have Englishmen pay no attention whatever to the French newspapers, and I wish it was also reciprocal here.

I never was fond of war, and I have been a sad victim to the last; but look fairly at this case. A public outrage is committed against every law in Christendom; a personal insult, and consequently a violent and impudent aggression, against all the Powers of Europe, and these Powers in arms! and France takes it as quietly as if it were a change in the seraglio at Constantinople, thinking it quite wonderful that we are not of the same opinion!

The present ministers possess an incalculable advantage, which has not been too dearly bought. They know most accurately the mind and means of all the Continental Powers, and whatever they decide on will be done on solid grounds. But with respect to the Bourbons, unless they devise means to conciliate the men here who now govern France, they cannot look to a safe return; and I don't know which would be the most arduous task, to make them trust the Jacobins, or the Jacobins trust them. There must be a pledge of some kind, and England sign the bond; for they will believe only in us.

You will hear every day of immense preparations; but Clarke must have told you there is not the matériel for a large army, and I am credibly informed they want ammunition.

Buonaparte is yet alone, unavowed, unauthorized, and will be so till the 1st of May. Lucien was here for a day, and sent back to Switzerland. He is, of course, raccommodé with his brother.

The French papers tell us strange things of Italy. It cannot be doubted, however, that great ferment has long existed there, as well as hatred of the Austrians. I enclose Buonaparte's gracious letter respecting the Duc d'Angoulême; but he has no credit, in my opinion, for the act. Two considerations occur to me, and I have just room for them. The Allied Powers must cerner France at all events; the same force and the same expense to keep such armies en pied to watch Buonaparte as to crush him at once, and it could unquestionably be done just now. If there should be any considerable delay from unavoidable circumstances, and that the 1st of May produces a constitution that the people really approve, it may then be a difficult undertaking.

The Earl of Liverpool to the Right Hon. G. Canning.

My dear Canning, Fife House, 19th April, 1815.

I am quite ashamed of not having written to you since the late extraordinary change which has taken place in France; but Huskisson promised me that he would keep you generally au courant des affaires; and my time has really been so incessantly occupied by official and other duties, that I feel confident you will excuse me.

Although there had been reason to believe for some months that there existed cabals against the government of Louis XVIII., yet it is certain that the fomenters of them never turned their eyes towards Buonaparte till a short time before his return.

Their first object was to place the Duke of Orleans upon the throne; and this would have been attempted if he had not refused to be their instrument. In fact, they wanted a king with a revolutionary title. Their pride was mortified by the events of last year, and they considered the termination of them as a reflection upon the Revolution in which they had been all more or less engaged.

In saying this, you will not understand me as implying an opinion that the great majority of the people of France were unfavourable to the Bourbons. I am convinced of the contrary; but the Jacobin party (which consists of the most able and desperate men in France), the greater part of the army, and most of the official employés, were against them; and the nation had neither virtue nor energy to engage in a conflict for the support of him whom, I really believe, they considered as their lawful Sovereign.

It was unfortunate that the King could not employ Fouché; but, considering him as a regicide, it is impossible not to enter into Louis XVIII.'s feelings with regard to him. The King's policy with regard to the army is likewise now severely criticised. It is said that he ought either to have adopted a plan for gradually disbanding the army, or that he should have trusted it; but he followed neither course. He kept the army up according to the state in which it was left by Buonaparte, and even augmented it; but he would not at the same time trust it about his person; and the establishment of his body-guard and his Swiss levies were the causes of the greatest jealousy and discontent among the old regiments.

To look forward, however: I think I know your sentiments well enough to be satisfied that you will be of opinion that we have no other line to adopt than to renew the war against Buonaparte, provided the Allies are disposed to embark heartily in the contest. I am happy in being able to assure you that there is not the least doubt on this head. All minor jealousies have been consigned to oblivion; and I should be at a loss to say whether Austria, Russia, or Prussia were most decided for active war with a view to the destruction of Buonaparte and his power. We trust that, by the middle of May, all the Allied armies will be on the frontier of France. The left (that upon the Upper Rhine) is to be commanded by Prince Schwarzenberg, the centre by Blücher, and the right by the Duke of Wellington. The latter is quite sanguine as to the result; and his residence in Paris has fortunately enabled him to form a tolerably just estimate of the military resources of France at the present crisis.

Whether the reestablishment of Louis XVIII. will follow the downfall of Buonaparte, if it shall be accomplished, is a question of more difficulty. Though we have no right to dictate to France as to the form of their government or the person of their Sovereign, we are bound in honour and justice not to countenance any project which is inconsistent with the rights of the legitimate Sovereign, and which might be adopted by many as a compromise if it appeared in any way to be not repugnant to the views of the Allies.

The private accounts from Paris are by no means unfavourable. Buonaparte's government is certainly not gaining popularity. He is at present in the hands of the Jacobins, and they are jealous of him. He has great difficulties in augmenting his army and in raising money. At the same time it would be most imprudent to give him more time for preparation than was quite indispensable.

The moment for entering France is a nice question; for we must not begin our operations with an inadequate force, and we must not, on the other hand, delay them an hour longer than is absolutely necessary.

I should hope, however, that all will be ready between the 10th and 20th of May. The Russians will by that time be on the Maine.

Believe me, &c.,

LIVERPOOL.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My dear Duke, Vienna, 19th April, 1815.

I have had little doubt for some time that the Russian government at least has long been in possession not only of the fact but of the very stipulations of the treaty of January. The certainty of this, from the arrest of Reinhard and seizure of his papers at Aix la Chapelle, leaves matters nearly in the state in which they were before. I would willingly act upon the suggestion conveyed in your letter of the 6th, but for two circumstances: the one, that it is made to depend upon any apparent coolness becoming visible on the part of the Emperor or his Ministers, which has certainly not yet occurred; the other, that entering into an explanation at this particular time would have the air of being conscious of having adopted a measure requiring to be excused; whereas, if we can draw the Ministers of Russia or Prussia on to take notice themselves of the treaty in the first instance, we should have the opportunity afforded, not of excusing but of justifying an act politic in itself, loudly called for by the circumstances of the then time, and now no longer available from the happy change which immediately followed its execution. The confidential intelligence given by me to each of the Ministers of the three Powers respecting the probable grant of subsidy was cordially received, although I did not think it prudent to state the precise amount as fixed. I trust our government will persevere in leaving the whole arrangement of this matter to your Grace: the best effects will follow from their so doing, as it will be the most effectual means of securing your influence in the councils of the campaign, and the co-operation in your plans of the other combined forces. I did not fail to mention this purpose of our government confidentially to the several Ministers, in order that it might have its due effect upon the decision of the military commission which is to assemble this evening upon the proposal contained in your despatch No. 3 of the 10th instant. Upon this Russia and Prussia have from the first stated their conviction of the necessity of following your advice; the Austrian has alone hung back, not, however, from any reluctance or desire to oppose your views, but because they will not have the amount of force which your despatch specifies at the period proposed for offensive operations.

My despatches to England will have shown your Grace the state of affairs here up to Saturday last: the subsequent time has chiefly been employed in negotiations with Baden, Hesse, Wurtemberg, and Darmstadt, with none of whom matters are yet finally arranged. With the first and third of these Powers it seems to be the general opinion that no great difficulty will occur; I should also hope that Hesse would prove constant; and as to Darmstadt, I know your Grace thinks it is no great matter whether she is so or not.

If any result comes from the military conference of this evening, I shall immediately despatch the messenger, without detaining him till we can prepare despatches for England. The importance of time is everything in this matter, so you must not be surprised at his arrival without diplomatic intelligence.

Pray give your messengers charge to travel somewhat faster. The bearer of your last despatches, Mr. Sylvester, though he left Brussels the 10th, did not reach Vienna till yesterday morning at 8 o'clock; a Dutch courier arrived here in less than eight hours after who did not leave Brussels till the evening of the 12th!

Yours, my dear Duke, very sincerely,

CLANCARTY.

W. Knatchbull, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Wednesday, 19th April, 1815.

I have the honour to inform your Grace that the latest account which the Austrian minister in Frankfort has received of the transactions in Italy is contained in news from Milan of the 11th. The action of the 8th proves to have been only an affair of the advanced posts between the Austrian and Neapolitan troops, and may be said to have terminated in favour of the former, who were able to maintain their ground. The Quartier-Général of the Austrian army had been moved forward from Bergoforte on the left, to St. Benedetto on the right bank of the Po, and the advanced posts were at Carpi. An Austrian force was in possession of the North of Italy for the protection of the King of Sardinia.

The Archduke Charles proceeded on his journey from hence to Mayence yesterday morning.

A considerable body of Bavarian troops have already passed through Heilbronn on their march to Mannheim, consisting of 3 regiments of light horse, 2 of infantry, several battalions of chasseurs, with a large train of artillery.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's obedient humble servant,

WYND. KNATCHBULL.

The Prince de Wrede to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL, Vienne, le 20 Avril, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de prévenir votre Excellence que, conformément à l'Article 6 de la convention militaire ci-jointe, j'envoye auprès d'elle M. le Colonel de Washington, Grand Maréchal de la Cour de S.A.R. le Prince Royal de Bavière, pour résider à son quartier-général et entretenir une correspondance active sur tout ce qui pourra intéresser et être à l'avantage commun des armées respectives. Il partira incessamment, et il aura l'honneur de présenter à votre Excellence la lettre créditive dont je l'ai muni à cet effet.

Je saisis cette occasion pour vous donner connaissance, Monsieur le Duc, que dans une conférence militaire qui a eu lieu hier au soir, et à laquelle LL.MM. l'Empereur de Russie et le Roi de Prusse ont assisté, on avoit été unanimement d'accord, avant mon arrivée, que l'armée du Haut-Rhin ne devroit et ne pourroit prendre l'offensive que vers le 1er du mois de Juin. Cependant d'après l'objection que j'ai faite que si, pendant cet intervalle, l'ennemi faisait mine de vouloir entreprendre quelque chose contre l'armée de votre Excellence et celle de la Prusse, il me paraissoit essentiel que moi et le Prince Royal de Wurtemberg, qui sera à ma gauche, nous fissions un mouvement en avant pour faire diversion à celui que l'ennemi pourroit opérer sur l'armée Prussienne et celle de votre Excellence, on a généralement reconnu et on est convenu que dans ce cas-là je devrais me porter en avant de la Sarre, tandis que le Prince Royal de Wurtemberg pourroit s'occuper de son côté du blocus de Landau et Bitsche, et faire en même tems une invasion dans l'Alsace.

J'instruis aujourd'hui le Maréchal Prince de Blücher de cette mesure, et je le préviens que d'ici au 25 de ce mois j'aurai 20 bataillons et 48 escadrons placés entre Germersheim sur le Rhin, et Trèves sur la Moselle.

Le reste de l'armée que j'ai l'honneur de commander, forte en tout de 46 bataillons, 66 escadrons, et 118 bouches à feu, prendra des cantonnemens serrés sur la rive droite du Rhin, de manière à pouvoir dans l'espace de trois jours passer sur la rive gauche de ce fleuve pour appuyer le mouvement de mes troupes qui y sont déjà placées.

Je suis extrêmement flatté, Monsieur le Maréchal, de me trouver par ces circonstances dans une relation plus étroite et plus active avec vous, et je prie votre Excellence d'agréer l'assurance de mes sentimens d'attachement et de ma haute considération.

LE MARÉCHAL PRINCE DE WREDE.

Le 30, au plus tard, je serois à Mannheim, où j'établis mon quartier-général.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Convention Militaire.

Leurs Majestés l'Empereur d'Autriche, Roi de Hongrie et de Bohême, l'Empereur de Toutes les Russies, le Roi de Prusse, et le Roi de Bavière, animés d'un égal désir de faire le plus promptement qu'il sera possible agir les forces que l'invasion de Napoléon Buonaparte les oblige de mettre en campagne, et jugeant que pour établir un ensemble et une harmonie parfaite dans leur coopération au but commun, il est nécessaire de fixer d'une manière précise les rapports entre leurs armées respectives, ont nommé, savoir :—

Sa Majesté l'Empereur d'Autriche, Roi de Hongrie et de Bohême, le Sieur Clément-Wenceslas-Lothaire Prince de Metternich-Winnebourg-Ochsenhausen, etc., etc. ;

Sa Majesté l'Empereur de Toutes les Russies, le Sieur Charles Robert Comte de Nesselrode, etc., etc. ;

Sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, le Sieur Charles Auguste Prince de Hardenberg, etc., etc. ;

Et Sa Majesté le Roi de Bavière, le Sieur Charles Philippe Prince de Wrede ; Lesquels sont convenus des dispositions suivantes, qui serviront de bases dans les rapports à établir avec l'armée Bavaroise.

ART. I.

Sa Majesté le Roi de Bavière, désirant faciliter par tous les moyens en son pouvoir les grandes opérations, et ne voulant pas multiplier le nombre des armées séparées, consent que son armée fasse, jusqu'à nouvelle disposition, partie de la grande armée du Haut-Rhin, qui sera commandée par M. le Feld-Maréchal Prince de Schwarzenberg.

ART. II.

Pour soigner les intérêts de l'armée Bavaroise sous le rapport de son administration et de sa subsistance, Sa Majesté Bavaroise accréditera un de ses généraux auprès du commandant en chef. Ce général sera appelé aux délibérations qui concerneront particulièrement l'armée Bavaroise. Le général en chef de cette armée le tiendra constamment informé de tout ce qui est nécessaire, afin qu'il puisse donner tous les renseignemens indispensables pour combiner les opérations.

ART. III.

Le général en chef de l'armée Bavaroise sera admis à toutes les délibérations qui auront lieu relativement au plan d'opération général toutes les fois que les circonstances l'exigeront et que les mouvemens de l'armée ne l'empêcheront pas d'y assister.

ART. IV.

Pour faciliter à l'armée Bavaroise les moyens de pourvoir à ses subsistances et à ses munitions, il est convenu qu'elle ne sera pas écartée de la ligne d'opération qui aura été fixée pour elle; et dans le cas où les circonstances rendroient un pareil mouvement nécessaire, il ne pourra avoir lieu qu'après avoir été concerté avec le général en chef de cette armée.

ART. V.

Trois bataillons Bavarois seront placés dans Mayence pour garder les dépôts de leur armée qui pourront être établis dans cette forteresse. Durant les opérations offensives, ces trois bataillons seront toujours à la disposition de leur général en chef, pour servir d'escorte aux convois des transports de munitions ou autres effets militaires. Dans le cas que Mayence viendroit à être assiégée, les susdits bataillons feront partie de la garnison, et seront sous les ordres du gouverneur de la place.

ART. VI.

Le général en chef de l'armée Bavaroise se réserve d'accréditer des officiers supérieurs aux quartiers-généraux de l'armée du Bas-Rhin et de l'armée de la Belgique.

En foi de quoi les plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé la présente convention, et y ont apposé le cachet de leurs armes.

Fait à Vienne le deux Avril, l'an de grâce mil huit cent quinze.

Lieut.-Colonel Rooke to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Tournay, 20th April, 1815.

As the report I have this instant received appears to be interesting, I think it my duty to forward it to you for the information of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, Commander-in-Chief of the Forces.

I have the honour to be
Your Lordship's most humble and obedient servant,
J. ROOKE.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Rapport du 20 Avril, 1815, au matin.

Extrait d'une lettre de Paris du 15 Avril, d'une personne bien instruite de ce qui s'y passe.

"La patrie est déclarée en danger. On ne se dissimule point le nombre ni la force des Puissances Alliées, mais on espère dans l'élan patriotique de la nation Française et la valeur des soldats de Napoléon. Il veut abdiquer une seconde fois en faveur de son fils, et la Régence serait confiée à Lucien Buonaparte, Carnot, et Fouché. Une autre version, qui prend de la consistance, c'est que la République sera proclamée dans quelques jours."

Valenciennes.

Le Lieutenant-Général Comte Reille commande toujours en chef le corps d'armée cantonné dans les environs de Valenciennes, et la garnison de cette ville, qui n'est que de 4000 hommes. Il y a 11 généraux à Valenciennes, composant l'état-major du corps d'armée du Comte Reille. Le Général Haxo commande le génie. Le Général Excelmans fait aussi partie de cet état-major. Les généraux en chef de cette place ont été visiter, le 18 Avril, l'emplacement du camp de Famars (situé à une lieue à l'est de Valenciennes). Il y existe encore des fortifications en terre et quelques redoutes. On ne sait pas le résultat de leur visite. On croit qu'ils doivent, d'après les ordres qu'ils ont reçus, se retirer sur la Picardie en cas d'attaque, en laissant de faibles garnisons dans les places fortes.

Buonaparte a l'intention de former un camp à Beauvais, à 17 lieues de Paris, mais ce camp ne doit être composé en partie que de gardes nationales.

Le corps d'armée de Valenciennes a très peu d'artillerie de campagne : on ne lui connait que 12 pièces montées.

L'esprit de quelques troupes commence à devenir chancelant. Quelques militaires crient hautement qu'on les a trompés ; que si la guerre a lieu, ils se mettront du parti des plus forts.

Il paraît qu'il n'est parti pour Paris en fait de troupes que les dépôts. D'après ce que disent les commissaires de guerre il y aurait sur toute la ligne frontière, depuis Dunkerque jusqu'à Givet, en comprenant Arras et Cambrai et leurs environs, 60,000 hommes ; mais on doit en rebattre beaucoup.

Quelqu'un d'ici est parti pour Paris ; mais comme cette personne est à pied, elle ne sera ici que dans 6 jours au plus tôt.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 20th April, 1815.

I have the honour, by direction of the Commander-in-Chief, to acquaint your Grace that the corps mentioned in the margin * have been prepared to join the force under your command in Flanders.

I have it at the same time in command from His Royal Highness to acquaint your Grace, in reference to Colonel Shawe's letter of the 4th instant, that Major-General Sir William Ponsonby was at that time placed upon the Staff in Flanders for the purpose of being attached to the brigade of cavalry* therein mentioned; but the 1st Dragoons having now been ordered for service, it has been judged expedient to place that corps under the Major-General, and to attach the 1st Dragoon Guards to the Household Brigade.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

H. Torrens.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

My Lord, Mons, 20th April, 1815.

I have the honour of sending you herewith an extrait du 'Moniteur' of the 17th, which you have not seen yet perhaps. The man who brought it assures me that Buonaparte is growing every day more unpopular at Paris, and that they ridicule the idea of a republic. He has not seen any works at Montmartre, and no troops on the road from Paris towards this frontier.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

Dörnberg.

Dépêches Télégraphiques.

Le Duc d'Albufera au Ministre de la Guerre.

"Lyon, le 16 Avril, 1815.

"Le 12, la ville de Marseille, sur l'invitation du Maréchal Prince d'Essling, et sans attendre l'arrivée de nos troupes, a arboré le drapeau tricolore. Il flotte, depuis le 10, à Draguignan et à Antibes."

A midi cette nouvelle a été annoncée à la capitale par une décharge de 100 coups de canon tirée par l'artillerie des Invalides.

S.M. a passé aujourd'hui la revue de la garde nationale de Paris, composée de 12 légions, formant 48 bataillons; 24 bataillons étaient formés dans la cour du palais des Tuileries, et les 24 autres sur la Place du Carrousel. Lorsque les 24 premiers bataillons ont été passés en revue, ils se sont serrés; les autres sont entrés dans la cour, et ont fait face en arrière. L'Empereur a passé successivement dans tous les rangs, et s'est arrêté pendant quelque temps devant chaque bataillon. Les officiers étant ensuite venus au cercle, S.M. leur a adressé la parole à peu-près en ces termes:

"Soldats de la garde nationale de Paris, je suis bien aise de vous voir. Je vous ai formé il y a quinze mois pour le maintien de la tranquillité publique dans la capitale, et pour sa sûreté. Vous avez rempli mon attente. Vous avez versé votre sang pour la défense de Paris; et si des troupes ennemies sont entrées dans vos murs, la faute n'en est pas à vous, mais à la trahison, et surtout à la fatalité qui s'est attachée à nos affaires dans ces malheureuses circonstances.

"Le trône royal ne convenait pas à la France. Il ne donnait aucune sûreté au peuple sur ses intérêts les plus précieux. Il nous avait été imposé par l'étranger. S'il eût existé, il eût été un monument de honte et de malheur. Je suis arrivé armé de toute la force du peuple et de l'armée pour faire disparaître cette tache, et rendre tout leur éclat à l'honneur et à la gloire de la France.

"Soldats de la garde nationale, ce matin même le télégraphe de Lyon m'a appris que le drapeau tricolore flotte à Antibes et à Marseille. Cent coups de canon, tirés sur toutes nos frontières, apprendront à l'étranger que nos dissensions civiles sont terminées; je dis les étrangers, parce que nous ne connaissons pas encore d'ennemis. S'ils rassemblent leurs troupes, nous rassemblons les nôtres.

"Nos armées sont toutes composées de braves qui se sont signalés dans plusieurs batailles, et qui présenteront à l'étranger une frontière de fer, tandis que de nombreux bataillons de grenadiers et de chasseurs des gardes nationales garantiront nos frontières. Je ne me mêlerai point des affaires des autres nations: malheur aux gouvernemens qui se mêleraient des nôtres! Des revers ont retrempé le caractère du peuple Français; il a repris cette jeunesse, cette vigueur qui, il y a vingt ans, étonnait l'Europe.

"Soldats, vous avez été forcés d'arborer les couleurs proscrites par la nation; mais les couleurs nationales étaient dans vos cœurs.

"Vous jurez de les prendre toujours pour signe de ralliement et de défendre ce trône impérial, seule et naturelle garantie de nos droits.

"Vous jurez de ne jamais souffrir que des étrangers, chez lesquels nous avons paru plusieurs fois en maîtres, se mêlent de nos constitutions et de notre gouvernement.

"Vous jurez enfin de tout sacrifier à l'honneur et à l'indépendance de la France."

"Nous le jurons!" a été le cri unanime de toute la garde nationale.

Ce discours a été fréquemment interrompu par les marques du plus vif enthousiasme, qui avait éclaté dès le commencement de la revue et qui s'est manifesté pendant toute sa durée.

Quoique la garde nationale marchât au pas accéléré, elle a mis plus de deux heures à défiler devant l'Empereur.

MINISTÈRE DE LA GUERRE.

Le 7 Avril, veille du jour où le Duc d'Angoulême a capitulé à la Pallu, avec le Général Gilli, le Général Ernouf avait fait tenter une attaque sur Gap, occupé par les troupes du Général Proteau, commandant le département des Hautes-Alpes; la colonne de tête du Général Proteau, commandée par le chef de bataillon Chauveau, du 49e, était sur la Durance.

Les troupes sous les ordres immédiats du Général Loverdo, ayant sous lui un chef de bataillon du 58e, depuis longtemps détaché de son corps, se présentèrent pour attaquer un avant-poste qui gardait le défilé de la Saulce.

Au premier avis de leur marche, le chef de bataillon Chauveau se porta au secours de son piquet.

Arrivé à quelque pas, il s'avança entre les deux colonnes pour essayer de parlementer. Il avait défendu à sa troupe de faire le premier feu. On tira sur lui, alors sa troupe riposta avec vigueur, et s'élança au pas de charge. Les assaillans, mis en désordre par le premier choc, se rallièrent cependant, et firent une nouvelle tentative, mais plus malheureuse encore que la première cent cinquante furent tués ou jetés dans la Durance; beaucoup furent blessés, entre autres le Général Loverdo grièvement.

Les troupes du Général Proteau ne dépassaient pas 300 hommes et une compagnie d'artillerie. Elles avaient eu affaire à environ 2000 hommes, ayant deux pièces de canon.

L'ennemi a laissé en nos mains un drapeau blanc, sur lequel étaient brodés en or ces mots : " Les Bourbons ou la mort."

Le lendemain 8, les insurgés tentèrent une seconde attaque, mais cette fois il a suffi des gardes nationales du village de Vitrolles pour les repousser sur Sisteron, où ils se sont retirés en désordre.

C'est ce jour-là que M. le Duc d'Angoulême a capitulé. Son chef d'état-major, M. le Général d'Aultane, est arrivé ce matin 15, et s'est présenté pour prendre les ordres de S.E. le Ministre de la Guerre, qui l'a envoyé aux arrêts de rigueur dans son domicile à Paris.

STATE OF FRANCE.

From a Correspondent.

Bruxelles, 20 Avril, 1815.

On ne doit dans les grandes crises ni s'endormir ni s'aveugler, encore moins se livrer aux théories, aux idées spéculatives, qui ne sont que les rêves des hommes médiocres ou sans expérience.

Pour parvenir à la guérison il faut sonder toute la profondeur de la blessure ; il faut surtout ne rien taire de ce qui peut éclairer le médecin dont on invoque le secours.

Faits.

L'armée, du moins la soldatesque, est pour Napoléon ; la nation, au moins l'immense majorité, est ouvertement contre lui.

L'armée est sans fièvre, sans enthousiasme ; elle a cédé à l'habitude, à l'ascendant que donne à un chef de janissaires un long usage du despotisme militaire.

La nation n'a jamais eu peut-être un meilleur esprit ; elle eut arrêté le torrent si on se fut borné à lui opposer la force nationale.

La nation a été trahie et surprise. Elle accuse beaucoup de personnages, mais elle n'adresse aucun reproche à nos Princes. Elle sait qu'ils n'ont pu la défendre, puisqu'ils ont été lâchement trahis par l'armée.

La nation n'aura point aujourd'hui assez d'énergie pour vaincre seule le despotisme, mais elle aidera avec empressement la puissance qui viendra le combattre.

Nous ne dirons pas ici tout ce qu'il a fallu d'aveuglement, non seulement en France, mais en Europe, pour amener la plus funeste des catastrophes : nous ne voulons, quant à présent, qu'exposer l'état des choses, et indiquer le plus sûr et le plus prompt remède.

Buonaparte a trouvé une armée sans matériel, sans cavalerie, en tout mal organisée. Il cherchera à tout prix à obtenir une paix de six ou huit mois ; après quoi il sera en mesure de menacer et troubler le monde.

Il n'est point possible d'admettre que les Alliés veuillent un seul instant écouter les propositions de cet homme sans foi, et qui ne peut maintenir sa tyrannie que par la guerre. La chute de Napoléon intéresse les Rois et les peuples.

Tous les gouvernements vont donc se réunir pour l'attaquer, mais en attaquant un tel ennemi il faut l'écraser.

Tant que Buonaparte n'aura pas racheté par une victoire l'ignominie dont son armée vient de se couvrir, tant que l'opinion en France sera incertaine, il ne pourra (même par la terreur) se procurer de nouveaux soldats. Il faut donc partir de sa situation présente pour l'attaquer de suite sur tous les points avec avantage. Il va bientôt se trouver dans la nécessité de porter toutes ses forces en Belgique. Il ne laissera en France que peu de troupes, et sera peut-être forcé de confier ses côtes à des Gardes Nationales, qui demain s'armeront avec empressement contre lui si sa fortune l'abandonne. Disposons tout pour que sa perte suive son premier revers.

Lord Wellington fera, n'en doutons pas, des prodiges dans le Nord. Lui confier les intérêts des Alliés, c'est assurer le salut du monde; mais ce grand capitaine doit être secondé. Il faut que le jour où l'armée de Napoléon sera battue par lui dans le Nord, la monarchie puisse triompher par les Français dans l'intérieur.

Armée Flottante.

Le Général Moreau a souvent témoigné son étonnement de ce que les Alliés n'avoient pas une armée flottante, qui, pouvant être transportée sur toutes les côtes, devenoit le moyen le plus simple d'obliger Buonaparte à employer la plus grande partie de ses forces à les garder. Ajoutons que ce seroit peut-être aujourd'hui le moyen le plus sûr, non seulement d'opérer d'utiles diversions, mais de soulever une province, et peut-être toute la France, en arrivant sur un point dégarni de troupes et bien disposé dans un moment favorable; par exemple, après la perte d'une bataille par Napoléon dans le Nord.

Les hommes d'état savent tout le parti qu'on peut tirer de la force morale, de la force de surprise, et de ce qu'on peut appeler force de circonstance. Jetez 10,000 hommes sur les côtes après une victoire de Napoléon, et il se trouvera des soldats pour les combattre; arrivez avec 500 ou 600 hommes et des armes (Buonaparte battu, et les Alliés en France), et vous serez l'étincelle qui allume le feu sacré, et finit par produire l'incendie.

Préparons l'étincelle, organisons cette force de circonstance, cette armée flottante, ou plutôt d'observation, qui produira de si grands effets, si elle est dirigée par des chefs habiles, connus des Royalistes, et estimés de la nation.

Moyens d'Exécution.

1. On réunira de suite (car il n'y a pas un moment à perdre) sur un point déterminé tous les François Royalistes qui se trouvent à Londres, les Suisses, et autres étrangers de bonne volonté, etc., etc.

2. L'Ile de Jersey paroissant le lieu le plus convenable pour cette opération, on s'occupera d'y faire arriver des côtes un grand nombre de Royalistes, afin de bien donner à l'expédition la couleur Française.

3. Le gouvernement Anglais fournira en infanterie, cavalerie, et artillerie une force de* ou environ* .

Cette troupe ne sera qu'auxiliaire. On aura bien soin de ne faire considérer l'armée d'observation que comme une armée Française. On fera prendre, s'il est possible, aux Français qui s'y réuniront l'habit de Garde Nationale.

4. Les chefs de l'armée flottante ou d'observation auront à leur disposition des armes, de l'artillerie, de la poudre, etc., etc., des selles, etc., etc., enfin des bâtiments de transport, et l'argent nécessaire pour payer les frais indispensables ; car pour une telle expédition il faut peu d'argent, mais des armes, beaucoup d'énergie, une grande activité, et surtout une adresse extrême, à savoir bien profiter et des événements et des hommes.

5. Les chefs de l'entreprise auront aussi à leur disposition plusieurs avisos, et des agents intelligents dans l'intérieur, afin que les nouvelles puissent leur arriver par terre et par mer sans le moindre retard.

6. Ils organiseront de suite (et ils en ont la possibilité) non seulement une police active sur les côtes, mais dans l'intérieur, de manière à bien savoir ce qui s'y passe, et à y faire circuler toutes les nouvelles favorables, les édits et proclamations du Roi, etc., etc.

7. Un débarquement devenant nécessaire, les chefs de l'expédition qui auront une connoissance parfaite de la situation des côtes n'auront de suite qu'à faire voile vers un point déterminé et dégarni de troupes, etc., etc.

8. Les hommes qui seront réunis à Jersey recevront nécessairement quelques secours tant qu'ils ne seront pas embarqués ; mais une fois en France, l'Angleterre n'aura à leur procurer que des armes ; car il est tems que la bonne cause cesse d'être servie par des hommes à argent. C'est à Paris que seront récompensés les braves qui s'enrôleront pour sauver leur pays.

9. Si les régiments Suisses qui viennent du Canada arrivent à tems, il seroit bien important de les réunir à l'armée flottante ou d'observation.

Le plan dont on vient de donner l'aperçu demande une exécution prompte. Si le principe est adopté, on entrera alors verbalement dans tous les détails. On prie les personnes qui voudront bien lire cet exposé de considérer que ce projet est présenté par des Français qui connoissent parfaitement leur pays, qui jouissent de la confiance de leur Souverain, qui sont pénétrés de reconnoissance pour la générosité du gouvernement Anglais, et qui ne demandent qu'à servir utilement la cause de l'honneur, de la patrie, celle de toute l'Europe.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Vienna, 20th April, 1815.

I have had the honour of receiving your Grace's despatches, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 ; the first on the 12th, the three last on the 18th instant.†

* Blank in manuscript.

† See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., pp. 295, 298, 300 : letters dated 10th, 11th, and 12th of April.

That marked No. 3, dated the 10th instant, appeared to me of such importance that I immediately invited the Plenipotentiaries of the Imperial Courts of Austria and Russia, and of the King of Prussia, to a conference at my house for the purpose of communicating to them its substance, with a view to the attainment of the consent therein sought of their respective Sovereigns; and I availed myself of this occasion likewise to impart to them the other papers marked as above, and also the copies of your Grace's correspondence with Generals Röder and Gneisenau.

On reading the despatch No. 3 and its enclosures, all appeared extremely anxious that the proposal of your Grace should be acceded to; all admitted the policy of immediate action, if the means should be deemed sufficient at the period in question; and Prince Metternich alone seemed to doubt the possibility of an Austrian force, to the extent approaching to that stated by your Grace, being assembled for offensive operation at so early a period.

It was proposed to me that a translation of your Grace's despatch, and an extract of the Duc de Feltre's paper, as far as relates to the enemy's supposed force, should be made for the information of the Sovereigns, and that they might take these documents into immediate consideration, in order that your Grace's proposition should be decided upon, and the result communicated without delay.

Having no objection to oppose to this measure, the papers were immediately prepared and submitted to the Sovereigns, at whose desire a military commission was assembled yesterday evening, at which the Earl Cathcart attended on the part of Great Britain.

I refer your Grace to Lord Cathcart's official report to me, and to the Protocol of the conference (copies of which are herewith enclosed), for the proceedings and result of this meeting. The former of these documents will put your Grace in possession of the force expected at the several dates mentioned therein on the French frontier, and of the opinion of that commission upon the subject of immediate offensive operations against the enemy.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect, my Lord,
Your Grace's very obedient humble servant,

CLANCARTY.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Earl Cathcart to the Earl of Clancarty.

MY LORD, Vienna, 20th April, 1815.

Your Lordship having lost no time in communicating the Duke of Wellington's despatch of the 10th April, received here on the 18th, to the Ministers of the two Imperial Courts and of the King of Prussia, several conversations took place among their military advisers, and a military conference was assembled at Prince Schwarzenberg's at half past seven on the evening of the 19th, more, as it appeared to me, to reduce into form and to record opinions already settled than to deliberate.

There were present the Emperor Alexander, the King of Prussia, Field Marshals Prince Schwarzenberg and Prince Wrede, Generals Prince Volkonsky (Russian), Radetzky and Langenau (Austrian), Knesebeck and Boyne (Prussian), and myself.

The Emperor of Russia stated that this meeting took place for the purpose of considering the proposal of the Duke of Wellington to commence offensive operations against Buonaparte on the 1st of May, with such forces as might then be assembled.

That this proposition was entitled to every consideration from the importance of the grounds upon which it was founded, and from the respect due to the opinion of the Duke.

That the insurrection in the south of France and the generally favourable disposition of the French, except the army, and the expediency of frustrating the advantages to be derived from the assembly of the Champ de Mai, coupled with the relative state of force as estimated, were the grounds upon which the urgency of commencing offensive operations on the 1st of May was pressed.

That in his contemplation there certainly could not be a doubt as to commencing offensive operations as soon as an adequate force could be assembled; but that until a sufficient superiority of disposable and efficient force to act against the whole of Napoleon's force (supposing it to be his policy to keep it together), and without relying upon the active cooperation of French, could be brought forward, it did not seem advisable to undertake offensive operations.

The most recent accounts from the south of France rendered it but too probable that the efforts made there were premature, and would be crushed before it was possible to give them effectual support; and that an invasion with inadequate means, or partial incursions, might have an unfavourable effect upon the means of improving the military resources by the assembly of the 15th of May, because Buonaparte might avail himself of those very circumstances to obtain supplies which would be resisted as long as the measures of the Allies were only in preparation. Admitting, then, the necessity of commencing offensive operations as soon as an adequate force could be assembled, it was necessary to look more minutely to the strength of the several armies as they now stand, and as they will be at subsequent dates.

On this subject I am sorry to observe that a part of my private letter to Lord Castlereagh of the 1st April, in anticipation of the last military protocol, has been misunderstood by the Duke of Wellington, as I cannot find, from the copy of that letter which I kept, that I named any period, except in reference to the probable force to which the Prussian army would amount in three weeks from that date.

The protocol of this conference will contain a statement of progressive increase of force, probably to the effect I am about to mention; but as I am giving an account of a conference the minute of which is neither signed nor even drawn out, it is impossible for me to pledge myself that the protocol which I shall receive to-morrow will in all points correspond with the report I am now giving in anticipation.

By the 1st of May there will be but a very small portion of Austrian forces in the army of the Upper Rhine; and I cannot, from all I have as yet heard, state that force at above 90,000 on that date, viz.:—

Bavarians	47,000
Wurtembergers	20,000
Darmstadt	8,000
Baden	12,000
	87,000

though it may perhaps be estimated at 100,000 men.

I am assured that on the 18th of May the army of the Upper Rhine will have—

Austrians	100,000
Bavarians	60,000
Wurtemberg	25,000
Baden	16,000
Hesse Darmstadt	8,000
Total	209,000

By the 1st of June the Austrians will have 130,000 men in that army, and the Prussian army will amount to 100,000 men.

Between the 24th of May and 13th of June the Russians will have 120,000 men on the Main and Mednitz, and on the 18th June the totality of the Austrian force will have arrived. This last division includes the light troops from their borders, and some distant Hungarian regiments.

From this statement it was argued that the armies could not be in a state to undertake offensive operations before the 1st of June, though they might be considered as in a defensive state by the 18th of May.

The expediency of detaching a corps to Geneva with power according to circumstances to cooperate to the extent of 30,000 men with any operations that may be going forward in the south of France was discussed and rejected, reserving to send a detachment to Geneva from the Austrian part of the army of the Upper Rhine for defensive purposes if circumstances should require it.

It was the received opinion that the army of the Upper Rhine might in the course of May be able to undertake an offensive movement to relieve the army of the Duke or that of Prince Blücher if pressed by the enemy.

What is called the Royal Saxon army in contradistinction to the Ducal Saxon force was stated at 14,000 men to join the Duke of Wellington; but I find the Prussians lay claim to near 9000 of the best of these troops, which would leave only from 5000 to 6000 of this army to join the Duke.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

CATHCART.

II.

Earl Cathcart to the Earl of Clancarty.

MY LORD, Vienna, 22nd April, 1815.

I have now the honour to enclose a copy of the protocol of the military conference of the 19th instant, which has been signed by all the Field Marshals and General officers who were present, except by General Boyne, who was not at home when it was sent to him for signature.

I have, &c.,

CATHCART.

III.

PROTOCOL de la CONFÉRENCE tenue en présence de leurs Majestés l'Empereur de RUSSIE et le Roi de PRUSSE.

Présens :

S.A. le Maréchal Prince Schwarzenberg.
S.A. le Maréchal Prince de Wrede.

M. le Prince Volkonsky, A.D.C. de S.M. l'Empereur de Russie.
S.E. Lord Cathcart, Général en Chef de S.M. Britannique.
M. le Baron de Boyne, Ministre de Guerre de S.M. le Roi de Prusse.
M. le Lieutenant-Général Comte de Radetzky.
M. le Baron de Kneesebeck.
M. le Général Langenau.

On a mis en délibération les derniers dépêches que le Maréchal Duc de Wellington avait envoyées à my Lord Clancarty, en date de 10 Avril, de Bruxelles. Le Duc propose de commencer l'offensive contre la France le 1 du mois de Mai. Il soutient que Napoléon n'a point encore des forces suffisantes pour se défendre contre une armée de 270,000 hommes, qu'il croit que les Alliés pourraient mettre en campagne à cette époque, tandis qu'il ne calcule qu'à 180,000 hommes les forces que Napoléon pourrait nous opposer. Le Duc observe encore qu'il croit très nécessaire de soutenir par une prompte attaque les mouvemens du Midi de la France. Il suppose enfin que l'assemblée sur le Champ de Mai que Napoléon avait convoquée pour le 15 de ce mois lui fournira de très grands moyens si on lui laisse du tems de les assembler et de les développer.

Après avoir pris cette opinion militaire du Maréchal Duc de Wellington en longue et mûre considération, la haute Conférence est convenue des points suivans:—

L'armée Prussienne ne peut être rassemblée sur le Bas Rhin que vers la fin du mois de Mai, ou encore elle ne présentera qu'une force de 100,000 hommes, y compris les troupes du Nord de l'Allemagne.

L'armée Autrichienne ne commencera pas à se former avant le 18 Mai sur les points de Kannstadt, Stockach, et Hall, où elle ne pourra réunir que 120,000 hommes, jusqu'à la fin de ce mois.

Il n'y a donc que l'armée Bavaroise et Wurtembourgeoise, et les troupes de Bade et de Darmstadt, dont on pourrait disposer au commencement du mois de Mai.

Toute opération offensive que l'armée du Haut Rhin pourrait entreprendre l'oblige à disposer d'un corps de 50,000 à 60,000 hommes, tant pour le blocus des forteresses que pour maintenir l'esprit du peuple dans les départements du Nord de la France, et pour y organiser les moyens de subsistance pour l'armée.

Les mouvemens dans le Midi de la France sont beaucoup trop éloignés des armées du Nord pour espérer qu'elles pourraient les seconder à tems.

On est enfin généralement de l'avis de ne pas vouloir hasarder des attaques séparées qui ne pourraient pas être soutenues par des forces supérieures à celles de l'ennemi, et on croit que des chances qu'on pourrait avoir pour soi, en attaquant, ne sont pas à comparer au mauvais effet que pourrait produire une défaite des premiers corps des Alliés.

On a donc unanimement décidé de ne commencer l'offensive contre la France qu'au premier du mois de Juin.

Le Lieutenant-Général Knesebeck a proposé de détacher un corps disponible de 30,000 hommes sur Genève, tant pour occuper les points importans de la Suisse que pour l'employer suivant les circonstances à soutenir les mouvemens du Midi de la France.

La haute Conférence a été unanimement de l'avis qu'il est indispensablement nécessaire d'avoir trois routes militaires en Suisse, savoir, la route de Bâle, la route du Simplon, et une route de communication entre les armées du Rhin et celle d'Italie.

On n'aurait pas moins désiré pouvoir dès à présent occuper militairement la Suisse, mais on a trouvé qu'un détachement pour le Midi de la France serait beaucoup trop hasardé, et par conséquent tout-à-fait contraire à ces principes établis plus haut, et adoptés par la Conférence.

Le Maréchal Wrede a supposé le cas que le Duc de Wellington fut attaqué de vives forces avant que les armées Alliées fussent en état de prendre l'offensive, et c'est dans ce seul cas que la haute Conférence a cru devoir admettre la nécessité de faire faire alors une démonstration à l'armée Bavaroise et Wurtembourgeoise vers Metz, pour dégager l'armée du Duc de Wellington.

Il a été résolu de communiquer sur le champ au Maréchal Duc de Wellington les résolutions prises dans cette Conférence.

Il vient d'être créés deux nouveaux régiments, un 7e de Lanciers et un 6e régiment de Chasseurs. Le Ministre doit d'après ses instructions porter chaque régiment de cavalerie légère à 1000 chevaux, ce qui feroit que la cavalerie, au lieu d'être de 41,300 chevaux, s'éleveroit alors à 46,000, dont 16,000 de grosse cavalerie et 30,000 de cavalerie légère, puisqu'il y a actuellement 30 régiments de cette classe.

Il serait très essentiel que le parti Royaliste du Midi eût connaissance du décret que nous mettons à la suite du présent No., parcequ'alors toutes les provinces du Midi qu'il atteint pourraient s'entendre et reprendre les armes en même temps pour s'opposer à une tyrannie ce qui ferait une diversion très salutaire au moment de la guerre, d'autant qu'il serait à désirer que le Roi eût un parti armé en France, contre lequel les militaires ne se battraient pas, et auquel beaucoup d'entr'eux iraient au contraire se joindre, ainsi que les mécontens, dont le nombre s'est beaucoup accru depuis qu'on a eu connaissance de la nouvelle constitution, parce qu'on s'attendaient qu'elle serait toute républicaine.

To Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 21st April, 1815.

I have received your letter of the 13th, marked "private," * and I will do as you desire regarding the subsidies when applied to. The Brunswick troops commenced their march on the 15th, and the Duke is sending a person here to arrange the subsidies.

I will write you to-morrow what I think of the distribution of the two millions. I should like to be able to give a small sum out of it to the Emperor of Russia.

I don't want a diplomatist. Cathcart has till now attended the military conferences on our part. The worst of him is that he is disposed to pay great deference to the Emperor of Russia's opinions; but as he has already attended these conferences, I don't think we could now send anybody else; nor do I immediately know anybody else who would be of much more use.

All your correspondence is among my papers in the Foreign Office. Lord FitzRoy is decided that nothing was left behind.

I think that Talleyrand took copies of every paper communicated to him, and sent copies to Paris, which the King, Blacas, and Jaucourt left behind them, and they are now published in the 'Morning Chronicle' by Buonaparte's friends in England.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 21st April, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose copy of a Memorandum which has been drawn up to show the extent of the subsidiary engagements which Great Britain has entered into under the present circumstances. This paper has been communicated to the Ministers resident at this Court of those Powers that may wish to offer their troops for the completion of the contingent to be furnished by this country, and they have been respectively requested to recommend to their Courts to communicate directly with your Grace on the subject.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Foreign Office, 17th April, 1815.

The Prince Regent, under the present circumstances of Europe, will not fail to make every practicable exertion to aid the efforts of the Continent for its own preservation and permanent security.

With this view His Royal Highness, in the Treaty of the 25th ult., has stipulated to give a subsidy of 5,000,000*l.* sterling, to aid Austria, Russia, and Prussia in bringing their numerous armies into the field, which will much exceed their quota of 450,000 men.

Great Britain further engages to furnish 150,000 men as her own contingent, or to pay a commutation in money for deficiencies, at a rate specified in the Treaty. This commutation will somewhat exceed 2,000,000*l.* sterling, which may be considered as an increase of subsidy to the Continent beyond the 5,000,000*l.* before referred to.

As this fund must be applied to secure the residue of the quota which Great Britain is bound to supply, the distribution has been placed altogether in the hands of the Duke of Wellington, trusting that his Grace will, in the exercise of his discretion, render it subservient to the general interests of the Alliance, as far as may be consistent with the above object.

The Allied Powers will no doubt justly appreciate the magnitude of the exertion which the Prince Regent is disposed to make at the close of so long a war; when, in addition to the charge of an army of 50,000 British troops now assembling in Belgium, His Royal Highness proposes to assist the exertions of the other Powers with a subsidy of not less than 7,000,000*l.* sterling for the service of the year.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Vienna, 21st April, 1815.

Your despatches Nos. 5 and 6 have been received early yesterday morning.*

With respect to the first of these, although I had the honour in my private letter of the 1st inst. to apprise your Grace that the arrangement respecting the German contingents had been under discussion, and that I had only succeeded to the extent of a paper then transmitted in carrying your Grace's wishes into effect, the matters then agreed upon were not placed upon the protocol till the 18th inst.

At the conference held that night it was cursorily mentioned by Prince Hardenberg that such of the troops, hitherto coming under the description of Royal Saxon troops, as belonged to those parts of the former Saxon territories now assigned to the King of Prussia ought, as subjects of His Majesty, to continue to act with the Prussian army. But as little notice was taken of this, I had supposed that the arrangement was to remain as it originally had been fixed; and there being no tableau then annexed to it, I did not hesitate to sign the protocol, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. Yesterday morning, however, having perused a copy of this document, as well as of the piece R. R. also sent herewith, I was somewhat surprised to find the addition which your Grace will observe under the first article.

Thinking it my duty not to leave the matter in this state, I mentioned at the conference of last night, in strong terms, the necessity either of having the tableau altered to the original arrangement, or that at least such further assignments of German contingents should be made, either of the troops of Ducal Saxony or Hesse, &c., as would make up the numbers at which the Chancellor himself had estimated the Royal Saxon troops; that these last troops having been in a state of mutiny at the time, it had been solely on the proposition of the Prussian plenipotentiaries, for their particular accommodation, and in the hopes that under some other command this force might be rendered more available, that I had consented to their being annexed to your Grace's army; but that, having thus consented, I could not now permit that the whole of them should be disorganised, and such small part thereof as the Prussians might think it convenient to spare passed over to serve with our army.

Upon this a very warm discussion arose, which, although I hope it will have the effect of bringing back things to the state in which they were, it is impossible yet to determine whether this advantage will result from it. In the mean time it is not my intention to leave matters here, but, if requisite, to enter a strong dissent to the proceeding upon the protocol. While the subject is in agitation your Grace will perceive that it would be impossible to procure the order required by the despatch No. 5.

But there is also another difficulty upon the subject, viz., that the arrangements with the King of Saxony, though progressive, are not yet in so advanced a state as to admit of application to His Majesty for such an order, which I am sure your Grace will agree with me in thinking ought to proceed from him.

You may rest assured that, as soon as this matter can be arranged, I shall lose no time in endeavouring to carry your Grace's wishes into execution.

I have the honour to be your Grace's very obedient,

CLANCARTY.

MM. les PP. ont pris en considération les arrangemens relatifs à la destination des contingens de plusieurs Princes et d'Etats d'Allemagne, arrangemens dont il a déjà été question dans la séance du 1 de ce mois.

Afin de les faire concourir avec plus d'efficacité et de promptitude au soutien de la cause générale, on a pris principalement pour régler d'assigner les contingens des Princes et Etats du Nord de l'Allemagne aux armées du Duc de Wellington et du Maréchal Blücher, suivant qu'ils se trouvent plus en proximité et en facilité de communications avec la ligne d'opération des dites armées.

En conséquence les destinations des dits contingents ont été fixées ainsi qu'elles sont indiquées dans le tableau sub litt. R. R.

Du reste la destination actuelle des contingens des troupes Allemandes ne préjuge en rien les arrangemens à prendre pour l'avenir.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Vienna, 21st April, 1815.

Your last despatches no longer requiring the same expedition, I have detained the courier till the usual day of forwarding a messenger to England.

I had a grand set-to with Hardenberg last night upon the Royal Saxon contingent. I have reason, however, to hope that we shall not be ultimately treated as he had designed. The hint you gave me in one of your private letters, that our government were likely to adopt the good policy of placing the arrangement of the subsidies under your management, has been of service to me. In the course of the evening I took Humboldt aside, and told him that this matter must be managed to our satisfaction, and at the same time represented to him the impolicy of acting unkindly by one who so deservedly enjoyed the whole confidence of our government, and who would probably be entrusted with the disposition of the supplies from England, in which his Court was so much interested. He answered that the matter should be satisfactorily arranged.

Not, however, content with this, I prepared the paper, of which the enclosed is a copy, with a view of having it placed upon the protocol, if this should become requisite; but previously I thought it expedient to send Lord Stewart to Hardenberg to acquaint him with my intention, to read this paper to him, and to signify that, however reluctantly, I should be obliged to take this step unless he should either adhere to the original arrangement or propose some adequate substitute. Prince Hardenberg has assured Stewart that matters should be satisfactorily arranged. He requested to have the paper left with him; which I think it probable he has done for the purpose of leading the King, from whose mulish disposition this contretemps has arisen, to leave things as they were.

The Italian news is good: Murat retreated to Bologna, Ferrara débloqué. The only fear here stated is lest the Neapolitan force should retire so far that the Austrians, now reinforced, will not be able to have a fair fight with them in the open country.

We do not make rapid progress in our negotiations with the little states, so as to complete the territorial arrangement. This may be said to be now the only difficulty in the way of final termination.

You will see from my despatches home, and the protocols of the Conferences of Five, that I have been at length obliged to make a formal reclamation for the signature of the note to Löwenhielm. In this I shall not succeed. Russia will not sign, and Prussia will do as Russia pleases. I have, however, thought it requisite to make the formal proposal, as well for the purpose of recording where the default has been, as for that of paving the way for myself to address the letter, which you had long since prepared for this purpose, to the Swedish plenipotentiary.

Yours, my dear Duke, very sincerely,

CLANCARTY.

Dr. Macnab to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Hôtel de Lyon, Brussels, 21st April, 1815.

Having this moment arrived from Paris, I have judged it my duty to lay the following information before your Grace, aware at the same time of the difficulty of the validity of it at a time when falsehood and fraud seem to be the order of the day with the governing party at Paris. On Tuesday last (the day before my departure from Paris) the best informed persons of both parties were of opinion the usurper meant, however contrary to his declaration, to attack the army at Lille, &c., by surprise. Cambacérès, it is said, pressed this measure, pointing out its necessity in point of finances in Belgium, and founded upon a conviction, which is too general, of the favourable disposition of the people of Belgium to second his views. Formerly Buonaparte retreated to the Elysée de Bourbon some days before his departure for the field. On Monday and Tuesday last he deserted the palace of the Tuileries. The people ascribed to this measure his intended departure; and what to me renders the conjecture strong is, that his partisans, on hearing of this, circulated a report which is known to be false, namely, that certain reparations were ordered to be made in the palace for the reception of his long-promised wife.

In the diligence in which I travelled there were four officers on their way for Valenciennes. Two of them received despatches at Cambrai, and took post-horses immediately. In their conversation they studiously insinuated hostilities would not commence before the 1st of May, a circumstance which appeared contradictory with the singular despatch they made to arrive. You will, my Lord Duke, do me the justice to forgive me for thus intruding on your Grace, as my only aim is that of a friend to our country.

It appears Carnot, Lucien Buonaparte, and Fouché are to be named directors or consuls, and the usurper Generalissimo of the army. The two parties with difficulty act; the Republican party in the Cabinet being the strongest, and the impetuosity and violence of the Dictator having had several violent explosions, which, however, hard necessity compelled him to bridle. The result of this has been the above change of the places of ministers; and what is extremely striking, the demand of Bassano to be allowed to retire, which has been hitherto refused. This is a fact, the knowledge of which I had from a literary gentleman to whom Bassano promised a place, but to whom he lately assured him he was determined to retire from public service. Cambacérès has also demanded his retreat, assigning his age as the reason.

Since the first eight days after the arrival of the usurper, the public have perceived a gradually increasing sullen sadness. The national guards should have been reviewed some time ago, but the numberless anonymous letters received by the reviewer induced him to defer it till Sunday last, when there were from 12,000 to 15,000 reviewed, and whose conduct was too unequivocal to flatter the ambition of the usurper. The fact is, and it may be regarded as certain, being admitted by his most violent partisans in the national guards, that three-fourths are stedfastly devoted to their King and the interests of their country.

The above-mentioned officers with whom I travelled took considerable pains to make me believe that Lucien Buonaparte set out on Tuesday morning last for England; which certainly I attributed to their wish to hide from me the intention of Buonaparte's commencing hostilities by surprise.

I should not have taken the liberty of addressing your Grace had I not had a conversation, early this morning, at Mons, with the General in command there, who highly approved of my having given him the above mentioned conjecture with its accompanying circumstances.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,
Your Grace's most humble servant,
HENRY GREY MACNAB, M.D.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 21st April, 1815.

The Royal Dragoons have been ordered for embarkation; and in reference to what I said to you respecting the inefficiency in point of numbers of the Household Brigade, the four squadrons of the 1st Dragoon Guards have been ordered to be attached to it. The Prince Regent himself named Fane to command this brigade, and he has accordingly received orders. But I find that he is by no means satisfied with a command of this description; and indeed it was from a supposition that he would not be so that his appointment did not take place previously to those of the connecting of the brigades under orders. I have advised Fane, however, to make no difficulties on this subject in consideration of the manner in which he has been named by the Regent; and as he will be next in seniority to Lord Uxbridge, he will have the benefit of any organization you may think proper to make eventually in the cavalry.

De Lancey is in town on his way to go out. He has also his scruples as to the indignity of returning to service in the field in the same situation only which he so long held; and he has requested of me to withhold the notification of his actual appointment until he communicates with you personally, lest you should imagine that he looks upon the arrangement as one favourable to him. I told him the very handsome and complimentary manner in which you asked for his services, and assured him that nothing could be so gratifying, in my view of the case, to his military and professional feelings as the desire you expressed to me of having him again with you; and that the expectation of Murray's arrival, and the existing appointment of Lowe, precluded the possibility of your offering him more in the department than the situation of Deputy Quartermaster-General. It would be desirable to place him on the Staff as a Colonel, in order that his situation may not be less advantageous than when he held the same in the Peninsula, he having been subsequently placed on half-pay in consequence of his appointment in Scotland. This appointment will be kept open for him, but the pay must go to the locum tenens.

It appears to me that Lieutenant-Colonel Berkeley cannot hold the situation of Deputy Adjutant-General while there are senior officers assistants, any more than Lieutenant-Colonel Torrens; and I fear that if this arrangement is not general, the latter will feel annoyed. I therefore beg to propose that Colonel Elley shall be Deputy Adjutant-General, doing duty with the cavalry; and the Adjutant-General can still retain Colonel Berkeley's services as an assistant. Should you approve this, I beg you will give me a line, or that at all events you will say what you think of it.

The enclosed letter from Colonel Whittingham, relative to a Spanish division being brought over, has been written by the suggestion of Lord Castlereagh, as you will see by the enclosed letter from Mr. Davis.* Whittingham is a fine fellow, most anxious for employment under you; but I fear the transport of a Spanish division is quite out of the question.

Ever, my dear Lord Duke, yours most sincerely,

H. TORRENS.

* See pp. 95, 96.

Marshal Lord Beresford to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Lisbon, 21st April, 1815.

The packet with my last letter to you on the state of things here had scarcely gone when I received from the government a communication in answer to a letter I had addressed to them, giving symptoms of a desire to look their situation in the face, and to put aside their plan of postponement in the hopes of something occurring that might render their efforts unnecessary. They asked me my opinion on the steps necessary to be taken, which I of course gave them; and which was, immediately to direct all officers and soldiers to join their corps, and thus, in the first instance, get their regiments together; then to assemble a corps of 15,000 men, in the first instance, in three corps or divisions, on the Douro, Mondego, and Tagus, merely for the convenience of provisioning and more speedy equipment, and to decide, whilst this was going on, how and where they would employ them. I recommended to make their establishment at once 1000 rank and file (it is now but 900). I pointed out there were but three lines to adopt: to act with the Spaniards on the frontiers of Spain and France; to cooperate on the same point with any small British force (making the corps of British and Portuguese from 25,000 to 30,000); and the third to cooperate with any British force upon any other point agreed upon by the two nations. The first of course I strongly recommended against, as promising only disgrace to their arms. To determine on which of the two latter modes should be adopted, I decline giving any opinion. I recommended that they should immediately enter into communication with the British government on the subject.

At this period I had the pleasure of receiving your letter of the 24th ultimo from Vienna; and as neither instructions had arrived to Mr. Canning, nor any communication from Palmella, I thought the best thing I could do was to put your letter into Mr. Canning's hands, and let him work on it, as it would not only come better from him than from me, but have more effect. He has acted on it; and, though nothing is yet decided, I understand there will be no difficulty. I am in the mean time getting the military together, and I have little doubts they will be prepared before the means to convey them; and you must be aware that, except Great Britain furnishes transports, they can never be got here. I think if Portugal sends any troops, she ought not to send less than 15,000, which pretty nearly agrees with your opinion. She cannot certainly, under any consideration of the case, send more; but her own respectability demands that number. How they propose to arrange for their payment and expenses I know not, as Great Britain will not give anything towards them.

You will be surprised to learn that even the clothing, which was absolutely all ready, and for which this government, expecting it from England, had made no other arrangement, was refused, and only one-third of it was sent. This will put us into some embarrassment, as we are yet waiting the final decision of the British government; and perhaps it would be well if you could give them a hint on this subject.

I am to go to the Regency to-morrow; and as I shall not close this letter till after, I shall be able probably to inform you of the determination of the government. I shall be most happy to accompany the troops to Flanders, though I shall appear among your mighty armies with a very high rank and few followers: however, perhaps you will be able to swell my train, and I am sure you will place me the best you can.

I shall be most glad to get out of the bickerings I am continually subject to here; and had not this war arisen, I should, under the determination of the Prince Regent not to return to this kingdom, have immediately set out for the Brazils, either to place the military establishment of this kingdom on the footing it ought, and of which it is so capable, or to have humbly taken my leave.

You will of course have heard of the decision of the Prince Regent not to return to Portugal; and under which determination, if there is not a respectable army, and that in a respectable state, kept up here, this kingdom cannot long remain in the House of Braganza. Every body, both high and low, is completely tired of being governed from America; but this feeling can be softened, as it no doubt will, by some amelioration in the mode of government. It is said the Prince of Beira is coming as Regent: if so, as he will probably after prefer Portugal to the Brazils, that may restore the monarchy to Portugal; but I do not suppose that will ever be done in the person of the present Prince Regent.

22nd April.

I am just informed of the Zenobia ship of war going to England in an hour; and as Mr. Canning appears inclined to postpone the sailing of the packet for some days, I will send you this letter without waiting for my audience of this afternoon with the Regency. I saw Mr. Canning after he had seen Dom Miguel yesterday, and he appeared to think that Dom Miguel was very averse to the Flanders scheme; but Mr. Canning thinks that if you can engage Palmella to enter into any arrangement or agreement to that effect, the Regency will here accede to it, and which I think it right to make you aware of without delay, though nothing is yet determined against the plan here; but I confess I always fear Forjaz's intrigues. I think if Great Britain would furnish the troops in provisions and ammunition, leaving Portugal to pay her own troops, it would be a great inducement to enter into the plan; but perhaps you may not think the numbers we should give worth making much work about where your numbers are so great.

I will do what I can to-day to urge those here to act, as if they do not do it at once they may be too late. I will write to you by the packet.

Believe me yours most sincerely,

BERESFORD.

General Walterstorff to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Vienne, le 21 Avril, 1815.

Si d'un côté j'ai regretté beaucoup de ne pas vous trouver ici à mon arrivée, j'ai dû de l'autre côté me consoler par l'idée que Votre Excellence se trouve dans ce moment dans les Pays-Bas, où sa présence est encore plus nécessaire qu'elle ne seroit ici.

Il paroît que my Lord Clancarty a hérité des bonnes dispositions pour le Dannemark que Votre Excellence avoit manifestées pendant son séjour à Vienne, et que le Roi se rappelle avec plaisir et avec reconnoissance. Il n'y a personne ici, Monsieur le Duc, à qui vous ayez inspiré une estime et une confiance plus vraies qu'au Roi. Sa Majesté m'a expressément enjoint d'en assurer Votre Excellence.

Nos affaires ne sont pas plus avancées qu'elles n'étoient lors du départ de Votre Excellence. Le Roi s'est déclaré prêt à accéder à la Confédération Européenne et à fournir un corps de troupes à deux conditions, savoir :— 1. Que la Suède soit tenue à exécuter les stipulations du Traité de Kiel, et qu'on renouvelle la promesse d'une indemnité future pour le Dannemark, ainsi une garantie que la Suède n'attaque pas le Dannemark pendant que nos troupes seroient hors du pays. 2. Qu'on fournisse au Roi les moyens pécuniaires pour rendre mobile et pour tenir sur pied un corps de troupes, les finances du Roi étant entièrement épuisées.

Les Ministres des principales Cours trouvent ces conditions très raisonnables, et désirent de hâter l'accession du Dannemark ; mais il n'a pas encore été possible d'obtenir l'adhésion de l'Empereur de Russie. Ce monarque voudroit engager le Roi à faire encore des sacrifices à la Suède ; mais le Roi ne sauroit abandonner entièrement les intérêts de ses sujets pour donner cette nouvelle preuve d'une résignation dont jusqu'à présent S.M. n'a recueilli aucun fruit. L'Empereur de Russie manifeste encore des craintes pour la Finlande, après avoir sacrifié au Prince Royal de Suède son plus ancien allié, le Dannemark, et après avoir récompensé la non-activité de ce Prince par l'acquisition d'un royaume.

Cependant, pour ne pas paroître indifférent ou étranger à la grande cause qui réclame la réunion de toutes les Puissances de l'Europe contre Buonaparte, le Roi a autorisé M. de Bourke à conclure avec la Cour de Londres un traité d'alliance et de subsides, et S.M. se contentera avec confiance de la garantie de l'Angleterre contre les nouveaux projets qu'à l'exemple de Murat le Prince Royal de Suède pourroit méditer contre le Dannemark.

Ce seroit une véritable satisfaction pour le Roi de voir ses troupes sous les ordres du vainqueur de Salamanca et de Vitoria, et S.M. se flatte que ces troupes mériteroient bientôt la confiance et l'approbation de leur illustre chef.

Sans les difficultés insurmontables que le Roi a rencontrées, dans un moment où il devroit régner partout la plus grande activité, les troupes Danoises auroient pû être déjà en marche. Si Votre Excellence pouvoit hâter et faciliter le succès de l'arrangement proposé au Ministre Anglois, elle feroit une chose extrêmement agréable au Roi.

Je me félicite, Monsieur le Duc, d'être dans ce moment l'interprète des sentimens du Roi, tant envers le gouvernement Anglois qu'envers Votre Excellence en particulier. Je la prie d'agréer l'assurance renouvelée de la très haute considération et de l'attachement respectueux avec lesquels je suis, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence

Le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

WALTERSTORFF.

that size have been issued will make a requisition upon the Quartermaster-General for a sufficient number to complete their men to one camp kettle for four men.

3. The kettles which hold twelve pints or more are to be considered sufficient for six men, and are to be accounted for accordingly; and in future, in all returns of camp equipments, there are to be two columns for camp kettles, one of the number for four men, and one of the number for six.

WELLINGTON.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

. . . . . .

MY DEAR DUKE, Vienna, 22nd April, 1815.

My despatch to Castlereagh of this date goes under flying seal to you. It may possibly give you a little idea of those opinions here which I learn from a good deal of intercourse with the military authorities.

I am told it would be very essential for you, if you wish for the most exact information of the French army, to get acquainted with M. Tabaner, chef du bureau de la guerre, who is with the Duc de Feltre. Talleyrand says he knows more of the military means of France than any other individual.

You will have such a dose of reading on the arrival of this messenger that I shall only add that I am ever

Most sincerely and affectionately yours,

STEWART.

As I think you may like to keep the memoir, I send you another copy.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Les points de rassemblement des différentes armées sont fixés.

Les rassemblemens se font dans ces jours-ci. Jetons dont un regard sur la situation des armées.

Pour ne pas s'y tromper il faut bien distinguer les différentes époques, savoir :—

1. Celle du moment présent.

2. Celle où les premières colonnes des troupes Autrichiennes, Prussiennes, et Bavaroises seront arrivées sur les bords du Rhin.

3. Celle où toute l'armée Autrichienne destinée vers le Haut Rhin sera arrivée dans ces contrées ; enfin,

4. Celle où l'armée Russe et les réserves Autrichiennes et Prussiennes seront à même de soutenir ces armées.

Dans l'époque du moment tel à peu près est la force des armées alliées et de celle de Buonaparte :—

Les Alliés.

a. L'Armée du Haut Rhin :—

	Hommes.
Wurtembergeois	20,000
Badeois	12,000
Darmstadiens	8,000
Bavarois	10,000
		50,000

b. Entre le Rhin et la Meuse :—

Bavarois (et la garnison de Mayence et de Luxembourg)	18,000

c. Sur la Meuse :—

Prussiens	50,000

d. L'armée de Wellington dans les Pays-Bas :—

	Hommes.
Anglais et Hanovriens	23,000
Belges et Hollandais	20,000
		43,000
En tout		161,000

Est telle l'état des armées des Alliés ; voilà celui des armées de Buonaparte :—

	Hommes.
Au moment de son retour en France l'armée Française consistait, d'après les calculs que l'on a formés, en	230,000
Décomptons les garnisons des places fortes, les troupes qu'il lui faudra laisser dans le Midi, la Vendée, et Paris, en tout ..	110,000
Restent disponibles	120,000

Mais comme son activité ne laisse point de doute qu'il aura tâché de l'augmenter dès le premier jour de son arrivée à Paris, une grande masse sera déjà en formation.

La seconde époque sera arrivée vers le commencement de Mai. A cette époque on pourra compter que—

	Hommes.
Autrichiens	24,000
Bavarois	40,000
Wurtembergeois	20,000
Badeois	10,000
Darmstadiens	10,000
		104,000
De l'armée du Haut Rhin, sous le Maréchal Prince Schwarzenberg, seront entre Mannheim et Bâle.
Disponibles de l'armée du Centre, sous le Maréchal Blücher, entre Namur et Luxembourg		70,000
Anglais et Hanovriens, 35,000 ; Belges et Hollandais, 25,000 ; l'armée disponible de l'aile droite, sous le Maréchal Duc de Wellington		60,000
En tout		260,000

L'avant-garde de l'armée Russe sera arrivée vers ce temps à la hauteur de Prague; les autres corps Autrichiens destiués pour l'armée du Haut Rhin à peu près à la hauteur d'Ulm; la réserve Autrichienne sur la hauteur de Munich; la réserve de la Prusse sur la hauteur de l'Elbe.

Avant que toutes les forces des Alliés soyent sur les frontières de la France, il faudra donc compter encore cinq semaines.

Jusqu'aux premiers jours de Juin ces forces seront donc partagées en deux grandes masses, dont l'une, à peu près de 260,000 hommes, se trouvera, vers le commencement de Mai, sur les frontières de la France, l'autre en marche entre la hauteur de l'Elbe, de Vienne, et le Rhin.

Les forces de Buonaparte en formation aujourd'hui auront été augmentés vers cette époque à peu près de tout ce qu'il aura trouvé en vieux soldats et officiers pour lesquels il a eu des armes; et comme les hommes ne lui manqueront pas, je crois qu'il faudra supposer qu'autant d'armes que Buonaparte aura trouvé son armée sera augmentée dans les premières six semaines.

Je ne connais pas au juste à quel nombre il faudra évaluer l'effectif de ces fusils, mais si l'on considère que la France, sous Louis XVIII., a fabriqué par mois 15,000 fusils, que cette fabrication a durée pendant 10 mois, qu'on a donc fabriqué depuis le départ de Buonaparte 150,000 fusils, et que dans la dernière campagne les grandes places et dépôts militaires, comme Metz, Strasbourg, Lille, Grenoble, ne sont pas tombées dans les mains des Alliés, je crois que sans exagération il faudra compter cet effectif à 250,000.

La force militaire de Buonaparte au commencement de Mai sera donc :—

	Hommes.
L'armée qu'il a trouvée à son retour		230,000
L'augmentation depuis		200,000
		430,000
Dont doivent être décomptés :—
Encore en formation	50,000
Pour les garnisons	70,000
Pour la Vendée	20,000
Pour le Midi	30,000
Pour Paris	30,000
		200,000
Restent		230,000

Avec lesquels il pourra paroître en campagne.

La balance des forces militaires des Alliés et ceux de Buonaparte sera donc à cette époque, forces disponibles, à même d'agir :—Alliés, 260,000; Buonaparte, 230,000.

Cet aperçu montre qu'à l'époque mentionné au commencement de Mai la prépondérance des forces des Alliés ne sera pas si grande; et que c'est une erreur de croire que chaque armée pourra agir indépendamment de ce qui se passe aux autres, espérant que ses forces seules suffisent pour vaincre ceux de l'ennemi, et contrebalancer tous les avantages que donnent à la France sa situation centrale et la série de ses forteresses.

Tout autre sera ce tableau à la troisième époque, vers le 20 de Mai.

A cette époque toute l'armée Autrichienne destinée sur le Haut Rhin sera arrivée aux pieds du Schwarzwald; les Prusses de l'Elbe seront sur le Rhin; les Hanovriens arrivés de leur pays : la force de l'armée du Haut Rhin devra donc être évalué, y compris :—

	Hommes.
Les Bavarois et Wurtembergeois, etc., etc., à	200,000
L'armée de Blücher, à	100,000
Celle de Wellington, à	70,000
En tout	370,000
Celle de Buonaparte en troupes disponibles, d'après le compte formé	230,000
Auxquels peut-être seraient à ajouter	50,000
Qu'on lui aurait compté encore en formation au commencement du mois de Mai.
Le tout donc, tout au plus	280,000

A cette époque la balance sera donc plus favorable pour les Alliés; et comme en même tems les têtes des réserves Autrichiennes, l'armée Russe, et les autres corps Prussiens seront à même de soutenir les armées, ces forces des Alliés augmenteront encore de jour en jour, pendant que ceux de Buonaparte auront un terme par le nombre des fusils.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Liège, 22nd April, 1815.

Marshal Blücher informed me he should write to your Lordship announcing his intention of paying an early visit to Bruxelles, and I therefore did not acquaint your Lordship of the Marshal's arrival.

In returning some French papers this morning to General Gneisenau, he spoke of the arrangements making by the present French government, and that in his judgment the approaching campaign became every day a more serious undertaking from the leisure Buonaparte would have for preparation and influence over the minds of the people. His project of operations, he said, had been approved by the King; that however proper the principle might have been then, delay would now require alterations. He did not state in what these alterations would consist; but he observed there were differences of opinion at Vienna; and that from what he heard from thence, he did not expect operations could commence before the middle of June, and that in that case there would be some difficulty in subsisting the troops between the Meuse and the Moselle. He referred to the danger to be apprehended from Prince Metternich's presence with the armies, as he knew, from the experience of the last campaign, that at periods of great military crises Marshal Schwarzenberg's movements had been fettered by secret instructions, the Prince Metternich being always disposed to try to repair any check in war by negotiation rather than by the renewal of military exertion. Of this preference and its mischievous effects he cited one or two instances, and that it was to be hoped the war councils would not be infected with the bad spirit of the Congress. This led to the subject of Saxony, the entire cession of which, he observed, had at one period been agreed to without restriction, and afterwards retracted. This is so very sore a subject with every Prussian officer, that I told General Gneisenau anything I should say would only be the repetition of reports current at the time I was at Vienna; but that those reports very distinctly annexed conditions to the entire cession which Prussia had been unwilling to accede to, particularly in what regarded Mayence, and Bavaria's interests in that question. General Gneisenau dwelt on the military importance of that fortress, and the impolicy of yielding it to Bavaria, who was assuming a character out of her proper sphere, which Wurtemberg and Baden might pretend to imitate; that the Saxon question had caused disagreeable discussions, and a very unnatural treaty for England to be concerned in with France. I asked if he had seen the treaty? He answered No, but that he knew the circumstances; and continued, that France would never have been sincere to such an alliance whilst her interests and the national voice called for the repossession of the left bank of the Rhine.

After repeating his surprise at the signature of such a treaty by the English plenipotentiary, I considered a proper opportunity had arrived of assuring him that, according to every interpretation I had heard given to the treaty, I conceived he mistook the nature of it if he imagined it was meant as a permanent measure of policy; that I happened to know something of its history, and that, in fact, it was only a temporary measure to prevent the Congress being forced on certain points which Russia and Prussia too strongly insisted upon, and of which the other Powers disapproved. I then explained the indiscretion of Prince Hardenberg, and that by Prussia's acceptance of the present arrangements for Saxony the treaty was virtually at an end.

General Gneisenau himself remarked that the signature of Great Britain to such a treaty in a great measure convinced him that it was only for a Congress purpose; but had war broken out and the treaty been acted upon, he would have counselled the setting up of Napoleon in France, and thus paralysed any cooperation intended by the Bourbons, could they have been so ungrateful as to have given any; and added, that at that period such a war would have been fatal to the Austrian power as head of Germany. I laid a stress on the support given by Lord Castlereagh to Prince Hardenberg on the discussion of the frontier line; and the subject ended by his saying he believed everything was forgotten in the interest which the present state of affairs excited.

The whole of this conversation was so entirely of a private nature, that although under no injunction of silence, I should certainly not have wished to repeat it, were it not for the fulfilment of your Lordship's instructions relative to the treaty; and I have every reason to believe, from General Gneisenau's manner, and from his dwelling on the impolicy of it rather than on any displeasure it had excited, that the treaty has passed here without marked observation or general circulation.

I hear from the discontents of the inhabitants of Liège of the loan of 6,000,000 francs and of the Prussian appropriation of arms manufactured in the town. The second payment to complete the loan is, I hear, to be made on the 25th instant.

Wishing to avoid any appearance of interference at this head-quarters, and knowing that General Röder can furnish your Lordship with information of the force and disposition of the Prussian troops, I have not requested any return or other paper.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

P.S. The enclosed 'Berlin Gazette' contains the King of Prussia's proclamation relative to the war.

Lieut.-Col. C. J. Napier to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 22nd April, 1815.

In asking a favour of your Grace, I believe it best to come to the point at once. You will confer on me a great obligation if you will place me on the Staff.

Knowing that the applications for the same thing must be numerous, and that I have no claim on your Grace's attention to mine, I confess I have little hope that your answer will be favourable. Eighteen years' constant attention to regimental duty, and having served in Spain, Portugal, the West Indies, and America, form the best excuse I have to offer for trespassing on your time, which I hope you will pardon; and Believe me to be, respectfully,

Your Grace's very faithful and obedient, humble servant,

C. J. NAPIER,

Lieut.-Col. h. p. 50th regt.

[Sorry, but cannot.—W.]

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 22nd April, 1815.

I have the honour of sending you herewith a letter of a French officer of douaniers to a brother officer, with a Proclamation, which are intended to be distributed all along our frontier, in order to engage our soldiers to desert.

There is a report that troops are assembling between Bavay and Landrecy. I have sent a confidential person to ascertain it.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Lieut.-Gen. C. Alten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duke, Hanoverian Head Quarters, Lens, 22nd April, 1815.

As Lieutenant-General Baron Decken, who lately arrived at Brussels, is a member of the Hanoverian War Office, and has very extensive powers with respect to making appointments in the Hanoverian corps as well as pecuniary grants, I have, in order to save the delay of sending an application for the appointment of a second field officer to each militia battalion to Hanover, made it to General Decken, and do myself the honour of transmitting the accompanying translation of my letter for your Grace's information.

I look upon such an appointment not only as absolutely necessary, but at the same time as calculated to dispose of the senior Captains of the Legion, at least such as are qualified, in the most useful and advantageous manner to themselves, and thereby avoid placing the junior Captains of the Legion, who could be the only ones to be chosen for such a purpose, in a similar command (if a sufficient number of companies are vacant) to what they leave in their own corps, and who have naturally not the same experience with their seniors of the same rank.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,
Your Grace's most obedient and most humble servant,

Charles Alten.

[Enclosure.]

Lieut.-Gen. C. Alten to Lieut.-Gen. Baron Decken.

Sir, Hanoverian Head-Quarters, Lens, 21st April, 1815.

I have already had the honour to state to you that his Grace the Duke of Wellington conceives it necessary for the good of the service to employ a certain number of Captains and subalterns of the Legion with the Hanoverian troops.

As the militia battalions have at present only one field officer each, whom I do not wish by any means to remove from the command of the battalion, but to give the assistance of an experienced Captain of the Legion as second field officer, such a measure appears to me the more necessary with these new troops, who, as well as the greater part of the officers, are full of the best spirit, but deficient in experience to take the proper measures in critical situations, which every corps in the field is subject to, and might otherwise be productive of the most disastrous consequences.

Permit me, therefore, Sir, to represent it to you from this point of view, and as in every respect advantageous for the good of the service and the common cause.

I have, &c.,
Charles Alten.

Prince Hardenberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duc, Vienne, le 23 Avril, 1815.

Je me vois dans la nécessité de m'adresser à Votre Excellence pour un objet qui nous intéresse également, afin de prévenir tout mésentendu.

Elle se rappellera que lors de son séjour à Vienne il fut question d'assigner à l'armée sous son commandement la partie du contingent Saxon qui resterait au Roi de Saxe, déduction faite des sujets Prussiens qui en seraient séparés pour entrer dans l'armée du Roi mon Souverain. My Lord Clancarty, dans une conférence qui eut lieu après votre départ, my Lord, me demanda à combien cette partie du contingent pouvait se monter, et je répondis, "à peu près à 12,000 ou 14,000 hommes." Il fut question par manière de conversation des contingens d'autres Princes de l'Allemagne ; et ni ce que je dis sur le corps Saxon, ni ce que d'autres avancèrent sur le nombre que chacun pourrait fournir, ne pouvait être envisagé comme officiel ou sûr, aussi rien de tout cela n'entra au protocole. Ce n'est que dans ce moment que les traités d'alliance sont négociés, et vont être signés avec le Roi de Saxe et les Princes Allemands, et qu'on déterminera le nombre de troupes à fournir par chacun. Malgré cela, my Lord Clancarty veut déduire une obligation de la part de la Prusse, de ce que j'ai dit, de faire marcher incessamment 12,000 Saxons à l'armée de Votre Excellence, tandis que des renseignemens exacts prouvent que ce nombre n'existe pas, et qu'il ne surpassera probablement pas 7000 ou 8000 lorsque la susdite séparation aura été faite. Le Roi a ordonné qu'elle ait lieu sans délai. Il sera facile de l'exécuter en peu de jours, en formant deux brigades, et en faisant entrer dans l'une tous les nouveaux sujets Prussiens, dans l'autre tous ceux qui restent au Roi de Saxe, ce qui pourra être effectué sans décomposer les différens corps qui comprennent déjà des soldats natifs d'un même district, et troqueront le peu qui restera. La même opération aura lieu en Saxe ; et il n'est nullement douteux que celle-ci n'offre tous les moyens pour faire avoir à Votre Excellence non seulement les 12,000 hommes, mais plus encore ; car il paraît que sur une population de près de 1,200,000 âmes on pourra exiger du Roi de Saxe de le porter plus haut, l'Electeur de Hesse fournissant autant sur la moitié de population.

Nous sommes prêts à concourir à tout ce qui peut avancer le but commun. Votre Excellence en a des preuves dans la manière dont nos généraux se sont prêtés à ses propositions, mais je rends trop justice à son équité pour croire qu'elle veuille adopter l'opinion de Lord Clancarty.

Je donne incessamment les ordres nécessaires au gouvernement général de la Saxe, et j'aurai soin que dans le traité que nous allons conclure avec le Roi de Saxe le contingent soit fixé d'après une juste proportion.

Agréez, my Lord, mes vœux les plus sincères pour votre gloire et votre bonheur, et l'assurance de la plus haute considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être,

My Lord Duc, votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

HARDENBERG.

The Right Hon. Sir Henry Wellesley to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR ARTHUR, Madrid, 23rd April, 1815.

I send you a copy of my despatch to Lord Castlereagh, which will show you the line I have taken in consequence of the news of Buonaparte's landing in France. I think you will agree with me that nothing but mischief could have resulted from the Spaniards entering France at the time they were required to do so by M. de Tatischeff and the Prussian minister; but I suspect they have complained of my conduct to both their Courts.

M. de Cevallos said yesterday that as you knew best what the Spanish armies were enabled to accomplish, the government was very desirous that you should send them a plan of operations. Castaños and some other officers have mentioned this to me likewise; and I really believe that they would be guided by any plan you might send them.

Cevallos likewise mentioned to me that the King had it in contemplation to appoint Alava to reside with the King of France, but that his principal station should be with you. He asked me what I thought of this arrangement. I said I was certain that you would be very glad to have Alava with you, but that I did not know whether that might not be effected without changing his present destination. Cevallos seemed to think that the change would be necessary. I know not where to write to Alava; but I suppose he is not far from you; so you can tell him this. I am very anxious to hear from you.

Ever, my dear Arthur, most affectionately yours,

H. WELLESLEY.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

The Right Hon. Sir Henry Wellesley to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Madrid, 23rd April, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose a translation of a note which I have received from M. de Cevallos in reply to mine of the 2nd instant, recommending that every possible exertion should be made for hastening the march of the troops which are directed to assemble on the frontier. Similar replies have been given to the ministers of the different Powers who have addressed the Spanish government upon this subject. The Russian and Prussian ministers, however, are not satisfied with this reply, and have presented other notes, insisting upon exertions which, in the present state of the resources of Spain, are utterly impracticable.

I have represented to these gentlemen that the government is without the means of feeding, paying, or equipping its army; that time must be given to provide means for its maintenance; and that, even if the army were in a condition to take the field, it is hardly fair to expect that the Spaniards should commence hostilities without any general plan of operations having been communicated to them, or do more than be prepared to act in concert with the Allies whenever such a plan be presented to them; that it will then be the duty of the ministers of the different Powers engaged in the contest to urge the government to co-operate in the general plan; but that to send the Spanish army into France in its present state, so far from being attended with any advantage, would be productive of the greatest mischief.

I think it necessary to guard your Lordship against the reports which may be made to you of the want of exertion of the Spanish government upon this occasion. The ministers of some of the Allied Powers here go so far as to say that the loss of the cities of Bordeaux and Bayonne is to be attributed to the refusal of the government to order the army to advance into France for the purpose of occupying those places. Nothing can be more unjust than this assertion. The period between the receipt of the intelligence of Buonaparte's landing in France and the fall of those places did not afford sufficient time for sending such a force as would have been necessary to secure them, even admitting that the Spanish troops had been permitted to occupy them; but if any resistance had been offered, which, from the temper of the French garrisons, was to be expected, the enterprise, in the actual state of the Spanish army, would certainly have failed.

The government have entered into contracts for provisioning the army and the fortresses on the frontier; and it appears to me that they have made every exertion which the present depressed state of their finances would admit of, and which can fairly be required of them under their present state of uncertainty as to the future operations of the Allies.

I have the honour to enclose an account of the state of the army in Catalonia and Aragon, which may be depended upon as being correct.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

H. WELLESLEY.

II.

Don Pedro Cevallos to the British Ambassador.

SIR, Palace, 12th April, 1815.

The King my master has been informed of the contents of your Excellency's note of the 2nd instant, in consequence of the events which have occurred in France, and of the declaration signed by the plenipotentiaries united in congress at Vienna; and His Majesty commands me to reply to your Excellency that a courier is momentarily expected from Vienna with despatches which will contain intelligence that will furnish matter for determining with more exactness and information the answer to be given to your Excellency's note.

In the mean time I assure your Excellency, in the name of His Majesty, that he will not overlook anything which can contribute to the prosperity of his people, the dignity of his crown, and his duty in maintaining his relations upon the most intimate and cordial footing of friendship with Great Britain, and of good and sincere understanding with the Powers of Europe.

I am, &c.,

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

III.

State of the Armies in Catalonia and Aragon.

The army in Catalonia consists of twenty-six regiments of infantry, one of cuirassiers, two of dragoons, and one of sappers, besides a proportion of artillery. The infantry is divided into four divisions, each division composed of two brigades, and every brigade of three regiments; and two regiments remain not attached to any division.

The 1st and 2nd divisions are those which constituted the original or 1st Catalonian army, to which were added in the beginning of 1813 the regiments of Principe and Pontevedra, sent from Galicia to Catalonia by his Grace the Duke of Wellington. The 3rd division (commanded by Brigadier the Marques de Vivot) is that of Majorca, formerly General Whittingham's. The 4th is the division of General Elio's army sent under the command of General Sarsfield to reinforce General Clinton. No General has been appointed to command the 1st division since Baron Eroles gave it up, on being nominated second in command of the army; and the 2nd division is commanded by Colonel Fleyres, a French emigrant officer, who formerly served in the Walloon Guards.

Four regiments of infantry, the cuirassiers and sappers, are in Barcelona and Monjuich; one in Tarragona; one in Tortosa; two in the town and two in the fortress of Figueras; one in Gerona, which sends a detachment to Hostalrich; and one in Lerida. The other regiments are quartered in different towns, from which they are occasionally moved to others, to make the burden of lodgings, &c., fall more equally. The consequence is, that although the army is nominally told off into divisions and brigades, they can never be united for the purpose of manœuvring in line; and the regiments can but rarely have field-days, from being constantly called on to detach companies to the towns and villages around, to enforce the contributions, as well of money as of rations.

With the exception of seven or eight regiments which had new clothing given them about the beginning of the year 1814, the army is nearly in rags. The 3rd division still wears the clothing delivered to the regiments composing it on the formation of it in Majorca in 1811; and General Sarsfield's division (one regiment excepted) has had its present clothing for about the same period; and almost all the regiments had numbers of prisoners in France, who have joined since the peace, and whom they are unable to clothe. They have, however, all got arms and accoutrements which belonged to the soldiers lately discharged under the classes of men enlisted during the war, only sons of widows, &c. The average strength of the regiments may be fairly estimated at nearly 1100 men. No regiment, I believe, is under 1000, except the Cazadores of Mallorca, consisting only of 730, and which arises from its not having lost any in prisoners during the war.

The fortifications of Barcelona, Figueras, Tortosa, and Lerida are in good repair; and there were at Figueras, in August last, provisions for 4000 men for two months, and which had been left by the French; but part of them, if not the whole, has been consumed. The salt meat, wine, &c., which the French left in Monjuich de Barcelona, have also been sold or consumed; and the fire-wood, of which there was some months' store, has been sold.

The regiment of cuirassiers is tolerably well clothed and appointed; good discipline and more esprit de corps than is generally to be met with in Spanish regiments, and has from 300 to 400 well mounted. The other two regiments of cavalry have each about 500 mounted, but are badly clothed and appointed. It is not known whether any arrangements have lately been made to form dépôts of provisions or stores at Figueras or on the frontier; but they might very easily be transported by sea to Rosas, from whence to Figueras there is a carriage-road. Until this be done, no army can be assembled in that point, through which runs the high road passing by Bellegarde to Perpignan.

The army in Catalonia is four or five months in arrears of pay; but some regiments which had funds have been enabled to give half of their pay to the men for these months. Those funds arose from the stoppage of pay of the soldiers who have been permitted to go on furlough during the Christmas holidays, and also of those who were allowed to assist the farmers during the harvest, and of the handicraft men who have leave to work at their trades in the towns where their regiments are quartered.

The funds appropriated for the payment of the army arise principally from the custom-house, a poll-tax, and another called los frutos civiles. There is also a small tax levied on all except nobles, clergy, and such as have the fuero militar, which was formerly intended as a remuneration to the householders, on whom billets might be given; but this fund was destined at the beginning of the war to aid in payment of the army, and still continues so. The tax called frutos civiles is thus levied: an average is made of the price of wine, of that of oil, grain, &c., and the grower pays the proportion (according to what he grows) in money. The manner of paying the troops is thus: the paymasters of regiments get from the intendente an order (libranza) on different towns, sometimes on eight or ten different ones, for the amount ordered to be paid his regiment; and these paymasters are obliged to go with an escort to all those towns, and the ayuntamiento has then to collect this sum to deliver to the paymaster: and should there be any demur on the part of any inhabitant, which often happens, the soldiers live at free quarters in his house, and he is, besides, obliged to pay to each soldier a certain sum daily, sometimes more, sometimes less, until he pays his entire contribution to the ayuntamiento. All this causes great delay in the payments of the troops, and has the bad effect of making the soldier obnoxious to the inhabitant.

The force in Aragon is small, consisting only of two regiments of cavalry (those formerly belonging to General Whittingham's division) and three or four of infantry.

[865.] To Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 24th April, 1815.

I have read the papers which you sent me in your note of the 19th, which are most interesting documents; and the person who has written them appears to me to have a more clear and just view of the state of affairs in France, and to reflect better upon them, than any whose letters I have yet seen.

I confess that every day's experience convinces me that there is but little chance of restoring the poor King. Clancarty's last private letter to you speaks volumes upon this subject. In fact the matter may be stated as arranged. Moutron brought to Talleyrand intelligence of what we know to be the wishes and intentions of the Jacobins and the army; and Talleyrand sent him back with a declaration of the intentions of the Allies upon the same point.

I consider the point, therefore, as settled with respect to the King; and it remains to be seen who will be taken instead of him. You see, however, the degree of indifference of the Emperor of Russia, or rather prejudice, against the legitimate Bourbons.

Pozzo di Borgo has just now informed me that Moutron brought letters to the Emperor of Russia, Metternich, &c. &c., of which you will observe that Clancarty had no knowledge; and this shows to what they related. It is also a curious circumstance that the French Legation, although they wrote on the 15th to the King, took no notice of the declaration of the 11th, of which they were the movers.

I concur entirely with you as to our line. Our object should be if possible to restore the King, as the measure most likely to insure the tranquillity of Europe for a short time; and although we cannot declare that to be our object, we should take care to avoid to do anything, and particularly to declare anything, which can tend to defeat it.

I concur in your reserve upon the ratification of the treaty, but I think the declaration of the 11th ought to be suppressed.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 24th April, 1815.

I send you the substance of our Treaty and Declaration, as we propose to lay it before Parliament. You will see I have strengthened the Declaration on the point of supporting the Bourbons. I persuade myself, as the explanation now stands, it will do them no harm in point of impression. Without it you may rely upon it we could do nothing for them in this country. I am, upon the whole, glad we have been driven to this disclosure, although somewhat irregular, as we wanted some incident to bring up the tone of Parliament to the true point: without this we must have remained inactive till either the ratifications arrived and were exchanged, or until hostilities were commenced. Now Whitbread must either acquiesce in our line, or be obliged to attack us, by moving, under circumstances of disadvantage, a Peace Address.

I have given directions for attaching Mr. Hervey as an Assistant to the French Embassy.

Ever, my dear Lord, yours most sincerely,

CASTLEREAGH.

If you find any difficulty in arranging the Hanoverian subsidy upon the principle of relieving the King of the Netherlands from the entire of the charge of 600,000*l.*, it might be proposed that each government should pay one half.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

SUBSTANCE of TREATIES between His BRITANNIC MAJESTY and the EMPERORS of AUSTRIA and RUSSIA, and the KING of PRUSSIA, respectively; signed at Vienna, on the 25th of March, 1815.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the , having taken into consideration the consequences which the invasion of France by Napoleon Buonaparte, and the actual situation of that kingdom, may produce with respect to the safety of Europe, have resolved, in conjunction with His Majesty the, &c. &c. &c., to apply to that important circumstance the principles consecrated by the Treaty of Chaumont.

They have consequently resolved to renew, by a solemn Treaty, signed separately by each of the four Powers with each of the three others, the engagement to preserve against every attack the order of things so happily established in Europe, and to determine upon the most effectual means of fulfilling that engagement, as well as of giving it all the extension which the present circumstances so imperiously call for.

Article I.

The High Contracting Parties above mentioned solemnly engage to unite the resources of their respective States for the purpose of maintaining entire the conditions of the Treaty of Peace concluded at Paris the 30th of May, 1814; as also the stipulations determined upon and signed at the Congress of Vienna, with the view to complete the dispositions of that Treaty, to preserve them against all infringement, and particularly against the designs of Napoleon Buonaparte. For this purpose they engage, in the spirit of the Declaration of the 13th March last, to direct in common, and with one accord, should the case require it, all their efforts against him, and against all those who should already have joined his faction, or shall hereafter join it, in order to force him to desist from his projects, and to render him unable to disturb in future the tranquillity of Europe, and the general peace under the protection of which the rights, the liberty, and independence of nations had been recently placed and secured.

Article II.

Although the means destined for the attainment of so great and salutary an object ought not to be subjected to limitation, and although the High Contracting Parties are resolved to devote thereto all those means which, in their respective situations, they are enabled to dispose of, they have nevertheless agreed to keep constantly in the field each a force of 150,000 men complete, including cavalry in the proportion of at least one-tenth, and a just proportion of artillery, not reckoning garrisons; and to employ the same actively and conjointly against the common enemy.

Article III.

The High Contracting Parties reciprocally engage not to lay down their arms but by common consent, nor before the object of the war, designated in the First Article of the present Treaty, shall have been attained; nor until Buonaparte shall have been rendered absolutely unable to create disturbance, and to renew his attempts for possessing himself of the supreme power in France.

Article IV.

The present Treaty being principally applicable to the present circumstances, the stipulations of the Treaty of Chaumont, and particularly those contained in the Sixteenth Article of the same, shall be again in force, as soon as the object actually in view shall have been attained.

ARTICLE V.

Whatever relates to the Command of the Combined Armies, to Supplies, &c., shall be regulated by a particular Convention.

ARTICLE VI.

The High Contracting Parties shall be allowed respectively to accredit to the Generals commanding their armies officers who shall have the liberty of corresponding with their governments, for the purpose of giving information of military events, and of everything relating to the operations of the armies.

ARTICLE VII.

The engagements entered into by the present Treaty having for their object the maintenance of the General Peace, the High Contracting Parties agree to invite all the Powers of Europe to accede to the same.

ARTICLE VIII.

The present Treaty having no other end in view but to support France, or any other country which may be invaded, against the enterprises of Buonaparte and his adherents, His Most Christian Majesty shall be specially invited to accede hereunto; and, in the event of His Majesty's requiring the forces stipulated in the Second Article, to make known what assistance circumstances will allow him to bring forward in furtherance of the object of the present Treaty.

SEPARATE ARTICLE.

As circumstances might prevent His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from keeping constantly in the field the number of troops specified in the Second Article, it is agreed that His Britannic Majesty shall have the option either of furnishing his contingent in men, or of paying at the rate of thirty pounds sterling per annum for each cavalry soldier, and twenty pounds per annum for each infantry soldier, that may be wanting to complete the number stipulated in the Second Article.

II.

MEMORANDUM.

Foreign Office, 25th April, 1815.

The Treaty of which the substance is above given has been ordered to be ratified, and it has been notified on the part of the Prince Regent to the High Contracting Parties that it is His Royal Highness's determination, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, to direct the said Ratifications to be exchanged in due course against similar acts on the part of the respective Powers, under an explanatory Declaration of the following tenor, as to Article Eight of the said Treaty:

Declaration.

The undersigned, on the exchange of the Ratifications of the Treaty of the 25th of March last, on the part of his Court, is hereby commanded to declare that the Eighth Article of the said Treaty, wherein His Most Christian Majesty is invited to accede, under certain stipulations, is to be understood as binding the Contracting Parties, upon principles of mutual security, to a common effort against the power of Napoleon Buonaparte, in pursuance of the Third Article of the said Treaty; but is not to be understood as binding His Britannic Majesty to prosecute the war with a view of imposing upon France any particular government.

However solicitous the Prince Regent must be to see His Most Christian Majesty restored to the throne, and however anxious he is to contribute, in conjunction with his Allies, to so auspicious an event, he nevertheless deems himself called upon to make this Declaration, on the exchange of the Ratifications, as well in consideration of what is due to His Most Christian Majesty's interests in France as in conformity to the principles upon which the British government has invariably regulated its conduct.

The Treaty was received in London on the 5th instant. The answer thereto was despatched to Vienna on the 8th, together with authority and instructions to the Earl of Clancarty to sign a subsidiary engagement, consequent upon the said Treaty.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Foreign Office, 24th April, 1815.

I send you enclosed a despatch from Sir Charles Stuart, in order that you may take our existing engagements with Hanover into consideration in your arrangement of subsidy.

You will observe that, exclusive of the German Legion, which, although principally composed of Hanoverians, is a corps now in the British service, Hanover brings into the field 27,000 or 28,000 men. Of these, 15,000 were subsidized by us during the campaign of last year at the rate of 600,000*l.* a year; the other 12,000 form her own contingent under Treaty with the Allies.

After the Peace, and transfer of the Belgic provinces to the King of the Netherlands, it was thought reasonable that His Majesty should relieve the British government of the charge of this force whilst serving in the Low Countries, more especially as the King had not yet been able to collect a force of his own commensurate to his resources.

The degree to which the various armaments have lately been pushed in both Holland and Belgium makes the government naturally desirous of being relieved of this expense, and you will see the degree in which, if this charge is withdrawn, they conceive their resources equal to sustain their own efforts in the war without extraordinary aid.

Hanover, under an agreement signed by me with Count Münster at Vienna in January last, is entitled to be paid at the above rate until these troops are sent home, a month's subsidy being allowed for their return. But if this payment is continued, which is at the rate of 40*l.* per man for 15,000 men, and 21*l.* per man for 28,000, there seems no ground on which Hanover can expect to receive any allowance for her own contingent. Nor does it seem consistent with your extended plan of distribution to give Hanover so much, unless in consideration of the government of the Netherlands being disposed to forego, if so relieved, any claims for subsidy.

I am only desirous of suggesting these points for your consideration, as Lord Liverpool considers this charge, however distributed, as forming a part of your general arrangement, which he seems very earnest should not exceed the original bounds of 2,100,000*l.*, exclusive of the 5,000,000*l.* to the Three Great Powers.

I shall refer the governments of Hanover and of the Netherlands to your Grace's decision on this subject.

I perceive the Bavarian and Wurtemberg governments make a participation in subsidy an indispensable condition of their accession.

I am, with great truth, my dear Lord, yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Sir C. Stuart to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, 11th April, 1815.

Your Lordship will, I presume, be anxious to learn the extent of the subsidiary assistance which may be expected on the part of His Majesty the King of the Low Countries when the armies which have been brought together shall take the field against the common enemy.

I have adverted to this subject in several conversations with M. Falck, and that Minister informs me that, under the financial arrangements which have been adopted, the King will be enabled to pay the whole force he has been enabled to collect until the month of July. He is desirous, however, to continue the same extent of exertion without any appeal to the generosity of his ally, which he is of opinion will be possible if it shall be so arranged that his armies are to be maintained at the expense of the country, the theatre of war, after they have entered France.

He added that the immense sums which are indispensable for the equipment of new raised troops will nevertheless with difficulty be provided, unless His Majesty's government consent to admit a proposition which, in whatever point of view it may be considered, cannot be deemed unreasonable, and which will enable this Court to continue the utmost extent of military preparations without establishing the precedent of a demand for subsidies at the commencement of every contest.

He declared that a relief from the burden which had hitherto been imposed for the payment of the Hanoverian corps in this country would not only permit the King's army to take the field entirely at his own expense, but would prevent the necessity of imposing new taxes in a country which is already impoverished by the weight of a system introduced under France, and from which, if affairs had worn a more favourable aspect, it would have been an object of real political importance to ease their new subjects.

I have not held out any assurance that this request will be entertained by my Court; but the proposition offers so favourable a contrast to the demands which I understand are pouring in upon His Majesty's government from all quarters, that I flatter myself I shall be authorized to acquaint the Ministers of the Netherlands that the arrangements which your Lordship may find practicable will be entered into with the Regency of Hanover respecting the money the Hanoverian army at present receives from this Court.

I have, &c.,

CHARLES STUART.

The Prince de Nassau to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Weilbourg, le 24 Avril, 1815.

En suite de la conférence que j'eus l'avantage d'avoir avec Votre Excellence et des nouvelles que j'ai reçues de Vienne de mes ministres au Congrès, qui s'accordent de me dire que rien ne s'oppose à la réalisation de notre vœu de voir le régiment nouvellement levé joindre l'armée que vous commandez, je m'empresse de vous annoncer que dans la mi-Mai il pourra se mettre en marche, et que dès le 15 Mai il n'attendra plus que vos ordres, Monsieur le Duc, pour apprendre l'endroit de sa destination, ordres que Votre Excellence voudra bien faire parvenir à notre Général-major le Baron de Kruse. Vous me croirez sans peine, my Lord, que rien ne peut être plus consolant pour mon cousin le Duc de Nassau et pour moi que de savoir nos troupes à l'armée qui est confiée au commandement du plus grand capitaine de son tems, et je dois vous manifester le désir que je me rappelle vous avoir exprimé déjà à Vienne, que ce régiment de nouvelle formation puisse être réuni au 2ième, qui se trouve déjà aux Pays-Bas. Cela sera du plus grand intérêt pour notre service, et j'ai prié instamment S. M. le Roi des Pays-Bas de vouloir nous donner cette facilité. D'après les éloges flatteurs, my Lord, que vous avez donné au Général Kruse en me parlant de lui, j'ose espérer aussi que Votre Excellence trouvera juste mon désir qu'il combine sous son commandement nos deux régimens, désir que j'ai également énoncé à S. M. le Roi. J'espère, my Lord, que vous verrez dans la promptitude que nous mettons à l'équipement de ce nouveau régiment une preuve de notre zèle pour la bonne cause, et en même temps que vous voudrez honorer nos troupes de votre bienveillance. Je fais bien des vœux pour la conservation des jours précieux de Votre Excellence, c'est en faire pour la réussite d'une guerre où il s'agit de la conservation des trônes et du repos de l'Europe, et je la prie d'agréer l'assurance de la plus haute considération et du dévouement parfait avec lequel j'ai l'honneur d'être, my Lord,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

FRÉDÉRIC DE NASSAU.

Ghent, le 24 Avril, 1815.

Esprit Public.

Les habitans des départemens mentionnés ci-dessus, et des ports du 1er. arrondissement maritime, sont généralement prononcés d'une manière non équivoque pour S. M. Louis XVIII.

Toutes les classes des bourgeois de Lille (ville plus particulièrement connu de l'officier qui fait le rapport) sont décidés à faire tous les sacrifices d'hommes et d'argent pour le gouvernement Royal, et à refuser tout pour aider Napoléon Buonaparte dans ses projets d'usurpation et d'envahissement.

Ceux des villes de Douai, Arras, Dunkerque, Calais, Boulogne, et de St. Valery (Somme) sont excellents.

La majeure partie des habitans de Valenciennes est bonne ; le peuple y est mauvais : on peut compter sur les villes de Maubeuge, Quesnoy, Avesnes, Landrecies, Cambrai, Guise, et Laon ; St. Quentin est mauvais en général ; Vervins, Vierzon, Aubenton, passables ; moitié des bourgeois de Soissons et Château-Thierry sont sincèrement dévoués au Roi ; l'autre moitié ne vaut rien.

Situation approximative des Forces Militaires formant le 1er. Corps, tenant la ligne depuis Philippeville jusqu'à Dunkerque, sous les ordres du Lieut.-Général Comte d'Erlon, et du Lieut.-Général Comte Reille.

Le 1er. corps, tenant la ligne de Gravelines jusques vers Charleville, peut être d'environ 50,000 à 55,000 hommes, dont tout au plus un 5me. de cavalerie, assez mal montée, et d'un médiocre train d'artillerie, mal équipé jusqu'à présent, et ainsi réparti, savoir :

Le 17me. de ligne et le 13me. légère occupent Dunkerque, Gravelines, Cassel, Bergues, et Hazebrouk.

Les 3me. et 4me. lanciers, le 3me. chasseurs à cheval, et le 7me. hussards sont cantonnés le long de la ligne, depuis Dunkerque jusqu'à Lille.

La garnison de Lille est composée du 19me., 21me., et 47me. de ligne, et des dépôts du 13me. légère, 17me. de ligne et du 12me. cuirassiers, faisant ensemble environ 5000 hommes ; plus une compagnie d'artillerie.

A Douai il y a environ 3500 à 4000 hommes au plus, y compris 150 chevaux du 12me. cuirassiers, que ce régiment a de disponible, et le dépôt du 1er. escadron d'artillerie légère.

La garnison de Valenciennes est d'environ 4000 hommes.

Celle de Cambrai de 2000 à 2500.

Celle de Landrecies d'environ 700 à 800 (un bataillon).

Le Quesnoy, environ 1000 à 1200 hommes.

Maubeuge, environ 1000 à 1200 hommes.

Avesnes, environ 1000 à 1200 hommes.

Les troupes de toute arme cantonnées depuis Orchiès jusqu'à Philippeville peuvent bien se monter à 30,000 hommes.

De la Formation des Gardes Nationales et des Militaires rappellés.

Les compagnies devant être formées d'hommes de 20 à 40 ans, destinés à composer les bataillons de grenadiers et chasseurs, pour être mis à la disposition du Ministre de la Guerre, auront beaucoup de difficultés à se compléter ; ceux des Départemens du Nord et du Pas de Calais s'y refusent absolument ; une 50aine. d'hommes se sont trouvés à Arras Jeudi dernier, pour passer la revue du Général commandant le Pas de Calais ; à Lille personne ne s'était encore présenté Vendredi dernier, excepté quelques officiers : le Général Gilibert (en retraite), qui a été nommé commandant de la Garde Nationale de Lille, sédentaire, a refusé d'accepter ; plusieurs autres nommés aux places de capitaine, de chef de bataillon, etc., ont de même refusé ces emplois.

Suivant les renseignemens qui sont parvenus, il en sera à peu près de même dans tous les arrondissemens des Départemens du Nord, de l'Aisne, et du Pas de Calais.

Tous les officiers à la demi solde ou en retraite se sont présentés à l'appel qui en a été faite la semaine dernière : il s'en trouve présentement à Lille 800 à 900, attendant leur destination.

Le même zèle ne s'est point manifesté parmi les sous-officiers et soldats qui, ayant quitté le service, soit par retraite, réforme, congé absolu, limité ou illimité, et ceux en état de désertion, ont également été rappellés ; jusqu'à ce moment très peu se sont présentés, et la gendarmerie n'est pas suffisante pour les y contraindre.

La désertion est assez considérable dans toute l'armée ; dans la seule 16me. division militaire il y a eu plus de 4000 déserteurs depuis un mois : le premier Inspecteur-Général de la Gendarmerie vient de donner un ordre du jour, qui oblige les gendarmes d'arrêter au moins chacun un déserteur chaque mois sous peine d'être punis très sévèrement, et même destitués s'il y a négligence reconnue. L'inspecteur exige un rapport tous les 15 jours à cet égard, afin de s'assurer par lui-même de l'exécution de cet ordre.

Observations Particulières.

D'après le rapport des voyageurs et des lettres particulières et de commerce, il paraît constant que l'esprit public de toute la France est généralement prononcée en faveur du Roi.

On peut aussi croire que les Gardes Nationales prises dans les hommes de 40 à 60 ans éprouveront infiniment d'obstacles et de difficultés à se lever ; l'opinion générale est opposée à cette opération tyrannique, qui met toute la population à la disposition du Ministre de la Guerre ; d'ailleurs il est évident que les armes et le matériel manquent tout-à fait.

Il paraîtrait par ces mêmes renseignemens que les habitans de la Bourgogne, de la Champagne, du Dauphiné, et de la Lorraine ne sont pas aussi généralement dévoués pour le gouvernement Royal que dans les autres parties de la France, et qu'il s'y trouvent des partisans de Napoléon Buonaparte.

Depuis 8 à 10 jours le militaire paraît triste, chancelant ; la majeure partie des officiers supérieurs est toujours exaltée en faveur de Buonaparte ; d'autres semblent réfléchir, et n'osent encore se prononcer. Les sous-officiers surtout sont généralement fort mauvais : le soldat est pour le Roi, ou contre, selon l'impulsion qu'on lui donne.

Les contributions se payent lentement ; aussi la solde ne se paye déjà plus aussi exactement : plusieurs régimens n'ont rien reçu depuis le 1er. de ce mois ; cela inquiète la troupe ; et on a entendu des soldats dire, "Le Roi nous payait pourtant mieux."

L'officier qui fait ce rapport ne croit pas le Général Comte d'Erlon un homme méchant, mais il servira tous les gouvernemens, fera autant de serments qu'on voudra, pourvu qu'il conserve sa place, sa fortune, et sa tranquillité : les Généraux Duhesme et Fauconnet pensent de même.

Les Généraux Excelmans et Cavaignac, commandant chacun une division de cavalerie dans le 1er. corps, sont mauvais : le Général Lapointe paraît bon : le Colonel d'Artillerie Levasseur est vraiment pour le Roi ; on pourrait compter sur lui.

Le Chef de Bataillon Delsalle, commandant la citadelle de Lille, le Colonel du 13me. légère, et le Major La Cour du 12me. cuirassiers sont décidement mauvais : le colonel de ce régiment est un homme faible.

Le colonel du 17me. de ligne est bon : celui du 47me. ne se prononce pas : le major de ce régiment paraît toujours bien disposé pour le Roi.

Les officiers des 3 compagnies de gendarmerie, formant l'escadron de Lille, sont généralement assez bons, à l'exception de deux lieutenants. Le capitaine de la compagnie du Département du Nord est Royaliste ; et la plus grande partie des sous-officiers et gendarmes paraîssait plutôt dévoués au Roi. Il est vraisemblable qu'ils se réuniront tous à la première occasion à l'armée Royale.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, le 24 Avril, 1815.

La lettre que vous m'avez adressée, ainsi que le Mémoire qui y était joint, m'est très bien parvenue, et je m'empresse de vous informer que si je m'empresserai à mettre à exécution la partie qui dépend de moi, je dois cependant aussi porter à votre connaissance quelques objets qui me semblent indispensables pour remplir vos vues, et à l'égard desquels votre assistance ultérieure est nécessaire. Les ouvrages des places respectives ayant été faits par des ingénieurs Anglais, et d'après leurs plans et leurs idées, je désirerai qu'ils puissent être également employés à perfectionner ce qui reste à faire, aussi à mettre Ath en état de défense ; et que de plus il reste dans chaque place au moins pour les premiers tems un ingénieur Anglais, afin de pouvoir d'autant mieux veiller à la défense dans le sens que celle-ci avait été préparé, ainsi donner aux nouveaux commandans et ingénieurs que je serai à même d'envoyer toutes les informations et les renseignemens qui leur peuvent être nécessaires. De plus je désirerai qu'un état des munitions et des approvisionnemens et vivres put être communiqué, pour connaître à quel point ces deux objets sont avancés, quand ils seront complets pour la dotation des places respectives, et combien de tems chacune d'elle sera en état de pouvoir tenir. J'ai de plus voulu vous donner à connaître qu'ayant laissé à mon choix de dépiécer pour le corps mobile des troupes Hanovriennes et des Pays-Bas, ou bien seulement des dernières, il m'a paru préférable d'y destiner une division de l'armée mobile, et de remettre la garde de la ville d'Ypres aux Hanovriens. Dans le choix des commandans j'ai observé ce que vous m'avez témoigné désirer, et vous pourrez voir par la liste ci-jointe que ceux destiné pour Anvers, Ostende, et Nieuport n'ont pas été au service de France. Le nombre de mes troupes employés d'après l'idée du Mémoire se montant à près de 15,000 hommes, et formant par conséquent une partie considérable de celles qui sont pour le présent disponible, j'ai jugé nécessaire d'en donner le commandement à mon fils cadet. Il sera en rapport avec les commandans des places dont les garnisons seront à sa disposition ; et comme je ne peux évaluer que de 7000 hommes les bataillons venant de l'intérieur, la nécessité me force de diminuer l'armée mobile de 7000 à 8000 hommes, à quel effet la 1re. division d'infanterie et la 2de. brigade de cavalerie légère, aussi qu'une batterie d'artillerie et une demi batterie d'artillerie à cheval, viendront sous les ordres de mon fils Frédéric. Il pourra par le fournir la garnison d'Ath, augmenter au besoin celle de Gand, et ce sera ensuite à lui de juger si celles de Tournay et de Mons doivent éprouver augmentation ou diminution, ayant préalablement par-tagé les onze bataillons venant de l'intérieur d'après le tableau ci-joint, par lequel vous pourrez voir, My Lord Duc, les jours de l'arrivée des troupes dans leur nouvelle destination, et par conséquent celui où les garnisons actuelles deviennent disponibles. Le jour où mon fils Frédéric devra se rendre avec les troupes sous ses ordres vers Ath, ou telle autre point que sera jugé convenable pour recevoir son petit corps mobile, dépendra des ordres que vous trouverez bon de donner. Je me flatte que vous serez satisfait de la promptitude avec laquelle je tâche d'effectuer les idées que vous avez bien voulu exprimer, espérant que vous aurez aussi la complaisance de satisfaire à mes demandes pour faciliter tout ce qui concerne les places mêmes. Veuillez accepter l'assurance de ma reconnaissance de la disposition que vous avez pris de laisser 12,000 hommes, de troupes Anglaises et Hanovriennes, pour la défense de ma frontière. J'espère être à même de pouvoir bientôt les remplacer par les levées qui ont lieu actuellement, et de les mettre par-là à même de renforcer l'armée en campagne. Je ne considérerai pas moins toujours cette mesure comme une marque de l'intérêt que vous prenez à la tranquillité de mes états, ainsi qu'une nouvelle preuve de l'amitié du Prince Régent. Recevez l'expression de la haute considération avec laquelle je ne cesserai d'être,

My Lord Duke, votre affectionné

GUILLAUME.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 25th April, 1815.

The man I send to Bavay, Cambrai, &c., just now returns, and reports that the greatest part of the troops in that neighbourhood have marched towards Lille. The 11th regiment, which still was at Bavay and Quesnoy, had orders to march to Arras. The greatest part of the garrison of Valenciennes has also been marched off to the left.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

MEMORANDUM from Sir HUDSON LOWE respecting the Formation of an INTELLIGENCE DEPARTMENT to be attached to the Head-Quarters of the Army.

Bruxelles, 25th April, 1815.

1. An officer belonging or attached to the Quartermaster-General's department to be specifically charged with this duty.

2. He is to have the selection and employment of all spies, the charge of paying them, and the formation of all accounts regarding them, even in cases where the persons may not have been employed by him; the officers who may have been authorised to make any expenditure on such ground sending their accounts to him.

3. All strangers and deserters arriving at the army are to be immediately sent to him, to collect every information that can be gained from them.

4. A report to be made out by him every night of all intelligence received during the day, according to a form annexed, and to be delivered to the Commander of the Forces. This, of course, not to prevent the immediate communication of anything arriving which may be required to be instantly made known to him.

5. A register to be kept of all intelligence thus received and communicated, of the same form as the report.

6. The Assistant Quartermaster-Generals attached to each division of the army, and in particular all officers of the department at the heads of columns, to be instructed to make an early report of all intelligence obtained by them, transmitting the same under cover to the Quartermaster-General, who will deliver it to the officer of the Intelligence Department. The reports of intelligence not to be blended with other matter: they may be put up under the same cover with other communications, with simply the date and the word "Intelligence" marked on the back.

7. Such reports are to be transmitted in ordinary cases by the assistants of divisions to the senior officer of the department attached to the corps in which the division is serving, who will obtain the directions of the General commanding the corps for transmitting them to head-quarters; but where the division is near to the head-quarters of the army, and any time can be gained by communication, the report may be sent direct.

8. All officers in command of advanced parties, whether of cavalry or infantry, to receive instructions to forward deserters and strangers immediately as they arrive without interrogation (except in those cases where an attack may be apprehended) to the officer of the Intelligence Department.

9. All officers so stationed to be further instructed to make their reports of intelligence respecting the enemy distinct from other matter, in order that the same may be transmitted through the regular channel to the Commander of the Forces or the Quartermaster-General for his information, and recorded in the Intelligence Department.

10. A form of questions to be put to all strangers and deserters will be delivered to the officers of the Quartermaster-General's department, and to the officers stationed at the outposts, stating the species of information most necessary to be gained: these questions, however, need not be put where there is an opportunity of sending the men directly to the officer of the Intelligence Department.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Report of Intelligence.

Bruxelles, 31st April, 1815.

Name and Description of Persons.	By whom Sent or Employed.	Intelligence Communicated.

II.

QUESTIONS to be put to all Deserters and Strangers coming from the direction in which the Enemy's Army may be operating.

1. If a deserter: To what corps belonging? Strength of the corps? Commander of it? Place where his regiment is stationed?

2. Of what brigade it forms a part? Commander of the brigade? How many regiments and battalions in the brigade (careful to distinguish between regiments and battalions, as also between brigades and divisions)? How many pieces of artillery, what calibre? Place where the brigade is stationed?

N.B. A French regiment consists of four battalions, of which three are presumed effective and one in depôt; a regiment of cavalry consists of four squadrons effective and one in depôt. Three regiments form a brigade or division.

3. To what corps d'armée the brigade or division belongs? Name of the General who commands the corps? Chief of his staff? How many brigades in the corps? How many regiments of cavalry? How much artillery? Who commands the cavalry? Who commands the artillery? Place where the corps d'armée is stationed?

4. Whether well or ill supplied with provisions and forage? Whether the soldiers are paid well? If desertion prevails, and to what extent?

5. The names, if possible, of all the General officers serving in the corps d'armée, and the brigades to which they may belong?

6. Of how many corps d'armée the whole army is composed, and the names of the Marshals or other officers who command them?

7. The name of the officer who commands the advanced guard? How it is posted and of what it consists, specifying infantry, cavalry, and artillery?

8. Whether he knows of magazines of artillery or provisions being collected in any spot near to where the army is stationed? Whether the army has received or is expecting reinforcements of any kind? Whether any troops of late have left it? Whether any detachments are gone from the army, and where to?

Other questions must result from local circumstances, but none of the above, which are essential for points of military information, should be omitted.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 25th April, 1815.

I have had a conversation both with Prince Schwarzenberg and General Langenau, chief of the Austrian Staff; and as I think their sentiments with regard to the operations of the campaign cannot but be important for you to be acquainted with at the earliest possible period, I have urged the Field Marshal to write to you himself on the subject, which he will do by the present conveyance. By opening early a confidential and friendly communication I consider much good can result, and I need not add how anxious I shall be to be aiding the general interests in any manner that is pointed out to me.

The last news from Italy I herewith enclose.

General Frimont's further plan, as far as I can learn, is to have Murat followed on his retreat to Ancona by General Neipperg, whose advanced corps consists of not more than 10,000 men, while a corps of 60,000 is to march under Bianchi to Foligno, thus placing a considerable force between Murat and Naples, and giving the chance of annihilating the Neapolitan corps retiring from Florence by being before it. They are sanguine here that these measures will succeed. At the same time General Frimont is moving the remainder of his army as fast as possible into Piedmont. They assure me his troops, by means of carriages for their packs and an allowance of wine which is never given to the Austrians in ordinary cases, march 12 leagues a day; and it is declared that General Frimont will have upon the Sesia in Piedmont, before the 1st of June, 60,000 men. I have much faith in the exertions and interior arrangements of the Austrian military establishments, and I think you will find they will not disappoint the expectations they thus create.

I should not conceal from you the great disappointment that is expressed both at the non-arrival of naval force in the Mediterranean, and the disinclination that appears to exist on the part of our military commanders in Italy and Sicily to aid the termination of a campaign which would give us immense facilities in our operations in France.

A Sicilian force going to Naples, aided by ever so small a number of British troops, might create a universal spirit there, as the Austrians mean to declare Ferdinand; and I cannot believe such an expedition, however small, would be too much risk for the advantage it might possibly produce.

I have letters from Canning, from Switzerland, in which he strongly urges me to persuade Prince Schwarzenberg to send a corps of Wurtembergois or Badois into the Brisgau to connect themselves with the Swiss troops, who alone will not do much. The point of Switzerland is so vital that I am convinced the Field Marshal will not neglect it. However, I have written Canning's representations to him as well worthy his attention, as they are forwarded by a sensible, well-informed individual on the spot.

Ever, my dear Lord, yours most sincerely,

STEWART.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Vienna, 23rd April, 1815.

The commanding officer of the Italian army gives the following report up to the 18th :—

The enemy had retired on all sides towards Bologna, and began to fortify his position along the banks of the Panaro. This gave me hopes of his having determined to give me battle near Bologna; but on the first attempt that I directed Field Marshal Bianchi to make on the 14th to pass the Panaro, the enemy abandoned that river on the ensuing night, and evacuated Bologna on the 16th.

Field Marshal Bianchi advanced on the 15th from Modena to Samogia, and on the 16th to Bologna.

General Seintzer came upon the right wing of the enemy along the base of the Apennines, and General Steffanini, over Finale and Cento, on his left. There were small affairs with the rearguard on all sides, in which the enemy lost a number of prisoners from the celerity of his retreat.

The affair of the greatest consequence took place near Castelfranco. The enemy's rearguard was still in retreat on the 16th, as far as Imola. On the road thither Colonel Guvenda was so fortunate, in a heavy charge of cavalry, as to take some hundred prisoners, nor was the enemy's loss inconsiderable in killed and wounded. The column of the enemy which had marched against General Nugent retreated also with the greatest precipitation. This General entered Florence on the 15th.

Lieut.-Gen. Baron Decken to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Brussels, 25th April, 1815.

I take the liberty to lay before your Grace a translation of two letters which I have received to-day from the Duke of Cambridge, relative to the recruiting of the King's German Legion.

I am, my Lord Duke, with the greatest respect,

Your Grace's most obedient and very humble servant,

F. DECKEN.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

The Duke of Cambridge to Lieut.-Gen. Baron Decken.

Hanover, 21st April, 1815.

In case your proposal respecting the recruiting of the infantry of the Legion should not be approved of on account of its uncertainty, and because it is not consistent with the plan of Count Münster, which his Grace the Duke of Wellington will perhaps have communicated to you, there appears to me no other way but to complete the eight battalions of the Legion by means of drafting the Hanoverian field battalions for that purpose, which will produce about 5000 men.

I have had a communication with the Hanoverian Ministers on that subject, and we are of opinion:

Firstly, if Hanover furnishes 5000 men to complete the infantry of the Legion; and secondly, permits the recruiting of the cavalry and the artillery of the Legion from amongst natives of Hanover; and thirdly, permits the establishment of recruiting depôts for the infantry in that country, it will be impossible to make good the want of men there unless Great Britain accedes to the following conditions:

1. That Hanover is to consider henceforth the Legion as a Hanoverian corps, which Great Britain cannot send (without the consent of Hanover) beyond the sea, and which is to be returned to Hanover six months after the conclusion of a definitive treaty of peace, together with the horses, arms, artillery, &c. &c., now in possession of the Legion.

2. Hanover giving 5000 men from the 15,000 Hanoverians now in British subsidy, for the purpose of completing the Legion, it will not be possible to send 5000 other men to complete the 15,000; but these 5000 men given to the Legion are considered to form a part of the 15,000, and Great Britain is to be compelled to pay to Hanover the same amount of subsidies, viz. 50,000*l.* per month, although the Hanoverian corps will remain 10,000 men only.

In case Great Britain should refuse to pay the full amount of that subsidy after 5000 men have been drafted, it must be observed that Hanover could not suffer to lose one-third of that subsidy, because it would have to provide for the Staff, the officers, and non-commissioned officers of the reduced field battalions.

England would profit by this arrangement the expense for recruiting the Legion; and it is therefore to be expected that if England will deduct any part of the subsidies, that deduction will not exceed 4000*l.* per month.

ADOLPHUS FREDERICK.

II.

The Duke of Cambridge to Lieut.-Gen. Baron Decken.

Hanover, 21st April, 1815.

I have received your proposals respecting the recruiting of the Legion, and have informed Mr. Best in London that the Hanoverian government has given its consent to permit the cavalry and artillery to enlist natives of Hanover, and the infantry to establish depôts at Bremerlehe and Offerndorf, for the purpose of forwarding foreign recruits to England, under conditions that no natives of Hanover are enlisted, and that the other Powers do not call upon Hanover to put a period to the recruiting.

I am of opinion that the depôts of the cavalry should be established not in Hanover, but in England, on account of the want of horses in Germany. The recruits can more easily join their regiments if the depôts are in England.

ADOLPHUS FREDERICK.

Correspondant B. à Son Excellence Monseigneur le Feld Maréchal Duc de Wellington.

NOUVELLES de Paris, du 22 Avril.

Bruxelles, le 25 Avril, 1815, à 11 heures du soir.

Sur le Gouvernement de Buonaparte.

Il est difficile de s'imaginer l'activité que met le gouvernement de Buonaparte à organiser une nombreuse armée. Tous les raffinemens d'administration, toutes les ressources que peuvent offrir un état presque délabré et des finances épuisées; en un mot, tous les calculs d'économie politique qui avaient autrefois formé l'une des principales bases sur lesquelles reposait la puissance de Buonaparte, sont mis en mouvement avec une vigueur redoublée. C'est par ces moyens extraordinaires qu'il cherche dans sa position actuelle à étayer un pouvoir qui disparaîtrait au moment où la nullité en serait démontrée au peuple Français.

Entre les ressorts multipliés qu'on fait agir aujourd'hui en France, il en est deux puissans, qui sont, la constitution dont Buonaparte berce le peuple, et le prétendu changement opéré dans son caractère. Comme il a toujours aimé à passer pour un homme extraordinaire, ses partisans s'efforcent encore en cette occasion de prêter à son génie quelque chose de merveilleux; tandis que dans toutes ses actions on voit évidemment ses craintes et sa défiance envers la nation, présages sûrs de l'avenir qui l'attend. Cependant, il ne neglige rien de tout ce qui lui est suggéré par les hommes qui ont opéré son retour, et dont le salut est désormais inséparable du sort de Buonaparte. Carnot, Fouché, Caulaincourt, Savary, Maret, Cambacérès, Regnaud, Ney, Suchet, sans nommer une quantité d'autres personnes de rang inférieur, sont les principaux instrumens de Buonaparte. Ces hommes, en variant à l'infini les ressources et le pouvoir que Buonaparte leur laisse, étendent à l'infini les branches qui toutes sortent de la même souche. C'est ainsi que Carnot travaille l'intérieur, qu'Eckmühl façonne l'esprit de l'armée, où ils entretient des agens qui répandent des nouvelles propres à former la morale du soldat. C'est ainsi que Maret, Caulaincourt, Savary, et Fouché envoient des agens dans toutes les parties de l'Europe, pour y épier la disposition des cabinets, et pour y déployer toutes les intrigues dignes du machiavelisme de Buonaparte. J'ose appeler sur ce point l'attention de Son Excellence. Il y a beaucoup de personnes qui avaient suivi le Roi, et qui retournent successivement en France. Ces personnes, pour faire leur cour aux nouveaux gouvernans, ne manquent jamais de les informer de tout ce qui peut les intéresser. J'ai vu même, les jours derniers, arriver de Bruxelles un officier Français déguisé en bourgeois; je l'avais vu quelque tems auparavant à Paris, en uniforme et avec la croix de la Légion d'Honneur. Cet officier se rendait en hâte à Paris. Je crois à propos de remarquer ici à Son Excellence que M. Lavalette, directeur-général des postes, a donné ordre à tous les bureaux de postes, sur les différens points de la France, d'arrêter tous les journaux étrangers, et de ne pas répondre aux abonnés qui les reclameraient; de sorte que le gouvernement est le seul qui les reçoit, et qui en fait extraire ce qui convient à ses intérêts; tandis que la vérité est cachée au public. Aussi son ignorance est-elle entière sur ce qui se passe à l'extérieur; et il est par conséquent aisé de lui faire accroire tout ce que le gouvernement juge à propos de lui communiquer. Toutes ces précautions, cependant, n'empêchent pas de manifester de tems en tems le mécontentement qui règne dans la capitale. On y a arrêté un grand nombre de personnes qui, usant de la prétendue liberté d'opinion, ont osé hautement la manifester. On a aussi arrêté plusieurs militaires.

Esprit de l'Armée et des Habitans.

Je ne dissimulerai point à Son Excellence que si l'enthousiasme dans l'armée est au-dessous de toute expression, une apathie complète règne dans le peuple. Il est aisé d'assigner la raison de l'enthousiasme du soldat. D'abord, oubliant son ancien orgueil et son despotisme, Buonaparte se montre aujourd'hui comme simple général, comme père du soldat; loin de souffrir ces épargnes minutieuses que le gouvernement de Louis XVIII. a fait exercer au détriment de tant de milliers d'officiers, la plupart sans fortune, Buonaparte les a mis à même de reconnaître un bienfait qu'ils ne pouvaient plus attendre du Roi. Ensuite, il a confirmé presque toutes les promotions dans l'armée, et autorisé les décorations de la Légion d'Honneur qui avaient été accordées par le Roi.

Mais il y a en outre d'autres motifs qui animent l'armée. Le gouvernement fait répandre dans toute la France que l'Autriche ne fera pas la guerre à Buonaparte; que l'armée Napolitaine est victorieuse; que les Puissances Alliées ne sont pas d'accord entre elles; que l'Angleterre est la première à entrer en négociation avec lui; enfin, mille semblables mensonges. Il a été établi à cet effet un véritable atelier de fabrication de nouvelles, dirigé par un membre de l'Institut, créature du Général Savary, et autrefois secrétaire de Maret. C'est là où l'on fabrique des lettres de Vienne, Venise, Bruxelles, &c.; et comme la liberté de la presse n'existe que nominativement, mais que le peuple dans les provinces croit véritablement exister, on ajoute une foi implicite à tout ce qui est débité dans ces feuilles mensongères. De là vient que l'armée Française ne croit point qu'on fera la guerre à Buonaparte, qu'elle regarde déjà comme fermement rassis sur le trône, et qu'elle fait des paris pour la paix.

L'esprit dans le peuple Français est bien différent de celui de l'armée. La capitale en présente un exemple frappant; l'inquiétude et la tristesse sont peintes sur tous les visages. Le commerce est dans une entière stagnation; les impositions sont demandées avec sévérité. La circulation de l'argent est gênée; la solde de l'armée ne se paye que par des à-comptes; et les fournisseurs ne couvrent que difficilement les avances qu'ils sont obligés de faire.

Forces Armées.

On estime qu'avec tout ce qui a pu rentrer jusqu'à présent dans l'armée active, soldats en congé limité ou illimité, ou prisonniers de guerre, Buonaparte peut avoir une armée de 250 mille hommes; mais il rencontre la plus grande difficulté à former une cavalerie, qui dans ce moment n'excède pas vingt mille hommes. Cependant, comme ses conseillers ne manquent jamais de quelqu'expédient, ils lui ont suggéré le moyen suivant :—Les préfets, les commandans de départemens, les maires, &c., ont reçu des instructions pour disposer la gendarmerie dans les départemens à offrir leurs chevaux à Buonaparte, ce qu'elle fit en effet, bon gré mal gré; et l'on compte qu'il a acquis de cette manière, tout-à-coup, vingt mille chevaux dressés, qu'il a promis de rembourser après les affaires arrangées. Depuis ce don volontaire personne ne doute en France qu'il ne fasse de même avec les propriétaires pour les chevaux de trait, dont il a un grand besoin.

Les forces Françaises sur la ligne qui avoisine la Belgique sont évaluées par les officiers de la garnison de Valenciennes à 80 mille hommes; mais après les données que j'ai eues des fournisseurs on peut les estimer à 60 mille. Le Général d'Erlon, qui commande, à Lille et aux environs, le 1er. corps d'armée d'observation, a trois lieutenants-généraux sous ses ordres, dont l'un est le Général Donzelot. La garnison de Lille est forte de huit mille hommes; la place est bien armée et bien approvisionnée.

Le Général Reille commande le 2e. corps d'armée d'observation, et a son quartier-général à Valenciennes; il a également trois lieutenants-généraux sous ses ordres, dont l'un est le Général Barrois, et l'autre Excelmans: ce dernier commande la cavalerie, composée de trois régimens, savoir, les chasseurs du Duc de Berri, le 6e. de lanciers, et le 7e. de houssards.

Le 1er. régiment d'infanterie de ligne, ou régiment du Roi, le 29e. de ligne, le 2e. d'infanterie légère, et un fort détachement du 7e. de houssards forment la garnison de Valenciennes, qui, comme place de guerre de seconde classe, est bien armée et bien approvisionnée.

Je dois finalement ajouter que l'état actuel de la France ressemble parfaitement à celui de 1792; que si Buonaparte remportait des avantages, il chercherait à soulever les peuples voisins; que les officiers font déjà entendre qu'il faudrait faire la guerre aux Souverains, et offrir aux peuples une constitution libérale; qu'enfin le moment était arrivé de réaliser ce que le peuple Français voulut effectuer en 1792. Aussi cherche-t-on à nationaliser la guerre, à enflammer les esprits, afin d'obtenir les mêmes résultats. Mais quant au peuple Français, il paraît entièrement revenu de ce vertige; et tout le monde est d'avis, que malgré l'appel pompeux de deux millions de gardes nationaux, il ne marchera aucun citoyen hors de son département, à moins d'être forcé par la baïonnette. La garde nationale Parisienne déclare d'avance ce sentiment; et Buonaparte a pu voir à la dernière revue de cette garde combien peu il doit compter sur ses services. Les journaux avaient annoncé que les douze légions avaient défilé pendant deux heures; mais le fait est qu'il n'y avait qu'à peu près 6000 hommes présens sous les armes, ce qui fait bien les cadres des douze légions Parisiennes. Il est à remarquer que les employés du gouvernement, qui sont presque tous membres de la garde nationale, ne s'étaient point présentés le jour de la revue.

Je prends la liberté d'observer finalement à Son Excellence que plus on laisse de tems à Buonaparte plus le peuple Français et l'armée se persuadent que les Puissances Alliées sont prêtes à le reconnaître ou qu'elles le craignent; et voilà ce que disent déjà les officiers. Il est certain qu'à la première déclaration des hautes Puissances lancée contre Buonaparte seul, sa cause deviendrait désespérée, et que le courage de ceux qui haïssent son gouvernement sera aussitôt relevé pour opérer peut-être d'une manière avantageuse aux vues des Puissances Alliées.

Mais je dois répéter ici de nouveau, d'après tous les renseignemens que j'ai recueillis sur l'opinion publique à l'égard des Bourbons, que cette famille a perdu en France tout son crédit; qu'on n'en veut plus; et que la majorité de la nation préférerait plutôt d'appartenir à l'Angleterre ou à l'Autriche que de rentrer sous la domination de ces princes. J'ai moi-même entendu plus d'une fois exprimer ce sentiment même par des militaires.

B.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Vienna, 26th April, 1815.

I avail myself of a Dutch courier, which they tell me goes in an hour, to tell you that I have been disappointed in my hopes of having matters satisfactorily settled with respect to the service of the Royal Saxon contingent. Hardenberg told me at the last conference that the King could not permit such of the soldiers as came from his part of Saxony to serve otherwise than with his armies; so that this force is not likely, if divided, to be worth much for some time. I have entered the paper sent you in my last on the protocol, which is all that can be done by me.

I know not how far it would be prudent, but I am sure it would serve them right, if we should refuse to receive any part of these picked and culled remains of the Royal Saxon corps, whose organisation and efficiency in discipline as well as composition cannot but materially suffer by the proposed operation, into the line of our army; and if we were to replace their numbers by Portuguese or Danish troops, paying the whole expense of these from the subsidies, otherwise assignable to Prussia, who would thereby be little tempted to make similar experiments in future. Unfortunately, however, their co-operation is essential to us; and although the means are in our own hands, and that there would be no denying the justice of the act, it may not be very politic to put it into execution.

Yours, my dear Duke, most sincerely,

CLANCARTY.

P.S.—Hardenberg says that in the whole you will ultimately have 12,000 of Royal Saxon troops, but these will be new levies!

COMMUNICATION d'un Compte rendu à S.E. le Duc de FELTRE sur la Situation et la Force du 1er Corps d'Armée de BUONAPARTE, à transmettre à S.E. M. le Duc de WELLINGTON.

Gand, le 27 Avril, 1815, à 11 heures du soir.

Il résulte du rapport fait à M. le Duc de Feltre par un officier supérieur venu de Lille, et sur l'exactitude du quel on peut compter, qu'en effet le 1er. Corps d'Armée, commandée par le Comte d'Erlon, était de quatre divisions d'infanterie, et de deux divisions de cavalerie. Il occupe les places et tout l'espace depuis Lille jusqu'à Dunkerque.

La 1ere. division, la 2me., et la 3me. sont composées de quatre régiments d'infanterie chacune ; la 4me. division n'a que trois régiments ; chaque régiment n'a que 1000 hommes d'infanterie : cela fait donc 15,000 hommes.

La 1ère. division est, à ce que l'on croit, sous le commandement du Lieut.-Général Alix, homme très hardi et habile à manier son artillerie, car il a servi dans cette arme ; du reste, c'est un homme dont la tête est volcanisée, et d'un caractère violent.

La 2me. division commandée par le Lieut.-Général Donzelot, qui n'était point encore arrivé à Lille le 25. Cette division, comme la précédente, est partagée en deux brigades ; la 1ère., composée du 17me. de ligne et du 13me. d'infanterie légère, est sous le commandement du Mal.-de-camp Schmitz, qui est un Illyrien, et dont la bravoure passe pour être un peu équivoque. Le 17me. de ligne occupait le 25 du courant Armentières et Bailleul ; le 13me. léger occupait Cassel et Steinworde. Le Lieut.-Général Donzelot, qui a été successivement en Egypte et à Corfou, n'est pas entreprenant à la guerre : c'est un homme de bureau. La 2me. brigade est composée du 19me. et 47me. régiments de ligne, qui étaient le 25 du courant à Lille.

La 3me. division est, à ce qu'on croit, commandée par le Lieut.-Général Marcognet, ancien gentilhomme, grand joueur, et adonné à la boisson ; ses talents sont médiocres ; on le croit disposé favorablement pour le Roi.

La 4me. division est commandée par le Lieut.-Général Durutte, qui était à Arras le 25 ; on vient d'ôter ce général de Metz. Buonaparte et le Prince d'Eckmühl se défient de lui : il est en effet porté pour le Roi.

Les régiments qui composent la 1ère., 3me., et 4me. divisions sont tous de ligne ; on ignore leur classement dans chacune de ces divisions, mais voici leurs numéros : les 8me., 21me., 25me., 28me., 29me., 42me., 43me., 45me., et 51me., qui est à Dunkerque : quant au dernier des 15 régiments, c'est ou le 79me. ou 86me.

Les deux divisions de cavalerie sont de trois régiments chacun. On croit cependant que l'une de ces divisions est de quatre régiments : chacun d'eux est tout au plus de 300 hommes. Les Lieut.-Généraux qui devaient commander ces divisions n'étaient pas arrivés le 25 : le 3me. régiment de chasseurs, qui était à Lille et à Bailleul le 25, est l'un des plus forts de cette division. Il s'y trouve le 3me. et le 4me. régiments de lanciers : le 3me. était le 25 à Wormhout : on n'est cependant pas certain que le 4me. régiment soit resté dans cette division, et qu'il n'ait pas été dirigé vers Valenciennes ou Maubeuge.

Le 6me. régiment d'artillerie à pied a deux compagnies à Lille : elles sont de 50 hommes chacune. Les 18 autres compagnies du régiment doivent être à Dunkerque, Gravelines, Douai, Arras, et dans les autres places de Flandre. Il y a à Lille un escadron du 1er. régiment d'artillerie à cheval.

Le 1er. régiment de dragons a passé à Lille il y a 7 ou 8 jours: il n'avait que 300 chevaux.

Le 12me. régiment de cuirassiers est, dit-on, du côté de Douai; il n'avait que 200 chevaux Flamands très mauvais. On croit les 66me. et 77me. régiments de ligne à Valenciennes.

Maubeuge était occupé il y a deux ou trois jours par le 89me. régiment d'infanterie, très disposé pour Buonaparte, et par le 62me., qui est assez porté pour le Roi. Il n'y avait que 31 canons sur les remparts, dont quelques uns sans affûts.

Le régiment qui est à Avesnes est dans d'assez bonnes dispositions pour le Roi. On dit que le 4me. régiment de cuirassiers vient en Flandre: ce corps et son colonel, M. Dujon, sont bien disposés pour le Roi. Le 5me. de chasseurs, qui est, soit dans les environs de Lille, soit dans les environs de Valenciennes, est, dit-on, dans un fort mauvais esprit.

Ces renseignemens, quoique imparfaits, méritent confiance, parcequ'ils viennent de bonne source. M. le Duc de Feltre s'empresse en conséquence de les communiquer à S.E. M. le Duc de Wellington, et désire que son Excellence les trouve de quelque utilité.

To Earl Bathurst. [866.]

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 28th April, 1815.

I enclose you a return of the Dutch army which I went with the King to see on Tuesday and Wednesday. The Nassau troops are excellent; and the Dutch militia are a very good body of men, although young. The Belgians young, and some very small. The cavalry remarkably well mounted, but don't ride very well. The whole well clothed and equipped for service; and, as far as I could judge from what I saw of their movements, well disciplined.

They are completely officered by officers who have been in the French service. It was an extraordinary circumstance that the only corps which cried "Vive le Roi!" were the Belgians, which appears in these good days to be the common cry of treason.

You will see in my despatch of this date the arrangement which I have made with the King for the defence of this country in case the armies should move forward. I have had the greatest difficulty in making this and indeed every other arrangement with him. With professions in his mouth of a desire to do everything I can suggest, he objects to everything I propose; it then comes to be a matter of negotiation for a week, and at last is settled by my desiring him to arrange it as he pleases, and telling him that I will have nothing to say to him.

In consequence of the arrangement for the defence of his country he will take away from the operating army about 7000 or 8000 men, which he proposes to place under the command of Prince Frederick, a very fine lad of eighteen years old. He then intends, as I understand, that all the remainder should be under the Prince of Orange, notwithstanding the remonstrances I before made with the Prince's consent against this arrangement, as placing in too great a mass all the youth and treason of the army.

He has given me no command over his army, and everything is a matter of negotiation, first with his son and then with himself; and although he is, I believe, a well-meaning man, he is the most difficult person to deal with I have ever met.

He is surrounded by persons who have been in the French service. It is very well to employ them, but I would not trust one of them out of my sight, and so I have told him. They manifest the greatest anxiety to get us out of Antwerp and Ostend; but unless I am ordered to evacuate those places, I shall not quit them. You'll see what has passed between the King and me about having English governors in those places: I don't know anything of the persons he has named to those situations.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

[867.] To the Right Hon. Sir Henry Wellesley.

MY DEAR HENRY, Bruxelles, 28th April, 1815.

You will have heard that I arrived here on the 4th, and have taken the command of the army in this country, where I have been ever since making my arrangements and preparations for the campaign. We have here now, including Dutch, about 60,000, and we are in close communication with the Prussians on our left. They promise me more men from England; but it appears to me as if they were afraid there to touch the question of war, and they have most unaccountably delayed all their warlike preparations. The consequence is that the peace opinions are gaining ground fast; and I agree with you in thinking that if we only leave Buonaparte alone, we shall have him more powerful than ever in a short time.

I have not heard from Vienna for some days. When I left that place, and when I last heard, the opinions were unanimous for attacking Buonaparte and pushing the war vigorously; and the preparations are certainly immense. According to all accounts there will not be fewer than 800,000 on the Rhine and on this side in the course of a fortnight. I think, however, that people are a little cool both at Vienna and in England in respect to the Bourbons. The Jacobin faction at Paris wish to see the Duc d'Orléans or somebody else at the head of affairs; in short, they wish to take a middle term between Buonaparte and the Bourbons, to which I am afraid the Emperor of Russia principally will not feel great objections. But if we are stout we shall save the King, whose government affords the only chance of peace.

As usual, our government won't speak out; probably they can't. But I hope their conduct will, at least, save us from the establishment of a government of war in France.

You may depend upon my writing to you by every occasion, and letting you know all that passes.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

G. O. Bruxelles, 28th April, 1815. [868.]

3. Lieutenant-General the Earl of Uxbridge is placed on the Staff of this army from the 15th instant.

4. Lieutenant-General the Earl of Uxbridge is to command the cavalry of the army.

WELLINGTON.

Colonel Chapman to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY DEAR LORD, Office of Ordnance, 28th April, 1815.

I have had the pleasure of your letter of the 22nd instant.

Respecting Sir Charles Smith, I am afraid there will be great difficulty in sending him out; but on this subject I will again write to you.

You may be assured that every endeavour will be made to meet the Duke of Wellington's wishes respecting the Ordnance branch of the service. We have sent out our Chief Commissary Stace, a most active and intelligent officer. Lord Mulgrave transmitted a short time ago a memorandum of particulars relative to what is doing by this department, since which Lieutenant-Colonel Webber Smith's troop of Horse Artillery has marched for, and I hope sailed from, Ramsgate. Major Bull's troop of Horse Artillery is also under orders; and I hope we shall be able to manage with horses and drivers (for here is the difficulty) to send out another troop, which will complete the Duke's number of troops of Horse Artillery.

The two companies of Sappers and Miners will, I trust, soon be at their destination. We find (or rather the Transport Board) a difficulty in getting vessels proper for receiving pontoons; but as I was at Woolwich on Tuesday last to spur the embarkation of all sorts of stores with every possible despatch, I hope there will no longer be a want of shipping to convey them over.

Lord Mulgrave has ordered every exertion to be made, and independent of doing my duty well, I am anxious to anticipate the several demands (and have done so in many instances) as much as possible. You may therefore rest assured that the utmost will be done to forward the service for the Netherlands.

I remain, my dear Lord, very faithfully yours,

S. R. CHAPMAN.

Marshal Lord Beresford to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Lisbon, 28th April, 1815.

I had expected when I last wrote to you to have had an opportunity by the following day to have communicated what more I should be able to learn on the subject of the Portuguese troops joining you in Flanders; but the packets are here very irregular, and none has since sailed.

I went to the Regency the same day I concluded my letter, and as far as concerned the measures I proposed relative to the army here I had no difficulty, and my opinions have again all the weight I could desire. We are, therefore, proceeding to get the regiments together, and that done, I shall immediately assemble in corps twelve regiments of the line, six of Caçadores, six companies of Artillery for three brigades of that arm, and the drivers, &c. As the regiments are now placed at 1000 rank and file establishment, this force will somewhat exceed 15,000 men, and I have told Mr. Canning that I think it may be embarked in a month. The northern and southern regiments have, after getting together their men on leave, to make long marches to the place of embarkation, which must be here.

It was only yesterday that the instructions from the government on this subject arrived to Mr. Canning, and he has not yet been able to make the formal official communication respecting it to this government. He has, however, since the arrival of your letter of the 24th ultimo to me, had much conversation with Forjaz on the proposal, and he is very far from sanguine in being able to persuade his government to send troops to Flanders. The subject was broached the day I was at the Regency, and a strong sentiment appeared to prevail against the measure, and nothing was omitted by the Principal, Souza, to induce me to give an opinion agreeing with his; but he did not succeed. Forjaz said little, but was obviously averse to the measure; the Marquis of Borba was silent both in words and actions; but the Principal was violent in his opposition. Mr. Canning yesterday saw Dom Miguel (before the packet arrived), and the latter was then decidedly against it. What effect the payment of the 11*l.* per man and the furnishing of provisions, with transport there and back free of cost, may have, I really know not, but would hope these aids would have great effect. I have myself with the present governors, as I have communicated to you, no personal influence; and indeed I saw the best thing I could do was to leave this entirely in Mr. Canning's hands, and limit myself to urge the governors and do what else depended upon me to get their army ready for what might be determined on. By the next packet we shall know and I will communicate to you their decision. I had hoped the prospect of getting rid of me for at least some time would have had some effect in influencing the determination for Flanders. It would certainly be more agreeable to me to join you than act with allies in whom we can place no confidence as soldiers, and still more than to be left out altogether.

Believe me yours most sincerely,

BERESFORD.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 28th April, 1815.

You will have received my despatch, No. 42, to Lord Castlereagh, under flying seal. I detailed at that time the opinions of the Austrian military authorities as far as I was able to collect them in conversation, and I have been using my best endeavours to induce them to open all their views as to their future operations in an unreserved and confidential manner to you. I hope I shall be able, before I despatch this messenger, to send you Prince Schwarzenberg's plan in writing. I have sedulously applied in the same manner to my friends the Prussians; and General Knesebeck, who was flattered by the confidence you showed him here, has placed in my hand two Mémoires, which contain proposals for our future operations.

The paper marked No. 1 was written and given to the Emperor of Russia on the receipt of your proposition for commencing offensive operations immediately, but before the arrival of your plan. I have reason to believe this paper very much influenced the Emperor of Russia in the line he took in the military conference of opposing the instantaneous attempt upon Paris. There is no doubt that General Knesebeck, both from his counsels during the last campaign and the general estimation in which he is held, has great influence both with the Emperor and the King, and I am persuaded his most anxious desire at present is to have a perfect understanding with you. You know there is a strong party in the Prussian army, and Generals Gneisenau and Knesebeck are declared rivals, and are jealous of each other's influence. On the present occasion, however, it appears to me that General Knesebeck is ready to lend himself to counsels which emanate from you, and which he believes will have the approval of those with whom you are acting in the most immediate communication. The Prussians are also anxious to have the glory of Blücher going hand in hand with you in the new campaign, and believe, not without some truth perhaps, that your two armies will be the most efficient and the most greedy for the contest. They prefer thus a projected operation in which you and Blücher would bear ostensibly the most prominent part; and there is no doubt your names united would have a great effect on the morale of the enemy. These considerations may have influenced Knesebeck in the suggestions contained in the enclosed Paper, No. 2. He adopts your outline of the advance on the capital between the Marne and Oise, and he endeavours, by a separate line of action for the army of the Upper Rhine, to obviate the difficulties that would be urged among the Austrian authorities to depart from their favourite views of the conduct of the campaign.

We have certainly considerations at present which did not apply when the Allies last entered France. The possession of Paris now would, according to all ordinary calculation, finish the career of Napoleon, and give us peace: the state of the country and the government strongly leads to this belief. It is therefore of more importance to arrive there rapidly (even although the whole of the enemy's army should not be beaten) than at the former period.

By a letter I have received from Colonel Hardinge, dated 18th from Liège, he thinks General Gneisenau's plan of campaign is to have three armies of 200,000 men each assembled on the Upper Rhine, Lower Rhine, and the Netherlands, with an army of reserve behind the central army.

Reckoning on a great numerical superiority over the enemy, each of these armies the General proposes should move independently upon Paris; each to mind its own base and separate communications. If one be attacked, to act defensively; if beaten, to fall back upon the reserve; the other two armies to move on, and, by preference, to keep four or five days from each other, and to have no mutual dependence or combination till near Paris. Colonel Hardinge adds, there is great simplicity in this plan; but I cannot but augur ill of an idea that declines combination, on which one has been taught to believe every military success depends, and which holds out no remedy for any change of measures which unforeseen events might demand.

I have had since I began this letter a long conversation with Prince Schwarzenberg, and he has promised to send me his ideas in writing in time to go by this courier. I have not as yet read his paper, but from his statement I should think the great fundamental difference between him and Knesebeck is, that the latter proposes to have the largest mass of force in the centre, so as to throw it upon either of the wings, while the former proposes that there should be only two great masses of force: namely, his army on one side, and yours and Blücher's on the other, with a Russian reserve of 100,000 men and light troops between you. Prince Schwarzenberg prefers to be weak in the centre, because from the fortresses in our possession on the Rhine, Mayence, Mannheim, &c., &c., we have a fortified line, through which the enemy would never attempt to pierce, whereas our flanks are assailable, and particularly our right.

The disposition of the Russian army is made, I think, with a view to the Emperor's personal feelings. Prince Schwarzenberg stated his idea was to have 50,000 Russians with him, and to have a similar number with the mass on the right, while the reserve of 100,000 should pass the Rhine at Mayence, and move on the Sarre under Barclay de Tolly. This centre reserve should thus have the credit in the day of battle to move to either flank, and apparently decide the fortune of the day. This idea, and a certain corps of his troops in each quarter, Schwarzenberg said would please the Emperor of Russia. I collected, however, in general from the Marshal that he was unwilling to go into minute particulars of detail until he arrived on the spot, and until the state of our preparations were more advanced. He was anxious to keep all his own army and contingents collected, and talked of his advance on his side on Langres and the sources of the Marne. He seemed alarmed about his means of subsistence, and stated that his own demand was to leave six weeks' rations of rum and biscuit in magazines before he crossed the Rhine; but he had been obliged to reduce this requisition to three weeks; and such was the poverty of the Austrian caisse, that he doubted if he could collect even this supply.

The Prince will leave this in a few days, and will be at Heilbronn the 10th of next month.

General Knesebeck left this yesterday for Berlin in order to be married, which is a little out of season at present. He will be back here by the 20th, and has begged me to charge myself with any communication you may have for him. I suppose about this latter period (or before) we shall all be moving from hence.

I shall feel very happy, my dear Lord, if from the data I have thus collected I have been serviceable in giving you the general military ideas here. I have endeavoured to sum up the arguments used on all sides in support of their own separate plans, without presuming to express any opinions of my own; and I assure you, you may count upon my zeal in anything in which I can be of service, and in forwarding whatever wishes you may form with reference to our boutique here, civil and military.

By a letter from Lord Castlereagh he tells me he shall charge me, as last year, with the military correspondence and duties at the Austrian head-quarters, to which the Emperor has very kindly consented: I shall therefore be always with the Field Marshal. My brother adds, that Mr. Pole thought you would wish to have some military person in your confidence to send to the great head-quarters to communicate the plans of campaign, &c., and that he has requested you to choose for yourself. I can only say that it will be my anxious endeavour to support your views as far as I am acquainted with them; and I hope, from my intimacy with and knowledge of the military persons in the army, I may be in some measure available.

Lord Castlereagh adds that Colonel Upton is to be employed as a reporter, and asks me if I wish for Colonel Hardinge, who, however, has been so advantageously placed by you. Upon these points I conclude I shall have further instructions, and beg you will communicate to me your wishes.

Believe me, my dear Lord, yours ever most sincerely,

STEWART.

The Mémoires have not been seen by the Emperor of Austria or the other Sovereigns.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

CONSIDÉRATIONS sur les OPÉRATIONS MILITAIRES qui pourraient avoir lieu en différentes époques.

Vienne, ce 18 Avril, 1815.

Par les mémoires ci-joints on a tâché de montrer, 1. La nécessité de donner derechef de l'ensemble aux opérations des différentes armées. 2. De bien distinguer les époques, afin de ne pas se tromper sur le calcul des forces de l'ennemi. Essayons maintenant quelques considérations sur ces opérations mêmes.

L'époque où un mouvement isolé et rapide pour le soutien de Paris aurait pu produire un grand résultat paraît être passée. Cette opération n'était bonne qu'aussi longtems que le Roi de France était à Paris, et que Paris se maintenait. La célérité de Buonaparte et la déchéance complette de l'armée Française l'a fait manquer. Une autre question se présente pour le moment:— savoir, Si l'on doit rester passif jusqu'à ce que l'armée Autrichienne sera arrivée sur le Rhin, ou si les opérations doivent commencer avec les forces rassemblées déjà; savoir donc, avec 50,000 hommes qui se trouvent déjà sur le Haut Rhin; 50,000 Prussiens sur la Meuse; 43,000 de l'armée Anglo-Belgique.

Les raisons qui parlent pour une telle offensive à l'instant sont :—

1. De soutenir le parti Royaliste du Midi de la France et de la Vendée avant que Buonaparte parvienne à le supprimer.

2. D'empêcher que Buonaparte ne profite pas de l'intervalle pour consolider son gouvernement, et gagner l'opinion de la nation, comme celle de l'armée s'est déjà prononcée pour lui.

Il n'y a pas de doute que ces deux raisons sont d'une très grande conséquence, mais ceux qui s'y opposent ne sont pas moins fortes.

1. Il faut se demander si l'entrée des armées alliées sur le sol Français n'éveillera pas la nation, et la ralliera autour de Buonaparte au lieu de l'éloigner de lui.

2. Le mémoire (B.) montre que la force disponible de Buonaparte égalera la nôtre jusqu'à la fin de Mai; savoir, qu'il pourra paraître en campagne encore avec 120,000 hommes, après avoir laissé des garnisons dans les places fortes, et des corps pour combattre la Vendée, le Midi, et observer Paris.

A cela il faut compter que les forteresses que les Alliés trouveront à l'instant qu'ils auront passé les frontières de la France, et qu'ils doivent nécessairement bloquer ou assiéger, affoibliront tellement leurs armées que Buonaparte en se concentrant derrière ces forteresses leur sera prépondérant en forces. Si on ajoute à cela que les Alliés, par la situation géographique de la France, manœuvrent sur le circuit du cercle, et que Buonaparte a ses forces concentrées dans le centre, la situation militaire sera si défavorable pour les armées alliées s'ils entrent en France sans forces suffisantes, qu'une telle opération, autant que les raisons alléguées semblent l'exiger, a trop de chances défavorables, qu'elle pourrait être conseillée autrement, que dans le seul cas que la Suisse, en joignant ses forces à celles des Alliés, permettrait un libre passage à l'armée du Haut Rhin, et que cette expédition, qui se dirigerait alors sur Lyon, serait en même tems soutenu directement par la marche des troupes du Roi de Sardaigne sur Grenoble et Chambéry, et indirectement par les manœuvres des armées de Blücher et de Wellington, qui auraient la tâche d'attirer les forces de l'ennemi de leurs côtés, et de les occuper, sans pourtant s'engager autrement à un combat général, qu'a des chances très favorables pour eux.

Sont telles les considérations qui se présentent pour les opérations qui pourraient avoir lieu pour le moment. Ceux de l'avenir semblent devoir être bien distinguées pour les deux époques, marquées dans le mémoire (B.) : savoir, celle au commencement du mois de Mai, ou quatre semaines plus tard.

La première époque demandera beaucoup plus de circonspection pour les mouvemens que la seconde, quoique le plan en général paraît pouvoir rester le même.

Devait-on se décider à ne rien entreprendre pour le moment, mais d'attendre jusqu'à ce qu'on pourra entrer en France en force de toutes parts, il paraît que voici quelles doivent être les lignes fondamentales d'une telle opération.

Battre les armées de Buonaparte, délivrer la nation Française du joug sous lequel elle gémit, tel est le but de la guerre. Tomber sur l'armée Buonapartienne avec tant de forces que possible ; donc, diriger les mouvemens des différentes armées alliées de manière que jamais une d'elles risque d'être accablée séparément, mais au contraire, que plusieurs doivent toutefois se trouver ensemble, et s'il est possible réunis au jour de bataille générale. Voilà le moyen d'atteindre ce but.

Il résulte de cette considération que si pour destituer Buonaparte Paris doit être derechef l'objet que les armées alliées se proposent, ils doivent se trouver sur la même hauteur avant de commencer un mouvement combiné sur cette capitale.

Il semble donc que l'armée de Wellington doit prendre position entre Enghien, Hal, et Genappe, tenant des postes d'observation à Charleroi et sur sa droite jusqu'à Ostende.

Cette armée doit regarder Anvers comme le point duquel ses opérations doivent partir, et où elle doit s'être réservé et préparé un asile, au cas d'une stricte défensive ; enfin Anvers doit être en Hollande pour l'armée Anglaise ce qu'était Lisbonne pour elle en Portugal.

Au cas qu'elle se voit attaquée par des forces supérieures, elle se retire sur cette direction, et y prend position jusqu'à ce que les opérations des autres armées viendront la dégager.

L'armée de Blücher prendra position sur la rive droite de la Meuse, entre Namur, Huy, et l'Ourthe.

Cette armée s'étant éloignée de Mayence, prendra pour le moment Juliers ou Wesel pour place d'armes.

Les circonstances que les capitaines expérimentés de ces deux armées jugeront le mieux sur les lieux leur indiqueront ce qu'il y aura à faire, et on laisse à leur sagesse d'en profiter.

On croit cependant devoir les prévenir que jusqu'au commencement du mois de Juin l'armée du Haut Rhin ne pourra pas être rassemblée, ni passer cette rivière en force.

Le fardeau de la guerre pésera donc, jusques là seul, sur les forces réunies sur la Meuse, et le soutien de l'armée du Haut Rhin devra se borner à des diversions ou vers le Midi de la France ou vers la Lorraine.

Des raisons majeures, comme par exemple la vraisemblance d'une contre-révolution à Paris, ou la certitude que l'ennemi, ayant été dans la nécessité de faire des forts détachemens pour le Midi, ne se trouvera pas en force du côté des Pays-Bas, peuvent donner la possibilité de battre un corps d'armée de l'ennemi, ou de surprendre une des places fortes. Mais si, cependant, ces raisons ne détermineraient pas les deux armées à prendre à l'instant une vive offensive, il paraît que pour le moment leurs opérations doivent se borner à une défensive active, et de se soutenir réciproquement, jusqu'à ce que l'armée du Haut Rhin pourra lier ses opérations aux leurs.

Quand les forces de l'ennemi tomberaient sur l'une de ces armées sans que l'autre serait pressée, celle-ci manœuvrerait en attendant sur le flanc de l'ennemi. Par exemple, quand l'armée de Wellington serait contrainte de se retirer sur Anvers, et l'armée de Blücher pas pressée en même tems, celle-ci s'avancerait sur le flanc de l'ennemi, pour dégager l'armée de Wellington, avec recours de ne pas trop s'éloigner de la Meuse et des points de Namur et de Liège. De même, quand l'armée de Blücher devrait être menacée, l'armée de Wellington passerait la Meuse pour soutenir Blücher. Si l'ennemi se porterait avec toutes ses forces du côté de la Moselle, les deux armées marcheront à la gauche sur Luxembourg, et tâcheront de le couper de ses ressources. En même tems un mouvement semblable se fera du côté de Mannheim sur Trêves par l'armée du Haut Rhin.

Dans cette position les deux armées resteront jusqu'à ce que l'armée du Haut Rhin passera le Rhin. Quand le moment de ce passage sera venu, les armées de Blücher et de Wellington tâcheront de le faciliter par un mouvement offensif de leur côté. L'armée du Haut Rhin continuera en attendant de se rassembler sur les lieux indiqués. Le moment de son passage étant venu, elle se rassemblera vite sur un point, jetera des ponts, et passera cette rivière d'après les circonstances, ou à Bâle ou entre Huningen et Brisac, attirant l'attention de l'ennemi du côté de Spire par un corps qu'elle tiendra de ce côté. Le point d'appui de l'armée du Haut Rhin doit rester derechef la Suisse sans pourtant y passer qu'avec consentement du gouvernement Suisse. Mais comme il est indispensable pour l'armée Autrichienne d'avoir une communication directe par la Suisse avec l'Italie, ainsi qu'il est de la plus haute conséquence, et pour les opérations militaires en général et pour la sûreté de la Suisse elle-même, d'avoir un libre passage par Bâle et Genève, on entamera une négociation avec le gouvernement Suisse pour obtenir une route militaire entre la Souabe et l'Italie, et le passage par les deux points indiqués. La ligne d'opérations de cette armée sera Bâle, Béfort, Langres, Muhlhausen, Epinal.

D'après cette esquisse on verra que les armées alliées ne formeront jusqu'à l'arrivée de l'armée Russe que deux grandes masses, l'une groupée sur la Meuse, l'autre du côté de la Suisse. La situation des circonstances a amenée cette position ; et sans vouloir exposer l'armée de Wellington à un échec, il ne faudra rien y changer. Aussi se pourra-t-il que l'ennemi par là se voit forcé de former de son côté de même deux armées, donc de partager ses forces ; mais s'il ne le fait pas, la trop grande distance entre la Meuse et le Rhin lui donnera l'avantage de manœuvrer longtemps sous la protection de ses forteresses et du Rhin du côté de Strasbourg, pendant qu'il pourra tomber avec prépondérance sur l'armée de la Meuse ; et s'il devrait réussir à la battre, de l'achever entièrement avant qu'elle pourra être soutenue.

Ces considérations n'échapperont pas sans doute aux illustres capitaines qui commandent les deux armées de ce côté-là, et les détermineront à ne rien hasarder. Si l'ennemi vouloit profiter de la lacune qui jusqu'à l'arrivée des Russes se trouve entre l'armée du Haut Rhin et de la Meuse, et se jeter dans cette intervalle, il semble qu'il faut être bien d'accord de se porter sur ses communications de toutes parts. Voilà à ce qu'il paraît la disposition générale jusqu'à l'arrivée des réserves et de l'armée Russe. Si les circonstances n'ont pas changées jusques là, alors un mouvement général pour l'intérieur de la France pourra se faire avec assurance de tous côtés.

En attendant on aura soin de préparer à toutes les armées un train d'artillerie de siége, d'accélérer les marches des troupes en arrière, de les former en corps avant qu'ils passeront le Rhin, et de bien préparer les moyens pour rester pendant toute la guerre toujours au grand complet.

L'armée d'Italie ne peut entrer pour le moment dans ce calcul des opérations, et doit agir séparément jusqu'à ce que peut-être à l'avenir elle pourra lier ses opérations directement à ceux des autres armées.

DE KNESEBECK.

II.

Vienne, le 24 Avril, 1815.

D'après les mémoires successives que le soussigné a eu l'honneur de soumettre aux yeux des illustres Souverains, reste encore à faire l'esquisse de quelle manière qu'il faudra manœuvrer quand le moment sera venu de marcher vers Paris.

La situation de la France présente deux opérations pour atteindre ce but :— L'une les Alliés ont suivi dans la dernière campagne en s'avancant avec leurs plus grandes forces par les routes de Langres et de Dijon ; l'autre peut se faire par la droite en portant les plus grandes forces entre la Marne et l'Oise.

Considérant que les armées de Blücher et de Wellington, partants de Mons et de Namur, n'auront à faire que la moitié de chemin que ceux du Rhin, il paraît qu'il faudra donner la préférence cette fois à la seconde opération.

Si l'on s'y devroit résoudre, voici à ce qu'il paraît doivent être les dispositions :—

Les corps de Wrede et du Prince Royal de Wurtemberg doivent marcher sur la Sarre. L'armée Russe s'y portera de même aussitôt que possible.

L'armée Autrichienne restera sur le Haut Rhin. Le quartier-général des Souverains sera pris à Fribourg. On tâchera de répandre de toutes parts les bruits qu'on suivra à peu près le même plan de campagne que l'année passée ; que la grande armée s'avanceroit derechef sur la route de Basle et Langres, qu'elle seroit secourée par l'armée d'Italie et les Suisses ; que les Anglois auroient insisté de faire le siége de Dunkerque ; ce qui conviendroit à Blücher de rester sur la défensive, et de faire une guerre méthodique, qu'il en étoit furieux, etc., etc.

S'il est possible il faut vendre de telles nouvelles et un tel plan à un des émissaires de Buonaparte ; en général rien négliger pour attirer les forces de Buonaparte vers les frontières de la Suisse ou de l'Italie.

Si l'on réussit par ces stratagêmes à détourner les forces militaires de Buonaparte de Paris, et de les attirer sur le Haut Rhin, alors il faut vite réunir les armées du Haut Rhin avec celle de la Russie, ce qui feroit—

Armée du Haut Rhin :—
Colloredo	40,000
Hohenzollern	36,000
Réserve	50,000
Wrede	60,000
Prince Royal de Wurtemberg	50,000
		236,000
L'armée Russe		120,000
En tout		356,000

et marcher à lui pour lui livrer bataille, ou l'occuper et forcer de rester sur le Haut Rhin, pendant que Blücher et Wellington se porteront brusquement sur Paris.

Si on décompte de ces 350,000 hommes cinquante pour observer les forteresses de l'Alsace, on garderoit toujours 300,000 pour marcher sur Buonaparte et lui livrer bataille, et Wellington et Blücher exécuteroient le manœuvre sur Paris avec 120,000.

Si on ne devroit pas réussir à attirer la plus grande masse des forces de Buonaparte vers la Suisse, l'Italie, ou le Haut Rhin, l'alternative se présente ou que Buonaparte, se voyant menacé de Wellington et Blücher, marche vers eux avec des forces supérieures, ou qu'il attend dans un cercle resserré autour de Paris, à peu près à la hauteur de Péronne, Laon, Rheims, Châlons, Troyes, les manœuvres des Alliés.

Dans le premier cas Wellington et Blücher doivent avoir la liberté de disposer des corps de Wrede et du Prince Royal de Wurtemberg, et pour les attirer directement à eux, et pour les faire marcher dans le flanc de l'ennemi.

Dans le second cas, que Buonaparte devroit rester dans le cercle marqué pour attendre jusqu'à ce que les manœuvres des Alliés se soient entièrement développés, voilà ce qu'il paraît qu'il faudroit faire :—

Se concentrent sur la Sarre, du côté de Deuxponts—les corps de Wrede de 60,000, et du Prince Royal de Wurtemberg de 50,000 : en tout de 110,000. On passe le Rhin à Mannheim, se portant premièrement sur la Sarre, et de là, par des marches rapides, sur Stenay.

L'armée Russe de 120,000 passe le Rhin à Oppenheim, se dirige derrière l'armée Bavaroise, par Kreutznach, Birkenfeld, Trêves, à Luxembourg.

L'armée Autrichienne de 125,000 passe le Rhin entre Strasbourg et Basle.

Chaque armée destine un corps de vingt jusqu'à trente mille hommes, qui restera en arrière d'elle, pour contenir le pays, observer les forteresses, et soigner l'approvisionnement des armées. Tout ce qu'il y a de Landwehr disponible se joigne à eux. Cette disposition faite, les opérations commencent.

L'idée générale est :—

1. Qu'on présente à l'ennemi trois masses à peu près égales, dont le centre est destiné de se porter, d'après les circonstances, ou sur la droite ou sur la gauche, et de renforcer de cette manière, par un mouvement rapide, une des ailes, pour lui donner une telle prépondérance de forces qu'il pourra livrer bataille à l'ennemi avec l'espoir de la victoire.

2. Si donc ce mouvement doit avoir lieu sur la droite, les armées Russe, Prussienne, Angloise, et Bavaroise tâchent de se réunir sur la Meuse aussi vite que possible ; réunies, ils chercheront l'ennemi pour lui livrer bataille, ou marcheront brusquement sur Paris, tâchant de le battre s'il s'y oppose, ou de se tourner sur leur gauche, si l'ennemi cherche de les prendre en flanc par Châlons, ou en longeant la Meuse, manœuvre auquel il faudra s'attendre, si Buonaparte est resté concentré dans le cercle de Troyes, Châlons, et Rheims.

3. Que le Prince Royal de Wurtemberg entretient les communications entre ces armées et l'armée Autrichienne, et que celle-ci manœuvre dans le flanc de l'ennemi, cherchant à l'attirer de son côté de le détourner du côté de Paris, ou de le suivre s'il se tourne vers les armées de Wellington et de Blücher.

Pour cet effet l'armée Autrichienne s'avancera premièrement sur Langres, le Maréchal Wrede sur Verdun, le Prince Royal de Wurtemberg sur Nancy, Toul, et Comercy ; l'armée Russe en tournant Sarre-Louis, Thionville, Longwy sur Stenay ; l'armée de Blücher sur Mézières ; Wellington sur Chimay. Chaque armée adopte en principe de surprendre, s'il est possible, sur son chemin quelques places fortes, et de ne pas s'engager avec des forces supérieures.

Si l'ennemi tâche de percer au centre, le Prince Royal de Wurtemberg se replie, et trouvera, dans le cas le plus malheureux, toutefois des asiles sûrs à Mayence ou Luxembourg, pendant que les autres armées se porteront sur le flanc de l'ennemi, pour le battre ou le prévenir à Paris.

DE KNESEBECK.

III.

MÉMOIRE DU FELD-MARÉCHAL PRINCE DE SCHWARZENBERG.

Vienne, ce 28 Avril, 1815.

A l'ouverture de cette campagne l'Autriche part de certains principes généraux.

Le but de cette guerre est le repos et la sécurité de l'Europe, menacées par le caractère entreprenant et hardi d'un chef et d'une armée licencieuse.

Les forces qu'on a destinées à cette entreprise peuvent être au moins évaluées au double de celles qui leur sont opposées par le chef des Français. Elles ne peuvent donc se trouver en infériorité que dans le cas :—

Où, en se divisant trop, elles offriraient à l'ennemi une résistance trop faible sur de certains points, et l'occasion de réunir avantageusement ses moyens d'agression.

Ou bien, en se resserrant trop, elles fourniraient une colosse immobile, qui n'aurait pas les moyens de se développer, et entraînerait même l'impossibilité de pourvoir aux subsistances des armées.

Ou bien, si une partie des armées se portait en avant avec trop de précipitation, et sans avoir suffisamment assurée ses communications contre les mouvemens qui seraient à redouter de la part des habitans du pays, s'ils étaient appuyés par les garnisons des forteresses qu'on serait obligé de laisser en arrière.

Détruire l'armée et son chef est donc le premier but de cette guerre. Eviter les dangers susmentionnés en est le second.

Il serait dangereux de se laisser aller à des illusions flatteuses. Le tems qui pouvait être favorable à un projet d'invasion est déjà passé, les armées des Alliés étant généralement trop éloignées des frontières de la France. Les moyens de résistance des Français sont nombreux, et nous ne pourrons espérer de les combattre avec avantage qu'en autant que nous nous attacherons à opposer un grand esprit d'ordre militaire, et l'accord le plus parfait dans nos mesures, au principe du désordre et de brigandage que Napoléon ne manquera pas de mettre en usage contre nous.

Ces considérations nous portent à établir les principes suivans :—

1. Chacune des armées doit s'attacher à la base d'opération qui lui est la plus naturelle.

2. Toutes les armées doivent avoir un objet d'opération commune entre elles, afin qu'elles puissent diriger leurs efforts vers le même point.

3. La route qui conduit de la base à ce point doit être suffisamment assurée, soit par des retranchemens, soit par l'établissement de corps de réserve. En un mot, l'armée doit se trouver dans la plus parfaite sécurité quant à ses derrières.

Il n'est pas probable que l'ennemi puisse opposer 400,000 hommes aux 800,000 que nous mettons en mouvement contre la France. Il sera donc forcé ou de diviser ses forces en adoptant un système de lignes étendues, ce qui ne peut manquer de le conduire à sa perte, ou bien il réunira la majeure partie de ses forces pour nous attaquer avec supériorité sur un point.

4. Les armées qui avancent doivent donc être disposées de manière qu'elles puissent contraindre l'ennemi à découvrir entièrement une partie de ses possessions, s'il était tenté d'agir offensivement d'un autre côté.

5. Le moyen le plus efficace pour atteindre ce but serait de menacer différens points assez distans les uns des autres pour pouvoir, dans le cas qu'une de nos armées essuyat des revers, rétablir les affaires en agissant avec vigueur d'un côté différent, l'empêcher de poursuivre ses avantages déjà acquises, et l'obliger peut-être à gagner avec rapidité une pointe opposé de sa monarchie.

Ce n'est qu'ainsi qu'une de nos armées battue gagnerait le tems nécessaire pour reprendre l'offensive, et que même, en admettant un second revers, l'ennemi finirait par succomber à la continuité de ses efforts.

La base d'opération naturelle à l'Autriche ne peut être que celle qui favoriserait sur la ligne la plus directe la communication de son armée d'Italie avec celle de l'Allemagne, ainsi que les secours réciproques qu'elles pourraient se porter.

Son aile droite est appuyée par la place de Mayence, sa gauche par les gorges du Piémont, son centre par celles de la Suisse.

La base d'opération de l'armée Prussienne s'étend sur sa gauche jusqu'à Mayence ; sa droite est couverte par l'armée Anglaise : donc les opérations concertées avec les mouvemens de la première ne peuvent être basées que par la Hollande et les Pays-Bas.

Ceci paraissant les bases naturelles qui s'offrent aux Puissances mentionnées ci-dessus, il n'y a que l'armée Russe qui en soit dépourvue dans cette guerre, attendu qu'elle se trouve à une trop grande distance de son pays. La tâche qu'elle a à remplir se présente d'elle-même ; elle doit remplir le grand interval que la nature même des opérations des armées alliées, Autrichiennes, Anglaises, et Prussiennes, formera infailliblement. Elle doit être prête à porter des secours à celle d'entre les armées alliées qui en aurait besoin, non pas comme une armée de réserve, mais placée sur la même ligne, afin de pouvoir se porter à droite ou à gauche selon le besoin.

L'offensive des Autrichiens doit être dirigée sur la gauche ; et en partant de son aile gauche, celle des Anglais et des Prussiens sur la droite, et par conséquent partant de leur aile droite.

Il en résulte qu'indépendamment des autorités militaires il y a trois grandes masses à disposer, savoir :—

	Hommes.
1. Une armée combinée Autrichienne sur le Haut Rhin, forte de	165,000
Corps de Bavarois	60,000
Corps de Wurtembergeois	25,000
Troupes de Bade	16,000
Darmstadt	8,000
Armée Autrichienne en Italie	70,000
Total	344,000
2. L'armee Prussienne et Anglaise, consistant en Anglais, Hanovriens, Hollandais ..	60,000
Prussiens	160,000
Saxons et Hessois	30,000
Total	250,000
3. Armée Russe, forte de	200,000

Les bases de ces armées sont données, leur objet d'opération est Paris, et la masse de l'armée Française partout où elle se présentera. En conséquence de ces principes, l'armée Prussienne ferait un mouvement sur sa droite, et l'armée Autrichienne sur sa gauche, aussitôt que l'armée Russe serait arrivée. L'opération principale ne peut cependant commencer avec avantage avant que 50,000 Russes n'ayent rejoints l'armée Prussienne auprès de Coblence, et que le même nombre n'ait fait sa jonction avec l'armée Autrichienne auprès de Mannheim.

Le gros de l'armée Russe se porterait en marches forcées sur Mayence et Coblence ; et quand la tête de leurs colonnes y sera arrivée, on sera à portée de juger si c'est sur la droite que le corps Anglo-Prussien, ou sur la gauche que le corps Autrichien, aura le plus besoin de son appui.

Tels sont les principes généraux sur lesquels il faut tomber d'accord avant d'ouvrir la campagne.

Pour les détails des opérations, pour les moyens les plus propres à atteindre le but général, il faut s'en remettre à l'expérience et aux lumières des quatre généraux en chef ; et eux-mêmes ne pourront les déterminer que quand leurs forces seront réunies, qu'ils connaîtront ceux des ennemis, et les positions qu'il auront occupés.

Cependant ces principes généraux devraient être dictés par leurs Souverains respectifs aux quatre généraux en chef pour leur direction générale.

Il résulte toutefois de cet exposé qu'une opération offensive ne peut être ouverte avant le 16 de Juin. Tout ce que l'ennemi pourrait vouloir entreprendre jusqu'à cette époque devrait être soumis aux mêmes principes que nouvenons d'établir par rapport à l'offensive ; c'est-à-dire, qu'un corps de troupes attaqué avec supériorité se retirerait sans se compromettre jusqu'à ce que tous les autres eussent fait des démonstrations énergiques.

Si peut-être des raisons majeures engageaient S.M. l'Empereur de Russie à désirer la réunion des forces Russes entièrement sur un point, ou sur la droite ou sur la gauche, sans accéder un détachement proposé de 50,000 hommes, on croit que cela n'attaquerait pas essentiellement les principes généraux établis dans ce mémoire, pourvu que le total de cette armée occupe au plutôt la position qu'on avait indiqué en première ligne à l'armée de 100,000 hommes.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 29th April, 1815.

I enclose to you an extract of a letter written by a person worthy of attention, but who does not wish me to use his name. I have doubted whether it ought to be transmitted to you or Sir Charles Stuart: if you think it more applicable to his situation, you will send it to him.

I am aware of the difficulty under which the King of the Netherlands was placed on his return to Holland, and to which he is equally exposed in his present situation, between employing men of ability and weight, but of doubtful loyalty on account of their former connexions, and confining his confidence to persons of approved fidelity, indeed, but without experience or authority. Either way he is sure to be reproached: a middle course requires great judgment to be successfully adopted, and after all will not escape attack.

You or Sir Charles will be able to judge whether there is in the enclosed statement anything more than what may be accounted for by over-anxious zeal or disappointed expectations.

I am, my dear Lord, yours ever,

BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Extract of a letter dated 27th April, 1815.

"I have received a confidential communication from a very respectable man in Brabant, which contains hints which I am at liberty to convey without naming him, and which you may consider deserving of attention.

"He states that ——————, whom the Prince of Orange has appointed ——————, is in his heart devoted to Buonaparte, as are many others whom the Prince employs from a false policy, of which I saw proofs when I was in Holland, and possibly from a jealousy towards anything that is or has been connected with England, more particularly its military service. One of ——————'s first measures has been the removal of almost all the German officers from the Belgian regiments, men on whom most reliance could have been placed; and these have been replaced by officers who had risen under Buonaparte, and are admirers of his system and government. Some of the German officers included in the first general proscription have been restored, but such only as had been employed under Buonaparte. Among the Belgian officers (viz., native Belgians) those who have not served Buonaparte are placed à la suite, while those who have served him are in superior situations. Thus a Mr. Gorthals is placed above a Lieutenant-Colonel De Lauchier, who had served Austria, while the former had served France only. Lieutenant-Colonel De Vesy is equally superseded by many others. A Captain Gall, a decided admirer of Buonaparte, is brought back to the service. Colonel Du Vivier, whose sentiments are wholly French, has been named Commandant of Mons, in the room of Colonel St. Aldegarde promoted, and Colonel Maxwell removed. Du Vivier is the dear friend and protégé of ——————. A brother of this Du Vivier has been named to supersede the Prince de Croy in the command of a regiment of Hussars, from which a German Major, an excellent officer, had been previously removed. My correspondent is inclined to suspect General Evers also, although he has recently carried to the Sovereign (he imagines as a blind) an anonymous letter which he had received, and which offered him the appointment of Marshal of France, if he would raise an insurrection in Belgium. He also suspects a Count d'Aldeir, Director of the Letter Post at Mons, whose language is, indeed, anti-Buonapartist, but whom formerly Buonaparte had forced the Prince of Tour and Taxis to receive at his Court at Ratisbon."

29 Avril, 1815.

On assure depuis 8 jours, et ce bruit se soutient, que plusieurs frégates sont disposées et prêtes à mettre en mer de Toulon, de Rochefort, et de Cherbourg. On ajoute que Napoléon a envoyé deux généraux en Corse pour visiter l'île et bien étudier l'ésprit et les dispositions de ses habitans. Son projet est, dit-on, de s'y réfugier s'il est vaincu. Quoique nous ne garantissons pas la vérité de ces bruits, nous croyons devait néanmoins les communiquer; mais nous pouvons assurer qu'on met en lingots tout l'or et l'argent qui arrivent à la trésorie. Il n'est pas moins certain qu'on a fait emballer et partir des diverses maisons royales les objets les plus précieux, notamment beaucoup de tableaux représentants des batailles et autres chefs-d'œuvre.

Tout cela a pris la route de la Normandie. Les chefs Chouans en ont été prévenus. Il serait bon de faire observer les trois ports précités. A Brest il y a eu une fête qui a duré quatre jours parmi les militaires à l'occasion du retour de Napoléon.

Hier, 28, les officiers supérieurs de la Garde Impériale ont été prévenus par un ordre secret (ordre que nous avons lu) de faire leurs dispositions de départ, attendu qu'ils ne recevront celui de partir que douze heures avant. Buonaparte doit partir sous deux ou trois jours : déjà une partie de ses domestiques et de ses équipages sont en route. Son projet est, dit-on, d'attaquer de suite si les Alliés ne sont pas prêts.

Observation très essentielle.

Si Napoléon commande en personne, comme on n'en doute plus, il formera certainement une grande armée, et il aura en outre sa Garde, tant vieille que jeune, ce qui augmentera cette armée d'au moins 15,000 hommes de troupes d'élite, et bien dévoués. Ces 15,000 hommes vaudront bien 25,000 d'autres.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 29th April, 1815.

I communicated to Lord Mulgrave your letter of the 21st instant.* You will hear from Colin Campbell that whatever can be done is doing, or has been done, to send you as much of your demands as possible. Lord Mulgrave regrets he cannot do more, and is by no means of opinion that you ask more than what the army you will have to command, and the country in which you are to act, would naturally lead you to require.

I have spoken to the Duke of York on the subject of dismounted dragoons. None can be spared without breaking in upon the depôts, but he will collect all the pensioned dragoons together, and form those who are fit for such service into companies without delay, sending them out to you as they are formed. I have also proposed to him to send to Hanover for 400 drivers, giving a bounty of four guineas; which being less than what is to be the bounty for the line, will not interfere with the recruiting of that service.

Drivers will be enlisted here as quick as possible. I have proposed them to be enlisted for short periods, even two years, as it is probable we may get post-boys out of place, who for so short a period may be inclined to enlist. They will be sent out by half companies.

As to horses, Mr. Herries tells me you have ordered the purchase of 3000. I have directed the purchase of 500, and Mr. Herries seems inclined to think that the order had better be doubled.

A very serious remonstrance has been received from the government in Ireland against taking the 4000 infantry and 1200 cavalry from thence before the corps under Lambert comes to replace them, and they have begged that the order may be suspended. But we have given a flat refusal to the application; and if the wind were to become fair, I should hope they would by this time be ready to sail.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 319.

It has been suggested to me that you might like to have two companies of sailors, 100 each company, attached to your army, for crossing rivers. Let me know if I shall give the orders: Lord Melville will begin forming them.

The Ordnance promise to furnish by the 10th of June all you have asked of horse artillery.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

The Comte de Lally Tolendal to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, 29 Avril, 1815.

Voici un papier confidentiel que j'ai écrit avec l'intention et l'espoir d'avoir l'honneur de le remettre moi-même à votre Grâce. J'ai dû le communiquer d'abord à S.M.T.C., qui en a pris lecture avant hier matin, et me l'a remis à l'heure du conseil, en approuvant que j'en fisse l'usage auquel je l'avais destiné.

Je prie votre Grâce de vouloir bien en conférer avec son Excellence le Chevalier Stuart.

M. le Général Pozzo di Borgo, qui en a eu connaissance, a proposé, ce me semble, un parti mitoyen qui obvierait à tout: ce serait d'envoyer cette proclamation en France, et de ne la faire connaître ici que quand tout sera connu.

On fait une copie de cette proclamation, modifiée suivant les circonstances. Elle sera mise sous les yeux de votre Grâce, et soumise aux lumières de sa sagesse, en même temps que recommandée à l'intérêt de son noble cœur.

Je ne retourne à Gand que demain; et si vous aviez, My Lord, quelques ordres à me donner, ou quelques minutes à m'accorder, je vous prierais de me le faire savoir à l'Hôtel d'Ursel, où je dîne, en m'indiquant l'heure où je vous importunerais le moins.

Votre Grâce sait, je l'espère, sans que j'aye besoin de le lui exprimer, combien je serai toujours honoré et heureux de tout ce qui pourra me donner quelque relation avec elle.

Je suis, avec respect, My Lord,

De votre Grâce le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

COMTE LALLY TOLENDAL.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Note sur la Nécessité d'une première et immédiate Proclamation du Roi à ses Peuples.

Gand, 27 Avril, 1815.

Tout ce qu'on écrit de France, tout ce qui en arrive, dit que les Royalistes n'ont qu'un cri—pour solliciter une proclamation du Roi; pour que le Roi parle au cœur de ses sujets fidèles, et même à la conscience de ses sujets révoltés, pour qu'il ne se laisse ni oublier des uns ni accuser par les autres ; pour qu'enfin il dissipe les inquiétudes et confonde les calomnies si artificieusement répandus par ses ennemis.

Les gazettes officielles, les papiers publics de Vienne, de Berlin, de Londres, des Pays-Bas, ont parlé du traité signé le 25 Mars, en ont rapporté le texte entier, l'ont commenté, interprété chacun à sa manière, et aucun des serviteurs du Roi de France n'en a encore dit publiquement un seul mot.

Le Roi de Prusse a fait une proclamation, et le Roi de France n'en a point fait.

Buonaparte et ses complices ne cessent d'empoisonner les esprits de l'idée que quatre cent mille étrangers furieux viennent leur imposer Louis XVIII. pour Roi sur les ruines de la France entière ; et une proclamation faite (heureusement sans qualité) par un Général Prussien n'a fourni que trop d'argumens à l'appui de cette fausse mais dangereuse assertion. Il n'est pas un jour de silence du Roi, qui n'enracine de plus en plus ces préventions dans les esprits déjà prévenus, et qui ne les fasse naître dans des esprits qui en étaient encore exempts.

La proclamation proposée au conseil du Roi, ordonnée, dirigée, et agréée par S.M., est de nature à faire des conversions par milliers en sens contraire : plus on les retarde moins elles seront faciles.

Il est bon, il est nécessaire que le Roi parle une fois à ses peuples, seul vis à vis d'eux, avec les droits, le caractère, le cœur, les vertus qui sont en lui, et sans armées étrangères près de lui. Ce sera, pour ainsi dire, une dernière tentative qu'il aura encore faite pour se soustraire à la douloureuse nécessité d'être secouru par les armes de ses alliés contre la rébellion de ses sujets.

Le jour où il se présentera avec ces alliés, où il parlera en même temps qu'eux, il n'y aura plus de temps à donner aux effusions de cœur. Elles seront restreintes dans tous les sens ; il se trouvera dans les discours du Roi des phrases de sévérité inévitables, jusqu'aux expressions de bonté, qu'il lui sera impossible de ne pas proférer encore, perdront quelque chose de leur effet par l'appareil menaçant qui les environnera ; au lieu que ces mêmes expressions, sortant aujourd'hui de la bouche du Roi encore seul, et uniquement entouré de Français, non seulement feront entrer le Roi au fond des cœurs, mais les disposeront même à ne plus haïr, à ne plus craindre, à voir au moins avec un sentiment favorable, et, dans plus d'un lieu, à recevoir en amis les étrangers qu'il leur aura présentés d'avance comme ses auxiliaires et ceux de la nation.

Le territoire d'où serait datée la proclamation du Roi ne peut pas être un obstacle. Charles II. datait les siennes de Bréda, et Jacques II. de Saint Germain.

D'ailleurs le nom de S.M. le Roi des Pays-Bas n'est pas compromis. La proclamation ne désigne même nominativement aucune puissance. Le Roi de France est reconnaissant en silence de la noble hospitalité et des procédés généreux qu'il éprouve : il sait que le moment n'est pas venu d'exprimer publiquement sa sensibilité. On n'ignore pas en France que Sa Majesté est à Gand ; sa proclamation ne dit rien de plus sur ses rapports avec le Roi des Pays-Bas.

Il peut y avoir dans la proclamation quelques passages susceptibles d'être modifiés. Les dernières nouvelles de France peuvent y nécessiter un léger changement ; mais si l'on attendait plus long temps à la publier, il faudrait la mettre de côté toute entière, et l'on aurait perdu un grand moyen d'émouvoir les cœurs, de calmer les imaginations, de réunir et d'enflammer les gens de bien, de diviser et déconcerter les méchans ; en un mot, d'adoucir, autant que la prudence le peut, et autant que l'humanité le veut, les rigueurs inséparables d'une mesure nécessaire, mais extrême. Or ici adoucir les rigueurs, c'est assurer le succès : faire son devoir, c'est marcher à son but.

Réflexion dernière. Cette proclamation, quoique beaucoup plus courte que les manifestes qui accompagnaient ordinairement les déclarations de guerre, bien moins intéressantes, a cependant et devait avoir une certaine étendue. Il faut qu'elle soit sentie et méditée, que le père de famille dans ses foyers, au milieu de ses enfans, que le curé dans son presbytère, au milieu de ses notables, pleurent et fassent pleurer en la lisant. Pour tout cela il est nécessaire qu'elle arrive au moins quelques jours avant celui où commencera l'action.

On ne réfuterait point ce dernier argument en proposant une proclamation plus sommaire. Les différentes manières de parler aux hommes, séparés ou réunis, dépendent pour leur emploi des circonstances, des caractères, et des besoins du moment. Le laconisme décide, ordonne, menace, punit. Il soumet, il peut même entraîner ; mais il ne persuade ni ne s'insinue ; or jamais l'on n'a eu plus besoin de persuader et de s'insinuer.

"Mulcentem Tigres, et agentem carmine quercus."

Voilà les deux classes entre lesquelles se partagent les ennemis du Roi, et voilà le caractère du langage qu'il faut leur parler aujourd'hui. Heureusement le cœur du Roi nous l'inspire, et ses paroles nous le dictent.

Prince Schwarzenberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Vienne, ce 29 d'Avril, 1815.

L'ambassadeur de S.M. Britannique, Lord Stewart, ayant pris sur lui de faire parvenir à Votre Excellence un travail sur les bases fondamentales du plan d'opération à suivre par les armées alliées que je lui avais communiqué à cet effet, je me flatte, Monsieur le Duc, que ce mémoire se trouve déjà entre vos mains.

Il m'a paru de la plus haute importance de convenir le plutôt possible de ces bases générales, et de s'entendre préalablement sur les principes qui guideront dans la suite la marche de nos opérations : c'est de ce point de vue, Monsieur le Duc, que je suis parti lorsque je me suis occupé à tracer les bases fondamentales sur lesquelles il faut essentiellement tomber d'accord avant de se décider pour un plan d'opération quelconque. Tout ce que Votre Excellence voudra bien me communiquer à ce sujet doit être du plus grand intérêt pour moi, et j'attends avec la plus vive impatience les premières dépêches que Votre Excellence voudra bien m'adresser.

Je compte être rendu à mon quartier général à Heilbronn le 9 ou le 10 du mois prochain ; c'est sur ce point, Monsieur le Duc, que je vous prie de diriger vos courriers.

Je vous prie, Monsieur le Duc, d'agréer les sentiments de ma plus haute considération, que je vous ai voué pour la vie.

SCHWARZENBERG.

[869.] G. O. Bruxelles, 30th April, 1815.

3. It is absolutely necessary that the soldiers of the cavalry should be kept with their regiments: accordingly, the Commander of the Forces desires that none but the General officers commanding corps and divisions of infantry of the army shall have orderlies from the cavalry to attend them, and of these but two for the latter; the General officers of the infantry are to have their orderlies from the cavalry serving with the corps to which they belong, if that cavalry should be British or German.

4. An allowance of 25*l.* is to be made to each captain of a troop of the British cavalry, and of the cavalry of the Legion, to purchase a bât horse.

5. This bât horse is to carry the camp kettles of the troop, and a proportion of picket posts and lines, and four scythes for each troop, for which the commanding officers of the cavalry are to make a requisition upon the Quartermaster-General.

WELLINGTON.

G. H. Rose, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Munich, 30th April, 1815.

Since I wrote to your Grace last night to make Colonel Washington known to you, I have had the good fortune to see Prince Wrede, who, arriving here yesterday, sets off for the army to-morrow. He had been just apprised by M. de Montjelas that the 2,000,000*l.* to be paid by us as commutation for the extent to which our force shall fall short of 150,000 men, are at your disposal as subsidy. His declaration to me on this was quite like himself, frank, manly, and friendly. He said that he felt no doubt that if from that sum anything could be allotted to Bavaria, your justice, your knowledge of the subject, and the sentiments and views your Grace expressed to him, would lead you to give her all practicable assistance; that he shall be convinced, if she gets nothing, it is because you have not the means of giving. What I said to the Prince respecting you was not necessary to confirm him in the feelings he bears you.

The effort of Bavaria is immense; and it is not only in numbers, but in the discipline, equipment, and quality of her troops; and it is one which necessarily weighs most grievously on her financial means.

I am delighted to hear you are pleased with your army. It would be cruel to put bad tools into the hand of such an artist.

Farewell, my dear Lord. Pray account me always as devotedly and most truly yours,

G. H. ROSE.

P.S.—I asked Prince Wrede if the sending spies into France had been attended to. He appeared to say it had not sufficiently; but he added he has himself organised it so as to be able easily to draw to himself through his advanced posts accurate information, that is, by persons who shall come over to them.

Report received from Mr. Hewley through Sir Charles Stuart.

Bruxelles, 30th April, 1815.

RAPPORT du 26 Avril.

M. Pierre de Busselot est arrivé hier à Namur, venant de Metz. Il a été dirigé sur Alost par les ordres de M. le Colonel Marquis de Castries.

M. de Busselot a rapporté qu'à son départ de Metz il se trouvait dans le département de la Moselle 16 régiments de cavalerie, cuirassiers et dragons, et deux régiments de hussards. Ces divers régiments étaient à peu près de 500 hommes chacun, mais l'on ne comptait que 250 à 300 chevaux dans chaque régiment. De plus 12 régiments d'infanterie, forts de deux bataillons de guerre; 14 batteries d'artillerie. Ces divers troupes étaient sous le commandement du Général Gerard; le Général Baltus commandait l'artillerie.

Le 26 Avril sont arrivés à Namur trois militaires Français: l'un, se nommant Foucault, venait de Sarre Louis, et se dit sergent d'artillerie. Il paraît d'après son rapport qu'au 3 Avril, jour de son départ, la garnison de Sarre Louis était forte de 400 hommes, et composées des dépôts du 55me. et 68me. régiments d'infanterie de ligne, de celui du 2me. de cuirassiers, de trois compagnies d'artillerie, et d'une compagnie de mineurs. Les compagnies d'infanterie étaient fortes de 70 hommes. Il y avait 20 pièces de canon de batterie sur les remparts de la place; les munitions de guerre manquaient, et les approvisionnemens de bouche étaient presque nuls.

Le second se nomme Jacques Vincent; il vient de Thionville, et se dit tambour au 80me. régiment. Il a quitté Thionville le 4 Avril. La garnison était suivant lui forte de 3000 hommes; elle était formée par le 80me. et 30me. régiments d'infanterie de ligne, par le 11me. régiment de cuirassiers, par deux compagnies d'artillerie et une compagnie de mineurs. Le commandant de Thionville est changé; le premier, dévoué au Roi, a été chassé par la garnison le 1er. Avril.

Le 3me., nommé Bourgeois, vient de Longwy. Il se dit sergent-major au 9me. régiment d'infanterie légère. Il est parti de Longwy le 12 Avril; à cette époque la garnison, forte de 2000 hommes, était formée par le 9me. régiment d'infanterie légère, par le 90me. d'infanterie de ligne, et par une compagnie de sapeurs. Les compagnies d'infanterie étaient fortes de 65 à 70 hommes. Il n'y avait pas plus de 12 pièces de canon sur les remparts, et peu de munitions dans la place. Le Baron Sayer la commande.

M. le Chevalier de Ingrab, garde du corps de la compagnie de Noailles, est aussi arrivé le 26 à Namur. Il est parti de Paris le 14, et a passé la frontière près de Sédan. Il a rencontré peu de troupes Françaises sur la route: il paraît que la majeure partie se porte entre Lille et Givet.

COL. MAR. DE CASTRIES.

Major-General Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 30th April, 1815.

A man I send along the frontier, and who left Valenciennes yesterday, gives the following intelligence:—From Dunkerque to Givet there are about 60,000 men, all the garrisons included. The garrisons have been often changed. There has been much desertion to the interior, but there are also recruits joining. The spirit of the inhabitants is good in general.

At Valenciennes the artillery has been placed on the ramparts, and consists of ten 24-pounders, six of which are at the citadel, and four at the gate of Mons. Besides these there are sixteen 18-pounders, twenty-four 8, and thirty 4-pounders; in the whole eighty pieces of ordnance, mortars and howitzers included.

A man that left Paris on the 28th says that all the troops that lately left Paris were directed towards Metz and Strasburg, and that the intended visit of Buonaparte to the frontier towns in our neighbourhood had been countermanded.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

Dörnberg.

Generals Reille and Excelmans, who were at Valenciennes, are gone, the former to Mézières, the latter to Landrecy.

Lieut.-Col. Sir Henry Hardinge to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

My dear Lord FitzRoy, Liège, 30th April, 1815.

Prince Blücher will be at Tirlemont on Wednesday next at eleven o'clock.

I was told he did not wish to be absent a night from his head-quarters, as he expected a courier from the King; and that they are not quite at ease respecting Saxony, and the delays of the King of Saxony to put his signature to the arrangement, which, though consented to, has on various pretexts been put off.

The last Prussian news from Vienna fixes the commencement of operations the beginning of June, and that the Austrian army cannot be upon the Rhine before the latter end of May. I understood that this period of June had been fixed at a military conference.

Very faithfully, my dear Lord, yours,

H. Hardinge.

The Count de Lally Tolendal to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

30 Avril, 1815.

Le Comte de Lally a l'honneur de renouveler à Sa Grâce le Duc de Wellington son respectueux hommage, et de lui envoyer la pièce en question.

Il a vu depuis ce matin un arrivant de Paris qui en est parti le 28, et il a reçu par cette voye des volumes qui le confirment plus que jamais dans son opinion.

Tout tient à un fil. Il s'agit d'empêcher que ce fil ne devienne cable.

La Garde Impériale a dû être portée hier à 30,000 hommes, mais au dépens du corps de l'armée où on la recrute.

Les places de ce côté sont dans un très mauvais état: 1200 hommes prendraient Cambrai.

PROJET d'un Premier MANIFESTE du ROI, adressé au Peuple Français avant la Déclaration que Sa Majesté se propose de faire en entrant sur son Territoire.

Avril, 1815.

Premier Manifeste du Roi de France.

Le Roi était impatient de parler à ses peuples. Il lui tardait de leur témoigner tout ce qu'avaient fait éprouver à son cœur ces marques de fidélité, ces consolations inexprimables qui lui ont été prodiguées dans toutes les villes, dans tous les villages, sur toutes les routes qu'il a traversées, lorsqu'il cherchait un point de réunion pour les fidèles défenseurs de sa personne et de son état; lorsqu'il demandait, sans pouvoir le trouver, un rempart, derrière lequel ils eûssent le temps de s'armer avec lui contre une trahison trop noire, trop basse, pour n'avoir pas été imprévue.

Mais plus, le Roi se sentait profondément ému de la fidélité de cette immense population Française; et plus, il se disait à lui-même que son premier soin devait être d'empêcher que parmi les nations étrangères la France ne fût calomniée, exposée à un mépris injuste, à une indignation non méritée, peut-être même à des dangers et à un genre d'attaque, qui auraient pu paraître un châtiment juste d'une déloyauté supposée.

Ce premier soin est rempli; il l'a été avec un succès digne de la sollicitude de Sa Majesté, du zèle de ses ministres, et de la magnanimité de ses alliés.

Les ambassadeurs et envoyés du Roi près des diverses cours Européennes, ses représentans au Congrès de Vienne, ont, d'après les instructions directes de Sa Majesté, établi partout la vérité des faits et prévenu jusqu'à leur exagération.

Toutes les Puissances de l'Europe savent aujourd'hui que le Roi de France et la nation Française, plus unies que jamais par tout ce qui peut resserrer les liens d'un bon roi et d'un bon peuple, ont été subitement trahis par une armée infidèle à son prince et à sa patrie, à l'honneur et à ses sermens; que cependant parmi les premiers généraux de cette armée, ceux dont les noms en faisaient la gloire ou se sont ralliés aux drapeaux du Roi, ou du moins ont abandonné ceux de l'usurpateur; que des chefs de corps et des officiers de tout grade suivent journellement cet exemple; que même parmi cette multitude de soldats, entraînés à une défection inconnue dans les fastes militaires, il en est un grand nombre que l'inexpérience a livré à la séduction; que la réflexion a déjà ramenés au repentir, et dont l'égarement doit être mis tout entier à la charge de leurs corrupteurs. L'Europe sait enfin qu'excepté cette portion d'armée devenue indigne de sa gloire passée, et qui a cessé d'appartenir à l'armée Française; excepté une poignée de complices volontaires qu'ont fournie à l'usurpateur des ambitieux sans mérite, des gens sans aveu, et des criminels sans remords, la nation Française toute entière, les bons citoyens des villes, les bons habitans des campagnes, les corps et les individus, tous les sexes et tous les âges, ont suivi et rappelé le Roi de tous leurs vœux, ont empreint sur chacun de ses pas un nouvel hommage de reconnaissance et un nouveau serment de fidélité. L'Europe sait que dans Paris, dans Beauvais, dans Abbeville, dans cette grande et glorieuse cité de Lille, dont la trahison occupait les portes et menaçait d'ensanglanter les murs, à la face et sous le glaire même des traîtres, tous les bras se sont étendus vers le Roi, tous les yeux lui ont offert le tribut de leurs larmes, toutes les voix lui ont crié: Revenez à nous! Revenez nous! Revenez délivrer vos sujets! L'Europe sait et continue d'apprendre que ces invocations n'ont pas cessé de se renouveler; que chaque jour elles arrivent au Roi, non pas seulement de tous les points de cette frontière si éminemment loyale, mais de toutes les parties de son royaume les plus éloignées. Ainsi les mêmes cris qui avaient retenti dans Lille se sont fait entendre dans Bordeaux, où la fille de Louis XVI. a laissé le souvenir puissant, joint à tant d'autres, de son courage héroïque: ainsi les mêmes contrées qui ont vu la première défection ont vu aussi la première réunion de braves restés fidèles se rallier au panache de Henri IV.: un neveu du Roi a marché à leur tête sans compter leur nombre; il a couru combattre la tyrannie et la rébellion; déjà plusieurs succès brillans lui en promettaient un qui eut été décisif; si des traîtres se sont encore trouvés là pour tromper son courage, le signal et l'exemple qu'il a donnés n'ont pas été pérdus. On a vu qu'un héritier du trône ne craignait pas de mourir pour la défense de son pays; et les acclamations des peuples le jour où il avait été vainqueur, leurs signes d'affliction le jour où il a été trahi, ne sont pas seulement la consolation du présent, mais l'espoir de l'avenir.

Et (qu'il soit permis au Roi de le dire, et d'adoucir au moins sa douleur dans une si triste épreuve, par le témoignage que lui rend la pureté de sa conscience) comment les sentimens dont tout son cœur est animé pour ses sujets, ne lui eussent-ils pas assuré de leur part un pareil retour? qui osera démentir le Roi lorsqu'il jurera devant Dieu et devant son peuple que depuis le jour où la Providence l'a replacé sur le trône de ses pères, l'objet constant de ses désirs, de ses pensées, de ses travaux, a été le bonheur de tous les Français; la restauration de son pays, plus précieuse pour lui que celle de son trône; le rétablissement de la paix extérieure et intérieure; celui de la religion, de la justice, des loix, des mœurs, du crédit, du commerce, des arts; l'inviolabilité de toutes les propriétés existantes, sans aucune exception; l'emploi de toutes les vertus et de tous les talens, sans autre distinction; enfin, la fondation de la liberté publique et individuelle, l'institution et la perpétuité d'une charte qui garantit pour jamais à la nation Française ces biens inappréciables? que si dans des circonstances d'une telle difficulté, à la suite d'orages si violents et si longs, parmi tant de haines à éteindre et des intérêts si contraires à concilier, on n'a pas pu échapper à toutes les surprises, se préserver de toutes les fautes, le Roi pourrait encore se flatter de l'assentiment de toutes les bonnes consciences, s'il disait que sa plus grande erreur a été de celles qui ne sortent que du cœur des bons princes, et que ne commettent jamais les tyrans: c'est à leur pouvoir qu'ils ne veulent point de bornes; c'est à sa clémence que le Roi n'en a pas voulu.

Ainsi éclairés sur les vraies dispositions de la France, d'autant plus fidèles à la noble tâche qu'elles s'étaient imposée le 13 Mars dernier, mais d'autant plus averties de ne pas confondre la loyauté opprimée avec la perfidie triomphante, les Puissances réunies au Congrès de Vienne ont signé le 2 du même mois un nouveau traité, par lequel, avant tout, elles se sont engagées à respecter religieusement l'intégrité du territoire Français; à ne s'y présenter que comme les amies, les libératrices, ou plutôt les auxiliaires de la nation Française; à ne connaître d'ennemi que celui-là seul qu'elles ont déclaré l'ennemi du monde, qu'elles ont placé hors des relations civiles et sociales, et livré à la vindicte publique; enfin, à ne poser les armes qu'après l'irrévocable destruction de son pouvoir malfaisant, après la dispersion des factieux et des traîtres, qui, se plaçant par une irruption soudaine entre un Souverain légitime et des sujets loyaux, ont arraché le Roi d'avec son peuple, et le peuple d'avec son Roi, pour le malheur de la France et du monde.

Les Puissances réunies en Congrès ont fait plus encore. Certes leur caractère et leur magnanimité, connus et admirés de tout l'univers, n'eussent pas permis de concevoir un garant plus sacré de leur parole que leur parole même : et cependant elles ont cru qu'à ce garant il fallait encore en ajouter un autre ; qu'elles ne pouvaient jamais ni assez tranquilliser le Roi sur la destinée de ses peuples, ni trop honorer la loyauté Française dans la douleur qui l'accable et dans l'impuissance désespérante à laquelle on l'a réduite. Les Puissances ont arrêté que l'accession du Roi serait demandée particulièrement pour le nouveau pacte qu'elles venaient de conclure. Leurs ambassadeurs sont venus apporter toutes ces communications à Sa Majesté. Ils lui ont présenté les nouvelles lettres de créance de leurs Souverains respectifs pour résider partout auprès du seul Souverain légitime de la France ; et leurs pouvoirs reconnus, ils ont offert le nouveau traité des Puissances à la déliberation et à la signature du Roi.

Français, le Roi a délibéré et il a signé. Dans ce mot seul est votre sécurité toute entière.

Vous en êtes bien sûrs, Français ; votre Roi n'a pu rien signer qui fût contre vous. Votre Roi ne cessera jamais de veiller sur vous et pour vous. Il n'a pas tenu à lui d'éloigner cette dure nécessité de reconquérir vos droits. Il vous sacrifierait aujourd'hui les siens, que son sacrifice, au lieu de vous assurer la paix, vous laisserait exposés à une guerre plus terrible. Une invasion étrangère prendrait la place d'un secours étranger. L'Europe a résolu la déstruction d'un pouvoir plus que jamais incompatible avec la société Européenne. Eh ! comment dans un tel conflit des étrangers livrés à eux-mêmes distingueraient-ils parmi vous les victimes de la tyrannie d'avec ses complices ? Comment la nation dont l'usurpateur forcerait toutes les facultés à le servir ne paraîtrait-elle pas à ceux qui le combattraient une nation entièrement et uniquement ennemie ? Victorieuse ou vaincue, que deviendrait la malheureuse France ?

Mais la France n'a plus que des amis dans une ligue où son Roi est prié d'intervenir, et où il intervient. La nécessité qu'il n'a pu conjurer, il est sûr au moins de l'adoucir, lorsqu'il est là pour rallier sa nation autour de lui ; pour détourner d'elle des coups qui ne doivent frapper que leur commun oppresseur ; pour observer, avertir, contenir, arrêter ; pour garder non-seulement vos propriétés publiques et individuelles, mais encore votre dignité nationale, dont votre Roi est aussi jaloux que vous l'êtes sûrement vous-mêmes de Sa Majesté royale. L'une et l'autre restent et resteront intactes. Les Français gardent leur place parmi les nations, comme le Roi de France garde la sienne parmi les potentats.

Avec la restauration de l'antique monarchie Française une ère nouvelle s'est annoncée à l'Europe l'année dernière. Tous les Souverains par leurs conventions se sont garanti le repos et la liberté de leurs peuples, comme, par leurs vœux, tous les peuples se sont garanti la légitimité et le maintien du pouvoir de leurs chefs. On s'est uni pour la paix ; on s'est ligué pour l'ordre ; et dans cette ligue bienfaisante, ainsi que le Congrès l'a justement appelée, tous les états sont en même temps protecteurs et protégés, garantis et garans.

Cependant, c'est le monarque et le peuple Français qui les premiers ont besoin d'être secourus : c'est au monarque et au peuple Français, une fois réunis par la présence de leurs alliés, à se secourir eux-mêmes de manière à n'avoir plus d'autre assistance à leur demander. Que cette disposition générale de la nation fidèle, favorisée par des amis, au lieu d'être entravée par des traîtres, soit donc mise en action : que l'armée Française régénérée reprenne l'éclat qui appartient à son nom : que toutes les gardes nationales, délivrés des pièges de la perfidie, et rendues à l'élan de leurs cœurs, hâtent le rétablissement de l'ordre politique et civil dans tout le royaume : qu'on se dire enfin et qu'on se répète sans cesse que plus les Français feront pour sauver leur patrie, moins ils laisseront à faire aux étrangers : que plus les Français pacifieront, moins leurs auxiliaires auront besoin de soumettre.

Français, le Roi qui a toujours été près de vous sera bientôt avec vous. Sa Majesté, le jour où elle posera le pied sur son territoire et le vôtre, vous fera connaître en détail ses intentions souveraines et toutes ses dispositions d'ordre, de justice, et de sagesse. Vous verrez que le temps de sa retraite n'a pas été un temps perdu pour vos intérêts, et que le Roi a régné par les soins de sa prévoyance, lors même qu'il ne régnait pas par l'exercice de son autorité.

Aujourd'hui Sa Majesté n'a voulu qu'annoncer aux bons Français ce qui devait satisfaire leur honneur, calmer leurs inquiétudes, payer leur amour, et seconder leur zèle. C'est déjà sans doute avoir rempli un grand but.

Sa Majesté a pensé aussi que cette communication adressée à ses fidèles sujets parviendrait à ceux qui sont encore rebelles, et pourrait, en les éclairant sur leurs dangers, comme en les détrompant de leurs erreurs, en ramener beaucoup à leur devoir. Le Roi a trop pardonné peut-être, et cependant il est aussi impossible à Louis XVIII. de ne pas faire grâce que de ne pas faire justice ; que l'innocence elle-même accueille donc encore le repentir ; que la fidélité persuade et ramène ; que les bons ouvrent leurs rangs à tous ceux qui peuvent être dignes d'y rentrer ; et d'un autre côté que les complices du grand coupable profitent du temps qui reste au repentir, pour avoir quelque chose de méritoire ; que les victimes de la nécessité soyent sûres qu'elle ne leur sera pas imputés ; que tout le monde sache et reconnaisse qu'il est des temps où la persévérance du crime en est le seul caractère irrémissible.

Français, que Louis XVIII. vient de réconcilier pour la seconde fois avec l'Europe : Habitans de ces bonnes villes dont les vœux touchans arrivent chaque jour au Roi, et l'encouragent à les remplir : Parisiens, qui pâlissent aujourd'hui à la vue de ce même palais, dont les murs seuls répandaient naguères la sérénité sur vos visages ; qui tous les matins pendant une année êtes venus y saluer Louis XVIII. du nom de Père, non pas avec une voix dominée par la terreur, ou vendue au mensonge, mais avec le cri de vos cœurs et de vos consciences : Gardes nationales, qui le 12 Mars lui juriez avec tant d'ardeur de vivre et de mourir pour lui et pour la constitution ; vous qui l'eussiez vu dans vos rangs, si la trahison eut permis à ces rangs de se former, et s'ils n'eussent pas été désunis par ceux qui veulent les souiller aujourd'hui : préparez vous tous pour le jour où la voix de votre Prince et celle de votre patrie vous appelleront au devoir d'aider l'un à sauver l'autre. Abstenez vous cependant de prendre aucun rôle dans la parodie de ces Champs de Mai qui jadis attestèrent la liberté sauvage de vos ancêtres, et dont le spectacle dérisoire n'a pour but aujourd'hui que de vous rendre la proie du plus vil ou du plus odieux esclavage, entre le despotisme anarchique et la tyrannie militaire. Eh ! que pourriez vous attendre de celui ou de ceux qui ont ensanglanté ou souillé tout ce qu'ils ont touché ; qui ont su faire un objet de dérision et d'horreur de tout ce qui doit être un objet de vénération et d'amour ; qui ont, s'il était possible, flétri jusqu'aux noms de patrie, de liberté, de constitution, de loix, d'honneur, et de vertu ? Français, n'avez vous donc pas votre Charte, qui a réhabilité tous ces noms sacrés, et les a remis en possession du respect qui leur appartient ? N'avez-vous pas enfin une Constitution pure dans son principe ? Elle a été réglée entre votre Roi et vos représentans ; douce dans son exécution, l'expérience d'une session entière vous l'a prouvé; portant en elle-même le germe de toutes ses améliorations; il n'en est pas que ne puisse créer à l'instant l'autorité royale avec l'assentiment des deux chambres. Croyez que là est le fondement le plus solide, le seul garant sûr de la prérogative, des priviléges et des droits de tous. Croyez surtout que par son droit, son titre, et son cœur, votre Roi est et sera toujours votre meilleur ami, votre plus constant, votre plus loyal ami; et cette Providence à laquelle il rend compte de l'accomplissement de ses devoirs envers elle et envers vous, cette Providence qui a reçu ses sermens et les vôtres, priez-la en commun avec lui de bénir son entreprise et vos efforts.

Par le Roi, étant en son Conseil.

Renseignemens sur les Inondations qui peuvent se faire au moyen des Eaux Douces et de l'Eau de Mer dans le Département de la Lys, donnés par Jean de Brock, Inspecteur des Ponts et Chaussées du même Département.

Avril, 1815.

A l'exception de la Lys et de l'Escaut toutes les rivières du département de la Lys sont canalisées. Toutes sont retenues par des écluses à la mer dans les ports d'Ostende, de Nieuport, et à la limite du département près de l'Eclúse.

Le canal de Gand à Ostende est partagé par des écluses en 3 biefs: 1° celui de Gand; 2° la traverse de la ville de Bruges; et 3° le canal d'Ostende jusqu'aux écluses de Slykens. Le premier a 3½ pieds de chute sur le second, qui en conserve 3½ sur le 3me.

Le canal de Nieuport est partagé en deux biefs. Le premier, de Plaschendaele à l'écluse de Rattevalle, est ordinairement de niveau avec celui d'Ostende. Le second, de l'écluse de Rattevalle à l'écluse dite de Bruges, est de 3 pieds plus bas que le premier bief.

Pendant neuf mois de l'année il y a trop d'abondance d'eau dans ces divers canaux, qu'on est obligé d'évacuer à la mer afin de prévenir le débordement et de procurer la décharge des eaux de divers autres petites canaux dont le niveau est en rapport avec celui de ces différens biefs.

Une bonne partie du sol de la ville de Bruges se trouve très peu élevé au dessus du niveau du bief formé dans cette ville; et si on remettait ce bief au niveau de canal de Gand, une grande partie de la ville serait inondée.

Le canal d'Ostende à sa côte ordinaire est de 4 à 10 pieds plus élevé que la campagne des environs.

Le canal de Nieuport dans son bief supérieur est de 2 pieds plus élevé que les terres environnantes.

Les digues qui contiennent le canal d'Ostende n'étant dans beaucoup d'endroits que de 3 pieds au dessus des eaux de ce canal, et celui de Nieuport que d'1 à 3 pieds, il est évident qu'en remettant les eaux de ces deux canaux au niveau de celui de Gand, elles déborderaient la majeure partie des digues par lesquelles elles sont contenues, et qu'à l'aide de coupures qu'on y aurait pratiquées d'avance on occasionnerait l'inondation des terres avoisinantes ces canaux.

Cette inondation aurait lieu, ou rendrait au moins le terrein impraticable, dans les environs de la ville de Bruges ; dans les communes de St. Michel, St. André, Varssenaeze, Snelleghem, Zilleghem, Eeghem, Westkerke, Oudenbourg, Ghisteller, Eerneghem, Ichteghem, Moere et Cokelaeze, Moerdyk, Zande, etc., Serecote, Slype, Leffinghe, Mariakerke, et Steene, dont la majeure partie des terres sont si basses que les eaux pluviales passent par des siffons sous les canaux d'Ostende et de Nieuport, pour se décharger à la mer par différentes écluses établies au port d'Ostende.

Le second bief du canal de Nieuport n'est bordé d'une digue que sur une partie de la rive gauche, qui sert à contenir l'inondation de la mer qui se fait en lune sur les Schors au derrière. Les caux à leur côte ordinaire sont de 2 pieds plus basses que les terres de la rive droite ; c'est dans ce bief que se décharge le canal de Vladsloo. S'il était porté au niveau du canal de Gand, toute la rive droite et les environs de la ville de Nieuport à l'est du port à l'exception du village de Lombarzide seraient inondés jusqu'à Ostende. A gauche de ce canal l'inondation aurait lieu jusque dans les communes de Mannekens Veere, St. Pierre Capelle, Zande, Leke, et Vladsloo, et rendrait impraticables beaucoup des terres environnantes. Toute cette inondation pourrait se faire en saison pluvieuse en quinze jours ou trois semaines de temps, en tenant fermées à Ostende l'écluse de Slykens et les écluses des Wateringhes, et à Nieuport celle de Bruges.

L'Yser, autrefois rivière, a été canalisé. Il est retenu par les écluses de Nieuwendamme et d'Ypres au port de Nieuport. Pendant six mois de l'année il y a trop d'abondance d'eaux, et l'on est obligé de les lâcher à la mer. Elles sont alors de 4 à 5 pieds plus hautes que celles du bief inférieur du canal de Nieuport. En tenant les deux écluses fermées pendant 15 jours ou 3 semaines, en saison pluvieuse, l'Yperlée, l'Yser, et autres petits canaux d'irrigation qui s'y déchargent, déborderaient les digues, et à l'aide de coupures y pratiquées d'avance on produirait l'inondation des communes de St. Jooris, Ramscappel, Boetshoecke, Scheerwillems, Nieuwe-Capelle, Pervise, Oostkerke, Oude-Capelle, Loo, et les environs de Knocke, Dixmude, Zarren, Handsaeme, Woemen, Merckem, Elsendamme et Oostvleteren, et beaucoup d'autres communes dont le terrein seroit rendu impraticable jusqu'à Ypres et Poperingue. Cette inondation se fait sentir jusque dans les environs du Mont Cassel. Celle de la ville de Bergues en est en grande partie formée ; mais lorsqu'elle s'est élevée autour de cette place jusqu'au point de couper les communications entre ces deux villes par la route, on lâche une partie des eaux sur Dunkerque, où on les décharge à la mer.

Le canal de Furnes ou de Nieuport à Dunkerque est d'un seul bief. Une écluse à Nieuport et une autre construite depuis peu d'années au port de Dunkerque servent à décharger les eaux surabondantes qui le sont 6 mois de l'année. Les eaux sont ordinairement de 4 pieds plus basses que l'Yser. En tenant ces deux écluses fermées pendant 15 jours ou 3 semaines, l'inondation des terres situées entre le canal et les dunes depuis Nieuport jusqu'à Furnes serait complette, et s'unissant à celle produite par l'Yser elle submergerait toutes les terres de la rive gauche du canal jusqu'à Furnes et au fort de Knocke.

Ces inondations seraient terribles si on y faisait contribuer l'eau de la mer, qui monte beaucoup plus haut que l'eau du pays, et qui, en raison des nombreuses écluses à la mer situées à Ostende et Nieuport, rendraient le pays, pour ainsi dire, entièrement impraticable.* Voici la nomenclature de ces écluses :—

À Ostende.	À Nieuport.
Slykens.	L'Ecluse de Bruges.
Vingerlinck.	Celle de Nieuwendamme.
Nordhede.	„ d'Ypres.
Nouvelle Ecluse de Chasse.	„ de Furnes.
Ecluse de St. Catherine.
Ecluse Bleue.

Je ne parle pas ici de la manœuvre particulière et de nouvelle invention des portes de l'écluse de Chasse, que j'ai construite à Ostende et Nieuport ; mais ce système a été généralement adopté pour les écluses à construire dans les fossés des places fortes. Deux écluses avec des portes de ce système sont commencées sous ma direction dans les fossés de la place d'Ostende. Voulant être de parole à faire parvenir à Son Excellence les renseignemens qu'elle m'avait demandée, je n'entrerai cette fois-ci dans de plus grands détails. Comme ingénieur en chef Belge, il me fera plaisir que mes connaissances locales et mon expérience peuvent être de quelque utilite à Son Excellence. Je la prie seulement d'être indulgente pour un exposé si court que j'ai l'honneur de lui adresser cette fois-ci.

JEAN DE BROCK.

PLAN DE CAMPAGNE ENVOYÉ À VIENNE.

1. Une armée en Belgique.
2. Une autre sur le Rhin-moyen.
3. Une troisième sur le haut-Rhin.
4. Derrière l'armée du Rhin-moyen une armée de réserve ; celle-ci la plus forte.

Les maréchaux des trois premières armées percent en France et prennent la direction sur Paris. Quoiqu'en arrive à l'armée voisine, qu'elle soit battue ou non, chacun de ces maréchaux continue son chemin en laissant derrière soi des détachemens mobiles, pour observer les places fortes.

L'armée de réserve est destinée à réparer les revers qui pourraient arriver à une armée de première ligne, soit par des mouvemens de flanc sur les communications de l'ennemi, ou par une assistance directe.

Ce projet de campagne est fondé sur la supériorité numerique des armées des Puissances Alliées. L'ancienne France avait 90 places fortes, dont les garnisons nécessaires absorbent un nombre considérable de forces ennemies. Supposé que Napoléon battra une des armées de première ligne, pendant qu'il la poursuit, les deux autres, en poussant toujours en avant, gagnent du pays et s'approchent de la capitale, en même tems que l'armée de réserve tâche de réparer les revers de l'armée battue. Préfère-t-il, après une victoire, au lieu de poursuivre ses succès sur l'armée battue, de tomber sur l'armée voisine, il aura à soutenir un nouveau combat, qui, avec l'aide de l'armée de réserve, lui pourra être disputé rudement, pendant que la troisième de nos armées de première ligne continue à s'avancer, et que celle qui a été battue se refait et reprend l'offensive.

* La côte de ces eaux comparée à celle du sol de la Grande Place de Bruges donne 6 p. d'eau sur ce sol.

Ces trois armées de première ligne doivent éviter de se rapprocher de trop près l'une de l'autre, afin que l'ennemi ne puisse disparaître de devant l'une et tomber inopinément sur l'autre, mais qu'il soit forcé de parcourir un nombre de marches suffisant pour les instruire, l'une de sa disparition de devant elle, et l'autre de son approche. Celle des armées avec laquelle il cherche le combat ne doit se battre que dans un terrain très favorable, et il vaut mieux de rétrograder quelques marches pour trouver cet avantage.

Tout projet de campagne qui s'occupe à admettre dans le calcul les armées en Italie est vicieux, parcequ'il est dangereux en ce qu'il nous fait perdre de tems. Les armées une fois rassemblées sur la frontière orientale de la France, on doit pousser les opérations vigoureusement.

GNEISENAU.

PARALLÈLE entre les Articles proposés et approuvés du COMITÉ pour les AFFAIRES d'ALLEMAGNE.

ART. 1. Proposition de l'Autriche et de la Prusse.—Les Princes et états de l'Allemagne, y compris l'Autriche et la Prusse pour leurs états en Allemagne, se réunissent dans une Confédération qui portera le nom de Ligue Germanique. Tous ceux qui y entrent renoncent au droit de s'en séparer sans le consentement des autres.

ART. 1. Rédactions du Comité et ses Remarques.—Les états de l'Allemagne (sess. 2n. 4), y compris l'Autriche et la Prusse avec leurs états cinommés, se réunissent dans une Confédération qui portera le nom de Ligue Germanique.

Chacun qui y entre renonce au droit de s'en séparer sans le consentement des autres confédérés.

La Bavière et le Wurtemberg ont observé que les pays avec lesquels l'Autriche et la Prusse entrent devraient être spécifiés, ce qui aussi a été approuvé par le Comité, avec la remarque que cette désignation, ne pouvant être faite dans ce moment, serait à supplcer. (Sess. 4.)

ART. 2. Proposition.—Le but de cette Confédération est le maintien du repos et de l'indépendance au dehors, et la sûreté des droits constitutionnels de chaque classe de la nation dans l'intérieur.

ART. 2. Rédactions.—Le but de la Confédération est le maintien du repos et de l'indépendance au dehors, et la sûreté des droits constitutionnels de chaque membre, ainsi que de l'ensemble, d'après les principes désignés dans les articles suivants.

N.B. L'Autriche, la Prusse, la Bavière, et l'Hanôvre ont voté pour la rédaction de cet article dans ces termes, mais le Wurtemberg a déclaré qu'il ne pouvait y consentir (sess. 4me.), et en général ne l'a pas cru nécessaire (ann. 3, sess. 8): les autres membres ont cependant voté qu'il devait être maintenu.

ART. 3. Proposition.—Les états de l'Allemagne se réunissant dans une Confédération pour atteindre le but du salut de la commune patrie, conservent tous et chacun en particulier la pleine et libre jouissance de leurs droits de souveraineté en tant qu'ils ne sont pas restreints par le but désigné dans l'article précédent, et que ces restrictions ne sont pas nommément exprimé dans la constitution.

ART. 3. Rédactions.—Les membres de la Confédération se réunissant pour atteindre le but du salut de la commune patrie, conservent tous et chacun en particulier la pleine et libre jouissance de leurs droits de souveraineté, etc.

N.B.—La rédaction de cet article est généralement approuvée à l'exception du Wurtemberg, qui n'avait pas d'instruction (Sess. 4).

ART. 4. Proposition.—Ayant partagé l'Allemagne en cercles, le but de la Confédération sera atteint :—

1°. Par l'établissement d'une assemblée qui consistera dans un conseil des chefs de cercles et dans un conseil des autres états.

2°. Par l'influence qui, d'après la constitution et sous la surveillance de l'assemblée de la Ligue, sera confiée à chacun des chefs de cercles sur les états de son cercle.

ART. 4. Rédactions.

N.B.—Au lieu de cette rédaction on est généralement convenu de rédiger cet article de la manière suivante, ce qui a été proposé par le Wurtemberg. (Sess. 8, ann. 3) :

Comme essentiel à la Ligue on est convenu :

1°. D'une assemblée de la Confédération, qui consistera en deux conseils :

a, Dans le conseil supérieur des Rois (au lieu de cela on est convenu dans la 7me. sess. de mettre : premier conseil).

b, Dans le conseil des Princes et états (au lieu de cela on est convenu de mettre : second conseil).

2°. D'une division des états de l'Allemagne en cercles, lesquels seraient a, A diviser de la manière suivante : . . . .

b, Les directeurs seraient . . . . .

N.B. Cette rédaction n'a pu être adoptée encore en détail, parcequ'il a fallu encore attendre une proposition à faire par l'Autriche pour une division de l'Allemagne d'une autre manière qu'en cercles (sess. 9).

ART. 5. Proposition.—Dans le conseil des chefs de cercles, etc.

N.B. A la place de cet article on a mis les articles suivants :

ART. 5. Rédactions.—Le premier conseil est formé par les plénipotentiaires d'Autriche, de la Prusse, de la Bavière, d'Hanôvre, et du Wurtemberg. On a changé dans la 7me. sess. le commencement de cet article, ainsi qu'il suit. Le 1er. conseil se réunit par les plénipotentiaires des Cours qui le constituent.

ART. 5*a*. Proposition.—Les Plénipotentiaires de l'Autriche et de la Prusse auront chacun 2 voix, ceux des autres Cours chacun une.

Le 5me. Article litte. fixe les règles pour empêcher une prépondérance perpétuelle des 4 voix dans le cas d'opposition des 3 autres.

ART. 5*a*. Rédactions.—Cette proposition est acceptée par l'Hanôvre, mais contredite par la Bavière, qui demande expressément que l'Autriche et la Prusse n'auraient qu'une voix. Le Wurtemberg a voté comme la Bavière, mais a accepté éventualiter la proposition qui tend à empêcher la pluralité perpétuelle de l'Autriche et de la Prusse.

ART. 5*b*. Proposition.—Le conseil des chefs de cercles est toujours rassemblé dans la ville de N. N.

ART. 5*b*. Rédactions.—Généralement approuvé.

ART. 5*c*. Proposition.—Les conseillers nommés par les chefs des cercles pour l'assemblée sont à considérer comme ministres plénipotentiaires, et doivent avoir des pleins pouvoirs et instructions de leurs Cours. Ils présentent leurs lettres de créance au conseil assemblé.

ART. 5*c*. Rédactions.—Les envoyés des membres du premier conseil sont à considérer comme ministres plénipotentiaires (7me. sess.).

ART. 5*d*. Proposition.—En conséquence d'un article suivant le premier plénipotentiaire d'Autriche jouit de la prérogative d'être informé en premier de tout ce qui est adressé au conseil; mais il est obligé de le communiquer sans délai aux autres membres, et si les affaires se qualifient pour une délibération, de les mettre dans l'instant en circulation. Le même mode aura lieu avec toutes les propositions que chacun des membres pourra faire.

ART. 5*d*. Rédactions.—En conséquence des articles suivants plus bas le ministre qui préside a le droit de prendre le premier la connaissance de toutes les affaires qui sont adressées au conseil; mais il est obligé de les communiquer aux autres membres avant la délibération, et de les porter sans délai à la délibération.

Le même mode aura lieu quant aux propositions que chaque membre du conseil pourrait faire.

ART. 5*e*. Proposition.—La pluralité des voix décidera dans toutes les affaires qui appartiennent au premier conseil. Mais il n'en sera pas de même dans le cas que l'Autriche et la Prusse ensemble seraient d'une opinion différente de celle des trois autres chefs de cercles. Dans ce cas la chose sera considérée comme s'il y avait égalité de voix, et on admettra alors des députés des Princes N. N., pour donner leurs voix dans la délibération qui sera faite de nouveau en leur présence.

ART. 5*e*. Rédactions.—Tous ont consentis à cet article à l'exception de la Bavière, en raison de sa protestation contre les doubles voix de l'Autriche et de la Prusse.

Le Wurtemberg a de même répété sa proposition pour les 5 voix.

ART. 5*f*. Proposition.—Les droits du 1er. conseil en partie lui appartiennent seul, en partie il les exerce conjointement avec le conseil des autres états. Les 1ers. consistent:

1. Dans la direction et le pouvoir exécutif de la Confédération.
2. Dans la représentation de la Confédération vis-à-vis de puissances étrangères.
3. Dans la décision sur la guerre et la paix.

En commun avec le conseil des autres états il exerce des droits qui sont du ressort de ce dernier. La manière dont le 1er. conseil prendra part au pouvoir législatif et judiciaire est réglé par les articles N. N.

ART. 5*f*. Rédactions.—Toutes les propositions de cet article ont été généralement approuvées.

ART. 5*g*. Proposition.—En vertu des droits de direction et du pouvoir exécutif du 1er. conseil—

1. De publier les décisions de l'assemblée;

2. De les faire exécuter ainsi que les décisions de la haute cour de justice par les chefs des cercles, et de donner pour cette fin à ceux-ci les instructions nécessaires.

ART. 5*g*. Rédactions.—Tout cet article est généralement approuvé.

ART. 5*h*. Proposition.—Les chefs des différents cercles agissent en vertu de commission à eux données par la Confédération, et sont soumis à la surveillance de ce conseil, que réunis ils forment eux mêmes, et auquel ils sont individuellement responsables pour les objets de leur fonction. L'acte constitutionnel et les décisions de la Confédération sont les normes de leur conduite. Le premier conseil a par conséquent la double obligation de veiller à ce que les chefs de cercles, chacun en particulier, remplissent les devoirs de leur charge, et à ce qu'ils ne les outrepassent pas.

ART. 5*h*.—Rédactions.

N.B. Au lieu de cet article le Wurtemberg a proposé de mettre :

"Le 1r. conseil prend soin que les chefs de cercle remplissent leur devoir dans les limites à déterminer" (sess. 8, ann. 3).

On n'a pas formellement voté sur cet amendement.

ART. 5*i*. Proposition.—Le premier conseil prononcera sur les plaintes portées contre les chefs des cercles en particulier. Les articles suivants plus bas détermineront comment ces plaintes peuvent et doivent être admises.

ART. 5*i*. Rédactions.—Généralement approuvé.

N.B. Au lieu de continuer les délibérations sur les développemens ultérieurs du s. 5, tels qu'originairement ils avaient été proposés, l'Autriche et la Prusse ont présenté dans la 8me. séance une rédaction nouvelle, contenant les 11 articles suivants :—

1. Proposition.—Les membres de la Confédération s'obligent à ne se faire la guerre entre eux sous aucune prétexte, n'y à vouloir maintenir leurs prétentions par la force, sauf le cas d'une défense nécessaire. Ils veulent au contraire que dans le cas de querelles entre les membres de la Confédération l'affaire soit décidée de manière que de chaque côté l'on nomme 3 arbitres, présidé par un chef élu par le 1er. conseil, dans l'élection duquel cependant les parties intéressées n'auraient pas de voix. Ce conseil d'arbitres décidérait l'affaire en 1er. lieu. Dans le cas que les parties ne seraient pas contents de la sentence portée, ils ont le droit d'en appeler au 1er. conseil, qui avec la haute cour de justice de la Ligue prononcera alors dans les formes encore à déterminer.

1. Rédactions.—Le Wurtemberg s'est réservé ses observations sur tout ce qui dans cette nouvelle rédaction ne serait pas conforme à ses propositions faites articles 1 et 3 dans la 7me. séance.

Le Wurtemberg a remis ensuite ces observations dans la 10me. séance :

L'Autriche, la Prusse, et l'Hanôvre ont adopté tout l'article. La Bavière a reconnu la nécessité d'une cour de justice, mais s'est réservée de s'expliquer ultérieurement lorsque les formes en seraient proposées.

Le Wurtemberg s'est déclaré contre la cour de justice, et veut attendre des propositions sur l'organisation du conseil des arbitres.

2. Proposition.—Tous les membres sans exception s'obligent de s'assister l'un et l'autre avec toutes leurs forces et moyens contre des attaques étrangères, d'après les normes ci-dessus désignées.

2. Rédactions.—Généralement approuvé.

3. Proposition.—Le premier conseil représente toute l'union dans les cas où elle agit comme puissance vis-à-vis des puissances étrangères.

3. Rédactions.—Généralement approuvé.

4. Proposition.—Ordinairement la Confédération n'admet pas de ministres étrangères accrédités près de l'assemblée. Le premier conseil a néanmoins le droit de recevoir les envoyés extraordinaires des puissances étrangères. Ils doivent présenter leurs lettres de créance au président de l'assemblée.

4. Rédactions.—Généralement approuvé par l'Autriche, la Prusse, et l'Hanôvre.

Le président est autorisé de prendre connaissance de leurs propositions, et est obligé d'en faire part sur le champ à l'assemblée ; mais pour les négations même le conseil doit lui adjoindre du moins deux de ses membres, s'il ne veut pas y prendre part lui-même en corps.

Le Wurtemberg a demandé que les ministres étrangers devaient faire leurs propositions au conseil général. La Bavière approuve l'article, mais propose que les ministres étrangers fassent leurs propositions non pas au président seul, mais encore à un co-directeur secundum surnum, qu'en pareil cas l'on adjoindra au président.

5. Proposition.—Quoique la Ligue n'a pas ordinairement de ministres dans les pays étrangers, le 1er. conseil est cependant autorisé d'en envoyer momentanément pour des négotiations.

5. Rédactions.—Le Comité a approuvé cet article, mais c'est réservé encore de fixer la manière de laquelle on exercerait ce droit. Le Wurtemberg a déclaré qu'en général il ne trouvait pas ces missions nécessaires.

6. Proposition.—En vertu de l'obligation de la Confédération d'en défendre chaque membre contre l'agression des puissances étrangères, il est du devoir du premier conseil d'examiner si le cas ou danger d'une pareille agression existe, et d'employer sans délai les moyens nécessaires pour procurer au membre lésé de la Confédération la sûreté et la satisfaction qu'exige la décision soufferte ou à craindre.

6. Rédactions.—Le Wurtemberg ayant objecté à cet article que l'on pourrait donner une fausse explication aux mots de l'article qui disent "que l'assemblée devoit premièrement examiner si le cas de danger existait," et qu'ainsi cela pourroit occasionner des retards, on proposa d'ajouter le supplément suivant :

Que dans le cas d'une invasion effective dans un territoire Allemand il faut avant tout que la Confédération donne le secours effectif d'après des normes à fixer encore, et l'article ainsi rédigé a été approuvé unanimement (sess. 10).

7. Proposition.—Au lieu de la première rédaction Prussienne de cet article on est convenu dans la 10me. session d'adopter la rédaction suivante, que le Baron de Wessenberg avait proposé dans la 8me. séance :

Le 1er. conseil se trouvant dans le cas de prendre une résolution sur la paix ou la guerre, on admettra 2 membres du 2d. conseil, qui participera avec 2 voix à la conclusion à prendre. Les Princes N. N. sont, comme premiers représentans du conseil des Princes, membres perpétuels de cette députation. On leur adjoindra encore 3 autres membres, dont le 2d. conseil fera choix par la pluralité des voix pour la durée d'une session à l'autre.

7. Rédactions.

N.B. Le Wurtemberg a déclaré qu'il ne pouvait pas consentir à ce qu'une députation du 2d. conseil fut admise : il a pris néanmoins cet article ad referendum.

Tous les autres l'ont approuvé.

8. Proposition.—Pour empêcher qu'un état individuel de la Confédération ne mette la sûreté extérieure de l'Allemagne en danger, tous les membres du 2d. conseil renoncent au droit de faire des alliances avec les puissances étrangères qui auroient rapport à la paix ou la guerre, ou qui pourraient entraîner la Confédération dans une guerre ; et les membres du 1er. conseil, soit qu'ils ayent des états hors de l'Allemagne ou non, s'obligent à ne faire aucune alliance avec les puissances étrangères qui serait dirigée contre la Confédération ou contre aucune de ses membres, ou qui pouvait les mettre en danger d'être impliqué dans des guerres.

Les alliances de ceux des membres de la Confédération qui n'ont des états qu'en Allemagne, avec des puissances étrangères, sont permises seulement avec la connaissance et le consentement * du 1er. conseil, qui ne peut le refuser, s'il n'y a pas de danger pour lui ou ses membres. En conséquence de cela on soumettra de même au jugement † du 1er. conseil les traités par lesquels des membres de la Ligue voudraient donner des troupes à la solde des puissances étrangères.

Si les puissances qui ont des pays hors de l'Allemagne, comme l'Autriche et la Prusse, seraient en guerre avec d'autres puissances, ils entront, par rapport à ces guerres et vis-à-vis de la Ligue, dans la catégorie de puissances étrangères, et il dépend de la libre résolution de la Ligue de prendre sur l'invitation de la puissance belligérante part à la guerre ou non. Néanmoins dans un tel cas les membres de la Ligue qui possèdent seulement des pays en Allemagne peuvent s'allier avec l'Autriche ou la Prusse, ou avec tous les deux, à condition que les autres membres de la Confédération ne soyent pas par-là entraînées dans la guerre.

En place de cet article l'Autriche a proposée la rédaction suivante :

Pour empêcher qu'un seul état de la Ligue ne mette la sûreté de l'Allemagne en danger, tous les membres de la Ligue, soit qu'ils ayent des états hors de l'Allemagne ou non, s'obligent de ne faire d'alliances quelconques avec des puissances étrangères qui soient dirigées contre toute la Confédération ou quelqu'un de ses membres, ou qui pouvaient mettre en danger médiatement ou immédiatement la Ligue, ou un des membres, soit que ces alliances ayent rapport à la guerre ou à la paix, ou à des subsides, ou quelqu'autre secours.

* Le mot consentement est rejeté par la Bavière et du Wurtemberg.

† Le mot jugement est rejeté par la Bavière et du Wurtemberg.

Chaque membre de la Confédération s'oblige à porter à la connaissance de la Ligue toutes ses alliances de cette espèce.

8. Rédactions.—Généralement approuvé. La Prusse s'est réservée sa déclaration sur cet article, qui ne lui paraît suffisant au but.

Le Wurtemberg a déclaré qu'il ne le trouvait pas préjudiciable à l'exception de la dernière phrase, Chaque membre, etc.: cependant il s'est encore réservé son assentiment.

Les trois autres membres l'ont approuvé.

9. Proposition.—En cas d'une paix à faire, le 1er. conseil n'a pas le droit de disposer du territoire d'un des membres de la Ligue, soit en entier ou en partie, soit pour l'échanger ou pour le céder, autrement que sous obligation de la Ligue de dédommager le membre souffrant dans la proposition la plus possible et avec son consentement. Aussi le membre souffrant doit-il prendre part à la délibération du conseil sur cet objet.

9. Rédactions.—Généralement approuvé, à l'exception du Wurtemberg, qui a pris l'article ad referendum.

10. Proposition.—Si les traités que fait la Ligue exigent pour leur exécution des loix générales, ces loix seront soumises à la ratification du 1er. et 2d. conseil comme corps législatif de la Ligue.

10. Rédactions.—Cet article est approuvé par tous à l'exception du Wurtemberg (sess. 11).

11. Proposition.—La législation étant proprement du ressort du 2nd. conseil, le 1er. conseil y prend part seulement en ce qu'il propose:

1°. Des loix à la délibération du 2nd. conseil; et

2°. Qu'il prend lui même en délibération les réponses du 2d. conseil en ses propositions, ainsi que les projets de loix que le second conseil lui a adressé.

La manière de faire et de décréter les loix mêmes sera fixée dans d'autres articles.

11. Rédactions.—La rédaction de cet article, qui diffère un peu de la première rédaction, est approuvée de tous à l'exception du Wurtemberg, qui s'est réservée sa déclaration.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London,* April, 1815.

Your Grace's letters of the 12th and 13th instant † arrived about three to-day, and I went immediately to York House to communicate to the Duke of York the proposition contained in your letter of the 13th, to recruit for the German Legion from the Hanoverian militia.

His Royal Highness was gone out on horseback, and has not yet arrived at the Horse Guards. If I can see him before the time I must go down to the House of Lords, I will submit the plan to him; but as I expect some opposition to it, I shall probably not be able to give you an answer before to-morrow, as I must see the Regent after having seen him, and the proposition will not, perhaps, be much more relished there, as it will be considered as interfering with the arrangement already made on the subject of recruiting the German Legion, and which must by this time have begun.

Our veteran battalion has sadly disappointed us. Out of 10,600 collected, only 370 proved fit for duty. They will be embarked to-day, with 500 not disbanded. We shall get a German battalion from different places collected by the middle of next week, which will proceed also to Flanders (either Ostend or Antwerp, as you will have decided): they will amount to near 1000 men, I am told. But we must now call out the veterans in a more regular way.

I am yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Intelligence sent by Earl Bathurst.

1 Mai, 1815.

Les journaux ont annoncé le départ de Napoléon dans le nord, dans le but d'aller inspecter les frontières de cette partie de la France, ainsi que la situation des places fortes qui s'y trouvent; mais il est très probable qu'il ne reviendra pas à Paris, et qu'il se mettra à la tête de l'armée. Il vient d'ordonner la réunion des 1er., 2me., 4me., et 6me. corps, qui se trouvent cantonnés dans ce moment, le 1er. à Lille, le 2me. à Valenciennes, le 4me. à Metz, et le 6me. à Paris et les environs de toutes ces places. Ces 4 corps réunis ensemble formeront sans doute la grande armée, dont il prendra le commandement. Il y a déjà nommé l'Ordonnateur Volland ordonnateur en chef de ces 4 corps, qui ne forment plus déjà qu'une seule administration sous ses ordres. Comme Napoléon a toujours sa Garde avec lui, il faut encore ajouter à la force de la grande armée celle de la Vieille Garde, qui est au moins de 10,000 hommes dans ce moment. Sous peu elle sera renforcée de la Jeune Garde, que l'on forme dans ce moment, et qui sera composée de 12 régiments.

Force approximative de la Grande Armée, en la supposant composée des 4 corps ci-après.

Brought forward ..	87,600
Il faut encore ajouter :—
L'Artillerie, le Génie, etc.	3,000
La Cavalerie du 6me. corps, que l'on suppose d'être de	3,600
La Garde, Vieille et Jeune	20,000
Total	114,200

Observations.

L'on a compté les régiments de cavalerie sur le pied de 600 hommes et 600 chevaux, quoiqu'il soit très présumable qu'ils ne pourront pas avoir autant de monde aux escadrons de guerre, malgré que le décret pour leur organisation porte que chaque régiment de cavalerie légère devra avoir 900 chevaux et 1000 hommes ; pareeque des régiments composés presqu'entièrement de chevaux de remonte, entièrement neufs, seront obligés de les former, et ne pourront fournir de suite que les anciens chevaux. Il faut compter sur un effectif réel de 16,000 hommes montés de grosse cavalerie, parcequ'ils ont été complétés au moyen des chevaux de gendarmes qui sont tous formés.

Ce calcul n'est qu'une supposition, les ordres pour la formation de la grande armée n'étant pas donnés définitivement : il pourrait se faire (et cela dépendra des circonstances) qu'on joignit avec les 4 corps ci-dessus une partie de ceux occupant le restant de la frontière du Nord et du Rhin.

*Brigadier-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Vienna, 1st May, 1815.

I received an intimation from the Earl of Clancarty on the 29th ultimo that his Lordship had appointed me on the Commission of Subsistence which had been directed to assemble by the Allied Sovereigns, and that Count Münster was to be my colleague.

I accordingly attended on the following day the Commissioners on the part of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, at the Prince Wolkonsky's quarters. It appears that the Commission which was formed to regulate the maintenance of the great armies had been sitting several days, and had proceeded very far in making their arrangements before they called upon the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain to take a part. This was explained to me by Baron Stein, in a manner, however, not very satisfactory. He said the Powers considered that Belgium and Holland were appropriated to the Duke of Wellington's army, and that they considered Great Britain had no interference for the system for Germany. I observed, where armies were acting together, and where some of the German contingents were destined to serve under the Duke of Wellington, I did not imagine how any general system would be applicable but by commun d'accord. This the Commissioners no doubt discovered when they came to the details for the North of Germany, and were very glad (however late) to call upon Great Britain to assist with her opinions, making the best excuse in their power.

* Duplicate of Despatch No. 52, addressed to Lord Castlereagh by Lord Stewart.

The Commission had divided the portion of the countries that are to feed and supply the armies into separate rayons within a certain line, reserving the countries of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, extending in the rear of the Weser river, for the maintenance of the army of reserve and corps of troops coming forward. The present arrangement was proposed to be in effect for three months, allotting the means and population of each rayon to the army it was to feed. The idea on which they formed their travail was, that it was better for these countries (belonging to the Princes of Germany) to have a moderate payment for rations, forage, and transport furnished to the armies, than to have mere requisition and plunder. The payment to be made could only be managed by an issue of paper, redeemable at a certain period after the war; but this was the most equitable system towards those countries that it was possible for the great Allied Powers to carry into effect.

The papers I have the honour to annex will show your Lordship the rayons determined upon, the rations and payments that were fixed, and also the communication that was made to the German Princes.

It occurred to me that it was as impossible to induce the Allied armies to enter into our regular system of payment according to the value of what was received from the country, as it would be against our mode of conducting war to oblige us to enter into theirs. No system, therefore, of generalising the whole arrangement could be proposed or acted upon.

The next best alternative seemed to me to be, that each army should take care of itself in its own rayon; and if the operations required the armies passing into each other's rayon, that in this case suitable arrangements should be made.

It seemed extremely unjust that those countries which furnished their contingents to the Duke of Wellington, and which will probably be obliged to subsist or pay for their troops acting with his army at a much higher rate than their neighbouring contingents acting (for example) with the Prussians, should be taxed in equal proportion for the subsistence of the armies that are advancing, or near them, if the King of the Low Countries will not consent to furnish the means of his country at the rate it is forced upon the German Princes.

It stands to reason that all the Powers of the contingents serving with the Duke of Wellington's army will be taxed in a double and in a very severe manner.

It was for these reasons that I felt it my duty, in conjunction with my colleague, to record our opinions as stated in the protocol and declaration herewith annexed, which I hope will produce some effect.

I should not conceal from your Lordship that although I endeavoured to point out the immense exertions that Great Britain had made, and also alluded to the power of aiding any particular district which the Duke of Wellington had in his hands, by the appropriation of the two millions at his absolute disposal, still there appeared a great deal of ill-humour, especially among the Prussians, threatening to withdraw their army across the Rhine (they having been obliged, since they have entered the King of the Low Countries' territory, to feed them from Juliers), and resorting to a style of observation, in which they were supported by the other Commissioners, as unjustifiable as disgusting and disagreeable.

The papers containing details for the administration in the enemy's country have not been received by me.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest truth and respect,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

STEWART.

Regulations for fixing the Price of Rations.

The soldier is to receive daily 2 lbs. of bread, at 1½ kreutzer; ½ lb. of meat at 2½ kreutzers; ¼ lb. of grits, barley, or rice: or in lieu of that, ½ lb. of peas, beans, vetches, or oatmeal: or in lieu of that, 1 lb. of potatoes or any other vegetable, at ½ kreutzer; ⅛ quart of brandy, at 1½ kreutzer. In addition to the above portion, 5½ kreutzers per lb. of meat will be allowed to the country which furnishes the same by the Power to whom the army belongs.

The following will be allowed in regard to forage:—1 ration for light cavalry, consisting of ⅛ of a bushel, Austrian measure, at 5 kreutzers; 10 lbs. of hay, at 3 kreutzers: total 8 kreutzers. 1 ration for heavy dragoons, consisting of $\frac{3}{16}$ of a bushel, Austrian measure, at 7½ kreutzers; 10 lbs. of hay, at 3 kreutzers; 2 lbs. of straw, at ½ kreutzer: total 11 kreutzers.

The prices are fixed according to the 24 gulden fuss.

In the sitting of the 1st of May it has been agreed upon to raise the prices as follows: the portions at 6½ kreutzers; the light cavalry at 9 kreutzers, the heavy cavalry at 12 kreutzers. About the payment, it has been determined that the first is to be made in ready money; the rest in four payments of three, six, twelve, and eighteen months.

VI.

PROCEEDINGS of COMMISSION established by Austria, Russia, and Prussia, for regulating the Subsistence of the Allied Armies in the Territories of the German Princes.

Vienne, ce 21 Avril, 1815.

La Commission établie par l'Autriche, la Russie, et la Prusse, pour délibérer sur l'approvisionnement des trois armées pendant la guerre actuelle, et sur les moyens de se les procurer, s'est occupée de ces objets dans plusieurs de ses séances, et est convenue rélativement à l'approvisionnement des troupes de leur part et de la part des Puissances Alliées de ce qui suit.

Convaincu que le système des réquisitions ne serait pas choisi par les Puissances Alliées comme injuste, peu convenable au tems, et susceptible d'attirer la haine, convaincu de même que la rareté du numéraire ne permet pas de se les procurer par des livranciers, et qu'on ne peut pas employer pour cela la voie des livraisons par les pays eux-mêmes, même en payant aux prix courants des marchés des pays qui dans ces circonstances deviendront exorbitans, on est d'avis qu'il ne reste moyens de pourvoir à l'approvisionnement et aux transports qu'en payant un prix modéré et fixé, et d'autant plus. que cette manière de payer conviendra mieux aux habitans des pays respectifs qu'une fixation à un haut prix, auquel on ne serait pas en état de faire face à défaut de fonds suffisans.

1. L'approvisionnement des troupes se fera par la livraison des vivres et des fourrages, d'après le tarif ci-joint (A.), par les pays Allemands à travers lesquels les troupes passeront, et les pays voisins dont on pourra se procurer ces objets.

2. Pour la portion fixée dans ce tarif l'armée payera 5 c. pour la single ration, pour la double ration 12 c. ; sur le pied de 24 pour le marc.

3. Ces prix seront payés au passage des troupes comme étapes, à moins qu'il ne soit convenu par les Puissances respectives d'arrangemens différens à cet égard.

4. Si une armée ou une division d'armée, au-dessus de 10,000 hommes, doit être fournie au delà de six semaines dans sa position concentrée, on payera de plus 20 pour cent. au-dessus des prix fixés.

5. Les relais pour les transports des troupes et de leurs effets, des blessés, des malades, des réserves qui suivent, et des militaires particuliers ayant droit aux relais, ne seront pas payés. Les transports des vivres et fourrages faits par les pays mêmes sont compris dans la taxe de payement.

5 (2). Les transports de vivres, des effets militaires, et des munitions, qui suivent les troupes en marche, seront également faits gratis, s'ils ne se portent pas à plus de 30 voitures à 4 chevaux. S'il faut plus de voitures à 4 chevaux, on payera le surplus des voitures à raison de 3 kreutzer par mille pour un quintal ; et pour l'ordre on donnera des reçus même pour les transports fait gratis.

6. Tous les pays qui auront fait les transports et fournis les approvisionnements en feront l'état, et auront soin de faire un état particulier pour chacun des trois Puissances.

7. Chacun des trois Puissances établira dans un lieu convenable—l'Autriche à Augsbourg, la Russie à Francfort-sur-le-Main, la Prusse à Cologne—une commission, qui recevra, allouera, examinera les états et les pièces justificatives.

8. S'il y a des objets qu'on ne puisse arranger amicablement, ils seront portés à la décision des Cours respectives intéressées.

9. Les sommes reconnues et allouées par la commission seront acquittées de la manière suivante :—

Les trois Puissances, l'Autriche, la Russie, et la Prusse, feront expédier des assignations particulières, sous leur garantie commune, dont le montant total sera porté à quinze millions de florins du Rhin, au pied de 24 pour le marc, pour trois mois d'approvisionnement des trois armées de ces Puissances, compris pourtant les troupes de la Confédération d'Allemagne, et ce qui a rapport au payement des transports et des dépenses des hôpitaux.

10. Les trois Puissances s'accorderont sur leurs quotités respectives.

11. On expédiera des assignations pour le montant de la somme susdite, d'après la formule (B.).

12. Les assignations seront payables, $\frac{1}{3}$ en trois mois, $\frac{1}{3}$ en 4 mois, $\frac{1}{3}$ en 6 mois, $\frac{2}{3}$ en 12 mois, $\frac{2}{3}$ en 18 mois, $\frac{2}{3}$ en 24 mois.

13. Ces sommes assignées à 12, 18, et 24 mois, de vue, porteront intérêt à 5 pour cent.

14. Chacune des trois Puissances recevra en une seule fois à sa disposition la quotité fixée pour les fournitures de son armée, et celles des troupes confédérées réunies à la leur dans la proportion fixée au paragraphe 12.

Chaque Puissance pourvoira la commission qu'elle aura établie de la quantité d'assignations qu'elle croira convenable.

15. La Commission acquittera les sommes liquidées et vérifiées avec les assignations mises à sa disposition, dans la proportion déterminée en paragraphe 12.

16. Il sera libre à chaque pays de présenter, ensemble ou séparément, les états à la vérification de la commission et au payement.

17. Il sera formé à Frankfort-sur-le-Main une caisse commune, qui acquittera les assignations aux termes fixés.

18. Chacune des trois Puissances fera payer comptant, quatre semaines avant l'échéance, à la caisse commune, dans la valeur susdite ou en autres espèces d'or ou d'argent à sa disposition, la somme dont elle aura reçu l'assignation.

19. Les Puissances confédérées payeront pour l'entretien de leurs armées un provata proportionné au nombre des troupes qu'elles auront sur pied. Chacune des trois Puissances s'accordera sur ce point avec les Puissances confédérées.

20. Si une Puissance n'a pas employée le montant d'assignations mis à sa disposition, elle pourra, au lieu de la somme qu'elle aura à payer comptant, verser à la caisse de réalisation les assignations non employées.

Il s'entend de soi-même qu'on ne pourra recevoir que les assignations payables à chaque terme.

21. Les trois Puissances se réservent de convenir entre elles sur la formation de la caisse et sur son administration.

22. Les trois Puissances se réservent aussi de s'accorder après la liquidation générale sur les payements réciproquement faits, et la levée de la garantie.

PROTOCOLE de la Conférence du 30 Avril, 1815, relatif à la Subsistance des Armées Alliées.

Vienne, le 30 Avril, 1815.

Dans la Conférence de ce soir la question a été discutée sur la concurrence des territoires qui fournissent des troupes à l'armée Anglaise se trouvant dans la Belgique, aux livraisons nécessaires à l'entretien des troupes Autrichiennes, Prussiennes, et Russes en Allemagne.

Les plénipotentiaires Anglais ont remis la note ci-jointe, qui expose leurs sentimens. Ils demandent que les raisons soient changés par rapport à ces pays qui donnent leurs contingens à l'armée de Wellington : ils désirent que les livraisons s'effectuent autant que les autres Puissances puissent le désirer. Mais ils trouvent que la justice demande que les pays qui donnent leurs contingens en Hollande, et qui seront obligés de payer leur nourriture à un prix bien grand, ne soient point taxés en double. Il reste de trouver un moyen pour cet arrangement en arrêtant une partie des subsides, ou bien par quelqu' autre arrangement.

Les Commissaires Autrichiens, Russes, et Prussiens ont fait la proposition suivante :—De former les rayons d'après leurs plans proposés de faire effectuer les livraisons d'après eux aux armées alliées, mais que les arrangements pour dédommager les territoires qui fournissent des troupes à l'armée Anglaise dans la Belgique soient remis à la décision des Souverains ; qu'en attendant les négociations avec les Princes Allemands se continuent et se terminent.

Les plénipotentiaires Anglais ne demandent pas que les négociations s'arrêtent, mais l'Angleterre ne peut pas donner son adhésion à un arrangement qui ne paraît pas juste pour certains districts, considérant la population immense des autres pays engagés dans la guerre.

Les Commissaires Prussiens déclarent vouloir rectifier les tableaux des rayons en admettant les provinces Prussiennes entre le Weser et la frontière étrangère à 2,300,000 âmes, au lieu d'un million, pour lequel les provinces ont été noté dans le premier tableau des rayons.

DÉCLARATION à être donnée au Protocole de la Séance du 30 Avril, 1815.

Les Commissaires nommés de la part de la Grande Bretagne pour assister à la Commission chargée de régler les principes d'après lesquels les Alliés auront à concourir du maintien des armées, après avoir pris ultérieurement en considération les points qui ont été discutés à la séance du 30 Avril, déclarant,

"Que le principe établi par la Commission d'après lequel les provinces désignées dans les tableaux présentés à la séance auraient à fournir les denrées nécessaires, à un prix considérablement au-dessous du prix véritable, ne saurait être considéré comme équitable, que tant que les provinces y intéressées participeraient également aux avantages et aux désavantages d'un tel arrangement.

"Que les pays qui sont tenus à fournir leurs contingents à l'armée aux ordres du Duc de Wellington devront pourvoir à l'entretien de leur contingent aux prix courants en Belgique, ne sauraient en même tems être grevés (en outre de l'entretien de leurs propres troupes) de celui des troupes des autres Puissances, à des prix nullement proportionnés à leur valeur.

"Que l'Angleterre devant borner ses efforts pécuniaires en faveur des Puissances étrangères aux cinq millions proposés pour subsides, ne saurait se charger de la dépense additionnelle qui tomberait sur elle si les Princes dont les contingens se trouvent à son armée seraient mis par la mesure proposée dans le cas de ne pouvoir subvenir à leur entretien.

"Qu'il ne lui restait par conséquent autre chose à proposer que de s'en tenir à l'arrangement qui paraissait d'ailleurs sous tous les rapports le plus équitable, celui de considérer les pays en question comme faisant partie du rayon assigné à l'entretien de l'armée dont leurs troupes font partie.

"Que MM. les Commissaires de Russie et de Prusse ayant cependant observés qu'un tel arrangement rétrécierait de trop les rayons destinés à la Russie et à la Prusse, la Grande Bretagne, pour terminer la discussion, consentirait à borner sa demande aux pays qui forment une masse compacte et contigue avec les Pays-Bas, savoir, le Hanovre, Oldenbourg, Brunswick, et les Villes Anséatiques. Qu'elle abandonnerait donc le pays de Nassau et la Saxe Royale (ou le pays dont les troupes remplaceraient les Saxons, dans le cas que ceux-ci ne feraient pas partie de l'armée du Duc de Wellington) à ses Alliés, en se chargeant de l'entretien de ces troupes, que les dites provinces en conséquent de cette arrangement ne seraient plus capable de fournir :"

Les Plénipotentiaires Britanniques croyent cet arrangement d'autant plus acceptable, 1er. parcequ'il abandonne près de la moitié du territoire qui, d'après le principe énoncé, devrait appartenir au rayon du Duc de Wellington, et qu'il causera une dépense considérable à la Grande Bretagne. 2e. Puisque le rayon Prussien, malgré la despoliation, restera fort considérable, lorsque ses propres sujets y compris jusqu'à l'Elbe seront, comme la stricte justice l'exige, compris dans le tableau. Ce principe a paru d'autant plus équitable aux plénipotentiaires de la Grande Bretagne, vu que l'armée Prussienne, en outre du territoire Prussien, occupe le Duché de Luxembourg.

Les Commissaires nommés par la Grande Bretagne sont en outre chargés de représenter que le taux fixé pour le payement des besoins de l'armée a paru aux plénipotentiaires Britanniques être trop au dessous de la véritable valeur des denrées; et que si l'impossibilité de payer un prix plus considérable avait pu être un argument pour le régler, tel qu'il est, que les subsides récemment accordés devraient le faire hausser.

Que convenant que la différence des principes adoptés par rapport au payement par l'armée Britannique pourrait causer des difficultés, lorsque les troupes des Alliés seraient appelées à passer sur son rayon, que dans ce cas le chef de l'armée Anglaise aurait égard à cette difficulté en facilitant l'entretien de ces troupes.

Il a d'ailleurs été observé que le Roi des Pays-Bays à l'heure qu'il est, fournissait en partie à l'entretien de l'armée Prussienne, malgré que Sa Majesté ne recevait aucun subside.

Qu'enfin, si le cas arriverait que l'armée du Duc de Wellington devrait empiéter sur le rayon de l'une des autres armées, qu'alors il serait disposé à se conformer aux régles établies par les Alliés.

ON THE STATE OF FRANCE.

From a Correspondent.

Paris, le 1 Mai, 1815.

Je ne puis vous répondre de mon écriture, mon cher ami ; et que ma mère, comme vous le savez, dont la plus grande inquiétude est de me perdre, me ménage, si j'osais, je dirais d'une manière ridicule. J'ai reçu votre lettre du 11 Avril, qui m'a fait un très grand plaisir. Si l'on nous trompe sur la manière de penser des Belges, on ne vous trompe pas moins sur l'esprit en général de la France, et surtout de celui de Paris. Il est bien vrai qu'il y a quelques départemens Buonapartistes et plus encore Jacobins qui voudraient profiter du moment de crise pour piller. Les provinces les plus acharnées sont la Bourgogne et la Champagne. Le Dauphiné se refroidit depuis le décret de mobilisation de la garde nationale. Enfin il est très clair que sur quatre départemens du midi il y en a trois pour le Roi. Mgr. le Duc d'Angoulême s'est conduit d'une manière admirable ; mais il a été trahi et trompé par le Maréchal Massena de manière à être pris comme un chat dans un souricière. Grâces à Dieu, il est embarqué, et notre malheureuse nation n'aura pas le crime de l'avoir assassiné comme elle a si cruellement fait d'une partie de son auguste famille. La Franche-Comté et la Lorraine sont aussi du nombre des provinces enragées, mais on peut dire que le reste de la France est pour le Roi. La Flandre surtout s'est montrée à merveille. Il est dur cependant qu'il faille avoir recours aux étrangers pour nous mettre à la raison. S'il n'y avait que Buonaparte à vaincre, je crois que cela ne serait pas difficile ; sa Constitution toute despotique n'est pas celle que le peuple et les militaires attendaient, et je tiens d'un inspecteur aux revues que depuis que cette Constitution a paru, Buonaparte a perdu un million d'hommes : il en perd aussi beaucoup par la désertion. J'étais hier à voir passer une revue de sa Garde et autres régiments : je vous donne ma parole, qui n'est pas une parole de maréchal (rébus du peuple), parole de bourgeois, qu'il y avait des compagnies qui n'étaient pas composées de plus de 30 à 40 hommes. Donc si on ne se battait que homme contre homme, les étrangers auraient sans contredit le dessus ; mais nous avons des moyens de séduction que je voudrais bien qui ne touchassent pas vos généraux, et surtout ceux qui commandent les places. Retenez bien cette phrase, mon cher ami : au nom de Dieu faites en usage surtout pour la grande ville qui vous avoisine. J'ai de fortes raisons pour vous dire cela, et vous, en bon citoyen, en véritable ami de votre pays, et pour le repos du genre humain, faites en usage avec tout l'esprit que je vous connais. Si vous avez lu l'extrait de l'Observateur Autrichien qui a été mis dans le Journal de l'Empire du 29 Avril, vous y avez vu l'exacte vérité sur le tableau de Paris, excepté toutefois qu'on dit que l'Empereur n'a pas été à l'Opéra, et qu'il y est allé ; qu'il n'a pas passé la revue de la garde nationale, et que cependant il l'a passée ; mais elle a été trois fois remise. Il est vrai qu'elle n'était pas nombreuse. Que résultera-t-il, mon cher ami, de l'état présent dans lequel nous sommes et de tout ce qu'il se prépare pour nous en tirer ? Quant à moi je n'y vois goutte, et je crains qu'il n'y ait prodigieusement du sang répandu. Ma mère répète toute la journeé, et je fais chorus avec elle, " Mon Dieu ! mon Dieu ! que nous sommes malheureux !" Ne me répondez pas que je ne vous ai écrit une autre lettre : aussitôt que je le pourrai, je vous donnerai de mes nouvelles ; si ce n'est pas moi, ce sera l'un ou l'autre de la famille.

Je n'habite pas Paris dans ce moment, mais je vais y envoyer cette lettre parceque je crois cette voie plus sûre pour qu'elle vous parvienne que si je la mettais à la poste du pays où je suis.

Je reçois à l'instant des nouvelles de cette grande ville, et on m'envoye une affiche de spectacle, plus un couplet répété à la halle par les bonnes dames de ce lieu. D'abord voici l'affiche.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 1st May, 1815.

I have the honour to inform you that a Dutch gentleman, who left Paris the day before yesterday, assures to have seen himself on that day a very strong column of French troops, which he estimates at about 40,000 men, taking the road towards Rheims, and he thinks they are destined for Metz and vicinity.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Vienna, 1st May, 1815.

I send you one of the copies of the Convention, in the form of an additional article, signed with each of the three Powers by me last night.

I have not yet given intimation to the Bavarian or any other Minister to apply to you for pecuniary succour. In truth, I fear that if once an intimation of this sort should be given, your Grace would bid adieu to anything like tranquillity : all would be open-mouthed at you. I purpose, therefore, in a confidential way letting it drop to M. de Reichberg, who has replaced M. Wrede here, that if Bavaria has any peculiar ground of claim to the small surplus we can spare, she must make application to your Grace, to whose exclusive direction the distribution is confided. If all who think they have claims were to fall upon you, there would be little hope of your having enough in hand wherewith to reinforce your own army, which to me, with sincere humility, it appears is the first and most important object. With respect to the Emperor of Russia, when his troops shall be once fairly engaged I shall have no objection to his deriving any advantage you can afford. His forces, however, are still far in the rear, having but just entered Silesia with the heads of his columns. Many here, and of some judgment, suspect that he has no great intention of committing himself, but, taking his position in reserve, in the heart of Germany, if the other troops shall have had success, to dictate the law without having incurred the risk.

Charles Stewart will write you the proceedings of the Commission of Subsistence, in which Messieurs les Prussiens show as much regard for the acquisition of what ought to belong to others as a proper attention to the conservation of what belongs to themselves.

My despatches will acquaint you with the progress of events here, and that conveying the protocols with a kind of paper war in which I am engaged with Hardenberg about the Royal Saxon troops, which ought to have been passed entire under your Grace's command, but which I fear will become for a time totally inefficient from the measure which the Prussian government have, in my mind, most improperly adopted towards them.

The Italian news continues good. The last accounts are of the 27th ult., when Murat was at Rimini, whence, if he should be allowed time, he proposed to embark his troops; but Neipperg, who was on the same day at Savignano, about half-way between Cesena and Rimini, proposed to attack him at this last place. Bianchi, on the 27th, was at Foligno.

Yours, my dear Duke, most sincerely,

CLANCARTY.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, War Department, 2nd May, 1815.

The Prince Regent has learnt, with a concern proportionate to the interest which he takes in the destinies of the House of Orange, the danger to which His Majesty the King of the Netherlands is exposed by having been induced so to model his army that it is for the greater part officered by persons who have been in the service of, and are generally supposed to be still attached to Buonaparte.

However favourable the people are to the House of Orange, all accounts agree that the army is constructed so as to authorise an expectation that the influence of the officers in general would be applied in a manner likely to produce the same dereliction of oaths and duty which has unhappily been manifested in France.

Had the officers entertained any regret at the part which necessity might have obliged them to take during the Revolution, far from complaining at the prohibition to wear the badges of servitude under a foreign yoke bestowed upon them by Buonaparte, they would have deprecated any measure which could bring to recollection that they had been ever forced to engage in it.

It cannot be expected that this unloyal spirit will manifest itself openly except in cases of disaster; but there is no war which is not liable to reverses, or any calculated to produce ultimate success which is not prepared for them.

Your Grace is well aware of the importance which we have always attached to the possession of Antwerp and Ostend, not only as the means of providing for our communications with the army, but as securing a retreat in case of mischance.

It is, therefore, very probable that His Majesty may be advised by those who were recently in the French interest to press for the occupation of these places, hoping either by our acquiescence to find a favourable opportunity to surrender them to the French, or, by our refusal, to create disunion between us and His Majesty.

However the latter is to be deprecated, the occupation of those fortresses by British commanders, considering the prevailing spirit of the officers of His Majesty's army, is so important, that the Prince Regent has commanded me to instruct your Grace to resist, with all possible respect, any demands which His Majesty may make to deliver up the command of Antwerp or Ostend to officers belonging to his service.

Militarily speaking, it is evident that our possession of these fortresses is most desirable for the security of our forces on the Continent. If there are any political reasons which His Majesty should urge against our occupation of them, your Grace is aware that the proper channel for the communication of any representations of that description is either through Sir Charles Stuart, or His Majesty's Ambassador resident at the Court of London.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 2nd May, 1815.

I have sent you a despatch, authorising you to decline the surrender of Antwerp and Ostend. I thought it desirable that you should have such an instruction to plead, as in your correspondence with His Majesty you appear to be willing to give them up if the Dutch officers are persons who had not served under Buonaparte. You are enabled in the despatch to make His Majesty over to Sir Charles Stuart, if he continues to press the matter unpleasantly.

I take it for granted that you will do what you please with the Dutch troops when you have advanced into France.

I am yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 2nd May, 1815.

Travellers from Paris say that Buonaparte was to leave that place to-day, and that they saw part of his equipages at Senlis, and that there was much movement amongst the troops from Cambrai towards the frontier.

DÖRNBERG.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 2nd May, 1815.

I think it not improbable that the Portuguese government may decline sending Portuguese troops so far from home as Flanders, but may not be disinclined to allow them to proceed, as a substantive force, to operate in the south of France. If this disposition should exist, would you object to it, agreeing to pay them as they would have been paid if they had joined your Grace? This has not been suggested to Mr. Canning hitherto, lest the Portuguese government should at once prefer it, and it is not to be wished that this proposition should be made until we know for certain that they had rejected our original proposal.

I am yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

The Adjutant-General to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 3rd May, 1815.

Having had the honour to lay before the Commander-in-Chief your Grace's letter of the 28th ultimo, with its enclosure, I have received His Royal Highness's commands to signify that the men whose period of service has expired must necessarily be discharged, as their services can only be continued under the authority of a Royal proclamation.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,

My Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and most faithful humble servant,

HARRY CALVERT.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 3rd May, 1815.

I just in this moment returned from Mons, where I could learn nothing more than what you are acquainted with. The fort is armed, and 300 men occupy it every night. I have sent the orders you desired me to Mons, Tournay, and Ghent. General Dörnberg is still at the first of these places waiting for orders whether to give over the command or not: he is there in this moment without troops, excepting some Hanoverian hussars.

For ever your most truly devoted

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

The Belgian cavalry is still without pistols and carbines; would you perhaps write for some from England? I did so, but received no answer.

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

[870.] To Earl Bathurst.

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 4th May, 1815.

I have received your letter of the 29th, enclosing one of the 27th, regarding the state of affairs in this country. I believe every word of what that letter contains; and I am sorry to say that I have every day more reason to be dissatisfied with the King, and with my situation here.

I have, however, this day sent him word by Nagell, that if he does not forthwith put me in a situation which shall enable me to guard the British interests from the effects of the treachery of those by whom he is surrounded, and he does not carry into execution the measures settled between us according to their spirit con amore, I will have nothing to say to him, and will carry on my concerns with his son as I do with Blücher or any other foreign General.

To tell you the truth, I am not very well pleased either with the manner in which the Horse Guards have conducted themselves towards me. It will be admitted that the army is not a very good one; and, being composed as it is, I might have expected that the Generals and Staff formed by me in the last war would have been allowed to come to me again: but instead of that, I am overloaded with people I have never seen before; and it appears to be purposely intended to keep those out of my way whom I wished to have. However, I'll do the best I can with the instruments which have been sent to assist me.

Ever, my dear Lord, yours most sincerely,

WELLINGTON.

G. O. Bruxelles, 4th May, 1815. [87

1. In future, if the army should not be marching, and the magazine should not be at a greater distance than six miles from the station of the troops, the horses are to be sent to the magazine to fetch the forage, instead of waggons being required to transport it to them.

WELLINGTON.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 4th May, 5 o'clock, 1815.

The insubordination among the Saxon troops, of which your Lordship was acquainted yesterday, at Tirlemont, continues to exist, and in some battalions to such a degree that it has been determined to have recourse to force in order to disarm those which have resisted the Prussian authority. In consequence, therefore, of the serious turn which this affair has taken, I have been desired through General Müffling to communicate with your Lordship on the following point:—Whether the battalions which it is intended to disarm and separate from the rest of the Saxon forces can, in the event of its being judged expedient, be accommodated with transports and embarked at any of the Dutch ports for such of the Prussian maritime places as may be hereafter resolved upon?

This question I have been desired to put for your Lordship's consideration; and the reason which induces Prince Blücher to think the measure may be an expedient one, is the little confidence at present to be placed in any of the other Saxon corps, and the risk which might result if the main body had any intercourse with the disarmed battalions; or at any rate, by referring this point to your Lordship, to have an additional alternative in the mode of sending these troops to the rear, should such be the indispensable necessity.

I shall now proceed to relate the Prussian account of this unpleasant business, which first broke out into open violence on the evening of the 2nd, and which originated in the arrangement that had been intended of transferring the soldiers individually, according to the partition of Saxony, the Prussians taking those soldiers of the districts ceded to their King; and this transfer was to be made by each regiment being divided into two battalions, one to be Prussian, the other to remain Saxon; of which the latter were to be sent to General Kleist's corps, and the former to be composed into a Prussian brigade, consisting entirely of Saxon battalions, in number expected to be 4500 men.

On the evening of the 2nd of May the commanding officers of corps were sent for by General Gneisenau to explain this arrangement, which they requested might not take place, but which it was decided should take effect on the following day, the 3rd; and whilst the officers were coming from this conference, a party of Saxon soldiers collected in the street before Prince Blücher's door, with shouts that they were soldiers of the King of Saxony, and would serve no other cause.

Upon the remonstrance of some officers, this party dispersed as suddenly as they had collected; and as the soldiers were principally of the Saxon Guards, the Prince gave the order that they should instantly leave the town for Namur.

Between eight and nine o'clock a stronger party of 400 or 500 men returned with their side-arms and endeavoured to enter the Prince's quarters, upon which there was the usual guard of a subaltern and 15 soldiers, who conducted themselves firmly in maintaining the doorway. During this tumult no Saxon officers, it is said, exerted themselves to repress the ferment, and the soldiers, after breaking the windows, returned to their quarters for the night.

An order had been given by Prince Blücher from the village in which he slept for the whole of the Saxon troops to quit Liège and march to cantonments in the neighbourhood of Verviers and Limbourg, excepting the battalion of the Guards, which was to march to Namur according to its first order, with the view, as being the most culpable, of having its conduct inquired into.

The next day, at noon, the troops marched upon the points directed, excepting two battalions, which, after much discussion with their officers, insisted upon following the battalion of the Guards ordered to Namur.

The Prussian General Grollmann, to prevent any disturbance in the town, permitted these two battalions to occupy cantonments on the left bank of the Meuse on the road to Namur, and they are now in the villages close to Liège in a state of irresolution as to their own measures, but in open disobedience to their officers, eight of whom have during the night been obliged to retire from their corps.

The expressions of disaffection used in the streets, and their cries of "Vive Napoléon!" can be easily attributed to the anger they at present feel at the proposed arrangement; but the greater mischief may be apprehended from the measure they are reported to have taken this day of deputing to the main body of their countrymen. The result of the communication is not known, although the officers have stated that they cannot answer for the obedience of their men if the arrangement be enforced.

The cavalry which were at Visé have been ordered into cantonments near Zittart, between Maestricht and Ruremonde, and have sent to this head quarters by their officers to declare their readiness to obey the orders they may receive.

The battalion of the Guard was yesterday at Huy, and there is no report of its having deviated from its march to Namur, though it is said the two battalions have communicated with it.

The Prussian measures are taken to march ten battalions upon Liège to occupy the town, and ten more battalions upon the cantonments at present occupied by the two battalions which have most obstinately refused obedience to the Prussian authority, and which it is intended should be disarmed to-morrow, the troops for that purpose being expected about one or two o'clock.

The total Prussian force ordered to march down the Meuse upon Liège is, therefore, twenty battalions, to provide against the possibility of the main body of the Saxons attempting to make common cause with the two battalions.

These two battalions, with the Saxon Guard, should the disarming be resorted to, will amount to nearly 2000 men to be sent to the rear. The total Saxon force is between 14,000 and 15,000 men; the part which Prussia expected from the transfer about 4500.

General Thielmann has entered the Prussian service, and is in command of the 3rd corps, in the vicinity of Luxembourg. A General Rüzell, since Marshal Blücher's arrival, has also worn the Prussian uniform; and the chief officers had already taken part with the Prussian government in all the arrangements it wished to carry into execution.

Although the officers have talked loudly in disapprobation of the dismemberment of their country, there is no reason to believe that they are directly concerned in the revolt of the soldiery.

I apologised for asking so obvious a question, as with regard to the steps of conciliation that had been taken, and with what effect; because this unfortunate difference was one of national feeling, and might be an error arising from an honourable motive on the part of the soldiery, and which, temperately explained, might terminate without farther mischief, but that the disagreeable consequences of urging 14,000 men to resistance might be very extensive. I was told the soldiery would listen to no expostulations at present, and that Prince Blücher, having received His Majesty's commands, would execute them; and that at any rate it was necessary to have the Prussian troops at hand. I trust, however, the reflection of the next four and twenty hours will moderate the resentments of both parties, and that the main body will not come to an open rupture.

I shall not fail to report to your Lordship to-morrow, at three or four o'clock in the afternoon, or earlier, should anything material occur.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 4th May, 1815.

A gentleman who left Paris on Monday morning reports that on Sunday morning two regiments of Buonaparte's Guards were sent in great haste into Bretagne. On Tuesday morning about 6000 men, also of the Guards, left Paris, and were destined to go with forced marches to Charleville; that all the troops from Cambrai, Douai, Valenciennes, all march by Avesnes and Solesmes in the direction of Givet and Charleville; that by the intelligence he was able to get, between 60,000 and 80,000 men might be assembled in that neighbourhood. All these troops march in great haste, and they are only allowed a few hours' rest. Nobody almost remains at Cambrai, Valenciennes, Bouchain, &c. Yesterday afternoon they have begun at Valenciennes to form the inundation.

This instant arrives one of my men from Guivrain, and informs me that this morning, at 9 o'clock, about 3000 men, coming from Condé and vicinity, marched by Guivrain to Bavay, and that more cavalry was expected to-morrow.

The troops that have passed Valenciennes do not exceed 4000 men.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Bruxelles, le 4 Mai, 1815.

Le Baron de Nagell m'a rendu compte de la conversation qu'il a eu ce matin avec vous. Je ne peux que regretter infiniment que des mésentendus occasionnent des difficultés qu'une explication franche préviendroit sur le champ. Dès votre arrivée en ce pays je me suis occupé de la manière convenable à remettre en vos mains un commandement que les arrangemens précédens me fesoient juger être déjà entre vos mains. Il a été écrit au gouvernement Britannique au sujet de la forme à donner à semblable mesure, et dans l'attente de la réponse j'ai cru ne pouvoir préjuger la question.

Connoissant maintenant vos désirs, je me suis empressé de passer sur toute autre considération, et je prendrai encore aujourd'hui les décrets dont traduction ci-jointe, pour autant que vous me ferez savoir qu'ils remplissent vos idées, je suis pret d'y porter toutes les modifications que vous jugerez convenable, attachant trop de prix au bonheur que mes fils ont de servir sous les ordres du grand capitaine qui a bien voulu former l'aîné, et à l'honneur et à la gloire que mon armée pourra recueillir sous votre commandement, pour ne pas aller au devant de vos désirs quand seulement je parviens à en avoir connoissance. Je me flatte que mon armée se rendra digne d'un pareil chef, et que vous prendrez à son égard les arrangements dont il a été précédemment question que vous avez jugé convenables, et de l'exécution desquels je ne me suis pas occupé, jugeant que le généralissime donneroit des ordres quand il le jugeroit nécessaires.

Recevez l'assurance de la haute considération avec laquelle je suis, my Lord Duc,

Votre affectionné,

GUILLAUME.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Vienna, 4th May, 1815.

Your Grace is already apprised through his Excellency Lord Stewart's despatch, No. 52, dated the 2nd instant, of the proceedings of the Commission of Subsistence, and of what passed at their last sittings on the 30th ult.

By an entry on the protocol of that date it was determined that the point concerning the rayons should be referred to the Cabinet Commission, and accordingly this matter formed the subject of a conference held yesterday morning at Prince Metternich's, at which, in addition to the plenipotentiaries usually assistant on the part of Great Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, his Excellency Lord Stewart and Count Münster were invited on the part of the first, and General Boyer on the part of the last. At this conference the whole subject came under discussion.

It appeared to us, and was so insisted on the part of your Grace's army, that without a positive instruction, either from His Majesty's government or from your Grace, it would be impossible for us to diverge from the usual practice of subsisting the British troops by faithfully paying for the several articles consumed by them.

We thought also, and so urged it, that those countries which afforded their contingents to your Grace's army, and whose geographic position did not interfere with the supplies of the other combined forces, should naturally be appropriated to the rayon whence your particular supplies should be drawn; and that it would be most unjust that while those countries should be subject to the charge of maintaining their troops at an advanced price while serving with the British army, they should also be subject to the additional surcharge of providing supplies to the other forces at a price far below their value, and rendered still farther inadequate from the mode and distance of the time of payment.

We therefore renewed the proposal made by Lord Stewart and Count Münster at the former Commission, that Hanover, Oldenburg, the Hanse Towns, and Brunswick, together with the kingdom of the Low Countries, limited, however, by the Meuse on the Belgic side, should form the rayon for the particular supply of your Grace's troops, and that the above states should be exempt from the operation of the forced system of supply resolved upon, previously to our having been even called in to assist at the discussions on this subject, for the other armies.

This, however, was strongly combated by the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian Commissions. It was insisted that these states could not be exempted from contributing to the supply of the other forces under the plan arranged for this purpose; that your Grace's rayon would thus become far greater than those assigned to the other armies; and that though the Allies were willing to spare part of the German contingents to act under your Grace's orders, they did not thereby intend to make over the countries from whence they were provided, so as thereby to lose to Germany the means for subsisting her forces which those countries could afford.

I confess that neither of these positions appeared to me to have the slightest foundation: for, first, there is no reason to prevent the rayons of Prussia, Russia, and Austria from being drawn as far eastward as possible, and thus rendering each far greater in extent and means than that which we proposed for the supply of your Grace's army, except one which appears to me extremely futile, viz., that the countries to the eastward of the Weser, &c., being appropriated to the reserves coming up, should therefore be exempted from being charged for any further supply; secondly, as to Germany sparing you her troops, or, as it was stated below, her blood, and having the right of reserving her countries. There is, in fact, at present no Germany, and consequently none who have any authority to dictate in her name.

It was, however, admitted to us that it would be unjust that Hanover and the other countries maintaining their contingents with your Grace's army should likewise be saddled with the loss of supplying the other forces at an inadequate price; and as the means of reconciling their demands on these countries with their views of justice, it was proposed that either Great Britain or the kingdom of the Pays-Bas should make good the loss suffered by these countries, under the double obligation of maintaining their contingent and providing supplies for the other combined troops.

The reasoning on which this proposition was maintained your Grace will see in a paper drawn up by M. de Stein, and submitted as the Russian answer to Lord Stewart's paper delivered in at the Commission below.

As far as this relates to Great Britain, the reasoning is so extremely absurd, its effects, which had escaped the views of the writer, if followed, so advantageous in a pecuniary point of view to Great Britain, though so detrimental and adverse to the very foundation of the Coalition, that the consequence of following it only needed to be stated, as it was by me, to be at once discarded.

I confess the reasoning, as applied to place this loss upon the King of the Low Countries, appeared to me equally unfounded.

Although in one respect it is certainly true that the subsistence of large armies, where full payment, as in our instance, is made for all articles consumed, will enrich the country, yet this is a species of wealth which I am certain very few Sovereigns or their people would covet, and am convinced that the King of the Low Countries would for his subjects be inclined to contribute largely to be exempted from it.

But it seems to be unjust, on the ground that it is, in fact, seeking to surcharge a state which contributes not only to the utmost of its means to the provision of its force, but to the entire maintenance and subsistence of that force without any support from the finances of others; and this in order to exonerate those who receive large subsidies from Great Britain.

Lord Stewart is, however, of opinion that the Low Countries may fairly be charged with this difference.

The charge against Great Britain ceasing to be pressed, the answer was easy with respect to the Low Countries, viz., that it was impossible for us to say anything with regard to the disposition of the King of the Low Countries to incur this charge. I, however, stated my opinion upon it; and the commissioners of Austria, Russia, and Prussia agreed to open a negotiation with His Majesty upon this subject, and General Vincent is to be immediately despatched with instructions to the ministers of the other Powers, in order that the negotiation should be commenced at Bruxelles.

I mentioned to Messrs. Humboldt and the others that they were to be aware that we had given no adhesion on the subject of the several rayons, and that I could not sanction the countries of Oldenburg, Hanover, Brunswick, and the Hanse Towns being withdrawn from your supply without directions from your Grace; and consequently that if they still insisted upon doing this, they had better instruct General Vincent and their other ministers to arrange this point with you. This they will do, subject, however, to the understanding that Hanover and the other countries above named should in the interim be subject to their system, which, as a preliminary and preparatory step, conditional upon the King of the Low Countries consenting to the arrangement, Count Münster has on the part of his Court consented to.

A conference of the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian commissioners, at which the Hanoverian minister is invited to attend, is assembled to-day, in order to draw up the instructions for General Vincent; and I have the honour to enclose a copy of the paper which Count Münster intends to give in at this meeting.

Although the arrangements adopted by the Commission of Subsistence profess to be entered into only for the space of three months, it appears to me extremely probable that if once put in execution their operation will continue till a period without limit.

Your Grace has now the whole of this matter before you. There certainly is some considerable difficulty in the case. The subject of subsistence for a combined army, composed partly of British and partly of other troops, acting as they have hitherto done on such entirely different systems, has always struck me as one of great embarrassment. In the campaign of 1794 it would be well to inquire whether this was not avoided by our conforming ours to the Continental system: how far this can now be done, or what shall be the course to be pursued upon this important subject, your Grace is far more competent to decide than those who have been assembled here on the part of Great Britain for a far different purpose.

I have the honour to be

Your Grace's most obedient and very humble servant,

CLANCARTY.

Lest your Grace should not have caused copies to be made of the enclosures in Lord Stewart's despatch, No. 52, I have the honour herewith to transmit copies thereof.*

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Note addressed by Count Münster to Committee of Subsistence.

Vienne, ce 4 Mai, 1815.

Le soussigné ministre de cabinet et premier P.P. d'Hanovre, quoique persuadé que le principe énoncé dans la déclaration remise au nom de la Grande Bretagne à la séance des commissaires chargés de régler l'approvisionnement des armées alliées en Allemagne, du 30 Avril, d'après lequel les pays dont les troupes font partie de l'armée du Duc de Wellington, et qui sont naturellement obligé de concourir proportionnellement à son entretien, devraient appartenir au rayon de cette armée et rester exempts de l'obligation de pourvoir à l'entretien des autres armées, et malgré qu'il considère l'objection élevée contre ce principe, par l'argument qu'en ôtant ainsi une population à peu près 1,800,000 âmes de l'Allemagne, les autres rayons deviendraient insuffisans pour fournir aux besoins des armées sur le Rhin, en partie comme exagéré, vu que ces pays sont en partie effectivement trop éloignés du théâtre de la guerre pour fournir à tems les denrées nécessaires pour les besoins des trois premiers mois dont il est ici question, ne saurait cependant se refuser de concourir, au nom de son gouvernement (sauf les conditions qui seront discutées dans la conférence sur l'accession des Cours Allemandes), à un arrangement que les Cours d'Autriche, de Russie, et de Prusse considèrent comme essentiel pour l'entretien de leurs armées, pourvu que la difficulté qui résulte de l'impossibilité de payer les prix établis à l'armée du Duc de Wellington et de fournir de même aux besoins des autres armées à des prix très bas, et payables seulement après un terme de 3 à 18 mois, soit levée :

Les dites Cours ayant résolu d'entâmer une négociation avec le gouvernement des Pays-Bas pour l'engager à se charger du payement de l'excédant des frais qui résulterait du mode de payement adopté à l'armée du Duc de Wellington contre celui des autres armées alliées (ce qui pourrait s'effectuer en fournissant tout l'entretien des troupes Allemandes et les transports aux Pays-Bas au prix fixé par la Commission susdite)—déclare : que pour éviter la perte de tems que cette négociation causera, le gouvernement d'Hanovre accède provisoirement aux arrangemens préparatoires dont on conviendra avec les autres Cours d'Allemagne, sauf à n'être obligé aux livraisons et fournitures de denrées ou autres charges pour l'entretien des autres armées qu'après que le Maréchal Duc de Wellington et le gouvernement des Pays-Bas auront consenti à l'objet de la négociation ci-dessus énoncée.

LE COMTE DE MÜNSTER.

La proposition faite aux Cours ou états d'Allemagne le 21 Avril contenu dans le 8, 19me. de concourir à la formation d'une caisse générale par laquelle les bons donnés pour les fournitures, etc., seront remboursés, ne saurait en aucun cas s'appliquer aux Cours qui fournissent leurs troupes à l'armée du Duc de Wellington. Lors même que le gouvernement des Pays-Bas se chargerait de les entretenir aux mêmes prix qui ont été fixé pour les armées Russes, Autrichiennes, et Prussiennes, ces sommes devront être payés aux sujets du Roi des Pays-Bas qui ne voudront pas le laisser assigner à la caisse générale dont il est question.

Protocole d'une Conférence des Cours d'Autriche, de Russie, et de Prusse, sur les Rayons de Subsistance à assigner aux Armées Alliées, du 3 Mai, 1815.

Séance des Trois Puissances, Autriche, Russie, et Prusse,

En présence de LL. AA. et EE.,—M. le Prince de Metternich, M. le Baron de Wessenberg, M. le Comte de Münster, M. le Prince de Hardenberg, M. le Baron de Humboldt, M. le Min. d'Etat Gén. Boyer, M. le Comte de Rasoumoffsky, M. le Comte de Nesselrode, M. le Comte de Capo d'Istria.

La Commission nommée pour régler ce qui est relatif à l'objet des subsistances des armées alliées n'ayant pas pu s'accorder sur la distribution des différens territoires qui devront fournir les vivres aux armées alliées, ce point a été remis à la décision des soussignés P.P. En ne faisant pas mention ici des points dont les membres de la Commission sont déjà convenus entre eux, il est clair que la question qui reste à décider est, si les pays de l'Allemagne dont les troupes sont destinées à appartenir à l'armée du Duc de Wellington peuvent et doivent faire partie d'un des rayons désignés pour l'armée Autrichienne, Russe, ou Prussienne? et que la difficulté qui s'oppose à cet arrangement est celle que ses troupes étant obligées d'après les règlemens faits par le Duc de Wellington d'effectuer leurs payemens en argent comptant et au prix marchand, ils trouvent trop onéreux pour eux de supporter encore la charge de fournir les vivres aux autres armées à un prix qui reste fort au dessous du véritable. On a cherché par cette raison de leur trouver une indemnité pour cette perte; mais il s'est présentée la double difficulté que les P.P. Russes, Autrichiens, et Prussiens ont déclaré que les subsides que l'Angleterre paye à leurs Cours, et qui sont à peine proportionnés aux immenses efforts qu'elles font, ne suffiront point pour en indemniser par là ces pays, et que les P.P. de la Grande Bretagne se sont trouvés si peu autorisés à offrir des facilités à cet égard, qu'ils ont déclaré au contraire que leur gouvernement n'était pas à même d'entrer dans ce nouvel arrangement pécuniaire.

Il a donc fallu reprendre plus haut la question, et aller jusqu'à la véritable cause des difficultés qui entravent dans ce moment la marche de cette affaire, et il a été aisé de voir que la différence des systèmes établis par l'armée Anglaise dans les Pays-Bas, et des autres armées alliées en Allemagne, est ce qui les fait naître. Les 4 grandes armées formant un ensemble, il serait juste et naturel qu'aussi tous les pays dans lesquels ils agissent fussent regardés comme un même théâtre de la guerre, et qu'ils fussent traités d'après les mêmes principes: sans cela il arrivera toujours que le gouvernement qui doit payer cher pour ses troupes et fournir à des prix plus que modiques pour celles des autres, ait de justes plaintes à porter; il est clair encore que la répartition des charges entre les différens pays sera entièrement inégale; et par cette double raison un pareil arrangement serait aussi injuste que nuisible au grand but de la guerre. Or c'est cependant là précisément ce qui existe dans les Pays-Bas et l'Allemagne. L'armée Anglaise et les troupes qui y sont jointes payent tout jusqu'aux transports et aux quartiers des officiers en argent comptant, et au prix marchand, tandis qu'en Allemagne les autres armées alliées, se voyant obligées à fixer des prix calculés sur leurs moyens d'acquittement, satisfaisant sous le point de vue que ceux qui fournissent aux armées, rentrent d'une manière sûre et prompte dans une partie de leurs déboursés, mais comme on ne saurait nier peu conformes à la véritable valeur des denrées.

On s'est arrêté à l'idée s'il n'y aurait pas moyen de rapprocher au moins en quelque façon les deux systèmes en rendant tous les prix des fournitures plus égaux. Mais on s'est bientôt convaincu que les Puissances Alliées sont hors d'état d'augmenter considérablement les leurs, et que toute tentative d'assimiler leurs armées à l'armée Anglaise sous ce rapport serait toujours vaine.

Dans cette situation des choses, où d'un côté il est juste que les Pays-Bas ne soient point seuls exempts des charges communes, et où de l'autre l'armée Anglaise ne demande point à changer son système, toute difficulté serait levée si les troupes Allemandes réunies à son corps d'armée étaient défrayées d'après les tarifs qui seront adoptés en Allemagne; et un pareil soulagement pourrait avoir lieu si le Roi des Pays-Bas bonifiait à ses sujets par des avances de ses caisses qu'il répartirait ensuite sur le pays entier, la différence qui existe entre le prix marchand payé par l'armée Anglaise et le prix du tarif des autres Puissances Alliées pour tout ce qui sert à la subsistance des troupes Allemandes récipiés à l'armée du Duc de Wellington sans être à la solde de l'Angleterre.

On est convenu généralement qu'il n'y a que ce mode pour sortir du présent embarras, et l'on a résolu de proposer à leurs Souverains respectifs de charger leurs ministres dans les Pays-Bas d'entamer cette négociation en priant les ministres d'Angleterre qui s'y trouvent, et le Duc de Wellington, de les appuyer dans leurs démarches.

Ces ministres devront surtout insister sur ces deux argumens de la justice de la demande et de l'impossibilité absolue de rassembler d'aussi grandes armées en Allemagne si l'on ôte de la concurrence pour les fournitures toute la masse des pays qui donnent des troupes à l'armée du Duc de Wellington. Les Puissances Alliées ne proposent dans cet arrangement que ce qui est fondé dans une parfaite réciprocité, puisque ce même mode de fournitures et ces mêmes prix sont adoptés dans toute la partie de l'Allemagne dans laquelle probablement les armées seront portées, ou qu'elles traverseront; et il est évident que sans cette conformité l'Allemagne serait privée des ressources que lui offrent les pays indiqués sans que le but de la guerre y gagnât en rien. Cette perte entière ne serait au contraire qu'à l'avantage des Pays-Bas seulement. Le Roi est certainement trop attaché à la cause qui réunit les Puissances dans la crise actuelle pour qu'il ne soit pas disposé à se rendre à la force et à l'évidence de ces argumens, et cela d'autant plus que la charge qu'il s'imposerait par là ne serait dans aucune proportion avec le grand intérêt que les Pays-Bas ont aux résultats de la guerre, et pas même avec les avantages qu'ils retirent des fournitures qu'ils font à l'armée Anglaise, et de la masse de numéraire que le séjour de cette armée met en circulation.

Si de cette manière la parité de système était établie pour toutes les troupes des Puissances Alliées et des Princes Allemands, les pays qui réunissent les leurs à l'armée du Duc de Wellington pourraient sans autre obstacle entrer dans la distribution des rayons en Allemagne; et comme il est urgent de ne point remettre la continuation des négociations avec les Princes et états de l'Allemagne jusqu'à la fin de la négociation avec le Roi des Pays-Bas, qui ne peut point être entamée ici, vu que ses ministres ne se trouveraient point munis d'instructions pour cet objet, le Comte de Münster a déclaré ne pas s'opposer à y entrer, en se réservant seulement de faire dépendre la prestation effective des fournitures du royaume de Hanovre de l'issue de la négociation projetée.

Le Comte de Münster a remis à cet égard une déclaration détaillée ici annexée au protocole sub lettera ZZ.

Marshal Lord Beresford to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Lisbon, 4th May, 1815.

The decision of this government has not yet been made on the demand of Mr. Canning for 12,000 or 14,000 men to go to you. They were to have discussed it to-day, and for that purpose had called upon the Marquis of Olhião and Ricardo Raimundo to assist their conference, as the first has not attended the Regency for some months on account of ill health, and the latter alleged it on the present occasion, if he had it not in reality.

I was also to have been called upon to assist this day, and was stopped for that object from going to Evora, as I had intended, to inspect the cavalry depôt. However, in the mean time despatches arrive from the Brazils, and of such a nature as are likely to perplex still more the Governors; and I suppose Dom Miguel has judged it right to see these despatches before the other question is decided, and has therefore put off calling upon me. The officer who brought them is intrusted with their contents, and he has in general communicated them to me. The Prince directs from 4000 to 5000 men to be sent out to the Brazils, with the object of acting over the Rio Grande and the Spanish frontier of Monte Video; and by private letters, which I have seen, from Araujo, they are extremely alarmed; and, in fact, he states that upon keeping things quiet there depends as well the security of Portugal as of the colonies; and he explicitly says that he thinks it would be very hazardous for the Court to leave the Brazils till this force arrives there. The alleged cause of the delay of the Prince to return here is to wait the decision of the Congress; but, from what I can see of the feelings there, it is to wait the arrival of this force demanded. You will immediately see that this demand will make a considerable alteration in the state of things here, and that it will furnish, beyond what it need, excuses to the government for not sending the force you wished to Flanders. They have shown themselves most decidedly averse to this latter, and particularly Forjaz; but, strange to say, he appeared to the officer who has arrived from the Brazils charged with this business still more averse to the Brazil than to the Flanders expedition, and even stated a falsehood, which is, that their plenipotentiaries had engaged them for 30,000 men towards the general cause. This kind of conduct is so strange that I know not what to make of it, nor what conclusion to draw, or even to guess at what they will finally decide.

I learn, from undoubted authority, that this government has acted to me in the most shameful manner in their correspondence with the Brazils; and that, as a secondary measure only, they requested the entire abrogation of my authority; and that, if I stayed here, that it should only be as a Marshal on the Staff and to command as senior General officer employed, without any other authority or privilege, but recommending in the first place, and especially, the dismission of every British officer, and to proceed without delay to adopt the French system of tactics and military exercise, as more adapted to the Portuguese character. Extreme intrigue was had recourse to, and every species of misrepresentation was employed there to carry their object, and emissaries had been particularly sent from here for the same purpose. However, the decision of Araujo coming in to assist the Prince's own strong inclinations, after, however, strong opposition, at length carried everything, and this government is, I am told, completely foiled; and that the Carta Regia, which they will read this day, is most full and explanatory on the subject and respecting me. From Antonio de Araujo I have got the most flattering letter—indeed, much beyond what I could expect a person in his situation to write to one he is personally unacquainted with; and, in one to Lemos, he says that not absolutely to discredit the government here, which policy dictates they should not do whilst they retain them, is the only reason they have not been more severe upon them; and the officer who is arrived, a cousin of Araujo, informs me privately that the cause of not changing the present Governors is, that the Prince fears it might create a belief here that he was not to return, which he is anxious should not be propagated. He is, in fact, most anxious to come back. To my brother there every sort of attention is shown; and all there, finding the disposition of the Prince, are now either silent or more generally loud in my favour and that of the English, and endeavour to pretend their admiration of me by their attention to my brother. But Araujo is the person who has fought the battle, and that against the Marquis of Aguiar and all the weight that could be sent from here. The government here is ordered to give me a copy of the Carta Regia, when I shall be able to judge better of the state of mind at the Brazils respecting me. What I have said is from what I am told, but from the person who has read all the papers and the Carta Regia. A frigate takes the mail to-morrow, and, if it should not sail, I hope to be able to tell you of the decision of the Regency relative to the troops. Sir George and Lady G. Berkeley go in the frigate.

Believe me, my dear Lord, yours most sincerely,

BERESFORD.

5th May.

The Regency sat very late yesterday, and I could only learn of their determination relative to the Brazil question, which is, comply and send the force required, which, as I understand, will not be more than 4000 rank and file. The mail is going off immediately, and I therefore shall not be able to tell you if or how they have decided the question of sending troops to you.

B.

[872.] To Earl Bathurst.

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 5th May, 1815.

Since I wrote to you yesterday I have had some reason to believe that I shall settle all these discussions with the King in a satisfactory manner, without resorting to the powers in your despatch. I will consult Sir C. Stuart upon the subject, and will write to you by the next post.

Till now I have no command whatever over the Dutch troops; and the screw with which I have operated upon the King is to threaten to make the real state of my relations with them known to the public and to the British government; but I believe now that I shall settle the matter in such a manner as that not only they will be effectually under my command, but that I shall be able to prevent any rascality in the garrisons by the King's revolutionary ministers.

I will not, however, give up the prospect of English governors in our garrisons, if Sir C. Stuart should think we can carry that object without difficulty.

Ever yours, my dear Lord, most sincerely,

WELLINGTON.

To the Right Hon. Sir Henry Wellesley. [873.]

MY DEAR HENRY, Bruxelles, 5th May, 1815.

I have but very little to tell you since my last. All the preparations are continuing actively, and we shall soon commence our operations with an enormous force.

Buonaparte has certainly no party in his favour excepting the army, and many of them, with the Jacobins, are looking to the Duc d'Orléans as a kind of middle term between Buonaparte and the Bourbons. Some of the Allies, including the Emperor of Russia, are looking the same way; but I am inclined to hope we shall establish the Bourbons after all, which certainly will afford us the best chance of peace.

Ever, my dear Henry, yours most affectionately,

WELLINGTON.

Marshal Prince Blücher to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Liège, le 5 Mai, 1815.

Je suis bien redevable à la bonté de Votre Altesse de m'avoir donné toutes les nouvelles qui ont eu lieu devant la chaîne de vos troupes, et je ne manquerai pas d'avertir, Monsieur le Duc, de tout qui se passera ici. Dans ce moment il n'y a rien de nouveau: l'ennemi est toujours dans la même position, excepté de petits mouvemens qui signifient rien, et presque de même force.

L'affaire avec les Saxons sera terminée aujourd'hui sans qu'ils ont osé de s'opposer aux mesures que j'avais pris.

Je vous prie, Monsieur le Duc, d'accepter l'assurance de la plus haute considération que j'aurai toute ma vie pour l'invincible héros Anglais.

BLÜCHER.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 5th May, 1815.

I have little to add to the long despatch which you will receive from Lord Clancarty on the subject of our Commission of Subsistence. If we differ in a trifling degree on the questions at issue, it is because no one is a bolder theorist or has more logic than Clancarty; but I know from practice a little of the gentlemen we have to deal with, and the system of their armies; and if we are to go on on cordial terms, I think we must neither oppose them too violently in their own systems, nor force upon them our ideas of justice in a country where they make war, to which we shall in vain attempt to wind them up. No radical reform is made at once. Changes take place little by little, unless there is an explosion and convulsion. Clancarty makes a calculation that our subsidies will maintain the Allied armies, but the governments and ministers of the Allied Powers will place those subsidies, in spite of all your efforts, to their great fund of expenditures; and though you may convince them of their injustice, and prove to them, as you have done heretofore, the advantage of an army acting under discipline and payment in the enemy's country, still it is too early to make the greedy Prussian, the needy Austrian, or the barbarous Russian come into your honourable and liberal mode of warfare. It is a great point to have established in some degree an arrangement; and although the prices fixed are very far under the value of the articles, I hail the plan as a shadow of organization and equity towards the resources of the countries. I think, however, we ought not to press our Allies too far at present. If, acting with your army, they perceive during the campaign the advantages of your system, they are more likely to adopt better payments and better regulations than by any arguments we may urge here, which are received with aigreur, and put to a different cause than the real one which gives them birth.

You will not get the Powers to give any part of Germany into your rayon. They say the position of Holland towards the sea affords more ample means of provisioning your armies than they can have by any arrangement. When I see a very determined opinion, when I know the nationality even of a Germany that does not exist, when I perceive all our Allies united against us, I would not fight the question, though it is best to give you the grace of yielding it. If, therefore, the Powers will not and those countries to your rayon that give their contingents to you, there are only two modes of releasing them from the impôt of subsidising their contingents at a very high rate (in proportion) with you, and furnishing their means to the other troops within their circle.

1st. To induce the Great Powers to consider their increased burthen, and to allow a part of the subsidies to be retained for their compensation; or,— 2ndly. To prevail on the King of the Low Countries to furnish those troops of Germany who pass into your army, at the same prices and rate that the German Princes are compelled under the regulation to provide them.

I look upon the first measure as impracticable; but I am free to confess —considering the high payments of an English army, the magnificence of the King of the Low Countries' possessions, the richness of his territories —that it is not demanding too much of him to put him, with regard to the maintenance of German troops, who are not able to pay as English, on the same limited receipt for their subsistence as is settled for all the countries on the Rhine. I think my colleague's partiality for Holland will not let him be just here. Suppose, even, the Allies were to go further, and to state that every country where they carry on war shall furnish for the common cause the means of their country at one settled price, I doubt whether, under our circumstances, it would not be just.

You may think, from what I have written, I have not been brought up in your school. I can only say that, however I worship your principles, I endeavour to give you my ideas of the practicability of working the machine here; and I again repeat I see the most feasible manner of levying our present difficulties is by inducing the King of Holland to enter into an arrangement that cannot be very burdensome to himself, and which, at any rate, Great Britain has a fair right to press upon him.

General Wallmoden has been with me since the receipt of your last letter. He urges me again to request of you a decision, if you can give him no hope of being employed in your army.

The Sovereigns leave this the 23rd.

Believe me ever, my dear Lord, yours most sincerely,

STEWART.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Vienna, 5th May, 1815.

Immediately upon the receipt of your Grace's despatch, No. 7, I communicated the same, with its enclosures, to Prince Metternich. He only returned me the papers last night; and from a conversation which I had with him on this subject I apprehend that however desirous he may be to rescue the Baron de Vitrolles from the situation described in M. de Blacas's letter to your Grace, he does not feel himself authorised to advise His Imperial Majesty to the step suggested in that communication.

I have the honour to be, My Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

CLANCARTY.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Vienna, 5th May, 1815.

My despatch No. 4 will put your Grace in possession of all the knowledge I possess respecting the affair of subsistence. The question is a difficult one, in consequence of our different systems; and I must own in the ignorant state in which I feel myself upon the subject—ignorant upon the matter itself, ignorant of your wishes upon it—I am not at all sorry that its arrangement is to be transferred to Bruxelles and made under your auspices. Believe me, however, that this arises from no wish to avoid trouble or responsibility, but from a consciousness that without much more information than I possess I am by no means in a state to do justice to what may be your wishes.

I have spoken to M. de Reichberg, the Bavarian Minister, respecting his application to your Grace for a part of the 2,100,000*l*. Marshal Wrede, while here, certainly made a bye arrangement with Austria, Russia, and Prussia, to participate to the amount of 30,000 men in any subsidy they should obtain; and I have reason to know that M. de Reichberg is endeavouring to enforce that arrangement. We must, therefore, take care that Bavaria does not become paid on both sides. I will endeavour to furnish you with whatever information I can obtain of the progress of M. de Reichberg's application to the other Powers, and your Grace will have the goodness to furnish me with the fact of such payments as you may propose to make from the 2,100,000*l*. to this Court. With respect to Russia, I must own I should wish to see her columns more advanced before any additional payments should be made to her, and should likewise fear that any additional demands on her part, allowed by us under any other circumstances than those of taking a part of her troops as part of our quota, would lay a ground for similar demands from Austria and Prussia, whose exertions are at least equally proportionate to their strength, and whose columns will be in the front of the battle. It is likewise a fact, which some of the Russians in authority have had the imprudence to let out, that His Imperial Majesty has been by the last, and hopes to be by the present, war enriched by our subsidies.

I had hoped to have been able to have sent off the messenger yesterday evening, with my despatch No. 4; but as I wished to accompany it with my despatches for England, one of which, No. 36, required a previous conference which I have not yet been able to obtain, neither shall till to-morrow morning, I have been obliged to postpone the departure of the courier till to-morrow. Do not, therefore, be surprised at the date of this letter and of the despatch addressed to you, or lay it to the charge of the messenger that he has been dilatory: the delay has been our friend Metternich's.

The last news from Italy is of the 27th ult. A battle is expected to have taken place at Rimini. Should any news arrive before the departure of the messenger, I will add it in a postscript.

Yours, my dear Duke, very sincerely,

CLANCARTY.

P.S. There are accounts from Italy of the 1st inst. If we had even a small fleet in the Calabrian seas, the business would be over with Murat; but, though unsuccessful by land, he is lord of those seas. Niepperg, on the 1st instant, was at Fano; in his advance there from Rimini by Pesaro to Fano he was much annoyed by Murat's gunboats. On the same day Murat and his wife (who, it seems, had joined him), with their Court, embarked at Ancona in three frigates. On the 29th ult. Bianchi advanced from Foligno on Tolentino. A complete communication was established between Niepperg's and Bianchi's armies. Nugent's army was at Rome, and he (individually) had been ordered to proceed to Sicily to see what efforts could be made in that quarter.

C.

Charles Long, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Whitehall, Army Pay Office, 5th May, 1815.

Mr. Herries called upon me soon after his return from the Continent, and I should have written to you upon the subject of the arrangement we talked over, but I rather wished to wait till it was finally settled, which I consider it now to be. Although, as the law stands, the Commander of the Forces is required to sign all warrants for pay, &c., and without which signature the auditors will not pass any account, yet in extensive commands I never could see why this troublesome duty should not be assigned to another person. The Treasury have now determined that such an officer shall be appointed, who will make out all the necessary documents from the returns and sign the warrants, so that you will be released from this unpleasant, and, as I have always thought, unnecessary trouble. Until this officer goes out, which I hope will be as soon as possible, I have written to my deputy to present as few warrants for signature as the service will admit of. The Treasury have also at length adopted another regulation, which I have long urged, that of releasing my deputy from being banker to the Commissariat, a duty which did not tend to the advantage of the public service, and only produced constant disputes between the two departments. With respect to Mr. Smith, the deputy with your army, I know nothing of him except having found him in this situation eight years ago when I came into office. If you are satisfied with him, very well; if not, upon receiving any intimation from you to that effect, I should remove him immediately. I will take up no more of your time, now pretty well occupied, except to say, Success always attend you.

Yours very sincerely,

CHARLES LONG.

The Right Hon. N. Vansittart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 5th May, 1815.

I was very happy to hear that the outline of our pecuniary arrangements for the Continental war, as communicated to your Grace by Mr. Herries, had met with your approbation. We have, since Mr. Herries's return, had much consideration of one of the points mentioned by you to him, and in which we have been extremely desirous of consulting your convenience as well as the advantage of the service: I allude to the inconveniences arising from the manner in which your attention is distracted and your time engaged in matters of civil detail relating to the army, such as the signature of warrants.

On consideration of the subject, it appears to Lord Liverpool and me that the most effectual way of relieving the Commander of the Forces, and at the same time of introducing regularity, system, and despatch into many of the minor branches of the service, would be to send out a Comptroller of Army Accounts to be attached to head-quarters, in whose office all the pay-warrants might be prepared and signed under the authority of a general warrant from your Grace; and the pay-lists and other details of the ordinary service, as well as much of the extraordinary, might be examined and checked.

For this purpose we should have sent out one of the present Comptrollers of Army Accounts, if one could have been spared, consistently with the health and convenience of those gentlemen, and the state of the business of their office. But as on those accounts it was not found practicable, we have been under the necessity of making a new selection; and the person we have fixed on is Mr. Rosenhagen, who was private secretary to Mr. Perceval, and has since his death assisted me in the same situation.

As he had for some time the charge of the military correspondence of the Treasury, he is by no means unacquainted with business of this nature; and I am sure Lord Liverpool (as well as every other person who knows him intimately) will concur with me in bearing the strongest testimony to his fidelity, zeal, and talents, as well as to his honourable feelings and gentlemanlike manners. I shall feel a great loss in the absence of a person upon whom I have been used implicitly to rely for the accurate and able management of the most confidential business, both in the finance department and of a more general nature, and who was no less in the confidence of Mr. Perceval; but I could not refuse to spare to the public service a man who seems to me so peculiarly qualified to be acceptable to your Grace, and serviceable to the public in the department you have pointed out.

If the general arrangement meets your approbation, the draft of his instructions shall be sent out for your consideration, subject to such modifications as experience may point out, and which the Treasury may sanction from time to time; and Mr. Rosenhagen will be directed to join the army and collect his establishment with as little delay as may be found practicable.

In order to remove any difficulties which Mr. Rosenhagen might at first feel with respect to details in a degree new to him, I have reason to hope that Mr. Erskine, the first Comptroller (whose character and merit must be well known to you), will be able to accompany him to the army for a short time.

Believe me ever, my dear Lord, most faithfully yours,

N. VANSITTART.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 5th May, 1815.

I have received and laid before the Commander in Chief your letter of the 2nd instant, and its enclosure from Major-General Sir H. Hinuber; and I have His Royal Highness's commands to acquaint your Grace that he entirely concurs with you upon the expediency of having divided the infantry of the Legion into two brigades, and of having placed them in separate divisions of infantry; and His Royal Highness is surprised that the Major-General should have conveyed any communication to your Grace in the shape of a remonstrance against so proper an organization.

Major-General Hinuber was originally appointed to the Staff in Brabant with the view, according to the then existing arrangement, of commanding the infantry of the Legion; but he could not in reason or propriety expect that such command should continue when the army in that country assumed a more extended organization: and though His Royal Highness puts a very high value on the Major-General's services, he could not consider himself justified in authorising that the Legion should be kept together in order that he should command them, when the good of the service requires that they should be differently organized.

Under these circumstances, should the Major-General's health require his absence at any of the German Spas, your Grace will be pleased to accept the resignation of his Staff appointment.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,
Your Grace's most obedient and faithful humble servant,
H. TORRENS.

[Enclose this answer to Major-General Hinuber.
WELLINGTON.]

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Grammont, 5th May, 1815, 9 P.M.

Sir Charles Broke is just arrived here, and informs me that your Grace has received a report of the country in the neighbourhood of Oudenarde having been inundated. I lose no time in stating to your Lordship that I am not aware that anything of the kind has been done: indeed I feel convinced that the report is not true. Your Grace's instructions to me on that point are perfectly clear: consequently I never could have had any intention to inundate the country until such a measure became absolutely necessary.

It is possible some accident may have happened to the sluices, or that our works about the town may have obstructed the course of the waters, or perhaps our engineers may have been trying some experiments to see if they could inundate the country near Oudenarde, in case they should be desired to do so.

I will, however, make immediate inquiries on the subject, and will not fail to report to your Grace.

I have the honour to remain your ever faithful servant,

HILL.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 5th May, 1815, 7 o'clock P.M.

The state of affairs with the Saxon troops is this day the same as I had the honour to report to your Lordship yesterday evening. There is, however, rather less resentment in the conversation of this head-quarters as the moment approaches of coming to a final issue with the revolted battalions. The same measures I stated to your Lordship are still to be pursued, and I apprehend the result will be nothing less than the loss of the services of the Saxon troops for the campaign.

The determinations of the day appear to be, that the twenty Prussian battalions which have arrived in the vicinity of Liège are in part, to-morrow morning, to surround and disarm the two battalions of Saxon grenadiers, whose colours it is intended to burn in front of the battalions, declaring them dissolved as unworthy by their conduct of being kept together as a military body. The ringleaders, or a few of each battalion, are to be shot.

Nearly the same proceeding is intended to be adopted towards the battalion of Saxon Guards, which, I am told, would not march from Huy till some Prussian battalions were actually formed to enforce obedience.

At the moment of carrying into execution these measures it is proposed to issue a General Order to the army informing the main body of the Saxons of the rigorous steps which have been executed, and that they are immediately required to obey the ordered arrangement for the transfer (according to the mode I mentioned yesterday), or that any battalion refusing will compel a repetition of the same measures.

If the whole body refuse to consent to the transfer, it is intended to march them immediately across the Rhine by Wesel.

If they consent, there are hopes that the present unfortunate agitation may subside, so as to render this body disposable in the field against the enemy; but there are now no hopes of bringing the detached battalions into better temper.

It is possible that these determinations, as they respect the main body of the Saxons, may be qualified according to the reports received of their disposition in the course of this night. Their officers have been instructed to employ this day in endeavouring to bring round the minds of the soldiery to the arrangement, which, by the Prussians, is now considered a point of honour and of discipline from which they cannot recede. But in any event the three battalions which are separated are to be disarmed and punished.

By every information I have been able to collect from Prussian and Saxon officers, it appears that there are slight hopes of the main body assenting to the transfer: their spirit of resistance is reported to be firm, though it has broken out into no excesses against their own officers, as in the case of the detached battalions, one battalion of the three having driven away all its officers but four, who are said to make common cause with the soldiers. These battalions have sent to their countrymen at Verviers this day, but nothing has transpired of the success of the deputation.

The cavalry have marched to Zittart, and are at present tranquil.

I ventured again this morning, in a private conversation with Generals Müffling and Grollmann, to restate the reasons which, in my judgment, might palliate, without however justifying, the conduct of the soldiery; and that, under the present circumstances, it might be more politic to yield in a certain degree to the unanimous feelings of 15,000 men until their King released them formally from their allegiance, rather than push them to an extremity, with the chances, as they admitted, against the success of their arrangement; that if the battalions would not allow their own officers or the Prussian officers to approach them, they might be inclined to listen to a third and disinterested party in their quarrel, and abide by the arbitration; and I wished by this course to afford an opening of reference to your Lordship. But, after thus far feeling my way, I found I ought to desist. I was told they had attempted only to accomplish legitimate objects, to which even the Saxon officers could not object in point of right; that the outrage committed on the Commander in Chief, who confided his person to their honour, required atonement, as well as discipline an example; that these battalions, after what had passed, could be of no use this campaign; and the only chance of the remainder performing service in the field was by crushing this spirit, and enforcing the arrangement, or sending them away.

In short, my Lord, the exasperation is at such a height that, in any favourable turn this affair may take, I don't conceive the troops of the two countries can serve together.

I hope I shall be excused for having entered upon a subject not exactly within the limits of my duties at this head-quarters; but as the conversation was entirely private, it appeared to me it would do no harm, and might have been of advantage.

The military dispositions made in the course of this day are the following:

General Zieten's corps to concentrate in the neighbourhood of Fleurus.

General Börstell's at Namur (deducting the twenty battalions around Liège).

General Bülow's (the 4th corps) has been ordered from Coblentz to Malmedi, where it is to arrive on the 11th, on which day it will be 14,000 strong, and on the 13th 23,000 or 24,000 strong.

General Thielmann's corps (the 3rd) will, on the 7th or 8th, be concentrated at Arlon.

With regard to intelligence of the movements of the enemy on this front, I cannot ascertain that there is any information to be relied upon excepting some reports, not of a very clear nature, that the enemy is collecting a large force in the neighbourhood of Maubeuge. I requested to have a copy to forward to your Lordship of such a report, but I believe the stated collection at Maubeuge comes from your Lordship's neighbourhood rather than in front.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 5th May, 1815.

I enclose Lord Melville's letter, which will fully explain to you the footing on which the seamen are to be placed when they have joined you.

If there are any official orders with which it will become necessary for me to furnish you, let me know, and they shall be sent.

If the wind continues as it now is, you will, I hope, have your troops from Ireland by Tuesday next.

Yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Viscount Melville to Earl Bathurst.

DEAR LORD BATHURST, Admiralty, 5th May, 1815.

There would be some legal difficulty in employing a body of seamen with their officers on shore unless as a detachment from a ship. By Act of Parliament they are only amenable to naval, and not to military discipline or courts martial; and in order to subject them to naval discipline and the authority of naval officers they must be borne on the books of some ship. The following is the arrangement therefore which I have directed as the least troublesome or inconvenient to the Duke of Wellington, and the most likely to answer his purpose effectually.

The Euryalus frigate, which is recently arrived from the coast of America, and is unfit for service at sea, will be ordered immediately to Antwerp, and will have on board a sufficient number of supernumerary officers and active seamen to furnish the required detachment. They will proceed from thence to wherever they may be ordered, leaving their ship in charge of the first lieutenant and men enough with a few marines to take care of her. The captain, Charles Napier, is a very intelligent officer, and I believe perfectly adapted to the sort of service on which he is going to be employed: he will accompany the 200 seamen, and will also have under him a master and commander, four lieutenants, eight midshipmen, and a few petty officers. There will also be a purser, who will provide for the payment and clothing of the people. The Duke of Wellington, therefore, will not have occasion to give any other order than that the officers shall have the same extra allowances (if any such are issued) as military officers of corresponding ranks, and that the same rations shall be served out to the men as to the corps with whom they may be serving. We shall send a surgeon and his assistant; and as we have no establishment of field medicine-chests, they may perhaps require a little supply of medicines. The Commissary-General also should be directed to give Captain Napier or his purser cash for their bills on the Navy or Victualling Boards. We shall direct the Euryalus to be furnished with great coats, knapsacks, and other articles of that description which will be required and are not usually furnished to seamen, and the Captain will have orders as to the payment of his party. I hope they will be useful; and if the Duke finds them to be so, and wishes for more, they shall be sent to him. The official communications to the above effect will be sent to you in a day or two.

Believe me ever yours most truly,

MELVILLE.

The Grand Duke of Baden to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Vienne, ce 6 Mai, 1815.

Après une guerre aussi désastreuse pour mon pays que celle qui vient de se terminer, je me trouve hors d'état de soutenir les efforts qu'exigera celle qui va commencer, et à laquelle je prends une part active en conformité au traité d'alliance que je viens de signer avec les hautes Puissances Alliées, sans les secours de Sa Majesté le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne. Je me suis adressé à cet effet à Lord Castlereagh, et il vient de me donner la réponse dont j'ai l'honneur de joindre une copie à Votre Excellence. D'après l'avis des hautes Puissances Alliées, d'après le conseil même des ministres plénipotentiaires au Congrès de Sa Majesté Britannique, je m'adresse à Votre Excellence, en la priant d'agréer ma demande de me faire participer aux deux millions dont la distribution vous est abandonnée. Je la prie d'accueillir à cet effet les propositions que j'ai l'honneur de transmettre à Votre Excellence par mon aide-de-camp général, le Général-Major Baron de Franken. Je lui soumettra la réponse originale de Lord Castlereagh, ainsi que tous les renseignemens qu'elle désirera se procurer sur l'état actuel de mes troupes. Je le charge en remettant la présente à Monsieur le Duc d'être l'organe des sentimens d'admiration que je ne cesse de lui vouer, et qu'il inspire à si juste titre. Je serai très charmé de pouvoir ajouter ceux de la reconnaissance à l'expression de la considération la plus distinguée avec laquelle je suis,

Monsieur le Duc, de Votre Excellence le très dévoué

CHARLES.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Viscount Castlereagh to His Serene Highness the Grand Duke of Baden.

SIR, Foreign Office, 17th April, 1815.

I lost no time in laying before the Prince Regent the letter which your Serene Highness did me the honour to address to me on the 30th ult.; and I am commanded by His Royal Highness to express how highly he appreciates the sentiments and principles by which your Serene Highness's conduct is influenced under the present circumstances of Europe, and to transmit to you for your information the enclosed copy of a note verbale by which your Serene Highness will perceive how fully determined the Prince Regent is to make every practicable exertion to aid the efforts of the Continent for its own preservation and permanent security.

I have the honour to be, with the most distinguished consideration, Sir,

Your Serene Highness's most obedient and humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

II.

Foreign Office, 17th April, 1815.

The Prince Regent, under the present circumstances of Europe, will not fail to make every practicable exertion to aid the efforts of the Continent for its own preservation and permanent security.

With this view His Royal Highness, in the treaty of the 25th ult., has stipulated to give a subsidy of five millions sterling to aid Austria, Russia, and Prussia in bringing their numerous armies into the field, which will much exceed their quota of 450,000 men.

Great Britain farther engages to furnish 150,000 men as her own contingent, or to pay a commutation in money for deficiencies at a rate specified in the treaty. This commutation will somewhat exceed 2,000,000*l.* sterling, which may be considered as an increase of subsidy to the Continent beyond the 5,000,000*l.* before referred to.

As this fund must be applied to secure the residue of the quota which Great Britain is bound to supply, the distribution has been placed altogether in the hands of the Duke of Wellington, trusting that his Grace will, in the exercise of this discretion, render it subservient to the general interests of the Alliance, as far as may be consistent with the above object.

The Allied Powers will no doubt justly appreciate the magnitude of the exertion which the Prince Regent is disposed to make at the close of so long a war, when, in addition to the charge of an army of 50,000 British troops now assembling in Belgium, His Royal Highness proposes to assist the exertions of the other Powers with a subsidy of not less than 7,000,000*l.* sterling for the service of the year.

6 Mai, 1815.

Nous avons fourni depuis le commencement d'Avril jusqu'à ce jour 10 numéros, qui contiennent à peu près tout ce qui s'est passé d'important à Paris durant ce laps de tems. Ce qui regarde la guerre nous a paru l'objet le plus essentiel, et nous lui avons donné toute notre attention. On peut compter sur l'exactitude et la vérité de ce que nous avons dit à ce sujet. Il n'est pas probable qu'on fasse de nouveaux changemens dans l'organisation de l'armée, à moins qu'ils ne soient nécessité dans la suite par les chances éventuelles de la guerre.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, War Department, 6th May, 1815.

I do myself the honour to transmit, for your Grace's information and guidance, a copy of the instructions which have been given by desire of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to the Hon. Captain Napier, whom their Lordships have appointed to direct a corps of seamen intended to serve as pontoneers with the army under your Grace's command.

I have the honour to be

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

The Right Hon. J. W. Croker to the Hon. Captain Napier.

SIR, Admiralty Office, 5th May, 1815.

It being the intention of His Majesty's government that a corps of seamen shall be employed to serve as pontoneers with the army in Flanders under the command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, and my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty having thought fit to select you to command the said corps, which will consist of the number of officers and men as follows, viz.:

1	Post Captain	One half of these classes are ordered to be prepared at Sheerness and sent to the Downs.
1	Commander
4	Lieutenants
4	Mates
4	Midshipmen
1	Surgeon
1	Purser
1	Boatswain
1	Carpenter
4	Boatswains' Mates
4	Carpenters
4	Gunners
200	Able and ordinary seamen

the whole of whom, with the exception of yourself and 100 of the seamen who are to be sent from the Euryalus, are to be borne as supernumeraries on the books of that ship for wages and victuals in the usual manner, except when landed, when they are to be borne with wages only: I have their Lordships' commands to acquaint you therewith, and to direct you to observe the following instructions for your guidance on this service.

When the corps is on shore the officers and men are to be victualled in the same manner as the corps of the army with which they may be appointed to serve, and the purser is to act under your orders as commissary to the corps, and to supply them with slops, and also to provide such small articles in addition to the usual rations as you may judge necessary for the health or comfort of the men.

You will be considered as entitled in all respects to the same allowance as the colonels in the army; the commander as major; the lieutenants as captains; the mates as lieutenants; the midshipmen as ensigns; the boatswains and carpenters as serjeant-majors; and other petty officers as serjeants: the men are to have an additional pair of shoes, two pair of worsted stockings, and a watch coat in addition, without being charged for them, and they are also to be furnished with a knapsack and canteen.

Their Lordships cannot be prepared to enter into all the details of this complicated service, but they are pleased to authorize you to take such measures as you may from time to time judge necessary, and particularly for placing the officers and men on the same footing as the persons of corresponding ranks in the army; and the Commissary-General with the army will be directed by the Treasury to communicate with the purser, and furnish him with money for his bills on the Commissioners for victualling, which are to be approved by you.

The 100 supernumerary seamen, with a proportion of boatswains, carpenters, and gunner's mates, will be put on board the Euryalus in the Downs on her way from Spithead to the Scheldt, for which you may shortly expect to receive their Lordships' orders.

I am, &c.,

J. W. CROKER.

John Roebuck, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, London, No. 101, St. Martin's-lane, 6th May, 1815.

I beg leave to inform your Grace that I have lately provided, by orders of the Honourable East India Company, some iron carronade howitzers, with trunnions (24-pounders), weighing only 13½ cwt., mounted on strong, but light and simple, block trail carriages, of my construction, which being highly approved of by the Military Inspectors of the Company, have been sent by the ships of this season to every presidency in India.

These guns being short, but very strong, and admitting a larger charge of powder than the more costly 5½-inch brass howitzers, are found to produce a far longer range of their shot, and are therefore more particularly adapted than the latter to the firing of Colonel Shrapnel's destructive shells.

The whole equipment of this piece of iron ordnance (24-pounders), carrying only a few rounds of shot on its limber to commence the action, would not weigh more than about 32 cwt., requiring only four horses to draw it.

If guns of this power and superior portability, and provided at a smaller comparative expense, should merit your Grace's favourable opinion, so that you should be pleased to signify your wish to Lord Bathurst (to whom I have the honour to be known) to have a supply of them, I could engage to provide the quantity required with all possible expedition; the whole equipment of iron, wood, and leather being provided of the best materials for the purpose.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,

My Lord, your Grace's most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN ROEBUCK.

[Compliments; and I do not consider this to be a proper period to alter the equipments of the army or to try experiments.

WELLINGTON.]

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 6th May, 1815, 7 o'clock.

I had the honour of receiving your Lordship's letter of 4 P.M. of yesterday early this morning.*

I read it to General Gneisenau, who said the principle recommended for the disposal of the Saxon troops completely met his ideas, and he appeared much gratified at your Lordship's view corresponding with his own.

The desire, however, to embark the disarmed troops is so strong that an officer will be sent this night to General Röder to renew the application to your Lordship for transports; or if they cannot be had, to make arrangements that these battalions may be disposed of in the direction of Antwerp until vessels can be procured. The reasons which are stated for this decided preference in the mode of getting rid of the mutinous troops are, that, in the present temper of the main body of the Saxons, it would be dangerous to march the mutineers within reach of any further communication; that the escort required by land is an inconvenient diminution of their force under present circumstances; that the traversing a large tract of Germany with such a body of disaffected German troops might be of very impolitic effect in the present times; and that the conveyance by water promises to obviate these difficulties.

The anxiety thus to dispose of them is so great that, although I immediately showed the passage of your Lordship's letter in reply to the request for transports, nevertheless orders have been since given to march the three battalions to St. Trond and Tirlemont.

General Röder will be instructed fully to explain to your Lordship the views and wishes of the Prussian head-quarters, and also to furnish a detailed explanation of the whole of this Saxon business. I acknowledge I have been inclined to give a cautious admittance to some statements, because, whatever may have been the real sentiments of the Saxon soldiery, it is evident there has been no conspiracy; and when I hinted in private conversation the policy of conciliatory measures with 15,000 men, it was on the principle that the body of the soldiers were acting on a misconception of their duties, not having received any authority from their own Sovereign; and also because the warmth of Prussian feeling rather inverted the state of the case, making the disaffection appear to be the origin, and the transfer the inferior cause, of the mutiny. The conduct of these troops has since been so mutinous on every point of military communication, that the getting the better of such a spirit has become an important point, and appears to have been accomplished with the three battalions with judgment and every proper consideration.

The Prussian battalions marched this morning to the cantonments of the two revolted battalions. The Saxon officers were desired to withdraw, and also the soldiers who were on guard in the town on the evening of the tumult, and who in every instance observed their duties. These were separated and marched with their arms into the town.

The two battalions when ordered laid down their arms.

The order to give up the ringleaders was received in tears and silence.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 349.

But it was explained that if each battalion gave up four leaders of the mutiny, it would be the means of preventing the shooting of one man of each company. Four were therefore produced of one battalion, and three of the other.

The seven men were shot; and the eighth, who was taken by lot from a most culpable company, being a very young man, was pardoned by Prince Blücher.

At Namur orders have been given for disarming the battalion of Saxon Guards and burning the colours, but no men to be shot, the conduct of this battalion since the 2nd not having been so culpable.

The annexed address has been sent to the main body of the Saxons, whose disposition is reported to have been during the day very variable, some battalions consenting to the transfer by companies, but not by battalion.

We have no distinct intelligence of the enemy in our front.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Soldaten des Sächsischen Armee-Corps!

Lüttich den 6 May, 1815.

Schauderhafte Verbrechen sind aus Eurer Mitte hervorgegangen. Mit Vertrauen hatte ich mein Quartier bei Euch aufgeschlagen, als ich von einer Rotte Rebellen die ihren Offizieren den Gehorsam aufgesagt hatten, und drei Tage im Aufruhr beharrten, meuchelmörderisch angefallen wurde.

Soldaten! Ihr würdet beschimpft, Eurer National-Ehre verlustig, vor ganz Europa erscheinen, wenn ich Euch nicht das ehrenvolle Zeugnisz geben müszte, dasz Ihr das Gefühl des Abscheues gegen eine verworfene Rotte, welche die erste Pflicht des Soldaten, Gehorsam gegen seine Offiziere verletzen konnte, hinreichend ausgedrückt hättet.

Ihr habt mit Vertrauen auf mich darauf gerechnet, dasz ich die Ansprüche, die Eure Ehre und die Kriegesgesetze zu machen berechtigt sind, erfüllen würde. Ihr habt Euch nicht getäuscht.

Das Grenadier-Regiment hat aufgehört zu seyn.—Die von ihm entehrte Fahne ist verbrannt worden, und dem Verbrechen ist die Strafe auf dem Fusze gefolgt.

Soldaten! fahrt fort auf die Stimme Eurer Offiziers zu hören, sie sind nich allein berufen, Euch am Tage der Schlacht zu führen, es gehört auch zu ihren Pflichten, für Euer Wohl und die Erhaltung Eurer Ehre zu sorgen.

Ich kann Euch dann meinen Beifall nicht besser zu erkennen geben, als wenn ich zur Erhaltung Eures bis jetzt noch unbefleckten Namens fortfahre, diejenigen der Strenge der Gesetze zu überliefern, die Verführer oder Verführte, es wagen sollten, den Soldaten-Ruhm durch Frevelthaten zu beschimpfen.

BLÜCHER.

The Chevalier d'Artez to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, 6 Mai, 1815.

Si je n'avais été réellement malade et hors d'état de pouvoir écrire, je n'eusse pas autant retardé de remettre à Votre Excellence le rapport qu'elle m'avait permis de mettre sous ses yeux. Je désire, My Lord, que Votre Grâce le reçoive avec bonté, et qu'il lui donne une preuve de ma constante sollicitude pour une cause qui intéresse également nos deux pays.

Je suis avec respect, My Lord,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE CHEV. D'ARTEZ.

P.S.—Je vous supplie, My Lord, d'excuser les fautes et les ratures qui se trouvent dans le Rapport. Si j'avois eu un secrétaire, j'en eu fait faire une copie plus correcte.

RAPPORT fait à Son Excellence le DUC de WELLINGTON sur la SITUATION de PARIS depuis le 20 Mars jusqu'au 19 Avril, 1815.

Bruxelles, Avril, 1815.

Soumis au décret du 13 Mars, qui obligeait tous les Français rentrés avec le Roi à sortir du royaume, je pris un passeport comme propriétaire pour me rendre en Hollande, décidé cependant à rester à Paris le plus long tems possible pour voir, observer, et connaître quelle sensation aurait produite la présence de Buonaparte sur l'esprit de la capitale et de l'armée. Les 15 jours accordés pour sortir de France étant à peu près expirés, je présentais une pétition au ministre général de la police, pour lui dire que le mauvais état de ma santé ne me permettant pas de voyager, je demandais qu'il me fut accordé un sursis d'un mois. Je n'eus point de réponse. Mes amis craignant que je fusse arrêté, et que ma position ne devint dangereuse si on découvrait que j'étais au service d'Angleterre, me pressèrent pour que je fisse une seconde tentative, ou que je ne perdisse pas de tems pour sortir de France. J'adoptai le premier parti par la raison que j'étais décidé à ne quitter Paris qu'après que la revue de la garde nationale serait passée. Elle eut lieu le Dimanche 16; et quelque exagération que l'on ait mise au nombre d'hommes qui y étaient et aux applaudissements qu'ils y prodiguèrent, les faits positifs sont (j'ai tout vu par moi-même) que tout fut froid et calme, et qu'il n'y avait pas plus de 7000 à 8000 hommes sur 30,000 dont le corps est composé. La garde à cheval ne voulant pas passer la revue s'étoit licenciée elle-même.

La première légion fut remarquable par son froideur. Dans les autres il n'y eut point d'exaltation; mais les journalistes ont eu raison de dire que l'air avait retenti des cris "Vive l'Empereur!" Pour cela on avait placé en dedans du Carrousel tout le long de la grille une multitude d'officiers à la demi solde, et derrière eux deux rangées d'hommes de la plus basse classe du peuple. Tous ceux-là gagnèrent leur argent comme tous ceux qui pour 20 ou 30 sols vont tous les jours à certaines heures sous les fenêtres de Napoléon, qui se montre de tems en tems à une croisée, pour remercier son bon peuple de l'amour qu'il lui témoigne.

Buonaparte craignant avec raison que la garde nationale ne fut en petit nombre à la revue indiquée, a été obligé de la renvoyer 3 fois. La première il donna pour raison que la Vieille Garde et toutes les troupes de la garnison de Paris donneraient un dîner au Champ de Mars à toute la garde nationale. Cette réunion pouvant avoir des inconvénients, je fus chez un capitaine de la garde nationale pour lui dire qu'elle aurait dû refuser d'y aller puisqu'il était probable qu'on aurait le désagrément de savoir qu'elle avait crié "Vive l'Empereur!" "Soyez tranquille," me dit-il; "nous avons décidé de n'envoyer que 12 hommes par compagnie, et nous avons choisi ceux qui nous connaissons être pour Buonaparte! Cette mesure a été adoptée pour éviter quelque rixe si d'autres avaient crié 'Vive le Roi!'"

Le Dimanche 9 avait été fixé pour la 2de. revue. La veille on rendit une ordonnance pour annoncer qu'elle ne se passerait que le 16, parceque le terrein n'était point assez étendu pour passer en même tems dans le Carrousel celle des troupes de ligne.

Le 10, nouvelle ordonnance pour faire savoir que les citoyens qui n'auraient point d'uniforme seraient reçus dans les rangs, et qu'on les verrait avec plaisir, n'importe de quelle manière ils seraient vêtus. Buonaparte avait également fait faire beaucoup d'habits pour les distribuer à ses nouvelles recrues. Les chefs de la garde nationale ayant su que Napoléon n'avait d'autre but que d'avoir beaucoup de monde, déclarèrent que ne reconnaissant pour gardes nationales que les hommes qui étaient sur leurs contrôles, ils ne recevraient que les individus qui y étaient inscrits, et que si on les obligeait à en recevoir d'autresils n'iraient point eux-mêmes à la revue. Buonaparte n'insista point, et la revue se passa sans amalgame.

Deux jours avant que la revue ne se passat on était à Paris dans une inquiétude affreuse. On se disait à l'oreille que Buonaparte y serait assassiné; que 30 hommes en avaient fait le complot. Cette annonce fit partir de Paris prodigieusement de monde le Vendredi et le Samedi. Le tyran n'était pas sans inquiétude; aussi au moment de passer la revue fut-il ordonné de faire l'inspection des armes. Celle du détachement de 60 hommes qui monte habituellement la garde au château est faite cinque fois par jour. Pendant toute la revue Buonaparte montra tant de crainte, tant d'embarras, que quelques généraux qui l'entouraient en furent honteux pour lui. Un grenadier étant sorti du rang pour aller lui présenter un mémoire, il lui défendit d'approcher. A 30 pas de là, quatre autres ayant fait un mouvement en avant, il montra de l'effroi, piqua son cheval, et courut le long de la ligne.

Après l'arrivée de Buonaparte à Paris, sa Vieille Garde venue avec lui de l'île d'Elbe fut établie à l'hôtel des Cents Suisses, dans la cour du Carrousel. Il fit mettre au dessus de la porte cette inscription, "Quartier des Braves." Les troupes de ligne trouvèrent l'épithète offensante, on se donna quelques coups de sabre, et l'inscription fut enlevée.

Plusieurs chefs de la Garde Nationale ont donné leur démission. M. de Montesquiou s'est empressé de reprendre sa place; le Général Dessolles a déclaré qu'il serait fidèle à son serment.

Buonaparte avait envie de désarmer la Garde Nationale; il ne l'a pas ôsé. Il avait adopté un moyen pour y parvenir; c'était d'avoir rendu une ordonnance pour que toutes les Gardes Nationales eussent à porter leurs armes à la municipalité pour y être marquées. Les premiers qui exécutaient l'ordre ayant redemandé sans succès leurs fusils, les autres, voyant le piège qu'on leur tendait, n'ont pas voulu y porter les leurs. Tous les moyens employés ne réussissant pas, et Napoléon se voyant obligé de conserver la Garde Nationale telle qu'elle était, a cru que pour s'en rendre maître il devoit y nommer des officiers généraux et particuliers qui lui fussent dévoués. C'est ce qu'il a fait par son ordonnance du 4 Avril.

Les Ministres.

Les individus qui ont d'abord composé le ministère étaient sans doute convenus de leurs faits, puisque leurs noms insérés dans le Moniteur du 21 furent connus le 20 Mars, quelques heures avant l'arrivée de Buonaparte, à l'exception de celui du Ministère de l'Intérieur, que le nouveau venu voulait donner à M. de Montalivet. Carnot le sut; il fut aussitôt chez son maître, et lui dit: "Vous voulez nommer M. de Montalivet au Ministère de l'Intérieur; je dois vous prévenir que nous sommes convenus que ce serait moi qui le serait." Carnot fut nommé de l'instant.

Le ministère n'est pas parfaitement d'accord. Rovigo et Bassano seraient pour les moyens violents; les autres croyent les mesures tempériés plus utiles. Quoique toute cette administration ait le maintien du Jacobinisme, à l'exception de M. Gaudin, Ministre des Finances, qui est un honnête homme, elle ne laissera pas prévaloir, si elle le peut, le système des Jacobins; il est possible cependant qu'elle les mette momentanément en action pour assurer davantage son autorité par la terreur. Tous les hommes en place, à l'exception de Carnot, ont des fortunes immenses; et, comme me le disait le Comte de Barthélemi, ancien président du Sénat, "Ne croyez pas que Fouché, qui a deux cents mille livres de rente à la porte de Paris, veuille en faire cadeau à la canaille."

Le ministère ne voudrait pas la guerre. Fouché et Caulaincourt s'étaient flattés de détacher l'Angleterre des autres Puissances; et Carnot, en acceptant le portefeuille, dit à Napoléon que la France avait besoin de repos. "Cela est vrai," dit-il; "mais il nous faut la Belgique."

Quand on connaît le caractère de Buonaparte on voit clairement qu'il est maîtrisé par son ministère. Les faits suivants le prouvent. Il avait fait une liste de 50 proscrits dont les biens devaient être confisqués; les ministres l'ont réduite à 13.

Il rendit un décret le 25 Mars contre les Princes de la maison de Bourbon, leur maison civile et militaire. Quelques ministres, Fouché et Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely, s'opposèrent autant qu'ils le peuvent à la publication: elle n'eut lieu que le 8 Avril.

Il avait ordonné que tous les Français rentrés avec le Roi eussent à sortir de France dans 15 jours, et Fouché et Réal donnent des permissions de rester à tous ceux qui en demandent. Cette opposition à la volonté de l'homme qui n'éprouva jamais de résistance doit nécessairement emmener un choc entre les deux partis. Ou les ministres secondés par les Jacobins renverseront Buonaparte, ou ce sera lui qui avec son armée, dont il a fait une garde prétorienne, fera arrêter les ministres qui entravent son pouvoir.

Il était question à Paris de proclamer la République. Carnot, fanatique outré, insistait pour le projet, auquel Fouché donnait son assentiment. Je suis certain que Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely a dit, "Nous aurons la République, mais elle ne durera pas longtemps." On pense assez généralement que l'armée s'opposerait à cette forme de gouvernement.

Buonaparte voulait d'abord de la conscription, les ministres l'ont refusée; il demandait un emprunt forcé de 30 millions sur Paris, on lui a dit que la n'était pas possible.

Les Maréchaux, les Généraux refusent de servir; beaucoup de colonels et d'officiers particuliers ont donné leur démission; il les accepte, et n'ôse pas punir. Tout prouve donc que son autorité n'est pas la même, et qu'il ne se sent pas assez de force pour contrarier à un certain point les ministres qu'il s'est donné.

Quand je suis parti de Paris il n'était sorti que trois fois des Tuileries. Un jour il voulait aller au spectacle: Fouché lui ayant dit qu'il ne répondait de rien, il n'y fut point. Il couchait rarement au château ; au moment de mon départ il paraissait décidé qu'il habiterait l'Elisée Bourbon.

Pour donner une idée de l'esprit infernal des hommes qui gouvernent, des moyens qu'ils comptent employer pour se faire des partisans, se donner de la popularité, et nuire à la personne du Roi, j'ai la certitude que, sachant que depuis 10 mois beaucoup d'émigrés rentrés étaient en souffrance parceque leur sort n'avait pas été fixé, ils s'occupaient de vouloir leur donner le même traitement qu'ils avaient en Angleterre.

M. l'Evêque d'Agen ayant fait demander indirectement si, vu son âge et le mauvais état de sa santé, il lui serait permis de rester à Paris, Fouché répondit qu'il en était entièrement le maître ; qu'il était inutile qu'il fit une demande particulière, mais qu'il lui envoyat seulement la liste des évêques qui comme lui auraient le désir de rester, et qu'il s'empresserait de les satisfaire.

Parlant un jour de l'étrange événement qui avait eu lieu, il dit, "Les pauvres Princes comme ils ont été trompés," etc.

L'Armée.

L'armée n'a plus de discipline ; une partie est honteuse de sa conduite ; les officiers ôsent à peine exercer leur autorité. Le fait suivant, dont je garantis l'authenticité, le prouvera suffisamment. Le premier régiment de cuirassiers, qui est dans le moment-ci à Lille ou dans les environs, avait hésité pour passer du côté de Napoléon : un escadron passa d'abord ; les deux autres se disputèrent entre eux ; il y eut même quelques coups de sabre donnés ; mais l'adresse, les propos, et la fermeté de quelques officiers particuliers les enlevèrent, et tout le régiment, fort de 500 hommes, vint à Paris passer la revue, et se rendit le soir même à Gonesse. Buonaparte, voulant récompenser les officiers qui avaient décidé la défection de ce régiment, fit un chef d'escadron major, et trois officiers particuliers chefs d'escadron. Le jour d'après les quatre officiers furent à Gonesse pour se faire recevoir dans leur nouveau grade. Les cuirassiers refusèrent de les reconnaître ; ils prétendirent qu'ils avaient mérité autant qu'eux une récompense ; et que comme on ne leur en avait accordé aucune, ils ne les reconnoîtraient point. Le lendemain le régiment eut ordre de partir en toute hâte pour Lille. Les cuirassiers excitèrent les habitans principalement contre le major nouvellement élu. La populace court sur lui, s'insulte, le couvre de boue ; lui jette des pierres et le blesse, au point qu'il ne peut point partir. Dans ce régiment 14 officiers ont donné leur démission ; le colonel Cristophe est du nombre.

On commettrait une grande erreur si on comptait la force de l'armée Française par le nombre de ses régimens. Ceux de cavalerie au complet de guerre sont de 1000 hommes à cheval et 200 à pied ; en temps de paix ils ne sont que de 800 à cheval et 100 à pied. En les mettant aujourd'hui l'un dans l'autre à 300, ce n'est pas les affoiblir : j'en ai vu qui n'avaient pas 200 hommes.

Les régimens d'infanterie qui ont été les premiers à Paris sont plus forts que les autres, mais dans le nombre de ceux qui ont passé depuis un mois dans la capitale je les ai tous vus former 14 pelotons, ne marchant que sur deux de hauteur pour donner plus d'étendue à la colonne. Les pelotons de grenadiers ont de 18 à 20 files, et ceux de fusiliers 10, 12, ou 14, ce qui fait au plus 368 hommes par bataillon. Les 3mes. bataillons n'ont pas plus de 200 hommes. On emploit certainement depuis un mois toute sorte de moyens pour les augmenter.

Plusieurs officiers que j'ai consulté, et entr'autres le Lieut.-Général Carra St. Cyr, chez qui j'avais un rendez-vous la veille de mon départ, me dit que le matériel de l'armée manquait absolument ; que Buonaparte n'avait pas plus de 16,000 chevaux ; qu'il croyait positivement que l'armée Française en état de combattre n'était pas de plus de 130,000 à 135,000 hommes, et que dans le Nord il ne devait pas y avoir plus de 45,000 à 50,000 hommes. Le Général, très bien pensant, m'avait donné une lettre de recommandation pour son ami à Valenciennes, le Lieut.-Général Pamphile la Croix, chef de l'état major de l'armée. Le Général m'offrit tous ses services ; et comme il savait par son ami que j'étais militaire, il me parla des apparences de guerre : je lui dis que tout semblait l'annoncer d'après le mouvement de troupes qui se faisait. "Nous avons," me dit-il, "80,000 hommes depuis Maubeuge jusqu'à Lille, et cette armée l'augmente chaque jour." "Cette force est imposante," lui dis-je (je ne l'ai pas crue telle qu'il a bien voulu me l'assurer) : "si vous en avez autant sur d'autres points de la frontière, et surtout depuis Basle jusqu'à Strasbourg, la France n'a rien à craindre." "Là," me dit-il, "nos forces ne sont pas considérables, mais Huningue et les autres places sont en bon état et bien approvisionnées ; et comme nous comptons sur la neutralité de la Suisse, qui sûrement ne laissera pas violer son territoire, nous aurons toujours assez de force pour défendre le passage du Rhin."

L'esprit de l'armée n'est pas aussi mauvais qu'il l'a été d'abord. Officiers et soldats avaient cru à la durée de la paix ; voyant qu'on se prépare à la guerre, ils disent qu'on les a trompés ; ils le disent encore davantage depuis qu'ils savent que Marie Louise, qui devait arriver le 4 d'Avril, et couronnée au Champ de Mai, est arrêtée par l'Empereur d'Autriche, sur la coopération duquel ils croyaient pouvoir compter.

Pour prolonger l'illusion et gagner quelques jours, le 4 ou le 5 d'Avril Buonaparte fit partir des Tuileries et sortir de Paris 3 voitures de la Cour : on fit circuler qu'elles allaient chercher l'Impératrice. Les crédules donnèrent dans le piège, mais au bout de quelques jours le peuple fut désabusé.

M. de Caulaincourt, dans son rapport à son maître, ayant déclaré que ses courriers n'arrivaient point à leur destination, et que toutes les Puissances semblaient se préparer à la guerre, la certitude que l'on a eu du renvoi de tous les Français attachés à Marie Louise, l'arrestation de M. de Montesquiou à Vienne, et l'arrivée à Paris de Me. de Ferensac, ont fait dire à une partie de l'armée, et à beaucoup de Buonapartistes, "Nous avons donc été trompés." Depuis ce temps-là (le fait est certain) il est prodigieux combien d'officiers et soldats ont acheté de pièces de ruban blanc ou des cocardes blanches. Celles que l'on fait aujourd'hui aux trois couleurs sont doublées de blanc, ce qui fait qu'en les retournant on a une cocarde blanche. On avait d'abord cru, et on était venu m'en prévenir, que c'était peut-être quelque nouvelle trahison que l'on méditait. J'observai que si on avait formé ce projet, c'eut été sans doute les chefs de corps qui seuls auraient été chargés d'ourdir cette nouvelle perfidie.

Buonaparte ne doutant point qu'en se montrant à ses soldats il les électriserait, voulut que tous les régimens destinés à former l'armée du Nord passassent à Paris. Quand plusieurs corps étaient réunis dans la capitale il en passait la revue, bien sûr d'avance qu'ils crieraient "Vive l'Empereur !" Mais qu'est-il résulté de ce calcul inspiré par l'orgueil ? Que presque tous les régimens sont partis de Paris moins bien disposés qu'ils ne l'étaient en y arrivant. Quelques jours de séjour dans la capitale ont suffi pour les éclairer. La joie qui en est bannie, le mécontentement exprimé par tout le monde, la dépopulation considérable de la ville, la difficulté que l'on fait partout pour loger les officiers, le mauvais accueil qu'ils éprouvent, les propos que l'on tient aux soldats sur leur conduite, l'arrivée de la guerre au lieu de la paix qu'on avait promise, le refus de la majorité des Maréchaux de servir, beaucoup de Généraux, Colonels, et officiers particuliers ayant donné leur démission, tout cela fait non seulement réfléchir ceux dont l'âme est encore susceptible de quelque remords, mais il en résulte que l'armée est honteuse et indécise, et qu'il ne faudrait qu'une bataille perdue ou un événement marquant pour en ramener une partie. Deux faits certains, c'est qu'un régiment d'infanterie caserné au Marais a crié toute une nuit "Vive le Roi!" quelle chose qu'aient pu faire les officiers pour s'en empêcher. Un autre revenant du dîné donné au Champ de Mars à la Garde Nationale passant dans la rue de Babilonne et entrant dans celle du Buc se permit la même chose. En tout l'armée tient à peu de chose un revers marquant la déciderait. Le Maréchal Ney était venu à Paris pour dire à Napoléon que s'il ne venait pas à l'armée il ne répondait pas que tous les régimens voulussent se battre; sur le désir qu'il témoigna d'y aller Fouché lui observa que s'il exécutait le projet il ne répondait pas de la capitale.

Les officiers à la demi solde sont plus insolens que les autres: ils se montront en foule au Palais Royal, dans les lieux publics; ils sont dès 8 heures du matin par milliers dans le jardin des Tuileries. Les grenadiers et chasseurs de la Vieille Garde, qui sont tous à Paris, sont tranquilles; ils n'ont pas l'air content; ils sont beaucoup moins mauvais que les officiers qui les commandent.

De la Guerre.

Comme nous l'avons déjà dit, les ministres ne veulent point la guerre. Si en la déclarant les Puissances alliées se montrent avec des forces imposantes, et qu'elles fassent connaître franchement leurs intentions, il leur sera probablement fait des propositions dans l'espoir de suspendre les hostilités. Mais quelles seront-elles ces propositions? Sans doute de renvoyer Buonaparte, puisque les Alliés ont déclaré ne plus le reconnaître, et de mettre à sa place une nouvelle forme de gouvernement, qu'ils se flattent de faire accepter aux Puissances. Les meneurs ont varié dans leurs projets. Le plus soutenu a été celui de la République; on a fait l'essai de quelques bonnets rouges; ils n'ont pas eu le moindre succès. Un jour c'était un dictateur, le lendemain un triomvirat, le 3me. Buonaparte se contentant du titre de Généralissime; le 4me. Lucien devait être, sous le titre de Régent, l'administrateur des droits de son neveu; enfin, c'était la France divisée en trois républiques fédératives, ou bien M. le Duc d'Orléans appelé par les Jacobins. On aurait bien certainement cessé de s'occuper de tous les partis, de nouvelles constitutions, d'idées libérales. Si la noble résistance de Monsieur le Duc d'Angoulême et le courage héroïque de Madame Royale n'avaient été obligés de céder à la perfidie et à la trahison, j'ai la certitude que deux lettres de Madame la Duchesse d'Angoulême interceptées par Fouché lui ont arraché cet aveu, "Qu'il n'avait jamais vu plus d'élévation, un plus grand caractère."

Il est évident que tous les meneurs ne pensent qu'à trouver un moyen qui satisfasse les Puissances étrangères; et comme de préférence à tout ils veulent conserver leur rang et leur fortune, leur unique but est d'empêcher le retour du Souverain légitime, parcequ'ils savent bien que sous lui leur existence ne saurait être douteuse. Ils proposeront donc, il faut l'y attendre, une nouvelle forme de gouvernement dans l'espoir de séduire les Puissances et d'arrêter le mouvement rapide de leurs armées. L'expérience a trop éclairé les Souverains pour qu'ils ne soyent pas convaincus qu'il n'y aurait jamais pour eux de sûreté si la France restait soumise aux hommes perfides qui la gouvernent.

Si la campagne qui va l'ouvrir débute comme cela est nécessaire par un succès marquant, si c'est surtout dans le Nord que le Duc de Wellington gagne une bataille, la défection de l'armée Française pouvant en être le résultat, la guerre ne serait pas longue. S'il en était ainsi, une partie des forces alliées contenant l'armée rebelle dans le Nord, qui empêcherait le héros de Angleterre de marcher sur Paris avec un gros corps de cavalerie?

Ce qui faciliterait le plus les succès du Nord serait une diversion que ferait deux corps d'armée: l'un, entrant par Basle, menacerait les départemens qui l'avoisinent ; l'autre, pénétrant par Chambery et se dirigeant sur Lyon, paralyserait tout le midi de la France. Mais ce qui contribuerait le plus à provoquer une explosion générale serait que M. le Duc d'Angoulême, secondé par les Espagnols, pénétrât en Languedoc, et que Madame Royale rentrât à Bordeaux avec un corps de troupes que la Grande Bretagne lui confierait.

Il est, je crois, de la plus grande importance que les hostilités commencent avant la tenue du Champ de Mai. Cette jonglerie ne procurerait pas à Buonaparte plus de moyens de défense, mais elle lui donnerait une force d'opinion qu'il est essentiel de lui enlever.

Dans cette guerre-ci Buonaparte ne se conduit pas comme dans les autres. Son point d'appui, sa force imposante, était toujours sa Vieille Garde. Aujourd'hui elle n'est point à l'armée, elle est toute auprès de sa personne pour favoriser sa retraite en cas d'événement. Ce que je sais d'une manière positive indique assez le projet que l'on a formé d'avance. Voici le fait. Un préfet bien dévoué à Buonaparte avait été destitué par le Roi. Quinze jours avant mon départ de Paris il fut nommé au département de la Haute Loire. Intimement lié avec M. Réal, il fut le voir avant son départ pour la ville du Puy, chef lieu de sa résidence. "Mon cher," lui dit le conseiller d'état, préfet de police, "partez bien vite ; organisez promptement votre département ; nous pourrions bien vous aller joindre dans 5 ou 6 semaines." Effectivement si Buonaparte était forcé, soit par un mouvement à Paris ou par la marche rapide des armées alliées, à quitter la capitale, la position du Puy serait pour lui la plus sûre pour résister, et la plus avantageuse pour favoriser son évasion. En prenant la route d'Orléans, et se dirigeant ensuite sur Bourges, Clermont, et Issoire, il arriverait au Puy, ayant toujours son flanc gauche couvert par la Loire. Rendu au Puy, il n'aurait qu'à traverser une chaine de montagnes, où un corps peu nombreux protégerait sa marche. J'ai fait cette route depuis le Puy jusqu'à Sommières, près de Nîmes ; elle est presque impraticable avec une voiture très légère. Rendu sur le Gard, il pourrait se porter sur Cette ou sur Aiguesmortes, où il aurait préparé d'avance les moyens de s'embarquer soit pour aller en Amérique, ou sur la côte d'Italie, pour se réunir à Murat.* Il n'est peut-être pas inutile que l'Angleterre surveille cette partie de la côte de France, ou toute autre ; car Buonaparte, serré de près et voyant le danger, cherchera à s'évader.

Si, comme je l'ai déjà dit, l'armée Française est bien battue dans une première action, je ne doute point que la désertion, ou même la défection, ne soient considérables. Mais quelle mesure adoptera-t-on alors à l'égard des officiers que la crainte et l'intérêt bien plus que les remords auraient engagé à déserter individuellement ou à passer avec leur troupe du côté du vainqueur ? Je ne me permettrai point de donner mon opinion à cet égard. Le Roi et le Duc de Wellington décideront sûrement dans leur sagesse ce qu'il importe de faire dans une circonstance où des officiers ont prouvé par la violation de leur serment, par leur conduite perfide et déshonorante, qu'on ne doit ni ne peut compter sur eux.

Il n'est pas douteux que beaucoup de généraux Français ou des fonctionnaires publics ont des propriétés considérables dans les départemens qui seront d'abord occupés par les armées alliées. Comme les Puissances n'ont pas à craindre les représailles, je demanderai si dans la proclamation qu'elles feront probablement en ouvrant la campagne elles ne pourraient pas dire que, décidées à respecter scrupuleusement les personnes et les propriétés, elles dé-

* On voudra bien observer que le rapport fait aujourd'hui étant seulement depuis le 20 Mars jusqu'au 19 Avril, il est tout simple que jusqu'à ce que les Autrichiens aient eu des succès, Buonaparte ait cru que Murat serait pour lui d'une grande ressource, puisqu'au moment de sa déclaration de guerre on ne doutait point en France qu'il n'eut pour lui toute l'Italie.

clarent cependant que les ministres actuels de Buonaparte, que les généraux qui commandent ses armées, que les fonctionnaires publics, ne pouvant être considérés que comme traîtres, rebelles, et ennemis de leurs pays, auront leurs biens, meubles et immeubles, séquestrés, confisqués, s'ils ne quittent sur-le-champ les places qu'ils occupent.

Les moyens de rigueur sont devenus nécessaires, puisqu'il est bien prouvé que le sort que la France éprouve n'est que le résultat de trop de bonté, de trop de douceur; que l'on soit juste et sévère observateur des lois; mais qu'on punisse les méchants; que les traîtres, que les grands criminels soient anéantis, la religion, la justice, la sûreté publique l'exigent.

Principales Causes de la Stupeur de la France et de la non Résistance que les Français ont mise à l'Arrivée de Buonaparte à Paris.

Lorsque Buonaparte se décida à rentrer en France, ses émissaires n'avaient rien négligé pour changer l'opinion des départemens. Les moyens secrets qu'ils employèrent sont ceux dont se servent publiquement aujourd'hui ses ministres. Les auteurs principaux de la conjuration n'ont pas même eu la pudeur de voiler leur conduite. Après avoir préparé les esprits dans les ténèbres ils ont rompu la glace, et ce n'est qu'à l'aide du mensonge le plus révoltant qu'ils sont parvenus à tromper le peuple, l'armée, et à desservir le Roi en dénaturant ses bonnes intentions. Leur triomphe, il faut l'espérer, ne sera que momentané; c'est l'exagération du rapport des ministres et du conseil d'état qui éclairera les hommes les plus prévenus. C'est la proclamation du 10 Avril, où le Ministre de la Guerre a eu l'impolitique de dire à l'armée, "Vous avez voulu votre Empereur! Vous l'avez," qui contribuera le plus à prouver à 25 millions de Français que leur vie, que leur fortune, que leur existence politique et religieuse, tiennent uniquement à la volonté d'une soldatesque infidèle et parjure, et que les malheurs qu'ils éprouvent ne sont que les résultats du funeste abus que l'on a fait de leur crédulité.

Les ministres actuels, aussi profonds en talens qu'en scélératesse, sentirent que pour se faire des partisans il fallait blesser l'amour propre des uns, exciter des craintes chez les autres, et parler à l'intérêt de tous. Pour cela, ils proclamèrent avec assurance que le Roi violait journellement la Constitution qu'il avait donnée; que la liberté des citoyens était compromise; que la féodalité était remise en vigueur; que les dîmes étaient rétablies; que le clergé catholique prêchait l'intolérance, et tourmentait les consciences; que les acquéreurs de biens nationaux étaient dépossédés; que l'armée était humiliée; que toutes les places étaient données à l'ancienne noblesse; que les officiers à la demi-solde n'étaient point payés; que les trésors de l'état étaient dissipés; que toutes les faveurs étaient pour les émigrés; et qu'enfin le despotisme le plus absolu était exercé sur toutes les classes de citoyens.

Pour mieux s'assurer de l'armée on lui avait promis de grandes récompenses et 20 années de paix. On lui avait assuré que Marie Louise allait arriver; que l'Autriche devait mettre toutes ses forces en mouvement pour soutenir ses droits; et que Buonaparte, avant de partir de l'île d'Elbe, s'était assuré de l'Angleterre. Tous ces bruits répandus dans les départemens comme ils le furent dans la capitale y produisirent un mauvais effet. Dès lors la résistance fut foible ou parut inutile, puisqu'on avait à lutter contre une armée en défection et deux grandes Puissances qui applaudissaient au retour de Buonaparte. Combien n'a-t-on pas vu à Paris de personnes raisonnables qui croyaient à ces absurdités?

Tels sont les moyens dont se sont servis les scélérats. Si Buonaparte peut parvenir à ne plus être maîtrisé par ses ministres, on peut être assuré qu'il n'exercera son autorité que pour bouleverser encore l'Europe, et faire le malheur de la France.

Esprit et Situation de Paris.

Quoique le décret rendu à Lyon m'obligeat à avoir quitté Paris le 27 de Mars, je n'en partis que le 19 Avril. Le désir que j'avais de voir passer la revue de la Garde Nationale, et de connaître l'effet qu'aurait produit sur les habitans de la capitale la transition subite d'un gouvernement doux et paternel à un régime tout Jacobin, me décida à braver le danger pour pouvoir rendre compte au Roi et à Lord Wellington du véritable état des choses.

Buonaparte, sachant d'avance quelles étaient les dispositions de Paris, ne voulut y entrer qu'à 8 heures du soir, pour qu'on ne vit point la classe d'hommes qui avait été au devant de lui. Ce n'était absolument que la réunion de la plus vile canaille, beuglant comme on peut l'imaginer pour l'argent qu'elle avait reçu. Son avant-garde, d'environ 200 hommes, ferait horreur, soit par sa mine, soit par sa tenue. M. Sebastiani, marchant avec une 20me. de tambours, le précédait; et dans le nombre des hommes marquants on distingua M. le Comte de Ségur, après déhonté pour s'être empressé d'aller au devant de lui. Cette démarche la réintègre dès le lendemain dans sa place de grand maître des cérémonies.

Pas un homme de la Garde Nationale ne fut au devant de lui; c'est une des choses qui a le plus indisposé Buonaparte contr'elle.

Messieurs de Montmorency, Montesquiou, de Burnveau, de Béarn, etc., ont été plus empressés que personne. Le dernier de ces gentilshommes baisa avec attendrissement la main de son maître au moment où il sortit de sa voiture. Ces ingrats, que tant de bassesse devrait flétrir, avaient repris leur place de chambellan quand le Roi n'était pas à 10 lieux de Paris. On a assuré que M. d'Ossonville et M. de Liller avaient refusé.

Il y a des choses étonnantes et presque incompréhensibles depuis les derniers événemens. Dans toutes les classes de la société, dans les cafés, chez les restaurateurs, au jardin des Tuileries, les militaires, les bourgeois tiennent les mêmes propos. Si les uns et les autres disent que Labedoyère, Ney, Clausel, Grouchy sont des traîtres, des infames; si leurs camarades même les méprisent, ils conviennent aussi que ceux qui ont été fidèles au Roi, à leurs sermens, sont des Français estimables. Partout on fait l'éloge du Prince Wagram, du noble dévouement du Duc de Feltre, du zèle admirable de la maison du Roi, et de tous ceux qui ont partagé le sort de leur maître. Dans tout Paris, dans l'armée même, la déclaration de la grande majorité des Maréchaux de rester fidèles à leur serment est approuvée, et la conduite noble et franche du Maréchal Macdonald est appréciée comme elle doit l'être. Enfin, l'approbation que l'on donne généralement aux officiers supérieurs et particuliers qui ont donné leur démission, ou aux généraux qui ont refusé de servir, prouve que dans les âmes les plus corrompues il reste encore une sorte d'honneur et de justice.

Pendant plusieurs jours le jardin des Tuileries fut désert; toutes les grilles du Château, même celles du Carrousel, étaient fermées; des troupes bivouaquaient dans la cour, et quelques pièces d'artillerie y étaient placées le soir. Dans la journée les officiers étaient les seuls qui pussent entrer par les guichets dans la cour du palais.

Dans les premiers moments bien peu de monde allait au spectacle: la toile a été baissée plusieurs fois faute de spectateurs.

Le morne, la tristesse de Paris après le départ du Roi ne sauraient se décrire. L'abattement y est toujours le même. Les Boulevards, si couverts de monde dans les beaux jours, étaient presque déserts; personne ne fut à Longchamp; on ne voit presque plus de voitures.

Le décret contre les Princes de la maison de Bourbon, la maison civile et militaire du Roi, a dépopularisé Buonaparte. Tous les négocians, les marchands, tous les faiseurs d'affaires, sont ruinés : la baisse des fonds publics affaiblit la confiance ; l'augmentation considérable des denrées coloniales est onéreuse à tout le monde ; le départ des étrangers, et la sortie de Paris des familles les plus riches, les plus aisées, ont enlevé de la circulation un numéraire immense. La Bourse ne fait plus rien ; les principaux banquiers ont fermé leur caisse ; les consommateurs dépensent le moins possible ; la halle, les marchés, les quais, les chantiers ne débitent pas à beaucoup près ce qu'on y apporte, parceque les particuliers n'achètent que l'absolu nécessaire pour conserver le peu d'argent qu'ils ont.

La presque totalité de la France gémit du nouvel ordre de choses : plus les particuliers de toutes les classes sont malheureuses, plus ils regrettent ce qu'ils ont perdu. Partout le nom du Roi est respecté ; partout on est touché de ses malheurs ; mais dans toutes les sociétés, grands et petits, militaires et magistrats, se prononcent fortement sur la funeste influence des hommes qui, empêchant la vérité d'être connue, furent cause qu'on n'eut que de la bonté, de l'indulgence quand il paraît être sévère ; pour le bonheur de la France le bien se fera enivré ; et si le meilleur, si le mieux intentionné des Souverains l'entoure d'hommes capables, d'un grand caractère, et surtout vertueux, il ne se formera plus d'orage autour du trône, parceque des ambitieux qui n'eurent jamais d'autre talent que de savoir cacher leur médiocrité par de l'assurance, ne repousseront plus ses serviteurs fidèles, quand ils viendront donner les moyens de le conjurer. Ce n'est donc que par la vérité que le Monarque peut être éclairé ; la lui dire sans déguisement, telle est dans ce moment de crise le devoir impérieux de tout sujet dévoué et fidèle. La gloire du Roi, son bonheur, l'amour de la patrie, donneront le courage de remplir cette tâche.

Quoique soumis au décret du 13 Mars, j'étais le maître de rester à Paris. M. Réal par sa lettre m'y avait autorisé ; mais, inébranlable dans mes principes, ne voulant pas prêter un serment qui aurait répugné à mon honneur, à ma conscience, sans autre ressource que celle que je tiens de la générosité du gouvernement Britannique, je suis venu offrir mes bras et ma vie pour le succès d'une cause dont dépend l'affermissement de tous les trônes, la tranquillité de tous les états, la paix du monde, et le bonheur des peuples.

LE CHEVALIER D'ARTEZ,
Capitaine au service de S.M.B.
Colonel au service de S.M.T.C.

Marshal Prince Blücher to the King of Saxony.

Liège, le 6 Mai, 1815.

C'est par les mesures que Votre Majesté a adopté plus tôt qu'elle a réduit ses sujets, une partie de l'Allemagne généralement estimée, à la plus grande misère.

Les mesures qu'elle a adopté plus tard peuvent couvrir cette partie avec ignominie.

La rébellion organisée par les foyers de Friedrichsfeld et de Pressburg a éclatée, et malheureusement au moment où toute l'Allemagne se dirige contre l'ennemi commun.

Les criminels ont proclamé Buonaparte protecteur ; et après un service de 55 ans, pendant lequel j'ai été dans l'heureuse situation de ne verser que le sang de mes ennemis, j'ai été forcé pour la première fois de faire faire des exécutions de l'armée que je commande.

Votre Majesté verra par la pièce ci-jointe que j'ai essayé de sauver le nom Saxon, mais c'est le dernier essai. Si on n'entend pas mes conseils, ce n'est pas sans douleur, mais avec la tranquillité d'une conscience pure et la conviction d'avoir fait mon devoir, que je rétablirai l'ordre des choses avec force, même si j'étais forcé de faire fusiller toute l'armée Saxonne. Dieu, qui nous jugera tous, fera passer le sang versé sur celui qui est la cause, et devant le Tout-puissant ce sera la même chose de donner les ordres ou de souffrir qu'elles soient données.

Votre Majesté sait qu'un vieillard de 73 ans ne peut avoir un autre but que celui de faire valoir la vérité, et qu'il se fasse ce qu'il doit se se faire.

Voilà le point de vue que Votre Majesté doit avoir en lisant cette lettre.

BLÜCHER.

Marshal Prince Blücher to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Liège, ce 6 Mai, 1815.

J'ai chargé le Général Röder de vous exposer le résultat de mes mesures contre les rebelles Saxons. Comptant sur votre complaisance, My Lord Duke, le Général Röder vous proposera de me rendre un grand service en permettant que les trois bataillons Saxons que j'ai fait désarmer se rendent à Anvers pour être embarqué et transporté en Prusse.

Je suis, avec la plus haute considération, My Lord Duke,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

BLÜCHER.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 7th May, 1815, 6 P.M.

I had the honour of receiving your Lordship's letter of the 6th this morning.*

The main body of the Saxons, it is hoped, are becoming more tractable to the arrangement. Three battalions have consented to it. Of the rest nothing further is positively known.

The view taken in your Lordship' s letter of the 5th has, of course, been strictly conformed to.†

The Saxon officers complain of the Prussian arrangement being too abrupt and premature: their indiscreet conversation had, however, prepared the men's minds for a certain degree of mischief, and when the sensation became ungovernable, and they found they could not hold the reins, they wished when too late to check the spirit they had produced. It broke out so suddenly that the terms could not be accurately known to the troops, whose first violence was against the Saxon General Küzell, who, as he walked at the head of the Saxon officers in a Prussian uniform, had a stone thrown at him. Mistrusting, therefore, their own officers, my idea at that time was that explanation coming from a less suspicious quarter than the Prussians might be of use: the point of discipline certainly admitted of no hesitation. I hope your Lordship will excuse my repeating these things in my anxiety to explain.

Whatever, however, may have been the exciting cause, sufficient sentiments of a very doubtful nature have displayed themselves during the mutiny to make it so far a fortunate occurrence that these smothered feelings have shown themselves at a time when they can do little harm.

I am, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Earl Bathurst to Lieut.-Gen. Mac Farlane.

SIR, War Department, 8th May, 1815.

Referring to Sir Henry Bunbury's letter to you of the 29th March last, I now transmit, for your information and guidance, the copy of a despatch which I have this day addressed to Lord William Bentinck. You will lose no time in preparing to carry into effect the orders which you may in consequence receive from Lord William upon the subject; and in the event of your learning that his Lordship had quitted the Mediterranean before he could have probably received the despatch, you will consider that part of it which applies to your command as addressed to yourself, and will act upon it accordingly.

I have, &c.,

BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Earl Bathurst to Lieut.-Gen. Lord William Bentinck.

MY LORD, Downing Street, 8th May, 1815.

In the event of your Lordship's receiving this despatch before you shall have carried into execution my instruction of 29th March last, for detaching troops from Sicily to Malta and Corfu, your Lordship will consider yourself authorised to employ the forces alluded to, or any others in Sicily, in such a cooperation with the government of Austria in an attack on Naples as you may be invited to undertake, and as, under existing circumstances, you may deem it advisable to attempt.

It is to be apprehended that you cannot withdraw from Genoa any of the troops under your command; but if there appears to be no reason to expect an attack on Sicily, some assistance may be afforded from thence, although the two regiments shall have left Sicily, according to my instructions of the 29th March.

I have, &c.,

BATHURST.

General Van der Plaat to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Anvers, le 8 Mai, 1815.

Je viens de recevoir le rapport que les troupes Brunswickoises, forte d'environ 7600 hommes et 2360 chevaux, sont dirigés en quatre colonnes sur Anvers, dont la 1ère, forte de l'état-major, un bataillon d'infanterie de 736 hommes, un régiment d'hussards de 830, et une batterie d'artillerie légère, doit arriver le 10 à Turnhout, Hoogstraten, et environs, et le 11 à Anvers; et les trois autres colonnes successivement le 12, 14, et 15 à Anvers.

Vous verrez, Monseigneur, par l'itinéraire ci-joint, que toutes ces troupes sont dirigés de manière qu'en les faisant marcher sur Lier, et de là par Malines sur Bruxelles, ils gagneront au moins une journée de marche.

C'est dans l'hypothèse que votre Grâce ne voudra pas les laisser à Anvers que je prends la liberté de proposer qu'on changea la direction donnée, et de les faire marcher sur Lier le 11, pour arriver le 12 à Bruxelles, ainsi que les trois autres colonnes; sur quoi j'aurai l'honneur d'attendre la décision de votre Grâce, par une ordonnance, vu qu'il reste peu de tems.

Veuillez agréer, Monseigneur, les sentimens du plus profond respect avec lesquels j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

VAN DER PLAAT.

Lieut.-Gen. Baron Decken to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, 8th May, 1815.

I beg leave to inform your Grace that, according to a letter which I have received last night from the Hanoverian Regency, dated the 3rd inst., in answer to the communication which I have sent to Hanover by your commands relative to the treaty of subsidies, the Hanoverian ministers do not consider themselves authorised to conclude a new treaty without the consent of the Prince Regent: they have therefore sent all the papers relative to it to Mr. Best, with directions to lay the same before His Royal Highness. I am ordered to remain here until I receive further instructions from the Prince Regent.

The Hanoverian ministers have further directed me to state to your Grace of their being fully convinced that whatever is proposed by you has no other tendency but to promote the welfare of the good cause in general, and especially that of Hanover, and that that country is disposed to make the greatest sacrifices in its power in order to promote your wishes in every respect; but considering the exhausted state of the finances, the impossibility of imposing new taxes, and the total want of credit, they do not see the possibility of maintaining so large a force (amounting to 33,000 men, exclusive of the King's German Legion) as now has been raised, even for a few months, if the present treaty of subsidies is to be discontinued.

I am, my Lord Duke, with the greatest respect,

Your Grace's most obedient and very humble servant,

FRED. DECKEN.

The Duke de Berri to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MON CHER DUC, Alost, ce 8 Mai, 1815.

N'ayant pas eu le plaisir de vous voir à vos passages ici ou à Gand, permettez que je vous envoye la lettre ci-jointe du Duc de Bellune que j'ai reçue. Il connaît bien Buonaparte et les Français, et les raisons qu'il donne pour commencer bientôt sont si fortes que je ne puis m'empêcher de vous l'envoyer. Vous pouvez être assuré qu'encore aujourd'hui il n'y a pas 50,000 hommes à vous opposer dans la ligne d'opérations entre Maubeuge et Mézières. Nous avons l'assurance que 8000 à 10,000 hommes seront en armes à jour nommé entre Naysbrook et Armentières. Bethune est à Mons. Je promis me porter sur Lille avec une partie de ce monde, et mon père sur Aise, qui, ainsi que Dunkerque et Calais, ouvriront leurs portes sans coup férir. Quant à Lille, quoique j'aie l'intime conviction que je m'en emparerois, je n'ôserais en répondre comme des autres places. Je crois que vous commencerez par vous emparer de la fort de Mormelle, de Maubeuge, d'Avesnes, qui ne valent pas Ciudad Rodrigo ni Badajoz; et si, comme je l'espère, comme je pourrais presqu'en jurer, toutes les autres places nous ouvriront leurs portes, en huit jours tout sera fini.

Si l'on attend quinze jours, Buonaparte aura cent mille hommes de plus à vous opposer; la cause des Alliés n'en sera pas beaucoup plus mauvaise, mais celle du Roi de France le sera. Tous les jours l'on destitue des colonels, des généraux sûrs, pour les remplacer par des coquins, et les régimens sur lesquels nous pouvons compter sont envoyés sur les derrières.

Je cherche, mon cher Duc, à ne vous pas importuner pour des choses inutiles. Ne vous donnez pas la peine de me répondre, et recevez l'assurance de

C. F.

Marshal the Duke de Bellune to the Duke de Berri.

MONSEIGNEUR, Aix-la-Chapelle, le 1 Mai, 1815.

Je profite du retour de mon fils à Gand pour offrir mes respectueux hommages à V.A.R., et pour la prier de les agréer.

Le tems que je passe ici n'est point perdu pour moi; je l'emploie avec une grande assiduité à recouvrer des forces pour servir le Roi et notre infortunée patrie. J'espère d'après l'expérience que j'ai déjà faite que sous peu de jours mon objet sera rempli, et que je serai en état de concourir avec les plus zélés serviteurs de S.M.

Les troupes alliées continuent à se rassembler, et la célérité de leur marche pour arriver sur les frontières fait penser que B. sera bientôt attaqué. Je le désire d'autant plus vivement que la promptitude dans cette occasion peut donner aux Alliés l'avantage que l'on apprécie peut-être pas assez, celui de rompre l'assemblée du Champ de Mai, et de priver B. de toutes les ressources qu'il attend de cette nouvelle fantasmagorie. Il ne faut pas se dissimuler que de tous les projets qu'il a formé dans son île, et qu'il se propose de mettre en exécution pour tromper les Français, celui du Champ de Mai n'ait eu la préférence; car c'est dans cette assemblée qu'il compte bien trouver tous les moyens qui lui sont nécessaires pour consolider son usurpation, assuré d'attirer à lui tous les suffrages par la sagesse apparente des nouvelles loix qu'il présentera, par la modération étudiée qu'il étalera, par les grands mots d'honneur national, de liberté, et d'indépendance qu'il fera entendre. Enfin, par toutes les supercheries méditées dont il est capable, B. doit regarder son Champ de Mai comme l'appui le plus formidable qu'il puisse désirer. C'est là, sans doute, qu'il proclamera la souveraineté du peuple Français, et tous les rogatons qui peuvent séduire la multitude; c'est là qu'il offrira la couronne souveraine à ce peuple crédule pour qu'un Antoine vienne la lui poser sur la tête, et qu'il puisse publier dans toutes les parties du monde qu'il ne tient le sceptre Français que de la volonté générale de ce peuple à qui il doit de toute sincérité consacrer son existence. Que résultera-t-il de cet événement? . . . . ce qui arrive toujours aux Français, mes chers compatriotes, amusés par des nouveautés, et qu'ils feront pour soutenir celles-ci les sacrifices qu'ils ont faits en tant d'autres occasions semblables. Ainsi je considère ce Champ de Mai, s'il n'est pas troublé, comme l'endroit le plus propre à multiplier les ressources dont B. a besoin pour se maintenir, et comme l'événement le plus fâcheux pour le Roi et pour ses Alliés dans la conjoncture actuelle.

Quelques coups de fusil tirés dans ce moment sur les frontières sans s'engager si on ne peut encore entrer en campagne, déjouiraient pourtant ce beau plan de B., et le priveraient de tous moyens de se soutenir longtems. Ils avertiraient les électeurs appelés à Paris de l'inutilité de leur voyage, et qu'ils doivent rester chez eux. Il n'en faudrait pas davantage pour faire écrouler l'échafaudage sur lequel B. veut asseoir sa puissance; et il est presque démontré que si on ne tire pas ces coups de fusil, qui abrégeraient assurément la durée de la guerre que les Alliés vont entreprendre, il faudra tirer le canon longtems.

Voilà une lettre bien longue, et peut-être aussi ennuyeuse. V.A.R. me la pardonnera en faveur de son objet.

Je suis, avec un profond respect,

De Votre Altesse Royale, Monseigneur, le très dévoué serviteur,

LE MARÉCHAL DE BELLUNE.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 8th May, 1815, 7 P.M.

I had the honour of receiving your Lordship's letter of last night at noon this day, with the enclosure for Prince Blücher.*

The Prince returns his thanks for the information of the French movements and force.

The reports from Charleroi of last night have just been received, in which General Zieten says that a person employed by him, who was at Givet on the 5th, and left Philippeville the 6th, reports that the regular troops of both those places (the numbers not stated) had marched on the 5th for Maubeuge and Valenciennes, and were replaced at Philippeville by a body of 1500 to 1800 national guards or peasants sent from the interior, armed with muskets at their own expense, but without uniforms, and mostly dressed in blue frocks; that the Douane had been active in provisioning those places; and that there was no body of regular troops in that neighbourhood.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 356.

With regard to the Saxons, a regiment of hussars has consented to the arrangement. The reports from the main body are not favourable. They have begun to dismiss their officers; and I am informed that upon a report of a Prussian force being in march against them, the drums beat to arms, the troops took up their position, and threw out their advanced posts. The report of the day generally comes in late at night, and in the meanwhile many rumours are spread through this head-quarters.

From some conversation this day, I think it seems to be apprehended that this Saxon affair may diminish the Prussian disposable force in the field. The 5th corps is between Torgau and Wittenberg; the 6th in march towards the Elbe, which it is feared may, in consequence of this dissension, receive orders to halt.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 8th May, 1815.

I have the honour to inform you that the mail from Paris, by Valenciennes, did not arrive this morning; and it is probable that the French have stopped all communication.

Two men I send in the direction of Charleville and Solesmes to ascertain the movement of the French army are not yet returned; but it appears to me that the movement of the French army on their right has been stopped, because no more troops have arrived at Beaumont, and the villages near Valenciennes and Maubeuge were full of troops.

The garrisons of Givet and Philippeville have been withdrawn, and replaced by conscripts, who are not yet clothed, and very indifferently armed.

It is said that all the artillery from Mézières, Sédan, and Verdun is ordered to be brought to Paris.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

[874.] G. O. Bruxelles, 9th May, 1815.

1. The light infantry companies belonging to each brigade of infantry are to act together as a battalion of light infantry, under the command of a Field officer or Captain to be selected for the occasion by the General officer commanding the brigade, upon all occasions on which the brigade may be formed in line or column, whether for a march or to oppose the enemy.

2. On all other occasions the light infantry companies are to be considered as attached to their battalions, with which they are to be quartered or encamped, and solely under the orders of the commanding officer of the battalion to which they belong.

3. The Commander of the Forces wishes that some of the light infantry battalions of each brigade should be practised in the manœuvres of the light infantry, and if possible in firing at a mark.

4. The Commander of the Forces is desirous that the General officers commanding divisions and brigades should exercise the infantry in marching in column of as large numbers as can be conveniently collected, at half and quarter distances, with a front of one company, on the high road, for the distance of five or six miles from the point of collecting, and returning in the same order, twice or three times a week.

WELLINGTON.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 9th May, 1815.

I have the honour of sending you here enclosed a letter of a French officer of douaniers, written to a friend, who addressed it to me.

The day before yesterday General Bertrand arrived at Condé; and as they were firing yesterday at that place, it is supposed that Buonaparte himself arrived. The French don't allow anybody to pass the frontier.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

[ENCLOSURE.]

MONSIEUR,

J'ai l'honneur de vous adresser des renseignements que j'ai pu prendre dans le voyage que j'ai fait.

La garnison de la ville est composée de 1300 hommes. 1300 sont également stationnés dans les villages aux environs, où la plus grande partie se trouve de l'autre côté de la Sambre. Il n'y a point de mouvement extraordinaire dans la ville; il a seulement 30 ouvriers qui travaillent à une redoute.

Il n'y a pas d'ouvriers au camp retranché. Il y a beaucoup de mécontentement dans la garnison, ainsi que dans la bourgeoisie. Il ne se trouve sur chaque bastion que quatre pièces de canon.

La troupe qui se trouve à une lieue de la frontière coupe les chemins. A l'entrée du village sont des voitures, dans lesquelles pour passer la nuit.

Le bruit est également répandu dans la garnison que Napoléon doit arriver pour visiter les places du nord. Des officiers supérieurs le devancent avec son état major. Il paraît que son projet n'est pas de se trouver dans la ville où son état major se trouvera; qu'il doit y entrer déguisé lorsqu'il en serait sorti.

S'il s'agissait de quelque mouvement extraordinaire, je m'empresserai de vous le communiquer.

P.S. Un courrier du Ministre de la Guerre a été envoyé pour disposer la ville à être mise en état de siége.

L'ordre est donné pour couper les ponts qui se trouvent sur le devant de la frontière. Cet ordre est donné par le commandant de la place de Maubeuge.

Colonel Sir Colin Campbell to S. R. Lushington, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR, Bruxelles, 9th May, 1815.

I have communicated to the Duke of Wellington the demi-official letter which you wrote to the Prize Agents on the subject of the grant proposed to be made to the army in lieu of prize, and his Grace appears to be perfectly satisfied with the same; but he says that he cannot think of giving an opinion, or deciding, where he is himself interested, in what proportion he should share, as it would be liable to misrepresentation; but that he is perfectly ready to decide for others, and will save the government any further trouble upon this head if they will decide for him.

If you will be so good as to let me know what the decision of the government is, I will communicate the same to his Grace, and the other questions will be immediately decided upon by him.

It is very desirable that this should be done immediately, as the army are very anxious to have this question settled as soon as possible.

On looking over the different modes in which prize money has been distributed, it appears to me that the fairest, and the one by which the different ranks will receive their just proportion, is to divide the grant into twelve equal shares, and to distribute it as follows:

To the Commander in Chief	One twelfth.
To the General Officers	One do.
To the Field-Officers	Two do.
To the Captains	Two do.
To the Subalterns	Two do.
To the Serjeants	One do.
To the Privates	Three do.

I have also gone over the calculations by eighths, tenths, and by shares, and none of these proportions distribute the prize in so just and so fair a division to each rank as that by twelfths does. I have written to Mr. Campbell, one of the agents, to send to you for the information of government a statement of what each rank will receive by the above proportions; and I feel persuaded that you will find that by twelfths is the one which will distribute the prize amongst the different ranks in the fairest proportion; and I have no doubt but that if it appear in the same light to government, they will act upon it.

I should hope that the grant will be brought forward in Parliament immediately. As that has nothing to do with the manner of distribution, I should think the sooner that question is put at rest the better.

Believe me, my dear Sir, very faithfully yours,

C. CAMPBELL.

The details for the periods of distribution will be regulated by the Duke, so that each rank will only receive for the different periods of distribution at which the person was present and served with the army.

Colonel Washington to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Bruxelles, le 9 Mai, 1815.

Pour soutenir la nouvelle lutte qui va commencer, la Bavière a fait des efforts difficiles à imaginer, et certainement impossibles à surpasser. Soixante milles hommes ont passés le Rhin, quatre milles sont à Mayence, et l'armée est à tous égards plus belle que jamais. Il serait superflu de dire que des efforts aussi prodigieux n'ont pu se faire sans un épuisement presque total de toutes les ressources financielles de l'état, déjà souvent atteintes d'une manière cruelle par les guerres dont le pays fut depuis quinze ans plus d'une fois le théâtre.

Le gouvernement Bavarois, animé du désir le plus prononcé de développer tous les moyens dans son pouvoir pour faire la guerre avec vigueur, et prouvant par les efforts inouïs qu'il fait combien il prend une part décisive à ceux que les Alliés mettent en avant, croit d'un autre côté pouvoir s'attendre d'être soulagé là où les moyens s'en présentent, et avoir des justes droits à participer également aux subsides de deux millions livres donnés par le gouvernement Anglais en surplus de cinq millions livres déjà accordés, et dont la Bavière doit avoir la part qui lui a été stipulé : elle réclame donc en outre et à juste titre d'avoir aussi une part proportionnée à ses efforts de ces deux millions livres mis à la disposition de Votre Excellence, mesure qui a été portée à la connaissance du gouvernement Bavarois par une note ministérielle du 17 d'Avril. L'Angleterre n'ayant cessé de donner des preuves d'amitié et d'intérêt à la Bavière, réciproqué de sa part par son attachement sincère au gouvernement Britannique, et par son désir de se réunir à lui de vues et d'intérêts, le gouvernement Bavarois croit pouvoir espérer aussi que dans cette circonstance les mêmes dispositions favorables lui seront non seulement continuées, mais étendu d'une manière proportionnée aux moyens extraordinaires qu'elle déploye dans la crise actuelle. Il y compte avec d'autant plus de confiance que Votre Excellence elle-même a donnée dans plusieurs occasions des preuves non équivoques de l'intérêt qu'elle porte à ce pays, non sans importance dans la balance politique de l'Europe, et par le développement de ses moyens et par le caractère national de ses habitants; c'est à ces titres aussi que la Bavière a des droits fondées sur l'appui de l'Angleterre.

Ne connaissant pas le principe que Votre Excellence jugera à propos et croira devoir établir pour faire participer les Alliés aux deux millions mis à sa disposition, et sans vouloir anticiper à cet égard à ses intentions, il serait à désirer que Votre Excellence voulut bien en faire le sujet d'une négociation séparée, quant à la part que la Bavière en recevra de même que sur la manière dont elle pourrait toucher ou disposer de ces fonds.

Le soussigné, chargé par le Maréchal Prince Wrede (qui personnellement ne compte pas peu sur l'amitié que Votre Excellence lui porte) de prier Votre Excellence de prendre cette démarche en considération, saisit cette occasion avec empressement pour le prier d'agréer les assurances de sa très respectueuse considération.

WASHINGTON,
Colonel au service de S.M. le Roi de Bavière.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 9th May, 1815, 8 P.M.

I received your Lordship's letter of yesterday early this morning,* and immediately communicated on the subject of it with General Gneisenau, who objected to Luxembourg as the place of reception for the French deserters, and in lieu proposed Trèves, as answering the same objects without the inconveniences. The General seemed to wish to write direct in reply, and, as he said he would give the arrangement every assistance, I did not press anything further, and it is understood he is to write in detail.

The Saxon business continues to be very troublesome. Though the whole of the cavalry have obeyed the arrangement, the infantry still hold out. It is intended to bring the affair to a close in two or three days, when a sufficient Prussian force shall have been collected. On the 11th there will be about 5000 men of the 3rd corps at Aix-la-Chapelle, and on the same day the 4th corps, 13,000 or 14,000 strong, arrives at Malmedi.

I am privately told an unpleasant circumstance has risen out of this Saxon dissension with an officer of rank in the Prussian service. It would appear that General Börstell, in command of the 2nd corps at Namur, has declined to fulfil the whole of Prince Blücher's orders relative to the battalion of Guards which were marched to Namur, on the grounds of the Saxon soldiers having been urged by hasty measures into disobedience on this point. The battalion was disarmed, but the colours not burnt; and I understand the Lieutenant-General has written a letter protesting against the measures adopted. Marshal Blücher has ordered General Börstell to be superseded by Major-General Pirch, who is to execute the original orders to-morrow.

A courier went off in the night to the King, and I hear the Lieutenant-General is to be tried by a court-martial.

On the 1st of May, the day preceding the revolt, an aide-de-camp of the Saxon General Lecoq was seen in the neighbourhood in plain clothes, without waiting upon any of the military authorities or wishing to be known. The conduct of the Saxon officers, combined with this and other circumstances, seems to leave but little doubt of the resistance of the soldiery having been a preconcerted business at the Saxon Court.

There is no news of the enemy on this front.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Intelligence from the Prince of Orange.

Le 9 Mai, 1815.

Parti de Paris à 3½ heures du soir : logé à la Chapelle ; le peuple animé du meilleur esprit à Senlis ; cent quarante hommes étaient demandés pour la garde nationale. Deux tiers sont pères de famille, même qui ont trois enfants ; la plus part refuse de partir. L'esprit publique se montre contre Napoléon. Deux individus sont partis de Paris le 9 courant, et ont logés à Louvre. Ils étaient porteurs d'une lettre pour le Général qui commande à Valenciennes, et de là ils devaient se rendre dans notre armée, pour s'assurer de leur situation et embouchage. Je n'ai pu savoir leurs noms. L'un est natif de Roubé, près de Lille, et l'autre se disait Belge : tous deux habitans de Paris.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 362.

A Péronne les esprits sont divisés.

A Nuye deux pères de famille qui étaient désignés pour la garde nationale s'étaient rendus à la sous-préfecture pour obtenir leur exemption, ce qu'ils ont obtenu, à condition d'en désigner deux autres de leur commune, ce qu'ils ont fait ; mais la nuit suivante ils ont été assassinés par ceux qu'ils avaient désigné. Dans plusieurs communes ils ont abattus le drapeau tricolor, et remplacé par le blanc. Plusieurs maires qui se montraient pour Buonaparte sont obligés à quitter leurs communes pour se soustraire aux mauvais traitement des habitans.

A Arras les gardes nationales ont refusés à marcher. Ils veuillent garder leur ville, mais ne veuillent en sortir. Des colonnes mobiles sont arrivés qui étaient logés à discrétion et à trois francs par jour ; pour lors ils ont obéis et partis ; mais aussitôt qu'ils ont appris que les colonnes étaient partis, ils ont abandonnés leur conducteur, et sont rentrés chez ; depuis lors plus de poursuite. Le département du Nord et le port de Calais sont animées du meilleur esprit. A Lille on n'ôserait se manifester pour Napoléon. Là l'on serait assommé. Les gardes nationaux ont refusés à sortir de leur ville. Ils ont offert de la garder, mais animés pour le Roi. Il n'y a à Lille que 3 à 4 mille hommes de troupes de ligne, mais il arrive presque tous les jours des gardes nationaux, très mal vêtus.

Je suis passé la frontière à Mippen. Il y avait 30 hommes qui formaient de videttes jusqu'à ¼ de lieue de l'extrémité de France, et qui empêchaient même les habitans du pays à passer leur poste. Les changeurs ont beaucoup de peine à en sortir ; et ce n'est qu'à force d'argent qu'on y parvienne.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 9th May, 1815.

I have letters from Canning of the 28th, in reply to my instructions about the troops. He is by no means sanguine in his hopes of success with the Regency. Beresford thinks the force required may embark in a month from that time, if the measure is adopted. The Portuguese army appears to have been reduced to a very low scale since its return home.

I am to see Best to-morrow morning about the Hanoverian troops. I will tell him that he must be satisfied with what you settle, of which I should be glad to receive a precise memorandum when the whole is arranged.

I don't much like the disposition at Ghent to half-measures. I have written fully to Sir C. Stuart, who will, of course, confer with you. Blacas's half arranging an administration for the King, and then submitting to only a nominal separation, will never do. The only chance Louis XVIII. has is to declare against any exclusion except that of Buonaparte, to employ the strongest man he can find for his minister, and let him, at his own peril, compose his administration as he best can.

Yours ever, my dear Lord, most sincerely,

CASTLEREAGH.

R. Arbuthnot, Esq., to —— Arbuthnot, Esq.

MY DEAR BROTHER, Lisbon, 22nd April, 1815.

I find that a frigate is going with despatches from Mr. Canning in less than an hour; as such is the case, I shall write you a few lines to say that I am well. Of course, you cannot expect any news from this quarter, but it is necessary for me to inform you that the governors of the kingdom are sadly puzzled what to do. They have disbanded their army, and by their folly they are left without the means of recruiting it. In the course of the last six months full 25,000 men have been discharged, and by the exemptions they cannot call on more than 5000 for the regular army, and of this number, of course, many are too old or infirm to serve ;* so that if Buonaparte attempts Spain, this country will not actually have an army for its defence, which, after all the money sent here by Great Britain for this object, is most lamentable. Indeed, if Portugal is again invaded, some thousand British troops must come to its assistance, for certainly, in the present state of the Portuguese army, much cannot be expected from it.

Ever yours most truly,

R. ARBUTHNOT.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 9th May, 1815.

All the private accounts from Paris concur in representing Buonaparte's power being on the decline, and that he must be overturned.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 9th May, 1815.

The arrival of seven companies of the 1st battalion 27th Regiment from America had created a hope that all the force expected from the Gulf of Florida was at hand. It appears, however, by the personal explanation of Major-General Sir John Lambert, that this is not exactly the case, though we may look shortly for the 4th, 21st, 40th, 44th, and 93rd Regiments, which sailed from the Havannah from the 2nd to the 6th of April. The want of provisions had unfortunately rendered it necessary to send these troops to the latter place, leaving the 7th, 43rd, and 95th with the Artillery and Engineers at Mobile, from whence, however, Lambert expects they would have sailed about the 3rd of April. All this force will be forwarded to Ostend as it arrives, with the exception of the 21st, 44th, and 93rd, which had suffered most on the Mississippi, and they will go to Ireland.

The remaining three companies of the 27th had parted convoy, and are supposed to have gone into Jamaica. This corps sailed from Mobile on the 15th March. It will be made up 800 strong from the depôts of the other battalions of the regiment, and sent to Ostend in the course of two or three days. It is a sad disappointment that the want of provisions for the voyage, and the delay observed by Sir Alexander Cochrane in communicating the Peace to Major-General Lambert, should have retarded the arrival of these troops in this country.

I received the following piece of news in a letter from Sir John Doyle, at Guernsey, this morning. An officer's wife had arrived from Cherbourg, and before her departure she was visited by the aide-de-camp of General Damas, the late Governor, who requested her to carry a letter to Doyle. This she refused, for fear of being searched and imprisoned; but he implored her to see the latter immediately on her reaching Guernsey, and to acquaint him that the night before (the 6th instant) a person of distinction had arrived from Paris, and was lodged at the house of the Collector, and that it was supposed to be Buonaparte. That immediately after his arrival two corvettes and a brig were ordered to be in readiness for sea, and that it was supposed he meditated an escape to America. I sent the letter to the Admiralty this morning, or I should communicate further details. This is, however, the substance of the information; and though scarcely credible, it is too circumstantial to be entirely void of foundation, and at all events it may be believed that a person of consequence, who conceals himself, and is proceeding to sea, has arrived at Cherbourg.

Ever, my dear Lord Duke, yours most sincerely,

H. TORRENS.

*Lieut.-Gen. Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, le 10 de Mai, 1815.

J'envoie mon aide-de-camp, le Capitaine Comte de Pinto, pour témoigner à Votre Altesse ma vite reconnaissance des gracieuses bontés avec lesquelles elle a daigné me communiquer en date d'hier les nouvelles que Votre Altesse a eu des frontières.

J'ai trouvé moyen de me procurer le nombre de l'ennemi qui se trouve à Maubeuge dans les environs de cette forteresse jusqu'a Beaumont. Mettant ci-joint cet état devant les yeux de Votre Altesse, elle jugera que les forces de l'ennemi ne sont pas considérables, et qu'il prend la défensive la plus stricte.

Je joigne encore le rapport de personnes venant de Condé.'

* The reply to this letter is dated "Ce 11 Mai, à 9 heures du matin." See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 373.

J'aurai l'honneur de faire part journellement des nouvelles que je reçois à Votre Altesse, la suppliant de me mettre gracieusement au fait de ce qu'elle apprend par l'aile droite.

La formation du 1cr. corps d'armée est la simple raison si je n'ai pu me rendre à Bruxelles faire ma cour à Votre Altesse, et à présenter mes devoirs à un des plus grands généraux du siècle, à un héros qui s'est autant signalé en Espagne. Je supplie Votre Altesse de me donner cette permission d'abord que les événements le permettront.

Que Monsieur le Duc veuille agréer en bonté les sentimens du plus profond respect avec lesquelles j'ai l'honneur d'être

De Votre Altesse le très obéissant serviteur,

DE ZIETEN.

Coup-d'œil sur la Force de l'Ennemi entre Maubeuge, Beaumont, vers Avesnes.

Le 8 Mai.

La garnison de Maubeuge était forte de 800 hommes. On y attendait un régiment de lanciers qui n'était pas complet. On ne travaillait point ni aux fortifications ni au camp de Rouzy. On avait donné l'ordre d'abattir dans l'environ de 500 toises les bâtiments et arbres.

Au même date.

Dans les différents villages de Maubeuge le long de la Sambre jusqu'aux frontières il se trouvait en infanterie 1675 hommes, 150 hommes de cavalerie, et 7 canons. L'ennemi a détruit tous les ponts sur la Sambre entre Maubeuge et Merbes-le-Château.

Le 9 Mai.

Il a retiré les postes de Merbes-le-Château, et parait rassembler à Salre sur Sambre un poste qui se portait le 9 au nombre de 430 hommes, autant de piétons que cavaliers.

A Hantes il se trouve 200 hommes; à Montigny St. Cristophe 100. On prétendait le même jour qu'il se portait des petits détachements de l'ennemi par Avesnes, prenant leurs directions sur Philippeville et Givet. Comme la garnison des deux forteresses est partie la nuit du 2 au 3 de Mai pour Sédan, et que les places ne furent occupées que par des conscrits, il est probable qu'on va renforcer la garnison. On va jeter un pont de bateaux sur la Meuse à Givet.

Dans les environs de Maubeuge on parla des arrivées de troupes, mais jusqu'au 9 on ne savait en arrivées que le 1er., 5me. de dragons, le 8me. de cuirassiers. L'ennemi fait des abattis dans les bois entre Beaumont et Cirey, et même couper la chaussée derrière Beaumont.

Du 10 Mai.

Deux ouvriers verriers parti le 8, à six heures du soir, de Frêne près de Condé, rapportent qu'à Condé la garnison, composée du 42me. régiment, forte d'environ 700 hommes, a relevé les carabiniers, qui ont pris la route de Maubeuge: beaucoup de ces derniers sont désertés, les uns chez eux, les autres chez les Alliés. Ce sont les canonniers bourgeois qui font le service pour l'artillerie. Dans le département du Nord on y a demandé beaucoup de monde, nommément à Valenciennes: tous refusent à marcher.

Le Général Vandamme a passé Dimanche 7 la revue du 42me. à Condé; le même jour il est parti pour Maubeuge.

Ils ajoutent que le peu de troupes qui se trouvent aux environs de Valenciennes sont constamment en mouvement; tantôt ils marchent vers Maubeuge, quelques jours après on les revoit allant sur Lille, et même Douai.

Ces personnes ont vu près de Quivrain un général Francais désertant; des officiers Anglais l'ont accompagnés jusqu'à Mons.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 10th May, 1815, 12 o'clock.

The movement you directed me to make has taken place: the 3rd Division has already reached its cantonments at and about Soignies. The troops of the Netherlands, destined to join Lord Hill's corps, will all be assembled at Hall and vicinity to-night. My brother is to go to Hall, where he will wait for further orders from your Grace. The 3rd Division of the Netherlands has moved to Reux and vicinity; the 2nd remains at Nivelles and vicinity, observing the high roads from Binch to Nivelles, and from Charleroi to Genappe.

The two Light Cavalry Brigades of the Netherlands are at St. Simphorien and Havré, and communicate to their right with the Hanoverian, and to their left with the Prussian posts. The Heavy Brigade still remain at Braine la Leud.

Should the French push along the road from Binch to Nivelles, am I to move General Alten's Division and the 3rd Division of the Netherlands in the direction of Nivelles, and make a stand there; or, in case their force was not very considerable, déboucher upon them from the Chaussée which leads from Reux into the other? If this could be a combined movement with the Prussians, it seems to me that it might be a successful one. The Nivelles road is the least well guarded, as well by us as by the Prussians, who have only a very weak post of cavalry at Binch, it being besides the nearest to Maubeuge, where the French have their principal force. It strikes me as not unlikely that in case of an attack they would make their principal effort along that road.

For ever, my dear Duke, yours most truly devoted,

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

Lieut.-Col. Aug. Wissell to Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill.

MY LORD, Tournay, 10th May, 1815.

I have the honour to report to your Lordship that yesterday a column of infantry, cavalry, and artillery has passed St. Amand on its way to Lille, coming from Valenciennes. The strength was not ascertained, but thought a very considerable one. It is believed that the movements of the troops have particularly in view now to enforce the conscription of 8000 horses of several descriptions, and of the men from twenty to forty years, also the provisioning of the fortresses, for which 125,000 rations should daily be delivered till all was complete.

With the greatest respect, I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

AUG. WISSELL.

Sunday, 14th May, 9 A.M.

This letter was received on the evening of the 13th. The one referred to has not been received by Lord Hill. Sir Charles Colville states that the diligence arrived at Courtrai from Lille on the 12th.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Du 10 Mai, 1815.

Le 9 il est passé par Orchie 450 hommes d'infanterie, se dirigeant sur Valenciennes. Ils sont arrivé aujourd'hui à St. Amand. Il est aussi passé à Douai trois régiments de ligne (infanterie), dont deux venaient de Bethune et le troisième de Lille; même direction sur Valenciennes. Cette dernière ville à l'époque du 8 et 9 Mai avoit pour garnison 12,000 hommes. 500 hommes sont partis aujourd'hui pour St. Amand, pour se diriger sur Valenciennes, et ils sont remplacé par les 450 venant d'Orchie. Il y a à St. Amand un détachement du 7e régiment d'Hussards, dont les patrouilles sont déjà venus plusieurs fois sur le territoire Belgique. Les Français prennent leurs précautions. Tous les ponts sur l'Ascarpe et l'Escaut sont levés, et les barques et les bateaux éloigné du rivage. Le pont d'Aunon est bien gardé par de la cavalerie (7e Hussards). La Garde Nationale de Douai devait se rendre sur la Place St. Jacques le 8 de ce mois, pour son organisation. Aucun individu ne s'y est trouvé. Celle de Lille ne veut point également ni sortir de la ville ni être désarmée. 400 hommes de Garde Nationale d'Amiens y sont entré le 7. Toutes les places fortes sont déclaré en état de siége. On devait mettre les eaux à Douai et dans les vallées de l'Ascarpe et de l'Escaut, mais le Duc de Trevise, qui se trouvait le 7 à Douai, n'a pas voulu qu'on fasse cette inondation.

Les conscrits du département du Nord ne marchent pas. Quelques individus se sont présentés le jour marqué à Condé, mais pour faire valoir leurs intermités; mais voyant qu'on voulait les tenir, ils se sont évadées. Les portes ne s'ouvrent qu'un moment par heure. Il se trouve à Orchie 500 hommes d'infanterie et 30 de cavalerie. Les 30 cavalerie (1er Cuirassiers) partent demain pour Valenciennes. Il n'y a plus de piquet à Nomain. Il paraît que Orchie sera longtems occupé par un bataillon. Il ne se trouve plus des troupes à Marchienne ni dans les environs.

Au 10 Mai, 1815.

La garde nationale de Valenciennes n'a pas voulu sortir de la ville. Celle de St. Quentin est arrivée en cette ville, mais d'un très mauvais esprit, et entièrement dévoué à Buonaparte. Ils doivent se diriger demain pour Lille. En général le département de l'Aisne est partisan de la mauvaise cause.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Liège, 10th May, 1815, 7 P.M.

I had the honour of receiving and communicating your Lordship's letter of yesterday to Prince Blücher. The Marshal has determined to move his head quarters to-morrow morning to Hanut, to be nearer his troops. No intelligence has been received of the enemy's movements from any of the Prussian posts.

It has been decided this day to march the main body of the Saxons three days' march to the rear, to occupy cantonments within the points of Wisel, Venloo, Ruremonde, and Düsseldorf until further instructions are received from the King, and to get them out of the way in case of operations. The cavalry having consented to the arrangement, are intended to be brought forward.

The 4th corps will be at Liège on the 12th, and the detachments of the 2nd and 3rd now march to their respective cantonments. In case of immediate operations the Prussian force on the Meuse and Sambre is 58,000 effective, and with the 4th corps in a few days 78,000, of which the cavalry are estimated at 8000, and thirty-six batteries of eight pieces each.

I shall report to your Lordship to-morrow from Hanut, by Tirlemont.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,
H. HARDINGE.

The enclosed state of the regiments under General Vandamme was received last night from Namur.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Grammont, 10th May, 1815, 9 A.M.

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your Grace's letter, dated yesterday* at noon. On the receipt of it, at 7 P.M. yesterday, I communicated to Sir Henry Clinton that part of the instructions which relates to him and the 2nd Division.

With respect to Colonel Mitchell's Brigade, I beg to state that I had moved it to Renaix, in order to give Sir Charles Colville an opportunity of attending to it before active operations commenced. The 4th Division will, however, be placed this day agreeably to your Grace's instructions—the 35th at Courtray, one battalion at Avelghem, and the other two at Oudenarde. Mitchell's Brigade and the 9th Brigade of Artillery will be at and near Grammont. General Lyon's Brigade I find is coming up this day to Neder Brabel.

The only accounts I have received of the movements of the enemy during the last two days are in a note I received from Sir Charles Colville, dated yesterday morning, stating that a French officer had arrived at Courtray, who stated that a French column, under the command of General Allice, was on its march towards Furnes. I have a letter from Sir Charles Colville, dated yesterday morning, in which there is nothing new mentioned.

I have the honour to be your Grace's very faithful servant,
HILL.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 366.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 11th May, 1815.

I only received your Lordship's letter, dated Bruxelles, the 9th, when I had already informed the two light dragoon regiments, K. G. L., now at Malines, that I would come there immediately to inspect the men that offered to re-enlist and have them attested, and I shall go to Malines to-morrow, unless I should receive orders to the contrary; and at the same time I take the liberty to request your Lordship may be pleased to let me know his Grace the Duke of Wellington's orders if I am to return to Mons after having attested the men of the two light dragoon regiments. I could easily do so, leaving my horses and Staff with the brigade, which I then could join at the first movement, and till that get all possible intelligence here.

It appears certain to me that the French have collected the greatest part of their forces between Valenciennes and Charleville, and that they are forming a reserve at Laon.

Two parks of artillery arrived at Valenciennes some days ago: the one, consisting of 30 pieces, is on the rampart on the side of Roleux; the other, of 20 pieces, between the gate of Tournay and the canal. They are making a battery on the height of Roleux near a mill, on the same spot where the Austrians had one in 1793. About 1000 National Guards of the Département de l'Aisne arrived at Valenciennes, but neither armed nor clothed. The severest orders have been given at Valenciennes to prevent all communication with this country, and the bridges at Guievrain, Crepin, Guevrechin, Baisieux, and Marchipont shall be destroyed on the first order.

A garde du corps, who left Paris on Sunday last, assures that Buonaparte was still there, and he met still on the road soldiers going to Paris drawn from several regiments, and destined for the Guards. No works near Paris had been begun yet; but the park of artillery from La Fère is ordered to go to Vincennes, and the park from Douai by Beauvais to Paris. This officer also says that Ney is exiled in the neighbourhood of Chartres.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

[Extract and send to Colonel Hardinge.

WELLINGTON.]

[875.] To Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 12th May, 1815.

Pozzo di Borgo has received despatches from the Emperor, in which he has informed him that he had heard of the treaty of the 3rd January. He complains of it a good deal, but says that it shall make no difference in his conduct, and appears to intend to make it a point of vanity to act with magnanimity upon this occasion.

The Emperor presses the King of France in a very urgent manner to take a popular and even a Jacobinical line on his arrival in France, to call a National Assembly, &c. It is useless to reason upon these schemes, which are as inconsistent with the wishes of our government as they are with the wishes and interests of the King; but it is very desirable to have in hand some means of keeping the Emperor in check.

Pozzo had a private letter from Count Nesselrode, in which he complains a good deal of want of pecuniary assistance, notwithstanding that the Emperor had put in motion his whole army, and would bring forward a second army of 200,000 men; and Pozzo urges strongly that we should make an exertion to give him another million in order to be able to keep him in check.

I acknowledge that I can't recommend this to you, as, seeing how these armies go on, and knowing how small the pay given to the troops is, I believe the subsidy already granted is more than equal to the real expense incurred; and any additional subsidy granted would only enable the Emperor to keep his army on foot after the occasion for its useful employment should be terminated.

It occurs to me, however, that it might be useful to get the King of France to pay him something, and might tend to check his Jacobinical flights. What do you think of this scheme? I have not nor shall say anything to Pozzo about it till I shall hear from you.

You had better write to Nesselrode in answer to the note which he and Rasoumoffski gave to me on the day before I quitted Vienna.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Hanut, 12th May, 1815, 8 P.M.

The intelligence received by Prince Blücher confirms your Lordship's opinion of the enemy's measures being defensive. The reports state that the enemy is destroying roads and bridges, &c.

In general the information which this head quarters receives is so scanty, and derived from sources so little to be depended upon, that your Lordship's accounts are most acceptable, and alone have weight. The Staff within these few days are very anxious to put this branch of the service on a more careful footing.

The Marshal will, I am informed, write to the King of the Netherlands respecting the change of his quarters and the disposition of his troops. The suggestions of your Lordship are well received, but it is necessary to present them through General Gneisenau or General Müffling, which is in a great measure the custom of the army; but I cannot make myself better understood than by stating that I don't believe any letter has been yet written, because General Gneisenau was absent to-day at Huy and Namur.

The King of Prussia, it is said, leaves Vienna for Berlin the 18th.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,
H. HARDINGE.

Marshal Lord Beresford to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Lisbon, 12th May, 1815.

The packet arrived the day before yesterday, and we expected it would have brought the document which the Regency here has expected from the Prince's Plenipotentiaries; but they have not sent it, and consequently the question of sending you troops from here is not even taken into consideration. I was this day at the Regency, being called there by their Excellencies; and though I was stopped from making an excursion to Evora for this audience, and that before the arrival of the demand from Brazil, the only points they formally entered on to me were what related to that expedition. They casually touched on the sending troops to Flanders, and the Principal Souza openly declared he would oppose it in every shape, even if the Plenipotentiaries had entered into the arrangement. The other two present, Marquis of Borba and Dom Miguel, were silent; but I still thought they appeared satisfied with the Principal's decision. Ricardo Raymundo, I know, has given his opinion in favour of the expedition. But it is to me obvious that unless the Plenipotentiaries have made an especial stipulation on that head, it will not finally be acceded to here, and I am therefore glad I wrote to you early to that effect. If, however, the Plenipotentiaries should have made the stipulation for the contingent of Portugal or a part of them to go to Flanders, then that document will stagger Dom Miguel and Borba, but will have no effect on the Principal Souza.

Most sincerely,
BERESFORD.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, War Department, London, 12th May, 1815.

I enclose for your information five papers containing the copies o extracts of the most important of a series of secret reports which have bee received by the Foreign Office from Paris.* It is understood that the mili tary details are furnished by a principal clerk, who possesses the means o giving the most correct information.

You probably have obtained accounts of the French forces, and the dis tribution of them, through your own channels; and I shall be glad to hear after you have compared the enclosed papers with your own intelligence whether you consider that the accounts we receive through this correspond ence may be confided in.

Ever, my dear Lord, most sincerely yours,

BATHURST.

Des officiers arrivés à Paris le 2 Mai, venant de l'armée du Nord, assurent que le pays est entièrement dévoué au Roi, et que les Gardes Nationales n'y étaient pas encore organisées le 29 Avril.

LA FRANCE ET BUONAPARTE—NOTE STATISTIQUE.

12 Mai, 1815.

On cherche à décourager les Puissances Alliées, et surtout l'Angleterre, par les tableaux gigantesques des préparatifs de défense de Buonaparte. C'est l'armée de Picrocole du bon Rabelais que chaque Moniteur nous passe en revue. Soumettons cette grande force militaire à la loi du calcul, et nous verrons qu'elle est disproportionnée aux moyens de la France, réduite à ses anciennes limites, désorganisée dans son système financier, son commerce, son industrie, épuisée par sa réduction, par l'invasion des Alliés, par la prise de sa capitale en 1814, criblée de dettes, sans crédit, sans confiance dans son gouvernement Algérien, où la majorité de la nation regrette un Roi légitime, dont les vertus lui faisaient espérer la guérison de ses plaies récentes, et le retour de sa prospérité dans une longue paix.

Nous savons d'ailleurs que cette nation est divisée en plusieurs factions, qui se sépareront, se heurteront, et chercheront à se renverser, dès que l'entrée des armées alliées leur permettra de secouer leurs chaînes, de les briser, et de s'en faire des armes les uns contre les autres.

Mais toute la France est militaire, toute la France est armée, et offre une muraille de 500 mille hommes de troupes de ligne, et un million au moins de gardes nationales. Admettons cette hypothèse, la plus funeste pour ce malheureux royaume ; calculons, et nous serons convaincus que plus Buonaparte mettra de troupes en campagne plus tôt il sera perdu.

On ne peut pas porter la dépense d'une armée de ligne de 500 mille hommes, dont 60 mille hommes de cavalerie et 40 mille d'artillerie, les chevaux de trait pour 500 bouches à feu de tout calibre, les charrois, les hôpitaux, les fortifications des places, les ponts, l'entretien des routes militaires, les subsistances, les pensions de vétérans, estropiés, veuves, enfans, les écoles militaires, les gendarmeries, enfin tout le matériel d'une armée aussi exagérée, en répartissant cette masse de dépense par tête d'hommes, à moins de six francs par tête, c'est à dire trois millions de francs par jour, quatre vingt dix millions de francs par mois. Six mois de dépense d'un tel état de militaire monteraient à 540 millions.

Une garde nationale de pareil nombre, avec l'armement et équipement, les frais de route, la solde en campagne et pendant les mois de service en garnison, la subsistance en campagne et dans les places, monteraient encore à un franc par homme, 500 mille francs par jour ; 15 millions par mois ; pour six mois, quatre vingt dix millions.

Total de la dépense pour la défense de la France pour six mois :—

	Millions.
Armée de ligne	540
Gardes nationales soldées	90
Dépense de la marine, construction, fortification des ports, batteries et forts des côtes, solde, etc., par mois cinq millions	30
	660
Dépense civile, administration, police, justice, liste civile, la cour, etc.	100
Dépenses imprévues	40
	800

Par an .. .. 1600 millions francs.

Soixante six, deux tiers millions sterling.

La consommation en hommes est pareillement insoutenable et hors de proportion. Sur la population de la France, qui depuis un an est réduite à vingt-six millions d'âmes, en retranchant les vieillards, femmes, enfans, estropiés, infirmes, un quart seulement peut supporter le service militaire. Ainsi la composition des armées de terre et de mer porte sur six à sept millions d'individus depuis 16 jusqu'à 50 ans, sans distinction de mariés et de célibataires.

Un million de citoyens composant l'armée de terre entraine nécessairement à sa suite cent ou cent vingt mille ouvriers, infirmiers, charretiers, valets, vivandiers, etc. ; et en y joignant la consommation de la marine militaire d'au moins 80 mille hommes, matelots, canonniers, soldats, ouvriers, etc., ce sont au moins 200 mille individus enlevés au sol. Ainsi cet état militaire prive l'agriculture, le commerce, et les arts d'au moins 1200 mille hommes adultes, le cinquième de la population, dont la moitié doit disparaître chaque année dans une guerre aussi acharnée sur toute la surface de la France.

Quant aux comestibles et bestiaux. Il faudrait pour une pareille armée au moins 250 mille chevaux de selle et de trait, dont au moins un tiers serait perdu en six mois de campagne, et 25 mille bœufs par mois, sans compter les moutons, porcs, volailles, etc. Toutes les boissons, les comestibles, les médicaments, les grains, le foin, la paille, etc., fournis en nature, et payés en billets d'état, ou enregistrés sur le grand livre, épuiseraient bien vite les ressources vitales de la France, et tariraient la source des impôts, surtout en ajoutant à cette consommation dévorante la subsistance de 400 à 500 mille ennemis, qui de leur côté leveraient des fortes contributions, détruiraient ou consommeraient les magasins, vuideraient les caisses publiques, et arrêteraient tous les moyens de perception.

Telles sont les dépenses et les consommations sur lesquelles porteraient toutes les ressources éphémères que peut employer le gouvernement de Buonaparte en supposant que toute la nation conserve en sa faveur un enthousiasme unanime qui la pousse à supporter spontanément des sacrifices aussi destructifs.

Mais quand on voit clairement que la France est divisée en quatre factions bien distinctes, comme les Juifs pendant le siége de Jérusalem, que le désespoir doit augmenter de jour en jour le parti Royaliste, qui au moment de l'invasion des Alliés au nord et à l'est va éclater de nouveau à l'ouest et au sud, va saisir les caisses publiques, va ramener à lui, ou neutraliser, les gardes nationales, va se présenter en corps d'armée nombreux, qui ne manqueront ni d'officiers ni de soldats, va consommer de son côté les chevaux, bestiaux, et comestibles de toute espèce, va couper les communications entre les dix corps d'armée de Buonaparte, chargés de la défense des frontières, va dominer dans les grandes villes de commerce et dans les départements de l'intérieur, alors on peut calculer, sans craindre d'erreur, que la défection, la perfidie, la violation des serments, l'égoïsme, la terreur, feront le même effet contre Buonaparte qu'ils ont produit contre Louis XVIII.

La lutte sera malheureusement un peu plus prolongée, parcequ'il a 200 mille fanatiques attachés à l'illusion de sa gloire et de sa fortune. Mais les fanatiques sont Français : quand ils se verront abhorrés dans leurs propres familles, la plus part se guériront de leur illusion, et deviendront les plus terribles ennemis du petit nombre de bandits attachés par la communauté du crime au sort de leur chef odieux.

DUMOURIEZ.

Lieut.-Gen. Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, 12 Mai, 1815.

Les nouvelles que je reçois dans ce moment des frontières affirment que l'ennemi garde la défensive. Il vient d'établir quatre pièces de canon à Salre sur Sambre, où le pont est coupé.

Deux régiments d'infanterie venant de Valenciennes ont passé Mardi le 10 par Beaumont, prenant leur direction sur Philippeville.

Le 1er. régiment de lanciers cantonné à Ferrière le Grand et à Boussoit sur Sambre.

Les chemins à Flory et à Beaufort, de l'autre côté de Maubeuge, sont coupés.

On dit qu'une grande partie des troupes qui cantonnèrent dans les environs d'Avesnes est parti pour Valenciennes.

Je viens d'expédier un homme affidé pour Avesnes : j'ai envoyé un autre à Rheims, et un pour Amiens. La garnison de Givet est forte de 12 compagnies : le pont de bateaux sur la Sambre est achevé.

Je prie Votre Altesse de recevoir en bonté les sentimens respectueux avec lesquelles j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

De votre Altesse le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 12th May, 1815.

In consequence of your letter of 12 o'clock yesterday, and the instructions therein contained, I have given orders to the 3rd division of the Netherlands to move more to its left, so as to be à cheval on the Nivelles road. Reux will then only be occupied by a battalion. This movement is to take place to-morrow.

For ever, my dear Duke, yours most truly devoted,

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

It is my intention to go and look at the position of Arquesnes to-morrow or next day.

The Right Hon. J. C. Herries to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Great George Street, 12th May, 1815.

I have the honour of acknowledging the receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 8th instant.

I have much satisfaction in receiving your Lordship's recommendation of Mr. Booth, and in learning that his services have obtained the approbation of the Duke of Wellington. I was already so favourably disposed towards him by the diligence and ability with which he has discharged the duties assigned to him, that I had, before the receipt of your letter, assigned an employment to him, under the Comptroller of Army Accounts (that of Chief Inspector), which will nearly secure to him the emoluments of a Deputy Commissary of Accounts, and in which he will no doubt render essential service to the Comptroller.

It was my intention to have placed Mr. Booth at the head of the new establishment for the accounts of the Commissariat, but the Treasury could not be brought to approve of my placing so young an officer in that situation, nor any one under the rank of a Deputy Commissary-General. Mr. Drake has therefore been appointed the Accountant-General.

I shall consider myself much obliged to your Lordship if you will take an opportunity of informing the Duke of Wellington that I lost no time upon my arrival in England in communicating with the Treasury and the Paymaster-General respecting the unnecessary trouble to which his Grace is subjected by the present practice of requiring his signature to so many warrants for the ordinaries; and I hope that the measures which have been adopted for removing this inconvenience will prove satisfactory to his Grace.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,
J. C. HERRIES.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Lacken, 12 Mai, 1815.

Après avoir fait prendre des informations au sujet du camp retranché près de la citadelle d'Anvers, je m'empresse de vous informer qu'aucune raison fait désirer son maintien, et que par conséquent rien ne s'oppose à ce que vous ordonniez le destruction de ses ouvrages, ainsi que le Général Vander Plaat et le Colonel Smith le proposent. Agréez l'assurance de la haute considération avec laquelle je suis,

My Lord Duke, votre affectionné
GUILLAUME.

[Inform Colonel Smith, and desire him to act accordingly.

Déclaration du Congrès du 12 Mai, 1815.

"Les Puissances, informées du débarquement de Buonaparte en France, n'ont pu voir en lui qu'un homme qui, en se portant sur le territoire Français à main armée, et avec le projet avoué de renverser le gouvernement établi, en excitant le peuple et l'armée à la révolte contre le Souverain légitime, et en usurpant le titre d'Empereur des Français, avait encouru les peines que toutes les législations prononcent contre pareil attentat."

Déclaration du 12 Mai.

"La volonté du peuple Français ne suffit pas pour rétablir, dans le sens légal, un gouvernement proscrit par des engagements solennels, que ce même peuple avait pris avec toutes les Puissances de l'Europe, et qu'on ne saurait, sous aucun prétexte, faire valoir contre ces Puissances le droit de rappeler au trône celui dont l'exclusion avait été la condition préalable de tout arrangement pacifique avec la France."

Lieut.-Gen. Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, le 13 Mai, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de présenter ci dos à Votre Altesse le rapport de deux officiers Français appartenant à la maison du Roi qui sont parti de Noyon et arrivés hier ce soir ici pour se rendre à Gand. Les avant postes ont depuis hier rien annoncé de nouveau.

Je prie Votre Altesse d'agréer en bonté les sentiments respectueux avec lesquelles j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

De Votre Altesse le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Renseignemens donnés par deux Officiers Français.

Dans les premiers jours de Mai point de troupes dans le département de l'Oise. La garde nationale n'y était point encore organisée, et ne montre aucune bonne volonté pour partir. Le Général Sébastiani avait fait quelques jours auparavant un voyage infructueux à Amiens pour organiser celle du département de la Somme.

Peu de troupes à La-Fère, autour de laquelle ville on fait en ce moment beaucoup d'ouvrages en terre.

La 1re. division du 6me. corps d'armée, faisant l'armée de réserve, est à Laon et dans les environs, s'étendant jusqu'à Marles. Cette division, dont l'un des généraux est Estève, se compose de 3 régiments d'infanterie de ligne, un régiment d'infanterie légère, un régiment d'hussards, et 3 régiments de dragons. Aucun de ces régiments n'était au complet.

(La 2me. division de ce corps d'armée est à Paris, et la 3me. à Orléans.)

Point de troupes à Vervins; à Wuimy un régiment d'infanterie; à Clair-Fontaine et environs un régiment d'infanterie. Ces troupes font parties de la division que commande le Général Rey à Avesnes, ayant sous ses ordres le Général Corsin. On sait que ces régiments sont aussi incomplets.

On assure que le Général Vandamme va transférer son quartier-général de Mézières à Givet. On prétend qu'un camp de 25,000 hommes se forme entre Givet et Charleville.

A Rocroix et à Chimay des gardes nationales, deux ou trois escadrons de chasseurs dans cette dernière, un escadron de chasseurs à Couvin; quatre à cinq chasseurs dans quelques villages pour la correspondance. Tous les jours ceux de Couvin et de Chimay se montrent dans les villages voisins, de sorte que ce sont toujours les mêmes.

Des gardes nationales venant de la Champagne, des Ardennes, et de l'Aisne forment les garnisons de Philippeville et de Beaumont.

Les départements de la Bourgogne, de la Champagne, des Ardennes, et de l Aisne peuvent avoir fournis chacun 4000 à 5000 hommes de gardes nationales. Ceux de l'Oise, de la Somme, du Pas de Calais et du Nord, et presque généralement tous ceux de l'intérieur, montrent un esprit tout différent.

Le Maréchal Ney avait reçu de Louis XVIII. un million de francs pour le distribuer à son corps d'armée; il n'avait point fait la distribution. Comme maintenant son corps d'armée le demanda, il répondit que c'était de l'argent qui appartenait au Roi. Il en résulta beaucoup de désagréments pour Ney, qui allait à Paris s'en plaindre à B., et où il eut la réponse de se retirer dans ses terres.

Macdonald a donné sa démission. B. souhaite d'engager le Maréchal Oudinot de servir; il refuse la demande.

On prétend que les entours de B. le déconseillent de partir pour l'armée.

A la revue de la garde nationale à Paris le 16 Avril elle fut composée de deux tiers des habitants du faubourg qui n'étaient point uniformés, et auxquels on avait donné des fusils pour compléter le nombre.

Prince Schwarzenberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Heilbronn, 13 Mai, 1815.

J'ai reçu hier la lettre que Votre Excellence m'a fait l'honneur de m'écrire en date du 7 du P.M. J'éprouve une grande satisfaction en voyant que nos idées s'accordent sur les principes à établir en base. Les nouvelles que je reçois d'Italie sont d'un grand intérêt. Le Roi Joachim s'est aperçu enfin de la manœuvre qui menaçait sa retraite dans l'intérieur de ses états; il s'est porté sur Macerata avec toutes ses forces, en ne laissant qu'une division vis-à-vis du Général Neipperg pour couvrir sa marche à Ancône. Le but du Roi était de gagner Tolentino avant le Général Bianchi: cependant celui l'avait prévenu, et il s'engagea au combat qui dura pendant deux jours; le 3 il se termina glorieusement en faveur des armes Autrichiens, et l'ennemi en pleine retraite sur Macerata se trouva vigoureusement tâlonné. Si le Général Neipperg avoit pu arriver à tems, la dislocation des Napolitains eut été complète. C'est le premier courrier qui nous mettra à même de juger des résultats que les deux brillantes journées du Général Bianchi nous ont procurées. Le Général Nugent est allé en Sicile pour prendre le commandement des troupes destinées à opérer une descente. Le Général Bianchi conservera une armée de 45,000 hommes Autrichiens. Je crois donc avoir suffisamment pourvu à la conquête de cette partie de la péninsule. Indépendamment de ces troupes, j'aurais réuni en Piémont à la fin du mois 80,000 hommes prêts à commencer une opération en France. L'ennemi de son côté ne perdra pas son tems inutilement; il retranchera tous les défilés et les positions qui lui offrent quelqu'avantage; il amenera les habitants des Vosges, et en général les montagnards, pour entraver nos communications, et intercepter nos convois au moment où nous porterons en avant nos masses, ce qui nous obligera de laisser des troupes en arrière, sans compter celles que les siéges et les observations des forteresses absorberont. Il est donc indispensable que nos mouvements se fassent avec la plus grande intelligence; que l'on s'avertisse scrupuleusement de tous les détails qui concernent la marche de l'ennemi et les opérations en général; que chaque armée s'avance rapidement au moment où elle apprend que les voisins sont menacés; qu'elle s'éclaircisse pour rompre à tems le masque que l'ennemi pourrait vouloir établir, et qu'elle se jette sur le flanc des colonnes qui chargent l'armée voisine. Si nous ébranlons nos masses, sous d'aussi heureuses auspices, en formant ainsi moralement et physiquement qu'une seule masse colossale mais mobile, nous osons espérer de marcher à la gloire. Si votre armée, Milord, ou celle du Prince Blücher devoit être attaquée, comptez sur la plus prompte coopération de ma part: je me transporterai dans ce cas sur-le-champ à l'extrémité de ma droite; je porterai toute l'armée Bavaroise rapidement en avant pour la faire travailler avec la plus grande énergie là où les circonstances l'exigeront; j'appuyerai ce mouvement par le corps d'armée du Prince Royal et par d'autres troupes encore; car je suis persuadé que si l'ennemi voulut entreprendre cette manœuvre, elle pourrait lui devenir funeste si je marchais avec toutes mes forces sur son flanc et sa communication, en laissant cependant un corps sur le Haut Rhin pour contenir les garnisons et couvrir la Suisse. Vous savez, Monsieur le Duc, que la plus grande partie de mes troupes ne se trouvera réunie qu'à la fin du mois.

J'envoie à Votre Excellence le porteur de la présente, le Lieut.-Colonel Baron de Rumuskirchen, de mon état major général, qui est chargé de vous donner, Monsieur le Marechal, tous les détails sur la dislocation et l'arrivée successive de mes troupes. Je me flatte que Votre Excellence voudra bien également me faire connaître sa position, ainsi que le nombre de ses troupes disponibles.

C'est avec la considération la plus distinguée et la plus sincère amitié que j'ai l'honneur d'être,

Monsieur le Duc, votre très obéissant serviteur,

SCHWARZENBERG.

Earl Cathcart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 13th May, 1815.

I send herewith a copy of my despatch to Lord Castlereagh concerning the Russian force, with its enclosures, for your Grace's information.

The army under Barclay de Tolly is the only one on the march. The Emperor expressed to me his wish and readiness to send a second army, which would be composed of Count Wittgenstein's and Prince Eugene of Wurtemberg's corps, and might be carried higher by the addition of the Guards and Grenadiers; but that the expense would be so great that he could not undertake it unless it had suited Great Britain to give him a larger subsidy.

Having already detained Lord Castlereagh's messenger an hour to make these copies, I can only add my best wishes and assurances of most affectionate regard.

Ever yours,

CATHCART.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Earl Cathcart to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Vienna, 13th May, 1815.

I have the honour herewith to enclose a state of the Russian forces placed under the command of Field Marshal Count Barclay de Tolly, and now on the march from their late cantonments in the duchy of Warsaw, Courland, Lithuania, and Volhynia, to the Recknitz.

The Emperor having understood that it was my wish to be made acquainted with the numbers and composition of this army in more detail than had appeared in the protocols of the military conferences, was pleased to order this statement to be forthwith prepared from the last returns he had received, and afterwards to go through all the particulars it contains in an audience I had yesterday with His Imperial Majesty. All the regiments and companies named have been completed since the last campaign.

Every division of infantry consists of six regiments, each regiment of two battalions, each of 1000 men in the ranks, including non-commissioned officers who carry muskets.

The men who appear in the return, above 12,000 in each division, are supernumeraries with arms, added to compensate the non-commissioned officers included in the rank and file. But exclusive of these are reckoned among the non-combatants a certain number of supernumerary soldiers for each battalion, who are marched without arms, to be ready to replace the men in the ranks who may meet with casualties on the march, or be left behind in consequence of sickness or fatigue.

The regiments consist of three battalions, two of which march, and one remains in reserve; and from these third battalions the corps which has marched has been completed.

His Imperial Majesty trusts that from this arrangement he will be able to bring this army into the field in as great force as it moved from the frontier.

The cavalry is distributed in divisions, each division consisting of four regiments of six squadrons of 180 rank and file; in all about 1000 horses per regiment; and each regiment of cavalry has a seventh squadron in reserve left in the quarters.

The artillery is distributed to the divisions, or in reserve, in greater or less proportions as circumstances may require.

Each company of artillery has twelve pieces of ordnance of various natures, with all the carriages and horses necessary for their complete equipment.

There is a second army in readiness to march, consisting of six divisions of infantry and four of cavalry, under General Count Wittgenstein, and three divisions of infantry and three of cavalry under Prince Eugene of Wurtemberg, amounting, with artillery, to near 150,000 men; and the Foot Guards, amounting to 27,000, besides the 1st division of Grenadiers. These are ordered to the Dwina.

The Polish force, and the Russian troops in Poland, are not included in this statement of force, nor is the army under General Count Beningsen on the side of Moldavia.

The head of the left column is between Prague and Pilsen, that of the centre about Dresden, and the head of the right column will pass through Gera this week.

This army will not halt in the position on the Recknitz, but will pursue its march towards the Rhine, where the last regiments from the most distant points may arrive about the 24th June (New Style).

The Emperor mentioned his intention of leaving Vienna between the 18th and 20th instant, and of being at Heilbronn on or about the 1st of June.

I have the honour to be, with great respect, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

CATHCART.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 14th May, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose to your Grace a letter from the Duc de Feltre.

General Bonnet commands at Dunkirk in the place of General Le Noir, and Marshal Mortier has reviewed the garrison of that fortress.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect,

Your Grace's most obedient very humble servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

The Marquis de Castries to the Duc de Feltre.

Namur, le 12 Mai, 1815.

Un de mes officiers est revenu de Viricux, près Givet, où il était depuis deux jours. Les diverses notions qu'il a recueillies jointes aux rapports des autres Français arrivés à Namur annoncent généralement qu'un grand mouvement a lieu dans les troupes Françaises, dont les divers corps paraissent appuyer vers Maubeuge, qui semblerait être le point de la concentration. Le Général Vandamme a quitté Charleville pour se rapprocher de la frontière du Nord.

Le Général Charbonnier, commandant de Givet, a été destitué et remplacé par le Général Le Dur.

Givet a été déclaré en état de siége. La garnison est forte de mille hommes. Les soldats et les gardes nationaux sont consignés aux portes de la ville, pour empêcher la désertion.

Il n'y a point ici de nouvelles positives sur le départ de Buonaparte et son arrivée à l'armée : il paraît au contraire fort embarrassé sur le parti qu'il doit prendre. Il craint également de quitter Paris et de laisser son armée sans chef.

Il paraît aussi certain que les troupes du Général Gérard sont venues rejoindre le corps de Vandamme, et que tous les chemins des Ardennes, Sers, Philippeville, et Givet ont été coupés. Cette mesure semblerait annoncer l'intention de retarder seulement la marche des Alliés sur ce point-là pour pouvoir porter toutes ses forces ailleurs.

Monsieur Paulnier, lieutenant des douanes, vient d'être envoyé à Namur pour seconder nos opérations. Il partira demain pour se rendre sur la frontière du côté de Bouillon, et même pour pénétrer en France, si les circonstances l'y engagent. Il sera porteur d'un bon nombre de proclamations et avis adressés à l'armée Française, ainsi que des déclarations du Roi que nous avons fait imprimer ici.

MARQUIS DE CASTRIES.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 14th May, 1815.

I have this instant received the enclosed report from the Duc de Feltre on the state of Philippeville.

The following is an extract from the Duke's letter to me enclosing it:—

"Un rapport de la frontière dit qu'au Quesnoy il y a plus de 2000 hommes prêts à se réunir à l'armée Royale dès qu'elle entrera en France, et que plus de 6000 autres des environs de Valenciennes, Landrecies, et le Cateau se joindront à eux. La garde nationale de l'arrondissement d'Avesnes a refusé de marcher."

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect,

My Lord, your Grace's most obedient, very humble servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

Copie d'un Rapport sur Philippeville.

Marbois, le 7 Mai, 1815.

Tous les rapports que j'ai sur Philippeville s'accordent à la représenter comme ce qu'on appelle en Français, un peu familier mais assez énergique, une véritable bicoque, et tout à fait incapable de soutenir un siége.

Les remparts sont à la vérité élevés de cinquante pieds d'hauteur (le talus compris), avec des fossés en proportion; mais quoiqu'il saute aux yeux que les remparts sont minés, les mines sont hors d'état de jouer: en outre il y a deux brèches tellement praticables que depuis très longtemps elles servaient de passage aux habitants; ils ont ne les a pas reparées, mais seulement garnies de chevaux de frise, suivant un rapport; cependant on était occupé par palissades.

Il paraît qu'on ne manque pas de canons dans la place: un rapport en fait monter le nombre à soixante; mais il paraît certain que les munitions y sont rares, aussi bien que les canonniers, que le même rapport ne les portent qu'à trente.

Du côté Florenne on peut s'approcher à couvert assez pour reconnoître la place, et du côté de Jamoigne on jouit des mêmes avantages pour commencer les attaques. Un autre avantage pour les assiégeants c'est la rareté de l'eau dans Philippeville, où il n'y a qu'un puit pour l'approvisionement de toute la ville; l'abreuvoir pour le bétail est hors de la porte, et on pourrait en empêcher l'accès.

La population est d'environ de 1500 âmes, parmi lesquelles il y a peu de gens aisés. La grande majorité est absolument la canaille, et par conséquent des gens sans énergie s'il pouvait le faire impunément, et à se déclarer pour le fort; mais dont on ne peut attendre ni opposition ni assistance.

D'après ce résumé il faudrait pour faire une résistance dans Philippeville une garnison de héros, et non pas une poignée d'invalides et de gardes nationaux, qui, avec quelques canonniers (d'après le rapport d'une personne digne de foi qui y était hier), composent maintenant toute la force armée dans Philippeville.

Les premiers rapports que j'ai reçu étaient à la vérité de cent hommes, moitié cavalerie et moitié infanterie; mais tout cela en a été retiré en conformité, sans doute, aux intentions annoncées ouvertement par Buonaparte, d'abandonner la défense des villes frontières aux gardes nationaux, afin de tenir les troupes de ligne toujours disponibles.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 14th May, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose to your Grace a report from Valenciennes of the 10th instant. It appears that the enemy are breaking up all the roads on the frontier on their right, and are also making preparations for destroying all the bridges at a moment's notice.

All the boats on the Sambre and Meuse have been seized and sunk.

At Ranse, a village between Beaumont and Chimay, they have cut embrasures in the church wall, and have planted cannon in it.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient, very humble servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

Note sur Valenciennes du 10 Mai, 1815.

1°. Un train d'artillerie y est arrivé, composé d'environ 30 pièces de canon avec leurs caissons en parc sur le glacis de la ville du côté du Roleux.

2°. Un autre parc d'artillerie, d'environ 20 pièces, est entre la Porte Tournay et le Canal.

3°. On travaille à une batterie à la hauteur du Roleux, près du moulin du même nom, à un quart de lieue de la ville; endroit où la batterie Autrichienne fut placée en 1793.

4°. On fait une levée de terre pour couvrir le fort St. Roche.

5°. Au premier mouvement hostile de la part des Alliés les mineurs ont ordre de couper les sept ponts qui se trouvent sur les rivières en deçà de Valenciennes, savoir, les deux de Quievrain, celui de Crepin, celui de Quevrchin, ceux de Baisieux, et celui de Marchepont.

Il y a ordre à Valenciennes de faire fusiller tout homme qui serait pris passant les frontières.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Gand, 14th May, 1815.

I beg leave to enclose you an extract from a memoir which the Duc de Feltre received from Paris. I hope and think you will find it interesting.

It was with difficulty I could persuade him to let me copy any of it; and he has just sent for the original, so that I was obliged to break off: however, I hope to be able to finish it to-morrow.

I also enclose to your Grace a memorandum on the subject of the Comte de Bourmont. It is extracted from a letter of a natural son of M. de Fontannes, and is deserving of credit.

I have the honour to be, my dear Lord,

Your most obedient, very humble servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

P.S. The Duc de Feltre does not wish the memoir to be shown to any one, as there are some observations on the Princes and the King's ministers in the latter part of it.

I rather suspect that M. de Fontannes is the author of the memoir; but the Duc de Feltre pretended that the writer was unknown to him.

Extract.

"Buonaparte est entré en France fort de son ascendant sur l'armée, des alarmes qu'avaient concues les intérêts révolutionnaires, de l'humeur des amours propres blessés, et surtout de la terreur de son nom. Les soldats ont rejoint leur chef; les Jacobins ont protégés leur ancien compagnon d'armes; la grande majorité des Français s'est montré effrayée ou indifférente; les bons citoyens se sont bornés à s'affliger.

"Le Roi, trahi par les troupes, et mal servi par ses anciens serviteurs, n'avait pas encore eu le tems d'en acquérir de nouveaux; le sentiment de la paix et du bonheur qu'il avait rendus à la France eut suffi pour empêcher des révoltes intérieures; ce n'était pas assez pour exciter le zèle et pour engager la nation entière à s'armer tout d'un coup contre l'ennemi commun.

"Le parti Jacobin s'est reveillé partout, et a soulevé le canaille; le parti Royaliste s'est trouvé assez fort dans quelques provinces pour tenter une résistance; mais cette tentative a été mal dirigée, et il n'y a point eu de parti national auquel pussent se rallier tous ceux qui, craignant Buonaparte et les Jacobins, n'étaient cependant par opinion ou par état ni émigrés ni gentilhommes, c'est à dire la plupart des Français.

"Si les événemens eussent été moins prompts, le parti national se serait formé; la cause du Roi était trop bonne pour qu'on ne l'eût pas gagnée si l'on eût pu la défendre; c'était la cause de la France, mais la France n'en était pas assez convaincue ou n'avait pas su le lui prouver clairement depuis dix mois; à peine commencait elle à le croire que tout était déjà fini.

"Ce qu'on n'avait pas su faire dans le cours de dix mois, ce qu'on n'avait pu que commencer dans un espace de trois semaines, se fait maintenant chaque jour, et par la seule force des choses, avec une rapidité qui surpasse les espérances des plus zélés serviteurs du Roi.

"Depuis le 20 Mars Buonaparte a perdu dans l'armée comme dans la nation un grand nombre de ses partisans, et à peu près tous les indifférens. Le Roi a gagné presque tout ce que Buonaparte a perdu.

"Buonaparte a commencé par proscrire; ses proscriptions ont indigné le public, et ses ministres mêmes qui peut être les avait conseillées se sont fait gloire de les désapprouver hautement.

" A peine ont-elles été exécutées : on n'a pris aucun soin pour arrêter ceux qu'il avait mis en jugement ; un grand nombre d'exilés sont restés à Paris ; on l'a permis à ceux qui en ont demandé la permission ; on n'a rien dit à ceux qui ont cru pouvoir s'en passer.

" Le public a vu dans cette conduite du gouvernement de la désunion et de la faiblesse ; il a commencé à se prononcer, et les premiers accens de l'opinion publique ont effrayé des hommes qui ne se sont plus senti le pouvoir de lui imposer silence. Toujours flottant entre la nécessité d'exciter un mouvement révolutionnaire et le désir de conserver le despotisme impérial, Buonaparte n'a plus suivi qu'une marche inconséquente et incertaine ; il s'était flatté qu'on se laisserait encore abuser par de trompeuses promesses ; à peine les avait-il faites qu'on lui a demandé de les tenir : il a parlé de la liberté de la presse dans l'espoir que nul n'oserait en user ; aussitôt le Censeur a paru, et en essayant en vain d'en arrêter la publication, il a prouvé en même temps sa mauvaise foi et son impuissance. On a exigé de lui une constitution ; il l'a donnée ; et quelque républicaine qu'elle soit, elle a souverainement déplu, parcequ'on a trouvé qu'elle ne l'était pas assez dès qu'elle rappelait l'Empire. Il désirait s'arroger une dictature absolue, et on l'a obligé d'assigner une époque prochaine à la convocation d'une représentation nationale. Ainsi ballotté d'un rôle à l'autre, il n'a su être ni despote ni Jacobin ; il a effrayé les citoyens paisibles, et mécontenté les esprits audacieux, de telle sorte que ceux qui veulent le repos et ceux qui verraient avec plaisir recommencer nos agitations politiques savent déjà que ce n'est pas de lui qu'ils peuvent espérer ce qu'ils désirent.

" Devenu ainsi un objet de méfiance, il a cessé d'être un objet de crainte. La France avait été pendant vingt ans sous le joug de la peur ; elle l'a secoué depuis la chute de Buonaparte, et à son retour il ne s'est pas trouvé en état de le lui imposer de nouveau : contraint d'appeler à son secours des principes qui menacent son pouvoir et des sentimens qu'il redoute, il n'a pu, en donnant aux uns toute licence, refuser aux autres toute liberté. Paris, que son arrivée avait frappé de stupeur, n'a pas tardé à reprendre courage ; on n'avait d'abord témoigné son aversion que par la froideur et le silence ; on s'est bientôt permis de tout avouer, de tout dire, et de se déclarer ouvertement contre lui. L'opinion qu'il a voulu flatter a senti sa force, et en a acquis chaque jour d'avantage ; elle se manifeste sans hésitation ; se propage avec rapidité ; se prononce contre ce qu'il fait, dénonce d'avance ce qu'il fera ; tandis que le nombre de ses partisans va diminuant sans cesse, celui de ses ennemis s'accroît, et ils redoublent à chaque instant d'activité et de confiance ; on le brave parcequ'on ne croit pas à sa force ; on s'éloigne de lui parcequ'on ne croit point à sa durée ; il inspire encore moins de sécurité à ceux qui le servent que de crainte à ceux qui l'attaquent, et ses partisans redoutent bien plus de se compromettre que ses ennemis.

" Telle est dans Paris la situation de Buonaparte : l'opinion des provinces est moins connue, et sans doute moins arrêtée ; dans quelques départemens méridionaux le parti Royaliste est le plus fort, le plus actif, et se remettrait en mouvement s'il était soutenu par quelques troupes régulières. Dans l'Ouest la guerre civile est près d'éclater, si même elle n'a déjà commencé : malheureusement ce ne sera jamais qu'une guerre civile, et le nom de Vendéen ou de Chouan déplait à l'armée et la nation ; là une véritable haine de parti animera les ennemis des Royalistes, et Buonaparte saura se servir de cette haine comme il se servirait d'une affection dont il serait l'objet. Les départemens du Nord sont bien disposés et plus unanimes, parcequ'ils n'ont point été le théâtre d'une guerre civile, et parceque le parti Royaliste y est plus modéré, plus raisonnable que partout ailleurs. A l'Est, et surtout en Alsace, en Champagne, en Lorraine, en Bourgogne, et en Dauphiné, le mouvement révolutionnaire a fait des progrès; on n'a rien négligé pour échauffer les paysans, et on y a réussi; l'esprit des campagnes est détestable dans ces provinces, et le Jacobinisme s'y est déjà manifesté par ses œuvres. On ne pense pas que Buonaparte puisse en tirer de grands secours pour la guerre; il pourra y lever des hommes, mais les impôts y seront mal payés, les réquisitions mal fournies, et des troupes de ligne ont peu à craindre de quelques levées de paysans. Ce qui paraît certain c'est que les partisans du Roi trouveraient là peu de coopérateurs et beaucoup d'obstacles. L'esprit de la Franche Comté est moins mauvais.

"Quant à l'armée, l'auteur de ce Mémoire ne la connaît pas; mais d'après tous les faits qu'il a recueillis, et d'après ce qu'il entend dire à des hommes éclairés qui en font partie, il est porté à la croire divisée et incertaine. Les soldats ne se soucient point de la guerre: Buonaparte leur avait promis l'alliance de l'Autriche, le retour de l'Impératrice, et une trêve de vingt ans; ils ont de l'humeur d'avoir été trompés; ils sont surtout très frappés de ce que l'Impératrice ne revient pas; ils n'ont point d'affection pour le Roi, ils ne passeront guères sous ses drapeaux; mais si le découragement se met parmi eux, il est probable qu'ils déserteront en grand nombre: on assure que la désertion est déjà considérable.

"Les sous officiers, les simples officiers, et presque tous ceux qui avaient été mis à la demi-solde sont dévoués à Buonaparte: c'est surtout par eux qu'il s'est emparé de l'armée; c'est par eux que le drapeau tricolore a été arboré dans les villages et dans les campagnes; c'est à la portion de l'armée qui ne connaît ni le Roi ni la France, ni patrie ni serment: c'est une classe entreprenante et ambitieuse, qui ne demande qu'à s'élever et à s'enrichir; Buonaparte les occupera, les avancera, servira leur avidité et leur orgueil; c'est le chef avec lequel ils ont vaincu, sous lequel ils ont fait fortune; il est le sujet de leurs entretiens, l'artisan de leurs espérances. Ils le suivront avec dévouement; et comme ils exercent sur les soldats une influence directe, c'est par eux que l'armée sera à lui.

"Les officiers supérieurs et les officiers généraux lui appartiennent moins; il en est un assez grand nombre dont la conduite a été loyale et fidèle; plus accoutumé à réfléchir, élevés dans des sentimens plus nobles, ils sont moins aveugles dans leur admiration pour Buonaparte, et jugent mieux sa situation actuelle; les idées de patrie et de liberté ont sur leur âme un véritable pouvoir; et s'il y a parmi eux plus de Buonapartistes que de Royalistes, on y trouverait peut-être moins de Buonapartistes que de Républicains; ils ont en général un profond mépris pour les anciens préjugés, un goût déclaré pour l'indépendance; ils ne seraient pas fâchés de joindre quelque gloire politique à leur gloire militaire; peu leur importe d'avoir changé de maître, mais ils souffrent avec peine qu'on les accuse d'avoir voulu donner un despote à la France; ils sont affligés et honteux d'entendre répéter sans cesse que l'armée a séparée sa cause de celle de la nation, que c'est une horde de brigands et non une armée de Français: de telles imputations les humilient, et ils s'en défendent avec colère; ils éprouvent aussi quelque repentir d'avoir violé leurs sermens; la plupart d'entr'eux expriment hautement leur mépris pour les traîtres dont la défection a été accompagnée de perfidie, et quand on leur reproche leur conduite ils disent que ce n'est point pour Buonaparte qu'ils ont abandonné le Roi, qu'ils sauront bien ne pas souffrir son despotisme; qu'ils veulent une constitution honorable et libérale; qu'ils n'ont désiré que de soustraire la France et eux-mêmes au joug des émigrés, et qu'ils ne seront jamais dévoués qu'à la patrie et à ses lois.

"C'est sur ces hommes-là qu'on pourrait agir avec le plus de succès; la situation de Buonaparte leur paraît mauvaise; ils espèrent peu des chances de la guerre; la chaleur avec laquelle l'opinion publique se prononce contre Buonaparte les glace, et on ne doute pas que la plupart d'entr'eux ne fussent charmés de pouvoir décemment séparer leur destinée de celle d'un homme dont la chute est probable, et qui peut les perdre en se perdant.

"On ne craint pas d'affirmer que telle est en général la situation de Buonaparte au milieu de l'armée et de la nation: hors une partie de l'armée et quelques hommes aveuglément dévoués, il y a peu de véritables Buonapartistes; les Jacobins le soutiennent, mais s'en méfient, et ils l'attaqueraient à l'instant s'ils étaient les maîtres de lui choisir un successeur; les classes moyennes et supérieures de la société ne veulent point de lui, et le repoussent hautement; le peuple des campagnes s'est déclaré en sa faveur dans plusieurs provinces, et a manifesté par des excès la joie que lui causait son retour; mais Buonaparte n'en tirera ni secours d'argent, ni secours d'opinion, et c'est là surtout ce dont il aurait besoin. Enfin ses anciens serviteurs eux-mêmes, et ce nombre est immense, hésitent à le servir de nouveau, et ceux qui s'y décident n'avancent qu'avec inquiétude et avec mollesse; écueil terrible pour lui, car nul homme n'a été plus accoutumé à compter sur une activité énergique de la part de ses agens, et sur une soumission sans bornes de la part de ses sujets.

"Les hommes qui observent, quels que fussent leur parti, leur opinion, et leur désir, n'ont pas tardé à s'en apercevoir

(Unfinished.)*

General Donnadieu to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MILORD, Bruxelles, 14 Mai, 1815.

Dans le cours d'une conversation les idées échappent quelquefois, et ne peuvent être classées avec la méthode convenable, lorsqu'il s'agit d'une opération qui peut être de la plus haute importance dans les circonstances actuelles. Que Votre Grâce me permette de tracer rapidement les réflexions que ce qu'elle m'a fait l'honneur de me dire a fait naître.

Bien certainement, ainsi que le pense Votre Seigneurie, les Espagnols se trouvent placés le plus avantageusement possible pour coopérer le plus efficacement, non seulement à l'ensemble des opérations militaires, mais encore au résultat non moins intéressant du but qu'on veut atteindre en France, de l'affranchir du joug de Buonaparte et la rendre à ses anciens Princes, objet de ses désirs. Certes il serait très malheureux de ne pouvoir se servir des forces de cette nation; de ne pouvoir utiliser ce puissant auxiliaire, par rapport aux préventions établies dans l'esprit des Français contre l'indiscipline des troupes Espagnoles. Mais, s'il est vrai que cette prévention existe, ne serait-il pas possible de la détruire? Serait-il impossible dans cette circonstance si importante pour l'Europe de pénétrer les Espagnols de l'avantage immense qu'ils devraient retirer de leur bonne conduite en entrant France, des dangers évidents qu'ils auraient à courir en maltraitant les habitants disposés à s'unir avec eux pour la cause commune, de la gloire, enfin, dont ils se couvriraient dans cette lutte par la beauté et la noblesse d'un généreux caractère? J'ose croire d'après la bonne opinion que j'ai de cette nation, susceptible d'enthousiasme, qu'il ne serait pas difficile à un général qui aurait sa confiance de la pénétrer de ces vérités, surtout en ce moment où les plaies de la vengeance doivent être un peu cicatrisées. Alors, nul doute, j'en suis convaincu, quelques jours seulement de bonne conduite suffiraient pour détruire les craintes que les Français peuvent avoir, et ils mettraient le même empressement à s'unir aux Espagnols qu'à toute autre troupe.

Dans cette hypothèse, tandis que l'armée Espagnole déboucherait des Pyrénées sur la droite de Bayonne, il serait extrêmement avantageux de porter la portion de l'armée Portugaise dont on pourrait disposer sur les bords de la Gironde. Ce corps d'armée, auquel on pourrait joindre quelques bataillons Anglais, commandés par un général en chef de cette nation, ne trouverait aucun obstacle pour s'emparer de Bordeaux et successivement de toutes les provinces environnantes, dans lesquelles je me ferais fort de lever avec la plus grande célérite une force armée nationale qui seule suffirait pour entraîner toute la population et détruire à jamais l'échafaudage du Corse. Ce mouvement, qui serait on ne peut plus favorable à la cause du Roi, laverait au moins la nation d'une partie des reproches que l'Europe a à lui faire, et lui donnerait probablement le ton moral dont elle a si grand besoin.

A ces puissantes considérations, auxquelles Votre Seigneurie prend, j'en suis assuré, le plus grand intérêt, sous les rapports purement militaires se joignent ensuite des avantages immenses qui doivent résulter de l'ensemble du mouvement, par la diversion en faveur des armées qui agiront au nord et à l'est de la France. Il enleverait à Buonaparte les seules provinces qui sur ses derrières doivent l'alimenter, et lui offrir toutes sortes de ressources, depuis la Loire jusqu'au Rhône, de l'ouest au sud-est de la France, et mettrait en relation d'opérations les armées qui descendraient des Alpes sur Lyon, en embrassant toute la ligne de l'Auvergne, du Limousin, et du Berri ; pays dans lesquels Buonaparte ne peut maintenir aucune troupe, et qu'il ne garde qu'avec quelques gendarmes.

Que Votre Seigneurie veuille bien croire que dans tout ce que je pourrais être utile pour l'exécution de ces projets, je suis entièrement à sa disposition ; premièrement, dans le sentiment de ce que je dois à ma patrie et à mon Prince, et ensuite comme homme, et j'ose dire homme de bien et d'honneur, contre le génie de l'iniquité et du crime qui voudrait planer encore une fois sur le monde civilisé.

Prêt à partir à l'instant même, je me rendrai sur tous les points nécessaires, à Londres, en Espagne, en Portugal, partout dis-je, avec les ordres et les instructions que Votre Grâce voudra bien me donner.

Je suis avec respect, de Votre Seigneurie, Milord,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE GÉNÉRAL DONNADIEU.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine-le-Comte, 14th May, 1815.

There is no very particular news from the front. At Quievrain, which is just on the frontier, before Mons, a regiment of French infantry has arrived; and altogether it seems to me that they are pushing their posts closer up to us than they have done as yet. I herewith send you copies of the intelligence I have received. Yesterday I went to Nivelles and Arquesnes, to look at the ground near these two places. At Arquesnes I do not think that I could stop the progress of the enemy for any time; but at Nivelles I think it can be done very effectually, there being a very fair and not extensive position close behind the town, to which the town would be the centre. Nivelles being quite surrounded by high walls and towers, can easily be defended, as a strong post; the cross road from Braine-le-Comte to Nivelles is very good in dry weather; the distance is only 2½ leagues. There is likewise a chemin de terre from Nivelles to Braine-le-Château, and from thence to Halle, which has been reported to me as very practicable for artillery in dry weather.

Ever, my dear Duke, your very affectionate

WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

RAPPORT du 12 Mai, 1815.

Maubeuge.

Il y a trois bataillons et un dépôt de dragons. On travaille faiblement au camp de Ronsée; il y a 500 hommes qui travaillent dans les bois à faire des palissades.

On reconstruit le fort d'Asserint. Il est déjà fort avancé. Il paraît qu'on veut y mettre beaucoup de canons.

Avesnes.

Les remparts sont hérissés de canons. Il y a 300 hommes de garnison; mais les environs sont remplis de cavalerie. On a coupé en partie la route de Sor le Château à Avesnes: on se dispose à faire des abattis.

Les Français viennent tous les jours voir ce qu'il y a de nouveau aux avant postes. Hier il y avait de l'infanterie avec des lanciers, un colonel avec l'aide-de-camp du Général Chastel.

VAN MERLEN, Général-Major.

II.

Mézières—Charleville.

Le Général Vandamme: 10,000 hommes, et 800 de cavalerie du 11me. chasseurs, du 4me. hussards, et du 2me. lanciers.

Rocroy.

Le Général Haredini: 600 hommes du 22 et 75 de ligne; 150 hommes de chasseurs du 11me., se tenants dans la commune et aux environs.

La Capelle.

300 hommes du 37me.

Chimay.

100 hommes du 4me. chasseurs et 50 hommes du 22me.

Ranse.

50 hommes de travailleurs sont occupés de la coupe des arbres pour barrer les chemins.

Beaumont.

Le Général Lanroy: 600 hommes du 9me. et 50 hommes du 4me. do chasseurs.

Pont Sambre.

100 hommes du 4me. chasseurs et 200 hommes du 3me. légère: on attend 1000 hommes venants de Maubeuge.

Péronne.

Il y est arrivé un train d'artillerie, fort de 45 pièces.

The Hereditary Prince of Nassau to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Weilbourg, ce 14 Mai, 1815.

Déjà à Vienne le Prince mon père a exprimé mon désir à Votre Excellence de pouvoir faire cette guerre comme volontaire sous ses ordres. C'est Sa Majesté le Roi des Pays-Bas qui nous a fait savoir que vous, Monsieur le Duc, voulez bien me placer comme votre aide-de-camp, près de votre personne. J'ose d'avance vous en faire mes remerciments, et vous mander, My Lord, que je ne manquerai pas de me rendre auprès de Votre Excellence en peu de jours, ne devant attendre que l'arrangement de quelques affaires de famille.

C'est avec la plus parfaite considération que j'ai l'honneur d'être,
Monsieur le Duc, de Votre Excellence le très obéissant serviteur, GUILLAUME, PRINCE HÉRÉDITAIRE DE NASSAU.

G. O. Bruxelles, 15th May, 1815. [876.]

4. Several applications having been made by commanding officers for pack-saddles and panniers for surgeons, paymasters, adjutants, and quartermasters of regiments, it is to be understood that they are only to be granted to surgeons of regiments and Staff surgeons; and that the allowance of 25*l.*, which has been authorised to be drawn by those officers, is to cover the whole expense of the outfit for which it is granted.

WELLINGTON.

Extrait d'une Dépêche du Maréchal Prince de Wrede au Colonel Washington, datée de Mannheim, le 12 de Mai, 1815.

Bruxelles, 15th May, 1815.

J'ai reçu des avant-postes le rapport fait par des émissaires que l'armement auquel Napoléon veut forcer sa nation éprouve des grandes difficultés; que les partis se divisent à Paris en trois factions, celle des Républicains, celle des Royalistes, et celle de Napoléon ; dans les villes de Strasbourg et de Metz ils ne se divisent que dans les deux dernières factions. Depuis plusieurs jours les conscripts Français désertent de notre côté. Une partie de ceux de la Haute Alsace même ont fait demander si on les laisserait passer nos avant-postes.

Un de mes aides-de-camp revenu hier de la Suisse assure qu'on n'y connait point la force ennemie établi sur la ligne entre le Rhône et Huningue. L'esprit des Suisses doit être bon pour la cause commune : les 30,000 hommes qu'ils ont mis sur pied de guerre sont formés en trois camps, chacun de 10,000 hommes, qui gardent leurs frontières vers la France.

MM. le Landamman Reinhardt et le Général de Watteville ont extrêmement perdu dans l'opinion publique des Suisses parcequ'ils leurs paraissent du parti Français. On manquent de caractère pour prendre un parti décisif dans la présente conjoncture.

Extrait d'une autre Dépêche du Maréchal Prince de Wrede au Colonel Washington, de la méme date.

Vous direz bien des belles choses de ma part au Maréchal Duc de Wellington, et que le Maréchal Prince Blücher m'a fait part de l'entrevue qu'il avait avec lui à Tirlemont le 4 de ce mois.

J'ai répondu au Maréchal Blücher que quoique toutes les nouvelles annoncaient que Napoléon n'est pas encore en mesure, je serai prêt de faire un mouvement en faveur de l'aile gauche de l'armée Prussienne, pourvu qu'on me prévienne à tems de l'époque où l'armée du Duc de Wellington et de Blücher se concentrent, mais que l'armée du Prince Royal de Wurtemberg n'est pas encore, et ne sera pas qu'entre le 20 et le 25, en mesure pour pouvoir efficacement appuyer ma gauche. L'armée Autrichienne est encore moins en mesure à l'heure qu'il est. Ce qui est fâcheux, c'est que le Maréchal Prince de Schwarzenberg n'est pas encore arrivé dans mon quartier-général, nonobstant que je lui ai écrit hier qu'il me paraît urgemment nécessaire que nous commencions les opérations avant la fin du mois.

D'après les nouvelles positives, Napoléon était encore, le 1 de Mai, à Paris. Il fait tout pour exalter le peuple, et à l'engager à prendre les armes contre nous. Jusqu'ici il n'a réussi qu'avec le force qu'il a employé, et qu'il a poussé au point à faire des réquisitions forcées, soit en hommes, en chevaux, et en vivres, etc.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Foreign Office, 15th May, 1815.

In order to economise the means placed at your Grace's disposal, and to prevent the dissatisfaction that might arise from subsidising the Hanoverian troops at a rate considerably higher than those of the other Continental Powers, the Prince Regent approves of the discontinuance of the subsidy of 600,000*l.* from and after the 1st of June next. This period is assigned instead of the 1st of May, as the convention with Hanover entitles them to a month's subsidy after notice given.

Your Grace will extend to their whole force in the field the amount of subsidy settled for the other Powers, viz. 11*l.* 2*s.* per man, with such additional allowance on the 15,000 men serving, beyond the quota which Hanover is bound to furnish, as your Grace may deem reasonable upon the principles suggested in your letter to me on this subject.

The Dutch government have hitherto only repaid to us one-half of the subsidy of 50,000*l.* per month for the 15,000 Hanoverians, so that they are indebted to this government for the other half, the payment of which, if they should find it inconvenient, under the present exigencies of their service, to continue it by monthly instalments until the extinction of the whole, your Grace will inform them that it may be delayed till some futu re pecuniary arrangement between the two countries.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

P.S. As the convention with Hanover commences on the 25th of the month, your Grace will substitute the 25th May, instead o f the 1st of June, for that of its termination.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 15th May, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose to your Grace the remaining part of th[e] memoir which I mentioned on Saturday, together with a letter from the Duc de Feltre.

All the accounts received here from Paris describe Buonaparte's situation as most embarrassing.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient very humble servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

*Continuation.

Les hommes qui observent, quels que fussent leur parti, leur opinion, et leur désir, n'ont pas tardé à s'en apercevoir de cette rapide décadence de Buonaparte, de ce discrédit absolu de son gouvernement comme de lui-même, et de la probabilité de sa chute. L'inquiétude s'est emparée de ceux qui redoutent le retour des Bourbons, et l'incertitude de ceux qui, sans le craindre, ne sont pas enclins à le désirer. Ces deux classes comprennent, il ne faut pas se le dissimuler, une assez grande partie des Français. La chute des Bourbons a été si prompte, si facile, que beaucoup de gens en ont conclu qu'ils ne pouvaient s'établir solidement en France ; on a cherché dans leur système de gouvernement et dans les fautes qui ont été commises la cause de l'impossibilité où ils se sont trouvés de résister à une première attaque. On a attribué ces fautes à des intentions universellement réprouvées; on en a exagéré les conséquences, et l'on a beaucoup répété qu'un second retour étoit impossible; que la famille Royale ne prendroit jamais racine en France; et que dans la nécessité de trouver un successeur à Buonaparte, il falloit le chercher ailleurs.

Trois partis se sont présentés, la Régence, la République, et le Duc d'Orléans. Nul doute que les principaux chefs des Jacobins, un grand nombre d'officiers, et même de purs Buonapartistes, ne désirent la Régence; elle les délivreroit de l'homme qu'ils redoûtent, et qu'ils ne croient pouvoir ni contenir ni soutenir; elle mettroit à couvert tous leurs intérêts, et laisseroit le pouvoir entre leurs mains. Mais l'idée de la Régence déplait à l'opinion publique; on craint l'influence étrangère; on ne voit dans ce gouvernement ni honneur ni solidité; d'ailleurs à moins de tuer Buonaparte, comment s'assurer que la Régence le chasseroit pour toujours? L'assassinat du père pour mettre le fils à sa place répugne à nos sentiments, à nos mœurs, et jeteroit un grand défaveur sur les assassins. Cependant, on parle de la Régence, on tentera peut-être quelque négociation à ce sujet; et ce parti, qui ne plait à personne, mais que peu de gens repousseroient avec chaleur, est sans contredit celui qui a le plus occupé les membres même du gouvernement.

La République est un mot plus populaire. Les Jacobins subalternes, et ils sont répandus dans toute la France, la regrettent et la désirent. Ils ont régné sous son nom, ils se flattent qu'ils régneroient encore. La populace est entre leurs mains.

La République offriroit aux hommes remuans et ambitieux des chances de pouvoir, de fortune, et de gloire; son souvenir s'allie à tous les mots qui ont agité longtems les Français, à toutes les phrases qu'ils ont entendu et répétés, à tous les airs qu'ils ont chantés et appelés nationaux. Aussi ne peut on se dissimuler que ce projet ne fût conforme aux désirs vagues d'un assez grand nombre de gens; mais les classes supérieures en sont si éloignées, on croit si peu à la possibilité d'établir un gouvernement de ce nom, le mot seul inspire un tel effroi à tous les citoyens paisibles, et si peu de confiance à ses partisans même, qu'on ne pense pas que rien de sérieux soit à craindre de ce côté.

Reste Monsieur le Duc d'Orléans. Il sembleroit, au premier coup d'œil, que ce devroit être là le parti le plus nombreux, le plus accrédité, le plus redoutable. On a beaucoup dit, et on est généralement convenu, que c'étoit le seul qui offrit aux intérêts révolutionnaires une garantie solide, et à la France, lassée de révolutions, des gages de stabilité. Cependant, on en parle peu; on peut même dire que cette idée n'est point devenue un projet, qu'elle n'a pris aucune consistance. Les uns doutent du consentement du Prince, les autres de son énergie; personne ne s'y arrête comme à une chance probable; beaucoup de gens sont de cette opinion, personne n'est de ce parti; et à vrai dire, le parti n'existe pas, et il n'y a rien à en redouter.

On peut donc affirmer que le Roi seul a en France un véritable parti, parti nombreux, actif, prononcé, et qui devient chaque jour davantage le parti national. Quelques craintes qu'aient inspirés à de nombreuses classes de citoyens les prétentions ou les imprudences des émigrés, quelque vive qu'ait été la révolte des vanités de 1814 contre les vanités de 1789, malgré les fautes qui ont été commises, malgré le discrédit où sont tombés quelques membres du gouvernement du Roi, malgré la méfiance qu'ont inspirés les intentions des Princes, et les propos de la Cour, en dépit des reproches de mauvaise foi ou d'incapacité qui se sont élevés contre le Ministère en général, et surtout contre certains hommes, la France a senti le bonheur dont elle a joui, et elle sent à présent qu'elle l'a perdu; elle sait qu'elle a été libre sous le Roi, et qu'elle ne l'est plus sous Buonaparte; qu'elle a été paisible, et qu'elle va avoir la guerre; qu'elle marchoit vers la prospérité, et qu'elle marche vers la ruine. Les proscriptions et les exils de Buonaparte, sa tentative pour arrêter le 'Censeur,' son alliance avec les Jacobins, ont merveilleusement servi la cause du Roi. La France voit qu'il lui rapporte en même tems le despotisme Impérial et l'anarchie révolutionnaire; qu'elle a tout à craindre des moyens qu'il emploie pour se rétablir sur le trône, et de lui-meme s'il parvient à s'y consolider. Elle repousse avec une égale aversion et ces moyens et leur résultat. Elle regrette les biens qu'elle a perdus, et avec ces biens le Roi qui les lui avait assurés; le Roi est considéré, honoré, respecté, aimé même. Il faut le dire, si le Roi devoit revenir seul, sans famille et sans suite, peut-être seroit-il déjà de retour; mais on craint les Princes, la Cour, les émigrés, et c'est là ce qui rend beaucoup d'honnêtes gens indécis, ce qui ralentit la marche de l'opinion publique, ce qui en retarde les effets.

On ne haït point les Princes; on leur croit de la bonté, de la générosité, de la vertu même; mais leurs qualités aimables et attachantes ne se font sentir et apprécier que de ceux qui les approchent, tandis que leurs actions et leurs moindres discours sont examinés, jugés, commentés, par la nation entière. On cherche, et on voit partout des motifs à la méfiance qu'ils inspirent. On les suppose mal entourés, mal conseillés, et on est disposé à penser qu'ils n'écoutent et ne croient que ceux qui les entourent. C'est à cause du Roi qu'ils reviendront; c'est à cause d'eux que le Roi reviendra peut-être avec moins de promptitude et de facilité.

[Here follow some observations on the King's late Ministers, which the Duc de Feltre wished me not to insert. After abusing many of them, the Memoir proceeds :—]

La Cour a fait encore plus de mal que le Ministère. Elle en a fait à Paris par ses discours, dans les provinces par ses correspondances. Elle a fait supposer partout que les intentions du Roi n'étoient point d'accord avec sa conduite, et devoient finir par prévaloir. L'Administration vouloit-elle suivre une marche régulière et conforme aux principes établis, la Cour détruisoit l'effet de ses mesures en les faisant envisager comme une condéscendance extérieure, comme un moyen de gagner du temps. La correspondance officielle étoit sans cesse démentie par une correspondance secrette qui soutenoit les espérances des ennemis du système constitutionnel, et intimidoit les agens légitimes de l'autorité. Ordonnoit-on la vente des bois nationaux autorisée par une loi que le Roi avoit proposée aux deux Chambres? La Cour répandoit partout que cette loi étoit l'ouvrage d'un Ministre, que le Roi la désapprouvoit, que les Princes n'en vouloient point; et dans son ignorante imprudence, elle ne s'apercevoit pas que, sans les alarmes qu'avoient causées ses discours, cette vente n'eut peut-être pas été nécessaire.

On ne finiroit pas si l'on vouloit développer les tristes effets de la conduite de ce parti aveugle et léger qui a séparé la cause du Roi de celle de la nation, qui a cru qu'il falloit au Roi une Cour plutôt qu'un peuple, et qui a cherché pour l'autorité un appui contre l'esprit du tems, au lieu de lui laisser prendre dans l'esprit du tems un appui dont elle ne peut plus se passer.

Les hommes même qui n'ont pris aucune part à ces misérables manœuvres, qui ont senti la nécessité de suivre la ligne que le Roi avoit tracée, n'ont su y conformer ni leurs actions, ni leurs manières, ni leur langage. Etrangers à nos mœurs, à nos habitudes, à nos idées, ils n'ont pas obtenu la confiance de la nation, qui n'a pu croire à leur bonne foi, parcequ'ils ne comprenoient pas plus ses sentimens, qu'elle ne comprenoit les leurs. On vouloit la même chose, et l'on ne s'est pas entendu, parcequ'on ne la vouloit pas par les mêmes motifs. Ainsi tandis que la France voyoit surtout dans la monarchie constitutionnelle la liberté qu'elle lui rendoit, on a surtout parlé de la monarchie. A l'appui des mesures qui constatoient les droits de la nation, et assuroient son repos, on a surtout fait valoir les droits du Prince et les intérêts de la couronne. Sans cesse le langage des Royalistes, mal adapté aux intentions d'un gouvernement constitutionnel, a jeté sur eux une teinte douteuse et défavorable. On en a vu l'effet dans la discussion relative aux biens des émigrés ; on avoit à faire valoir dans leur cause tous les principes de la justice, et même de la liberté ; on a surtout parlé de leur mérite et de leurs sacrifices ; et l'élan de moralité qui se prononçoit en leur faveur a été sur le champ comprimé par la méfiance de l'esprit de parti.

Il ne faut pas espérer que la sagesse ou l'autorité du Roi puissent jamais inspirer ou dicter un langage nouveau à des hommes qui ne savent, qui n'entendent que celui-là, et pour qui n'ont aucun sens les expressions maintenant à notre usage. Nous le répétons, ils ne comprennent pas plus la nation qu'elle ne les comprend, et dans l'isolement où les tient cette impossibilité de communiquer avec elle, la méfiance qu'ils éprouvent est égale à celle qu'ils inspirent.

[The rest is not worth copying : it contains advice to His Majesty.]

Count Blacas d'Aulps to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Gand, ce 15 Mai, 1815.

Un devoir impérieux me prescrit de soumettre, sans délai, à votre Excellence un projet fondé sur les rapports très importans qui viennent de me parvenir. Des députés des communes d'Armentières, d'Aire, d'Hazebrouck, &c., sont venus offrir au Roi leur sang et leur fortune. Les habitans de cette fidèle contrée sont impatients d'arborer le drapeau blanc. Animés d'un dévouement sans bornes, ils se sont cotisés, et ont formé une caisse qu'ils viennent proposer au Roi ; ils ont fabriqué des cartouches, et sont tous armés de fusils de chasse. En un mot, ils s'engagent, au premier signal, à fournir un rassemblement de quinze mille hommes. (Il leur faut quatre jours pour les réunir.) D'un autre côté, la foiblesse des garnisons qui occupent les places voisines, et les intelligences que nous y avons, nous donnent l'assurance de surprendre ou Calais ou Dunkerque. Un autre correspondance non moins active est établie entre le Boulonnois, l'Artois, et la Picardie, d'où l'on m'a fait dire que la présence de trois ou quatre régiments suffiroit pour soulever toute la population.

Vous concevez combien il seroit important que ce mouvement intérieur précédât l'entrée des armées alliées, quelle impulsion cet événement donneroit au parti Royal ; et ce que je dirai avec un égale confiance au Duc de Wellington, quelle force cet appui prêteroit à mon auguste maître dans ses relations avec les autres Cours.

Je n'hésite donc point, my Lord, à vous demander l'assistance d'un petit corps, avec un peu d'artillerie ; et j'ose vous protester que l'autorité légitime sera bientôt reconnue et proclamée dans deux ou trois provinces.

Je connois trop votre âme et le but que vous anime pour douter de la satisfaction avec laquelle vous verriez un changement aussi favorable aux intérêts du Roi et de la France, changement que la connoissance des faits que j'ai l'honneur de vous communiquer me fait regarder comme certain.

J'attends avec la plus vive impatience la réponse de Votre Excellence, à qui j'offre un nouveau témoignage de l'inviolable attachement et de la haute considération avec laquelle

J'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

BLACAS D'AULPS.

General Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, 15 Mai, 1815.

Il m'a été possible d'avoir des renseignements sur la force de l'ennemi dans les cantonnements entre Maubeuge jusqu'à Givet et Avesnes.

Ayant l'honneur de mettre la copie de cet extrait devant les yeux de Votre Altesse, j'ose y ajouter qu'après les donnés que je reçois il me paraît que la garnison de Maubeuge n'est pas unanimement porté pour Buonaparte, et qu'il y a eu entre la cavalerie et l'infanterie des scènes assez sanglantes.

Je supplie Votre Altesse d'agréer en bonté les sentiments respectueux avec lesquels j'ai l'honneur d'être,

Monseigneur, de Votre Altesse

Le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

[Write him that I am very much obliged to him.

WELLINGTON.]

General Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, le 15 Mai, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de mettre devant les yeux de Votre Altesse le rapport d'une personne qui, venant de Chaumont, est arrivé hier à Charleroi.

Toutes les nouvelles de la frontière affirment que l'ennemi garde la défensive la plus stricte.

Daignez agréer les sentiments respectueux avec lesquels j'ai l'honneur d'être,

Monseigneur, de Votre Altesse

Le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

[ENCLOSURE.]

RAPPORT d'un Voyageur parti de Chaumont, en France (Département de la Haute Marne), le 4 Mai, et ayant passé par St. Dizier, Verdun, Sédan, Charleville, Marienbourg, et Philippeville.

Dans le département de la Haute Marne les Gardes Nationales ne se rangent point, l'esprit des habitans étant opposé aux mesures du gouvernement actuel.

On ne fortifie pas la ville de St. Dizier, des officiers de génie ayant vu la place, et reconnue comme n'offrant point de moyens de défense. Le sous-préfet y a été destitué pour ne pas avoir montré assez de zèle à former la Garde Nationale. Un nombreux train d'artillerie, avec beaucoup d'ateliers, mais sans canons, venant de Sampigny, près de St. Mihiel, a passé par St. Dizier pour se rendre à Paris.

Sur toute la route ce n'est qu'entre Rocroy et Charleville qu'on commence à voir un nombre considérable de troupes réunies dans des cantonnements serrés, et fesant parties du corps du Général Vandamme, qu'on dit être de 30,000 hommes. Dans six des villages les plus proches de la route il y avoit un bataillon dans chacun.

De Charleville jusqu'à la frontière on ne voit pas de troupes.

Dans les places fortes il n'y a que des Gardes Nationales, dont une partie est sans armes.

En général on est contre Buonaparte, mais non plus pour les Bourbons. Les usurpations de la noblesse, la crainte qu'on leur voudra rendre leurs anciennes terres sans indemniser les propriétaires actuels, jointes aux inquiétudes qu'on a pour l'imposition de la dîme, ont fait perdre à cette famille l'amour de la nation.

On rend toute la justice à Louis XVIII., et attribue tout le mal aux personnes qui l'entourent.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 16th May, 1815.

I send you an extract of a despatch from Mr. Canning (the note I will not trouble you with).

The advantage to be derived from your writing to the Prince Regent of Portugal, and the letting Mr. Canning have a copy of it to show the Regency, must, I conceive, consist in satisfying the Regency that they have decided right, rather than in persuading them so to decide; for the decision must have been taken one way or the other before a copy of your letter (if you consent to write one) can reach Lisbon. Unless, however, you see any objection, I wish you to write the letter as desired, that we may have given every chance of getting the men.

Mr. Canning is instructed to propose Bordeaux, only on the supposition of the original proposition being rejected, and after consultation with Lord Beresford, to whom I have written a private letter, telling him fairly I could promise him naval co-operation, but not any troops, and enclosing him a copy of your letter, in which you suggested that without British troops there might be doubts how the Portuguese would behave.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

The Right Hon. George Canning to Viscount Castlereagh.

Extract.

Lisbon, 1st May, 1815.

I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the passage of the Jasper to enclose to your Lordship a copy of the note which I have this day addressed to Dom Miguel Pereira Forjaz, in execution of the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, conveyed to me in your Lordship's despatch, No. 17.

Your Lordship will infer from the length as well as from the topics of this note, that it has been written after a conference with M. de Forjaz, in which he has stated several objections to the plan proposed, and suggested other plans of action.

It is indeed very plain that in addition to whatever may be their own views of the impolicy of this destination of their troops, and of the dangers likely to arise from the want of them at home, the members of the government have a real and genuine doubt as to the sufficiency of their own power for the decision of the question, and an anxious apprehension of the use which may be made of their compliance with the demand by those who are adverse to them at Rio de Janeiro.

I have, therefore, made my note stronger than I should have otherwise done upon this point, not only for the purpose of endeavouring to overcome their scruples (which I confess I cannot blame), but of giving them the means of justifying their compliance to the Prince Regent by the urgency of the application.

Much more efficient to this purpose, however, would be a letter to His Royal Highness from the Duke of Wellington, and your Lordship might perhaps see no objection to proposing to his Grace to write such a letter, and to furnish me with a copy of it, for the satisfaction of the government here.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 16th May, 1815.

Do you think we could get hold of the three Swiss regiments late in the French service? I see by Sir Charles Stuart's despatch of the 12th, that La Harpe has had influence enough to counteract their return to Louis XVIII. We are no parties, as I know, to agreements not to recruit in Switzerland; and if the regiments in question understood that they could be made over to France on the restoration of Louis XVIII., we should have no difficulty in getting them. I only throw this out for your consideration; and I cannot but fear that if the regiments in question are not permitted to serve either Louis XVIII. or the Allies, they will serve the enemy.

Yours ever sincerely,

BATHURST.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, War Department, London, 16th May, 1815.

I do myself the honour to acquaint your Grace that a part of the troops which have been lately employed in the Gulf of Florida have arrived in the ports of England. Not a moment has been lost in ordering such among them as were fit for immediate service to repair to Ostend, and I hope that the three battalions named in the margin * will reach Flanders nearly as soon as this despatch. Parts of the 4th and 27th regiments have not arrived as yet, but they shall follow as soon as they reach the coast.

* 1st battalion 4th regiment; 1st do. 27th do.; 1st do. 40th do.

Parts of the 21st and 44th regiments, and the 93rd, which suffered severely at New Orleans, have gone to Ireland to replace in part the infantry lately drawn from that country. The 85th regiment is returned extremely weak in numbers, and until it can be strengthened, will hardly be available for active service.

The Royal Artillery, the Sappers and Staff Corps, 7th and 43rd Foot, and part of the 95th regiment, did not leave Mobile so early as the rest of the troops, but they may be expected in a fortnight; and as these corps are understood to be in excellent order, they will be sent directly to Ostend.

I have the honour to be

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, North Cray, 16th May, 1815.

I send you two more letters from the same correspondent at Paris. I should be glad you could show his reports to Sir C. Stuart and Clancarty.

I will write to you on my return relative to the Russian subsidy. I hope you will make Pozzo observe, in reply to the observations on the treaty of the 3rd Jan., that if there is any grievance, it is surely on the side of the Powers who were threatened into defensive measures.

The unabated spirit of conciliation evinced on our part, as well as of Austria and France, in all the subsequent proceedings, sufficiently justifies our conduct, and proves that we had no views hostile either to Russia or Prussia. Whatever language they may hold, it is pretty clear that the knowledge of this treaty has done no real harm to our relations with either Court.

We have no satisfactory information with respect to the number or present position of the Russian troops now advancing. A private letter states them to be much exaggerated. If you can give me any intelligence, pray do.

How far do you think it would be prudent for the King, when the Allies have made a certain progress in France, say to Chaumont, Nancy, and Dijon, to invite his two Houses of Parliament to assemble in the rear of the armies? If they were likely to obey the call in sufficient numbers to enable them legally to enter upon business, their authority might be a powerful instrument against the new Jacobin Assembly.

Yours, my dear Lord, ever most sincerely,

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Paris, 3rd May, 1815.

I wrote on the 1st by an opportunity not sure enough to trust much to: another presents itself, in which I may be more open.

I told you the "Constitution" was ridiculous. The people go beyond me, though it establishes, as far as such a paper can do, some great principles; and the press is undoubtedly as free as possible: but confidence is lost.

In the 'Moniteur' of to-day you will see a line of fortifications that would require all the men, money, and bonne volonté of the entire French people to finish in three months!

I told you Buonaparte was falling in public opinion. He is so rapidly fallen as to be at this moment an object of execration with everybody but his immediate dependents. The innumerable casks, packed up, that he has sent from the Tuileries and the Elysée Bourbon for the last ten days, his having melted all the plate he could lay his hands on, as well as the medals in all the palaces, are facts known to every one in Paris.

He dare not stir till the forced acceptation of this "Constitution" gives him a semblance of national authority, and his presence at the army is more than indispensable.

There was a scene, with some bloodshed, on the Boulevards last night between some of his soldiers and the people, which I consider as the beginning of a more serious affray. It is not mentioned in any paper of this morning.

There is much alarm about Lisle. A new General was sent off to that place yesterday. "L'esprit y est très mauvais" is the military confession. There are other reports from thence too good to be true.

I am more and more persuaded that the Man will be sacrificed to the country, but I cannot shut my eyes to the desperation that has no retreat.

The troops are not paid; they are an intolerable weight in the villages they pass through; and a considerable number of them stop at certain distances, as if he wanted to have an intermediate force to ensure his return to the capital in case of a disaster.

From the people he is already separated de facto. The great object would be to separate him from the men in power; and if so, what can be thought of the policy that tends to identify them?

I hear some amongst you praise this Constitution. Do they consider who gave it, how it is given, how it is to be accepted, or do they attend to the last article of it? Read the enclosed by a very respectable independent man, of some weight and fortune, sold publicly at all the shops.

It is a curious circumstance to observe how Buonaparte is working for the Bourbons, and how the Comte de Lisle is working for the Carnots.

How is it possible for any man living, out of Paris, to guess at the state of things here, when I, on the spot, and my whole mind devoted to the object, cannot ascertain, from one day to another, the turn or the complexion that events may give to opinions?

If I were to colour things as I wish them to be, and not as they really are, I should have no more intellect than a French émigré; whereas the truth is, that I do not give half the force to my remarks that they appear to me to deserve.

The bare mention of a project to fortify Montmartre, in the paper to-day, has created a violent ferment, and immediately put into the people's heads to illuminate the town, it being the anniversary of the King's return. Measures, I hope, will be taken to prevent such imprudence, which would undoubtedly produce a massacre.

The federation in Brittany is reckoned the most impolitic thing yet done by government, and it is already reported to have turned against Buonaparte; but this is only a report.

The return of Mr. H. will bring me some advice which will be law to me, but I begin to see that it will be very difficult indeed to get a passport, even for Basle.

Il sera chaud ici, but I am not easily frightened. Upon the whole view, and the best I am able to form, Buonaparte is in a deplorable way, independent of the coup de grâce which you are preparing for him.

MOTIF du Vote Négatif de LOUIS FLORIAN PAUL DE KERGORLAY sur l'Acte intitulé "Acte Additionnel aux Constitutions de l'Empire," en date du 22 Avril, 1815.

Paris, 28 Avril, 1815.

Je crois devoir à mes concitoyens, et je me dois certainement à moi-même, de leur rendre compte du motif qui m'a déterminé à voter contre l'acceptation de l'acte intitulé "Acte Additionnel aux Constitutions de l'Empire," en date du 22 Avril, 1815.*

Ce motif est que l'article 67 de cet acte est attentatoire à la liberté des citoyens Français, en ce qu'il prétend leur interdire l'exercice du droit de proposer le rétablissement de la dynastie des Bourbons sur le trône. Je suis forcé de protester contre cet article, parce que je suis convaincu que le rétablissement de cette dynastie sur le trône est le seul moyen de rendre le bonheur aux Français. L'expérience que nous venons de faire du bonheur pratique dont a joui la France pendant la restauration n'a pu laisser à personne aucun doute à cet égard, et l'unanimité du vœu national en faveur de Louis le regretté est pleinement confirmée par le soin qu'ont pris les auteurs de l'article que je réprouve d'interdire la manifestation de cet unanime vœu. La confusion combinée qu'ils ont mise dans cet article, en y mêlant divers fantômes impopulaires qui n'ont aucun rapport avec le rétablissement de la dynastie des Bourbons, est une preuve de plus de l'évidence du désir général de la nation; ce n'est que faute d'objets réels qu'on évoque des fantômes; et le plus magnifique éloge que l'on puisse faire des actes d'un gouvernement est de se voir réduit à reconnaître que le seul moyen de le dépopulariser est de lui supposer des intentions.

Je dois protester aussi contre l'art. 6 du décret du même jour, portant que l'acte additionnel aux Constitutions sera envoyé à l'acceptation des armées. Il est contraire aux principes admis chez toutes les nations civilisées d'envoyer des actes constitutionnels à l'acceptation des armées. Chez tous les peuples libres, chez tous les peuples qui ont le sentiment de leur dignité, les armées sont des corps destinés, non à voter sur les Constitutions, mais à obéir à la volonté nationale. Aussitôt qu'une nation souffre que ses armées votent, elle se soumet au pire des esclavages.

Cet esclavage se décèle assez dans l'art. 5 d'un second décret du même jour. Cet article ne dit pas que, suivant que le recensement général des votes sera favorable ou contraire à l'acte additionnel aux Constitutions, cet acte sera promulgué ou ne sera pas promulgué; mais il dit que le résultat du recensement général des votes sera proclamé, et que l'acte additionnel aux Constitutions sera promulgué. Cette étrange certitude du succès est un langage assez clair, ce me semble, et chacun de nous peut l'entendre. Peut-on nous dire plus clairement, "Votez, grande nation; mais en votant conformez-vous à l'injonction qui vous est donnée; votez, non en hommes libres, mais en sujets soumis; votez, mais n'oubliez pas que le vœu de l'armée étant connu d'avance, il faut bien que la nation fléchisse devant les baïonnettes"?

* J'ai voté negativement aujourd'hui au secrétariat général de la Préfecture de Police, et j'y ai motivé mon vote par les deux premières phrases qui suivent, et dont le présent écrit n'est que le développement.

Quant à moi, je n'ai point encore appris à prendre les baïonnettes pour règle de ma conscience.

L. F. P. DE KERGORLAY.

III.

Paris, 4th May, 1815.

The delay of another day allows me to send you some more last words by the same opportunity.

There was no tumult last night, or illumination. I have conversed with several sensible and impartial men here at different times, and upon different subjects, and in the material points they all agree.

En voici quelques-uns:—That France, at no period of the Revolution, was in a more unsettled state than at this moment. That it never can get settled into any shape that will not be most dangerous to its neighbours, without the interference of foreign power. That the National Guards will not fight or move out of their departments. That Buonaparte will not be supported by the people, of whom 23 millions at least out of the 24 are against him. That the loss of a battle would be instantly fatal to him; but that the great, the golden rule of the Allies must be to "ménager l'amour propre de la nation." That they will accept no constitution from any Sovereign, and that he would have the best chance who went au devant the wishes of the people. That the full and entire liberty of the press is irrevocably fixed. That no proclamation of the Allies will be believed or attended to but that of the Duke of Wellington, and that if he contrives so as not to let the war peser upon a single peasant or householder, he will do more than by his arms; and they further agree that a considerable part of Buonaparte's army will not be faithful to him. If men of the description I speak of are deceived, it is no wonder if I should be so; but they have been uniform in these opinions for some time, and they confirm me in mine.

We have now done with these subjects, and my fear is that I have already said too much upon them. I conceive the war to be begun. If any opportunity should occur in its progress, you shall hear from me.

I have written to Lord M. as you desired. I trust you have received all my letters, as I have yours. I am only anxious about one, sent by the post, on my wine account, and signed Adamon, in which I acknowledged your kindness in 300 ways. The change is so bad that I defer using it till the last extremity.

The papers of this morning show me that you are stout in England, and have Whigs among you who see the impossibility of suffering this scourge of mankind to remain in peaceable possession.

The enclosed has done mischief.

To the Duke of Brunswick. [877.]

SIR, Bruxelles, 16th May, 1815.

I request your Highness will let me have a return of the exact quantity of musket ammunition requiring to complete your Highness's troops to sixty rounds a man, and to fill the ammunition waggons your Highness is in possession of with musket and gun ammunition.

I have the honour to enclose your Highness the papers which I have received from Vienna regarding the disposition of the Allied armies. I beg your Highness to return them to me, as I have no copies.

WELLINGTON.

The Duke of Brunswick to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Head Quarters, Lacken, 16th May, 1815.

I fear I have occasioned some error, to judge of your Grace's letter, respecting the want of ammunition for my corps; and I must once more take the liberty to mention that, except thirty rounds of musket ammunition per man, and forty for each piece of ordnance, the one tumbril for each piece is quite empty, and the same is the case with the tumbrils for the infantry: in consequence of this, I request once more your Grace will be pleased to order the wanting ammunition for my corps to complete each man to sixty rounds, and to carry the rest in the tumbrils.

I shall not fail to give to my Commissariat the necessary instructions in consequence of the explanation on the subject of provisioning of which your Grace informed me yesterday; and I could wish that the Commissary-General of your Grace's army would point out exactly what each man shall have to receive in provisions, and what quantity of forage for the horses. I beg your Grace to believe that so soon as I receive the scale on that subject, everything will be directly arranged, as I am quite ignorant what the Allied Powers have settled on that subject at Vienna.

I have the honour to be, with the highest regard,

My Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and very faithful servant,

WILLIAM DUKE OF BRUNSWICK.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 16th May, 1815, 7 P.M.

General Beurnonville has been written to this day, and, whenever he presents himself, will be received with attention, and invited to accompany the head-quarters.

I don't believe any answer has yet been received from Ghent respecting the French Marshals at Aix-la-Chapelle. There is no intrigue attributed to them. General Maison, having property in the Prussian dominions, and choosing to reside on it, has been required, in the same manner as every resident Frenchman, to swear allegiance or to return near the person of the French King; and the reason assigned for exacting such a pledge is (I am told) that by the Code Napoléon a Frenchman holding or residing on property out of France is not released from any of his duties as a French subject. For different reasons General Maison has hitherto avoided to conform to this demand, or to take the alternative of withdrawing; but he has with him two aides-de-camp, one of whom has been imprudent in conversation concerning Buonaparte, and has been reproved by the police; and as the system has been applied to all Frenchmen in that part of the country, the Prussians have not been more indulgent to these French Marshals as being emigrants or royalists; and as in the present war much of the national and military spirit is derived from a decided hatred of the French, it is a part of the Prussian system to keep alive this spirit. However, I am assured nothing injurious to the character of these officers shall take place, and that nothing will be decided on this point till the King of France's answer is received.

The Marshal is known personally to dislike all Frenchmen; and to judge from the conversation of officers of rank and in the confidence of headquarters, it is evident there is a strong anti-Bourbon feeling.

I have again heard it insinuated that the Saxon quarrel may lessen the disposable Prussian force; and I am informed that the fermentation which exists in Poland will certainly cause a Russian army to be stationary there.

No news of the enemy has been received in the course of the day.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 16th May, 1815.

I have the honour to inform your Lordship that, according to the directions of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, I am returned to this place. As there is a report that already about 20,000 men are at Laon, and that they fortify a position there, I have sent a man to ascertain this, and I hope I shall be able to get 'Moniteurs' tolerably regular.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Rapport des Nouvelles rentrées au 16 Mai, 1815, from the Prince of Orange.

A Avesnes il est distribué journellement 30,000 rations de vivres, y compris les rations pour les troupes des environs et de Beaumont.

Au Parc à Avesnes il y a 60 bouches à feu.

Près de San Potterie on a fait une coupure dans le chemin, qui est défendue par une batterie de 6 pièces.

Entre San Potterie et Fillerie on élève des ouvrages sur différens points, visiblement pour une position retranchée.

On travaille au camp retranché de Maubeuge. On dit qu'il doit y réunir 60,000 hommes pour le défendre.

De chaque régiment, comme aussi de la bourgeoisie, des députations doivent être envoyées à Paris, pour assister au Champ de Mai; après quoi, on dit, que Napoléon se rendra à l'armée.

On a vu peu de cavalerie près des troupes. 300 Lanciers devant Binche. Hier on a attendu 5000 Cuirassiers-Lanciers.

On a vu beaucoup de paysans, précédés d'une musique, arriver à Avesnes pour se présenter au service.

On débate sur les frontières de France que nous nous renforçons, et les attaquerons.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, 16th May, 1815.

Je me suis justement occupé hier du bagne d'Anvers, et des moyens de commuer le peine des détenus qui s'y trouvent en d'autres punitions. Le résultat en sera naturellement que, ce genre de punition venant à cesser, le bagne sera également aboli. Quelques arrangemens préalables devant cependant avoir lieu avant que je sois à même de prendre une détermination finale sur cet objet, je dois désirer qu'entretems tout reste in statu quo, puisqu'il n'existe pas de prison semblable dans le pays, et je ferai hâter les mesures préparatoires autant que les circonstances le permettent. Du reste, je dois observer ne pas partager l'opinion du Général Vander Plaat au sujet des forçats, dont je pense que s'il en tira le parti dont ils sont susceptibles, l'utilité peut être grande en les employant aux travaux les plus difficiles, et auxquels des personnes libres ne se prêtent qu'avec bien de la peine. Même en cas de siége, en suivant l'exemple donné par les Français pendant le dernier bombardement, ils peuvent être mis aux postes les plus dangereux, et éteindre les incendies, les plaçant à des endroits et les fesant monter sur les bâtimens où l'on craindroit exposer maint autres individus, ce qu'ils font avec plaisir, par l'espoir d'obtenir par là leur liberté, ou du moins le raccourcissement de leurs peines.

Je suis, avec haute considération, my Lord Duc,

Votre affectionné,

GUILLAUME.

NOTE sur les FORCES MILITAIRES de NAPOLÉON à PARIS, et sur l'ARMÉE DE LA MOSELLE, rédigée par un Officier parti de Paris le 10 Mai, et le 17 de Thionville.

Chaque jour ajoute, dans une proportion effrayante, aux forces de Napoléon.

La plus grande activité régnait à Paris, le 10 Mai, dans tous les préparatifs militaires.

Un premier appel de bataillons de Gardes Nationales fut fait dès les premiers jours de Mai dans tous les départements environnants Paris ; et peu de jours après on en a fait un second, qui a compris tous les hommes de 20 à 40 ans, mariés et pères de famille sans exception.

Cette mesure exécutée dans toute la France aurait mis au moins quinze cent mille hommes sous les armes. Une partie de ces hommes ne s'est point présenté, une autre a déserté ; mais cependant il en reste sous les drapeaux : et dans les provinces exaltées la presque totalité marche et forme de très beaux bataillons.

On a retrouvé dans les campagnes beaucoup de fusils étrangers, que la terreur ou l'exaltation a fait livrer, quoiqu'ils ne soient pas de calibre. On les répare, et on en arme des bataillons de Gardes Nationales.

La Garde se recrute avec une activité étonnante, non seulement des hommes pris dans chaque régiment, mais même de beaucoup de soldats qui avaient obtenu leur congé, et viennent y reprendre du service.

Le manque de chevaux ne permet pas d'augmenter la cavalerie avec la même rapidité. Les 6000 chevaux que l'on a pris à la gendarmerie ne fourniront pas une ressource bien étendue.

La garnison de Paris était, le 10, formée de quelques régimens d'infanterie et de la Garde.

Le 10e régiment d'infanterie, celui qui s'est si bien montré dans le Midi sous les ordres de Monseigneur le Duc d'Angoulême, y arrivait le 9 Mai. Les deux bataillons de ce régiment ne formaient que 480 hommes sous les armes. Les soldats étaient mornes, et portaient attaché à leur aigle une espèce de fanon bleu et blanc, avec la devise " Valeur et fidélité."

On retranchait avec activité les hauteurs de Montmartre et de Menilmontant, mais on n'y avait point encore amené du canon.

On élève des retranchemens dans toutes les parties de la France, et même sur les bords de la Loire. On retranche le château d'Amboise, et on ajoute des ouvrages à celui de Saumur.

L'officier rédacteur de cette note a trouvé sur la route de Metz à Paris près de 300 pièces de canon, conduites par des chevaux de paysans, et sans escorte. Elles lui ont paru presque toutes des pièces de bataille.

On rétablit les fortifications de la ville de Verdun. On relève la demi-lune qui couvre la porte sur le chemin de Metz. Cette ville, dans une assez mauvaise position comme place, mais importante par son pont sur la Meuse, avait gêné, en 1814, les corps qui bloquaient Metz et Luxembourg, et avait servi de point d'appui à la sortie assez inquiétante qui avait eu lieu peu de jours avant la prise de Paris.

La ville de Verdun sert de dépôt à quelques régimens, notamment à un premier régiment d'étrangers qu'on forme de déserteurs, qui est bien vêtu et bien armé, et fournit déjà la garde des portes.

Armée de la Moselle.

Cette armée, qu'on ne devrait appeler qu'un corps, s'étend depuis les environs de Bitch jusqu'au de là de Longwy. Elle est commandée par le Lieut.-Général Gérard, officier estimé et de talens, qui a pour chef d'état-major M. Clouet, et qui a sous lui quatre Lieutenans-Généraux, dont MM. de Bourmont et de Vichery (on ignore les noms des deux autres). Mais on connait leurs opinions, et on peut assurer que tous les chefs de cette armée, parfaitement unis, gémissent de la servitude où ils sont, et regrettent sincèrement le Roi; mais on ne croit point que cela puisse les porter à passer sous les drapeaux ennemis. Le Lieutenant-Général Marescot est Inspecteur du Génie attaché à l'armée de la Moselle.

Cette armée était, au 17 Mai, postée ainsi qu'il suit:—La division des Dragons formait la droite, et était auprès de Sarguemines; une division d'infanterie etait disséminée aux environs de Sarre-Louis, et en se rapprochant de Thionville. En avant de Thionville un régiment d'infanterie est cantonné dans les villages sur la rive droite de la Moselle jusqu'à Sirk. Le 8e régiment de Chasseurs à Cheval couvre la plaine de Cattenom, sur la rive gauche de la Moselle. Un régiment d'infanterie est cantonné dans les villages entre la chaussée de Luxembourg et de Longwy; enfin le reste de l'infanterie est aux environs de Longwy.

La place de Metz était en bon état à la fin du blocus en 1814. On en a encore complété les réparations, et la place paraît bien armée. Néanmoins, malgré quelques ouvrages, et notamment une redoute placée dans l'île du Sauleis, et une coupure faite pour couvrir une brèche existante à l'endroit où la citadelle détruite se liait aux ouvrages de la place, malgré ces ouvrages le front entre la Seille et la Moselle, qui n'est plus couvert par la citadelle, restera toujours faible. La garnison de cette place est composée de quelques dépôts de régimens de ligne, d'un ou deux bataillons d'artillerie, et de 9 bataillons de Gardes Nationales, qui à cette époque n'étaient point habillés, point exercés, et dont fort peu étaient armés. Une partie de ces bataillons désertent, hors les bataillons de la Meurthe et des Vosges, qui sont beaux, et zélés pour Napoléon. La place a été approvisionnée pour 9 mois, le tout sans argent, par réquisitions, et avec une sévérité sans exemple.

M. de Curel, fils de l'ancien commandant de l'artillerie à Metz, et qui vient d'émigrer, pourra donner sur cette place des renseignemens plus précis.

Le Lieutenant-Général Lanusse, commandant la 3e division, est à Metz. Il ne paraît pas très dévoué à Buonaparte. Le Maréchal de Camp Richter, commandant le département, paraît, au contraire, très zélé pour sa cause. Le Préfet La Dometto employe tous les moyens de terreur pour tâcher de soulever son département contre les étrangers. Cinq corps de partisans s'organisent à Metz.

Thionville est en bon état de défense, approvisionné pour 9 mois, et au delà de toute mesure, et toujours par réquisitions. Le Général Hugo, qui y commande, est tout dévoué aux Jacobins, et en emploie toutes les mesures. Il a la prétention d'avoir une garnison de 9000 hommes, mais jusqu'à présent elle n'est fixée qu'à 3500. Elle était toute de Gardes Nationales, dont 2 bataillons du pays, qui, quoique consignés, désertent dès le moment où ils le peuvent. Ils ne s'élèvent guères qu'à la moitié de la force qu'ils devraient avoir; une très faible partie était armée. Un bataillon de la Meurthe se trouvoit à Thionville, était nombreux et zélé. Sarre-Louis est, dit-on, dans le même état, et gardé de même. Longwy a été retranché le mieux possible, mais cependant pourrait être facilement enlevé de l'aveu même des officiers qui y sont employés; et ce point est de la plus haute importance si on veut percer sur Châlons. Les commandans de Sarre-Louis et de Longwy sont très affligés du retour de Napoléon, et le servent à regret.

On a retranché plusieurs vieux châteaux sur toute la ligne, notamment en avant de Thionville, du côté de Sarre-Louis, un village appelé le Hakenberg, le vieux château de Sirk, et sur la rive gauche de la Moselle entre cette rivière et la chaussée de Luxembourg celui de Rodemak. Ces différens postes sont environnés d'ouvrages en terre fraisés et palissadés; on les a armés d'artillerie, on les a approvisionnés avec une abondance effrayante, puisqu'elle a dépouillé toutes les campagnes environnantes. Ces postes ne seront défendus que par des Gardes Nationales. Avec de l'artillerie de position on les aura promptement soumis. S'ils n'étaient réduits, ce seraient des asiles très dangereux pour des corps de partisans.

On doit prévenir que depuis la frontière de la Lorraine jusqu'à Paris la récolte en tout genre s'annonce mal; les fourrages seront très rares, et les grains peu abondans. L'approvisionnement des places ayant épuisé les campagnes de la frontière, on ne peut trop engager à mettre de la célérité dans les opérations. Sans cela les armées alliées éprouveraient beaucoup de difficulté à se procurer des subsistances.

Extract from the 'Journal de Francfort' of the 17th May, 1815.

TABLEAU des Forces Auxiliaires que doivent fournir, partie en Landwehr, partie en Troupes de Ligne, les Princes et les Etats, en vertu de la Convention ci-dessus.

(A.) Armée du Haut Rhin.—Hohenzollern-Hechingen, 194 hommes; Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, 386; Lichtenstein, 100; la ville de Francfort, 750.

(B.) Armée du Bas Rhin.—Electorat de Hesse: Mecklenbourg-Schwerin, 3800; Mecklenbourg-Strelitz, 800 (le tiers en cavalerie); Duché de Saxe-Weimar, 1600 (la Cour de Weimar se réserve de déclarer l'augmentation qu'elle fera à ce nombre aussitôt qu'elle sera mise en possession des nouveaux pays qu'elle doit acquérir); Gotha, 2200; Meinungen, 2600; Hildbourghausen, 400; Cobourg, 600 (la Cour Ducale de Cobourg a déclaré qu'elle porteroit ce nombre à 800); la Maison d'Anhalt, 1600; celle de Schwartzbourg, 1200; de Reuss, 900; de la Lippe, 1300; de Waldeck, 800.

(C.) Armée des Pays-Bas.—Brunswick, 3000; Oldenbourg, 1600; Nassau, 6080. Outre ce dernier nombre, qui doit se joindre à l'armée des Pays-Bas, il y aura dans le pays de Nassau 2000 à 3000 hommes de réserves prêts à entrer à Mayence sur la première demande qui en sera faite. Les Villes Anséatiques, 3000.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Downing Street, 18th May, 1815.

As many soldiers now serving in His Majesty's forces under your Grace's command are, or will at an early period be, entitled to immediate discharge under the provisions of 46 Geo. III., cap. 66, unless measures be taken to retain them for the further period authorised by law; and as it is desirable, under the present circumstances of the country, to prevent such a reduction of His Majesty's forces, I am to signify to you the commands of the Prince Regent that your Grace should take the steps prescribed by the Act (a copy of which is enclosed) for retaining for six months from the date at which they would otherwise be entitled to their discharge all soldiers who, having originally enlisted for limited service, may have completed the period specified at the time of their enlistment.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

[There is something in the General Regulations on this subject.

WELLINGTON.]

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 18th May, 1815.

I have received your letter of the 8th instant,* and my colleagues and myself have read with the deepest interest your military opinions. They are so clearly expressed and so admirably conceived that I have no doubt of their becoming the base of all our transactions. I thought, in the absence of Prince Schwarzenberg, and not knowing whether you had written in the same detail to him, that it would not be foreign to your wishes that Prince Metternich should see this letter. I accordingly gave him the perusal; and, as you will see by the note he returned, he enters entirely into your conceptions, but adds, your ideas are entirely his own.

I shall urge him to impress on Prince Schwarzenberg the principles laid down:—

First. To finish completely the affairs in Italy with Murat.

Secondly. To keep the Piedmont operations quite separate from those of the army of the Upper Rhine, which must be wholly dependent on the movements of the army of the right and centre, on the principle you have laid down, approaching as much as the facilities of subsistence will allow.

Thirdly. To press forward with the utmost celerity all the troops to form the 150,000 men on the left and in the centre, while you will take your own measures.

These appear to me to be the leading points of your wishes.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 359.

Lord Cathcart has sent you the Russian bill of fare; but as to their arrival, I have very much my doubts, and when their columns will be closed up. The influence the Emperor of Russia has on Prince Schwarzenberg's mind, and the fear Prince Metternich entertains of him, even under their hostility, make the question whether the operations on the left will take any shape before the greater part of Barclay de Tolly's force pass the Rhine, pretty much in the Emperor's hands. My own opinion is that my friends the Austrians will like to wait for the Northern phalanxes: first, because they have undoubted reliance on their firmness and immobility under fire; second, because they dread suffering more than or before their great and formidable rival, lest in their weakness he should dictate his mandates, and take his own decisions. I shall be enabled to give you more intelligence on all this and other interesting military subjects when I get to Heilbronn. The Emperors leave this on the 27th; and I shall go a day or two after, when the road is clear. General Knesebeck is not returned yet from Berlin; but he is expected, and on his arrival I will communicate your letter, and you shall know results: I am sure they will be satisfactory. I wish that Lord Cathcart should also show it to the Emperor of Russia, as confidentially written to me. I think it may tend to keep his ideas right, and, as addressed to me privately, cannot bear in his mind the idea of the initiative. I shall inform you of the result.

I enclose you copies of the instructions I have received relative to Colonels Upton and Jenkinson; and you will much oblige me by sending me your opinion on the subject, inasmuch as the Prussian army may be divided. It will be necessary to arrange that Colonel Upton should only repair to the head-quarters of that part which is not immediately acting with you; for as you have kindly appointed Colonel Hardinge, and as I conceive no better choice could have been made, to a part of the Prussian army, and as he communicates direct with you, to supersede his reports in any shape would be unsatisfactory; and I own I think if Colonel Hardinge remains as a reporter, he should be put on the same footing in respect to rank and allowances as the others. If you thought the same, I am sure it would be done; and I am very much of opinion that some arrangement should take place between these two officers, to direct their attention to different head-quarters, so as not to interfere.

Marshal Wrede's corps, on our right, would be a very proper place for an officer, as well as the Prince of Wurtemberg's. I think we could establish such an English communication along the line as would be of great use; but I shall be glad to know your ideas and wishes on the subject. I certainly am interested about Hardinge; for I am sure he will be efficient wherever he is. I feel very much gratified by your consent to accept my best services in the quarter where I shall be; and though you may be better, you shall not be more zealously served.

Ever believe me, my dear Lord, yours most affectionately,

STEWART.

Since writing the above I have received a note from Prince Metternich, a copy of which I enclose, but have not been able to see him.

S.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Viscount Castlereagh to Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 29th April, 1815.

His Royal Highness the Prince Regent having deemed it expedient that officers of rank and experience should proceed to the Continent to be employed under the orders of your Excellency, whom the Prince Regent has been pleased to designate as the channel of communication respecting the operations of the Austrian and Prussian armies, in the event of war with France, I have the honour to acquaint your Excellency that His Royal Highness has selected Brigadier-General the Honourable Arthur Upton and Colonel Jenkinson to be employed on this service.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

CASTLEREAGH.

II.

Prince Metternich to Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart.

Vienne, 17 Mai, 1815.

Je vous remercie, mon cher Lord, de l'intéressante communication de Lord Wellington. Il y a un mot sur la 5me. page que je ne puis lire : si vous êtes plus heureux que moi, veuillez m'écrire ce que c'est que l'endroit illégible.

Les idées de My Lord Wellington sont entièrement les miennes, et je crois pouvoir répondre que le Prince de Schwarzenberg les partagera également. Il propose un grand mouvement concentrique; et il veut que pour que ce mouvement ne soit pas risqueant, on attend que l'ensemble des forces soit à la disposition des généraux. Voilà également ce que nous voulons. Il veut que les armées se placent à la hauteur de laquelle elles puissent se prêter la main en cas de revers. Il ne propose en un mot rien d'eccentrique, et je l'aime aussi peu en fait de questions militaires qu'en toutes autres.

METTERNICH.

J'ai reçu ce matin les premières nouvelles de Schwarzenberg de Heilbronn. Il s'est mis en rapport direct avec Wellington.

III.

Prince Metternich to Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart.

Vienne, ce 18 Mai, 1815.

Je vous prie de me permettre, mon cher Lord, de convenir avec vous demain d'une heure de conversation avant que vous n'écriviez à My Lord Wellington. Je vous mettrai avec grand plaisir au fait de ma manière de juger les opérations; et je vois par une lettre que j'ai reçu aujourd hui du Prince de Schwarzenberg que je ne me suis pas trompé sur notre conformité de juger la position des choses. Le Prince de Schwarzenberg me mande qu'il a reçu des lettres fort intéressantes du Duc, et qu'il lui a répondu fort en détail. Il ajoute que leur manière de voir est la même ; ainsi donc ce qui doit se faire a lieu, et on peut attendre à des succès véritables. J'ai reçu un rapport du Général Steigentest de Moral, en date du 11 Mai, infiniment curieux pour les nouvelles de l'intérieur de la France. Comme il est le duplicata d'un rapport adressé par lui au Prince de Schwarzenberg, il est hors de doute que le Duc de Wellington est informé de son contenu. Je viens de le faire passer à l'Empereur Alexandre, et demain je vous le communiquerai.

METTERNICH.

Lieut.-Col. Marston to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Bordeaux, 18th May, 1815.

The inhabitants of Bordeaux are, with few exceptions, for Louis XVIII. They say the feeling is equally favourable towards him in all the vicinity. In Médoc I believe it to be so, but on the opposite bank of the Garonne the Buonapartists declare the opinions to be as decidedly in favour of the Emperor.

Each party is quite confident that the result of the struggle will terminate in its favour. The Royalists assert that all the young men and discharged military who have been called to Bordeaux, and have received routes for the armies, have, with little exception, returned to their homes. On the other hand, the Buonapartists maintain that the men this department has furnished since the decrees for augmenting the army have been beyond all expectation, upwards of 5000 in a few days.

I was at General Darmanac's, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Bordeaux, yesterday, when two officers who had just arrived from Paris called to report: they represented the enthusiasm in the north without example; that the people from some districts were flocking for routes unsolicited. All admit that the nation in general feel averse to the ancient nobles. The inhabitants of Bordeaux are prepared to assist any force that may be sent there, and long for the appearance of foreign troops.

The national guards can be depended upon, and all persons of property and influence in the neighbourhood: they would require arms and military equipment. The regular force in Bordeaux and the immediate neighbourhood does not, I believe, exceed 2500 infantry and some cavalry; but it was difficult to ascertain the force, as they were quite apart from the inhabitants, and the marching for the north had been frequent.

At the last review prior to my leaving the place, on the 7th May, there were a battalion of the 8th and 62nd regiments, not amounting to 1500 men, and a troop of chasseurs à cheval, formerly the Duke d'Angoulême's. As well as I could learn, there were not above 8000 in this part of France, including the garrison of Bayonne. In Pouillac and some other towns in Médoc there are detachments of 100, 50, and fewer, to protect the national flag. Upon a force arriving off the coast, should a proportion of the garrison of Bordeaux be kept in the town to prevent the collecting of the national guards and inhabitants, there could be no opposition to the landing of the troops and their marching upon the town: should the garrison leave Bordeaux to combine with the detachments in the neighbourhood, the national guards and people would rise in their rear. Bordeaux would in all probability be evacuated upon the arrival of a force. Fort Trompetta has undergone some repairs: it was more as a retreat for the garrison from the people than to attempt to render it capable of defence against a regular force that induced them to repair it.

At the Patté of Blaye there are ten 18-pounders and two mortars, French 70-pounders, and close under it a battery of four 36-pounders. Opposite is Fort Médoc, with eighteen 36-pounders. The passage of the river is completely commanded here. At Blaye the works have been put into a state of defence, and the garrison increased: there are about 100 guns mounted.

The 4th May they were constructing a work of twelve 24-pounders at Royen, at the mouth of the river, on the right bank. This is the only obstruction to entering the river as far as Pouillac, where troops can land upon a wharf, or upon a sandy beach near Verden, at the mouth of the river on the Bordeaux side. There are no other landing-places below Blaye and Fort Médoc: the banks are 2 feet in mud at low water.

Troops could disembark on the beach outside the mouth of the river at (a), except with blowing weather from north-west to south-west: from thence there is no road for artillery except over sand-hills. At La Teste there is a harbour with 5 and 6 fathoms at high water: this is about 28 miles from Bordeaux. I believe there is no impediment (from batteries) to vessels entering; but I don't know that there is not.

The Royalists in Bordeaux are unanimous in the opinion that a force arriving there at this moment would be the means of freeing that part of the country south of the Garonne from the sway of the present government; and the rising would be general so soon as the people had a force which they could depend upon to support them.

The national guards were not so culpable as may be supposed in permitting the town to be delivered up without resistance to General Clausel. They were completely deceived and betrayed by General Dinan, the governor. Whether it was an arranged plan, or that he was ultimately compelled to enter into the views of the garrison of regular troops that were in Bordeaux, the national guards found themselves without leaders or orders, ammunition or guns, at the moment they were necessary. The latter were refused by the officer commanding in Fort Trompetta. The regiments of the line then in Bordeaux were sufficient to disperse the national guards.

1. Officers are not to be permitted to quit their regiments, for the purpose of appearing before a Medical Board, without a previous application being made to the Adjutant-General, and the Commander of the Forces' leave obtained. A certificate of the officer's case, signed by the surgeon of the regiment to which he belongs, must accompany the application, and directions will be given to the Inspector-General of Hospitals to assemble a Medical Board accordingly. Without such directions, no officer is to be examined by a Medical Board.

WELLINGTON.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 19th May, 1815.

I request to call your Grace's attention to the wording of the Treaties of Subsidy which you have signed at Bruxelles with the Plenipotentiaries of His Sardinian Majesty and the King of Wurtemberg, as it does not exactly accord with the terms of the Treaties of Concert and Alliance, and the Additional Convention of Subsidy, with the Three Great Powers of the Continent, which have been concluded at Vienna.

I enclose to your Grace a copy of the Additional Convention as signed with Russia, from which you will perceive that it is stipulated that the Subsidy is to be paid for the service of the year ending on the 1st of April, 1816, and we are consequently enabled thereby to regulate our monthly instalments so as to defer the last payments to the month subsequent to that period, and at the same time the exertions of the contracting parties are not to cease before the 1st of April, 1816.

By the omission of an explanation to that effect, and by the stipulation that the Treaties shall last till the end of the year 1815 (although there is no positive claim to that effect on the part of the Courts, and although it is understood between the parties that the subsidies are payable in twelve equal monthly instalments), yet it is possible that a construction of the Treaties may lead to a misapprehension elsewhere that we are to pay the whole within the year 1815, and that the services of the other parties are also determined at the same period.

As the Wurtemberg Plenipotentiary is, I believe, still in the Low Countries, I beg to suggest to your Grace that you arrange with him the preparation of another instrument according to the tenor of those concluded at Vienna, and on the receipt of such instrument with your signature another in the same terms will be drawn up here, and receive the signature of Count d'Aglié, the Sardinian Minister at this Court, which will be forwarded to your Grace to receive your signature at your head quarters, and it can thence be despatched to Turin to receive His Sardinian Majesty's Act of Ratification, accompanied by an explanatory despatch from me to His Majesty's Minister at that Court, accounting for the non-acceptance of the ratification of the first instrument.

It is useless for me to solicit the attention of your Grace to the subject of this despatch, in drawing up the other subsidiary engagements which you may conclude on the part of His Majesty with the other Powers of the Continent.

The dates of the two new instruments may be the same as those of the two which I propose to cancel.

I have the honour to be with the highest respect, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

ADDITIONAL CONVENTION.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, having agreed by common consent to regulate, by means of a particular Convention, which shall be added in the form of an Additional Article to the Treaty concluded at Vienna the 25th March, the arrangements which have been judged necessary to give to the stipulations of the said Treaty all the effect requisite for the attainment of the great and noble end which their said Majesties have proposed to pursue, have named in order to discuss, settle, and sign the Conditions of the present Convention, His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Honourable Richard le Poer Trench, Earl of Clancarty, Viscount Dunlo, Baron Kilconnel, one of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council in Great Britain and also in Ireland, President of the Committee of Privy Council for the Affairs of Trade and Plantations, Joint Postmaster-General in Great Britain, Colonel of the Galway Regiment of Militia, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, and one of His Majesty's Plenipotentiaries at the Congress: and His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, Andrew Count Razoumoffsky, His Privy Councillor, Knight of the Orders of St. Andrew and of St. Alexander Newsky, Grand Cross of that of St. Wolodomir of the First Class, and His Plenipotentiary at the Congress; and Charles Robert Count of Nesselrode, His Privy Councillor, Chamberlain, Secretary of State, Knight of the Order of St. Alexander Newsky, Grand Cross of that of St. Wolodomir of the Second Class, Knight of the Supreme Order de l'Annonciade, Grand Cross of the Order of Leopold of Austria, of the Red Eagle of Prussia, the Polar Star of Sweden, and of the Golden Eagle of Wurtemberg, and His Plenipotentiary at the Congress; who, after having exchanged their Full Powers found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following Article:

ARTICLE.

His Britannic Majesty engages to furnish a subsidy of Five Millions Sterling, for the service of the year ending on the first of April, 1816, to be divided in equal proportions amongst the three Powers, namely, between His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and of Bohemia, and His Majesty the King of Prussia. The subsidy above stipulated of Five Millions Sterling shall be paid in London, by monthly instalments and in equal proportions, to the Ministers of the respective Powers, duly authorised to receive the same. The first payment thereof to become due on the first day of May next, and to be made immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this present Additional Convention. In case peace should take place, or be signed between the Allied Powers and France, before the expiration of the said year, the subsidy calculated upon the scale of Five Millions Sterling shall be paid up to the end of the month in which the Definitive Treaty shall have been signed: and His Britannic Majesty promises in addition to pay to Russia four months, and to Austria and to Prussia two months, over and above the stipulated subsidy, to cover the expenses of the return of their troops within their own frontiers.

The present Additional Convention shall have the same force and effect as if it were inserted word for word in the Treaty of the 25th of March.

It shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged, as soon as possible.

In faith of which the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed it, and have affixed thereunto the seals of their arms.

Done at Vienna this thirtieth day of April, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

(L. S.) CLANCARTY.

(L. S.) LE COMTE DE RAZOUMOFFSKY.

(L. S.) LE COMTE DE NESSELRODE

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 19th May, 1815.

Although I have reason to know that neither the Minister of Sardinia nor Wurtemberg entertain any practical doubts upon the subsidy to their respective Courts being payable in twelve successive monthly instalments, yet I am anxious that there should be no question of construction in the House of Commons on their respective engagements being consonant to the main Treaty, which I shall represent to Parliament as furnishing the means of war till the 1st of April in the ensuing year.

I have not yet had a moment since my return to confer with Lord Liverpool and Mr. Vansittart on further pecuniary aid to Russia. As far as I have weighed your suggestion as a mode, although it would have some advantages, yet as the money must be raised for the King of France by us, it would be considered as a British charge, whilst His Majesty, being made the organ of this exclusive favour to Russia, might be complained of by Austria and Prussia, and indispose them to Louis XVIII. more than if we upon some special grounds gave it ourselves to the Emperor of Russia, such as for an army of reserve, an extra allowance, as we have done by the Austrians for the Italian campaign.

My notion at present is (if the Treasury will hear of any additional grant, of which I am yet doubtful) to consider Barclay de Tolly's army, said to be 200,000 men, as already provided for; and to connect any further aid to be granted to the actual advance of the second army, said to be commanded by Wittgenstein, and to be of equal amount. There is no doubt considerable exaggeration in the estimated numbers of both these corps, of the strength of which I beg you will send me the best information you can procure; but if the British government gave a million to bring forward the second army as far as its services might be required, either for active service in France or as a reserve advanced in Germany, I think His Imperial Majesty ought to be satisfied, and of this, under all the circumstances appertaining to so distant a Power as Russia, I do not think any of the Allies could reasonably complain: but in this case we might justly annex as a condition, if you wished it, that in the event of our giving an additional million, which is nearly equivalent to subsidizing 100,000 men more, a proportion of these troops, say a corps of 50,000 men, should be ordered to join your army. Send me by return of the messenger your opinion and wishes upon this proposal. It will also be reasonable that this additional subsidy should only take its commencement from the period when this second army shall actually pass the Russian frontier, with some regulation also as to its return, less onerous than four months after a Definitive Treaty.

You will receive by the present messenger an official request that you would transmit to me a copy of your letter to Monsieur de Blacas, of the 4th January last, as referred to in the 'Moniteur,' with its enclosures, this document being called for in the House of Commons.

You will see the object is to ascertain what the particular papers were upon which you pronounced in that letter as not in your judgment inculpating Murat. Those I produced to Parliament (copies of which I send) were, as I apprehend, with perhaps one or two exceptions, never seen by you till I sent them officially to you after my return to England. Upon these documents, considering them as proofs of Murat's treachery, you state in your letter of * that the Allied Sovereigns were of opinion that Murat should be immediately attacked.

After inspecting these documents, I must beg you to specify whether any of them and which were seen by you previous to your letter of the 4th January. My conception is that the principal documents, if not all, were found after you left Paris, and previous to my arrival. The six letters to which signatures are affixed, viz., two letters from Fouché, one from the Princess Borghese, one from the Viceroy, one from the Consul at Ancona, and another from the Consular Department, were all shown to me in original at Paris; the three from Buonaparte to Murat and his Queen were found after I left Paris, and transmitted to me here by Monsieur de Blacas. I am confident you never could have seen either the Viceroy's or the Princess of Borghese's letters, or (I think) Fouché's, when you wrote your letter of January.

I have requested the Prince Castelcicala, in whose hands the original documents were placed by Monsieur de Blacas for safe custody, to call upon him for such a report as may clear up this impudent attempt to impose upon the world, which report being transmitted by him with a statement that the original documents are now in his possession, may be laid by me officially before the House. Perhaps in your answer to me, if, as we feel assured, the Proclamation attributed to you and commented upon in the French papers be a fabrication, you may advert to it sufficiently to bring the whole into view as a deliberate system of deception.

Believe me, my dear Lord, ever faithfully yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

Lieutenant-Colonel Chapman to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY DEAR LORD, Office of Ordnance, 19th May, 1815.

I have not seen Lord Mulgrave this day, so that I am not aware whether he has written to the Duke of Wellington by this day's mail. At any rate, as this information will be satisfactory to his Grace, I write a line to say that we are making still greater exertions to provide him with artillery. We are withdrawing from Ireland and this country so as to be enabled to send out five companies of Artillery, and for which I forwarded yesterday the necessary orders for the immediate embarkation of six brigades of 9-pounders, with 1000 rounds of ammunition. They are ordered for Ostend. You will also soon receive an addition of about 60 sappers and miners to the last two companies.

I remain, my dear Lord, very sincerely yours,

S. R. CHAPMAN.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 19th May, 1815.

No particular news from the frontier, but it is reported that the troops that were assembled about Avesnes have moved towards Valenciennes. At Mons, where I was yesterday, General Behr wishes much to have six howitzers and two or three field-pieces, if possible: the howitzers he is particularly anxious for, not having any in the place as yet. The inundation is formed, but not quite so extensive as was expected. I hope to see your Grace at Bruxelles on Sunday, intending to pay my respects on that day to the two Princesses just arrived from the Hague.

Ever, my dear Duke, most faithfully yours,

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

Sir C. W. Flint to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Irish Office, 20th May, 1815.

The enclosed was communicated to me to-day; and as it contains some particulars which I think ought to be known to your Grace, I take the liberty of sending it to you.

I am assured that what relates to the army, national guard, and the preparations at Montmartre, comes from an individual (a relation of the person who gave it to me) in the War Office at Paris.

I remain, with high and sincere respect, my dear Lord,

Your Grace's most obliged and faithful

C. W. FLINT.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Situation de Paris et de quelques Provinces de la France au 13 Mai, 1815.

1°. Paris est toujours dans une grande consternation; cependant sa stupeur est moins grande qu'il y a un mois.

2°. Il y a une très grande émigration, et cela inquiète le gouvernement; aussi il vient de prendre des mesures secrètes très fortes pour l'empêcher.

3°. On n'ose faire aucune arrestation dans Paris; mais il y en a beaucoup en province.

4°. Depuis huit jours Buonaparte ose sortir à cheval dans Paris. Le 11 du présent il s'est promené à cheval dans Paris, accompagné seulement des Généraux Drouot et Samelègue; mais il ne veut point aller dans le faubourg St. Germain, qu'il appelle le Quartier Royal.

5°. Une grande partie de l'armée est revenue de ses craintes, parceque les soldats disent que puisque les Alliés ne les ont point attaqués dans leur plus grande faiblesse, c'est qu'ils les redoutent. Cette idée les a beaucoup ranimés. Aussi la désertion est bien moins grande, surtout depuis quinze jours que la solde se fait exactement. Buonaparte a trouvé les moyens de faire des emprunts secrets et très considérables.

6°. Il ne reste point de troupes de ligne dans aucunes places fortes. La garde en est confiée à des gardes nationales; mais voulant rendre militaires et disponibles ces mêmes gardes nationales, la garde nationale de chaque ville est obligée de quitter la sienne pour aller garder une autre ville à 40, 50 lieues de chez elle, et cela dans le but de les dépayser et déshumaniser.

7°. On estime la ligne depuis Thionville jusqu'à Dunkerque à environ 130,000 hommes; mais elle doit être renforcé sous quinze jours de plus de 50,000 hommes.

8°. Il se fait beaucoup d'enrôlements dans les départements de l'Est. Il se fabrique seulement à Paris 500 fusils par jour. (C'est exagéré.)

9°. On fortifie pour certain la butte Montmartre. Il doit y avoir en batterie 300 pièces de canon ; déjà 150 étaient placés le 12 de ce mois.

10°. Toute la Picardie, le Hainault Français, le Boulonnais, la Flandre Française, et l'Artois, sont très prononcés pour le Roi. Amiens surtout se fait remarquer, et autres villes environnantes.

11°. Il y a en Bretagne et Saintonge une fédération Jacobine qui est terrible. Elle est organisée de même dans le Dauphiné, le Foretz, et une partie de l'Auvergne. Ils ne veulent ni des Bourbons ni de Buonaparte.

12°. Les Royalistes prononcés soupirent après les Alliés. Les mixtes attendent tout du temps. Mais les enragés sont persuadés que cette dernière coalition aura l'effet de celle de 1792. Surtout que la Russie s'en détachera si on parvient à balancer les succès et ainsi de suite. Aussi on prétend que d'après cet espoir Buonaparte n'attaquera pas.

13°. Buonaparte a fait et fait faire des sacrifices immenses en argent pour neutraliser les cabinets de Vienne et de St. Pétersbourg.

14°. Une grande partie des officiers Belges sont gagnés.

15°. On redoute beaucoup les troupes Anglaises et Prussiennes.

E. Cooke, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Rome, 20th May, 1815.

You may consider the Neapolitan war as most successfully terminated. After the victory gained on the 3rd and 4th at Foligno and Macerata, Murat endeavoured to effect his retreat, and by forced marches through Pescara and Popoli with about 6000 men reached Venafro, to join about 6000 more which had been left under Generals Mannes and Pignatelli to watch General Nugent and garrison the capital, Capua, and Gaeta.

The Austrians were forced to march by Terni on Aquila and Popoli ; a longer route.

General Nugent had been in the mean time active : he advanced with 700 men on Terracina, and forced the positions of Fondi and Itri in front of Gaeta. With his main body, about 2500 men, he passed the Garigliano, driving and dispersing the enemy's detachments ; and on the 15th, being reinforced, attacked Mannes and Pignatelli, who had 6000, forced their position, and then attacked the camp at night, made above 1000 prisoners, and the rest of the corps dispersed.

He by this means completed his junctions with all the Austrian columns which were on the high roads from Aquila and Popoli. The advance yesterday was at Calvi.

Murat was himself present in the battle against Nugent on the 16th. He has not above 8000 troops left.

A few days ago Captain Campbell, in the Tremendous, threatened to bombard Naples unless they surrendered the fleet. The Duke di Gallo gave him up, by capitulation, two sail of the line and the whole arsenal.

The King of the Two Sicilies was, by the last accounts, embarking with the British and Sicilian troops.

Captain Brace, of the Berwick, blockades Gaeta.

The night before last, having gone to Civita Vecchia to wait for the Admiral, I went on board in the evening and put Lord Exmouth in possession of all details, who, with four sail of the line, proceeded forthwith for Naples.

The Neapolitans have hardly fought at all. Officers and men desert almost by regiments. The whole country has risen against Murat, who deserves his fate by his perfidy, his folly, his gasconades, and his lies.

Your Grace knows that a treaty is signed between Austria and Ferdinand IV. The most liberal terms are offered both in Austrian and Sicilian proclamations to all who, deserting Murat, join the cause of their ancient legitimate Sovereign.

I sincerely congratulate your Grace upon such gratifying and important intelligence.

Believe me, my dear Lord,

Ever your Grace's most obedient and humble servant,

E. COOKE.

The Duke of Orleans to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Richmond, ce 20 Mai, 1815.

Permettez-moi de profiter de la bonne volonté que vous m'avez témoignée pendant votre séjour à Paris pour vous communiquer confidentiellement les lettres que le Roi de France m'a écrites, ainsi que celles que j'ai eu l'honneur d'adresser à S.M. J'attache trop de prix, my Lord, à mériter et à obtenir le suffrage d'un homme tel que vous, pour ne pas veiller soigneusement à ce que ma conduite ne soit pas dénaturée à vos yeux par de fausses représentations que j'ai plus d'une raison de craindre dans le moment actuel, et dont une longue et triste expérience m'a appris à me défier toujours de la part de ceux avec lesquels j'ai souvent différé d'opinion. Ce n'est pas, my Lord, que mon objet soit de pénétrer les vôtres, je vous demande seulement de lire, mais nullement de me dire ce que vous penserez de ce que vous lirez, quoique j'en fusse très flatté, si vous le jugiez à propos, et que je sois très disposé à entrer dans tous les développemens que vous pourriez désirer. J'ai communiqué toutes ces lettres confidentiellement au Prince Régent, qui m'a encouragé à vous les envoyer.

Je regrette vivement, my Lord, de n'avoir pas eu la satisfaction qui eut été bien grande pour moi de vous voir, et de causer avec vous, lorsque j'ai traversé la Belgique pour venir en Angleterre, mais vous n'étiez pas encore arrivé. Il s'est passé tant de choses dans le peu de tems qui s'est écoulé entre votre départ de Paris et notre malheureuse débâcle, que j'aurais bien désiré pouvoir vous en entretenir, et vous faire part de mes observations sur ce que j'ai vu et entendu.

Ma femme et ma sœur, qui savent que je vous écris, me demandent de vous faire tous leurs complimens; et moi, my Lord, je saisis avec grand plaisir cette occasion de vous entretenir de tous les sentimens que vous m'inspirez, et de vous assurer de ma très haute considération.

My Lord, votre très affectionné,

LOUIS PHILIPPE D'ORLÉANS.

Je ne vous envoye pas de copies des lettres que j'ai écrites au Roi les 3 et 11 Avril, dont S.M. parle dans sa première lettre, parceque ce n'était que des lettres de complimens de ma part.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

The King of France to the Duke of Orleans.

Gand, le 17 Avril, 1815.

J'ai reçu, mon cher Neveu, vos lettres du 4 et du 11. Elles m'ont fait un grand plaisir en me donnant de vos nouvelles, et de celles de ma nièce, qui j'espère est tout-à-fait établie. J'ai aussi été un peu indisposé depuis mon arrivée à Gand, mais je me trouve maintenant beaucoup mieux.

Dans l'attente où je suis des grands événemens qui se préparent, et qui doivent nous offrir avant peu des chances favorables, je n'ai rien de nouveau à vous mander pour le moment; mais dès qu'il se présentera une occasion d'agir, je ne tarderai point à vous appeler auprès de moi, où je vous verrai toujours avec autant de plaisir que de confiance. C'est avec les mêmes sentimens que je m'en remets à votre zèle et à vos lumières pour éclairer M. le Prince Régent et la nation Anglaise sur tous les faits dont vous avez été témoin. En leur montrant l'irrésistible et funeste effet d'une défection qui m'a forcé de quitter jusqu'au dernier asile où vous étiez venu me joindre,* vous leur ferez voir à quel point la nation Française désavoue une semblable trahison. C'est un moyen d'animer, de concilier tous les sentimens généreux dont nous devons nous faire un appui, et personne n'est plus que vous, mon cher neveu, en position de remplir une pareille mission.

Adieu, mon cher neveu. Vous connoissez mon tendre attachement pour vous.

LOUIS.

II.

The Duke of Orleans to the King of France.

SIRE, Londres, ce 25 Avril, 1815.

Je reçois avec une vive reconnoissance la lettre que V.M. a eu la bonté de m'écrire de Gand le 17 Avril dernier. J'y vois avec le plus grand plaisir que l'indisposition de V.M. n'a pas eu de suites, et que sa santé est de nouveau aussi bonne que nous le désirons. Je voudrois pouvoir lui en mander autant de celle de ma femme, qui a bien souffert dans ces derniers tems, et qui a eu une toux épouvantable. Elle n'en est pas encore entièrement délivrée, quoiqu'elle soit beaucoup mieux, et j'espère que l'air de la campagne, où je compte la mener à la fin de la semaine, achévera de la rétablir. Mes quatre enfans ont la coqueluche, et la petite filleule de V.M. est celle qui en souffre le plus jusqu'à présent.

J'ai déjà anticipé en partie ce dont V.M. me charge pour le Prince Régent, et je lui ai fait un récit fidèle des tristes événemens dont j'ai été le témoin. Je crois qu'il a fait sur S.A.R. une impression profonde et bien douloureuse, mais V.M. n'ignore pas que l'amitié que lui porte le Prince Régent est trop vive et trop sincère pour que rien puisse y ajouter, et que son désir de la voir rétablie sur son trône n'est ni moins vif ni moins sincère. Je puis même dire qu'il est constamment occupé de voir quels sont les moyens les plus efficaces d'y par-

* Le Roi se trompe. Je n'ai pas été joindre S.M. à Lille; j'y étais plusieurs jours avant le Roi, et je n'en suis sorti que douze heures après. Je présume même que ma présence à Lille, et l'effet qu'on disoit que j'avois fait sur les troupes, a été une des causes qui ont déterminé S.M. à s'y rendre d'Abbeville, où il paroit qu'elle étoit encore incertaine de la route qu'elle prendroit.

venir, et j'espère n'avoir pas besoin de dire à V.M. que telle est aussi mon occupation constante.

Comme V.M., je pense que les grands événemens qui se préparent doivent nous présenter des chances favorables, mais selon moi il est de la plus grande importance que nous les attendions, et que nous ne suscitions pas de nouvelles difficultés à en profiter par de la précipitation et de fausses mesures. Je prie V.M. de me permettre d'expliquer ce que je veux dire par là.

L'objet de V.M. me paraît devoir être d'abord le renversement de Buonaparte, sans lequel votre rétablissement est impossible, et ensuite qu'aucun autre gouvernement que celui de V.M. ne remplace celui de Buonaparte. Quant au renversement de Buonaparte, il me semble incontestable que V.M. n'a plus aucuns moyens directs de l'opérer (au moins quant à présent), puisque toutes les tentatives qui ont été faites dans les différentes parties de la France ont successivement échouées. Je ne vois donc plus dans l'état actuel des choses que l'arrivée à Paris des armées étrangères, ou leur approche de cette capitale, qui puissent abattre le gouvernement de Buonaparte, et déterminer les factions qui l'entourent à l'abandonner. V.M. ne doit pas se dissimuler que ce moyen si onéreux et si pénible pour la France y excitera des sentimens dont l'application à V.M. et à ses Princes seroit très fâcheuse, et d'ailleurs, en écartant cette discussion inutile aujourd'hui, puisque ce sont les Alliés qui croyent nécessaire à leur sûreté et à leur indépendance de marcher sur Paris et de renverser Buonaparte. La seule question à examiner, selon moi, pour V.M. c'est de savoir si sa présence et celle de ses Princes dans les armées alliées ajouteront à leurs forces, ou si, comme j'avoue que je le pense, l'application au Roi et aux Princes des sentimens dont je parlois tout-à-l heure ne les diminueroit pas effectivement en rendant celles de Buonaparte plus indissolubles, et en créant de nouvelles difficultés à ce que ce soit le gouvernement de V.M. qui remplace celui de Buonaparte.

Je prie V.M. de me pardonner si cette opinion lui déplait, mais dans les circonstances où nous nous trouvons c'est le devoir de tout Français de lui dire franchement son opinion, et ce devoir est encore plus impérieux pour le premier Prince de son sang. Je pense, Sire, que la présence de vos Princes dans les armées alliées n'ajoutera point à leurs forces, parceque je suis bien convaincu qu'aucune partie de l'armée Française ne se joindra à elles.

Il ne faut pas oublier ce que l'émigration des premières années de la Révolution doit nous avoir appris, et il ne faut pas retomber en 1815 dans les mêmes illusions qui ont été si funestes en 1791 et en 1792, sans quoi les mêmes causes produiront les mêmes résultats, et l'émigration de 1815 feroit encore moins de prosélytes en France que n'en fit celle de 1791. Le séjour que nous venons de faire en France m'a mis à portée de connoître l'effet qu'y a produit la présence des Français marquans dans les armées étrangères; et je suis d'autant moins suspect sur ce point, qu'avant notre retour en France je m'en étais formé une opinion différente ; mais M. le Duc de Berri pourra certifier à V.M., car il me la dit lui-même bien des fois, qu'on n'a jamais pardonné en France au Général Moreau d'avoir servi dans les armées alliées. Or, Sire, si d'une part la présence des Princes dans les armées alliées ne produit pas une grande défection dans l'armée Française, et que de l'autre elle jette en France sur les Princes Français une défaveur très fâcheuse pour eux, et propre à créer des difficultés additionnelles au rétablissement de V.M. après le renversement de Buonaparte, il me semble qu'il faut éviter soigneusement de se placer dans cette position-là. Cela me paraît d'autant plus important, que, ne comptant plus, comme j'ai déjà avoué au Roi que je le faisais, que sur la force matérielle des Alliés pour leur arrivée à Paris, et ne voyant rien que cette cruelle extrémité qui puisse quant à présent opérer le renversement de Buonaparte, que je regarde toujours comme la conséquence nécessaire de cette arrivée, il me semble que de toutes les manières c'est pour ce moment-là, où il faut réserver tous vos moyens, afin qu'il s'élève alors, comme en Avril, 1814, un cri national, qui détermine l'armée à se soumettre au Roi, et par conséquent il me semble très essentiel d'agir avec l'armée Française de manière à diminuer autant que possible sa répugnance pour le Roi. Ce qui s'est passé alors, et dont Buonaparte vient de faire connoître les détails en publiant les Mémoires de l'Abbé de Montesquiou, trouvés chez M. de Blacas, doit faire sentir combien le Roi aura encore de difficultés à surmonter, et combien d'intérêts divers il faudra concilier et réunir. Je crains qu'il n'y en eut encore plus cette année que l'année dernière. Mais le point le plus difficile de tous sera d'organiser une force sur laquelle V.M. puisse compter pour appuyer et soutenir son gouvernement.

En pensant comme je le fais que la compression des armées alliées sur les armées Françaises soit encore aujourd'hui comme l'année dernière le seul moyen de faciliter à la nation de réclamer V.M., je ne peux pas perdre de vue que cette compression ne peut jamais être que momentanée, et que la cruelle expérience que nous venons de faire ne nous fait que trop sentir qu'il ne peut plus nous suffire simplement, ni je crois à toute la nation Française, et à toute l'Europe, que V.M. soit reconduite aux Tuileries, et que le peuple l'entoure de nouveau des cris de "Vive le Roi!" Il faut que V.M. se crée en France une force physique et morale qu'elle n'a pas eue après sa restauration, et dont l'absence a amené la catastrophe que nous avons maintenant à déplorer, et à réparer si nous pouvons.

Quelqu'intéressant que cela put me paroître à traiter, je n'importunerai pas V.M. de mon opinion sur la marche à tenir pour se procurer cette force morale parceque cette lettre n'est déjà que trop longue, et je me bornerai à ce qui regarde la force physique, d'autant plus que quelqu'essentielle que soit l'autre, je crains que ce ne soit plus par des illusions sur les moyens de se procurer la force physique que sur ceux de se procurer l'autre, qu'on se persuade de trouver le remède là, où, selon moi, on ne trouvera qu'une augmentation terrible d'obstacles au rétablissement de V.M.

Il est clair, selon moi, et V M. a prouvé en différentes occasions que c'étoit aussi son opinion, que la force destinée à soutenir le gouvernement ne peut jamais être en France une armée étrangère. Je ne m'arrêterai donc pas sur ce point, et je ne m'occuperai que des moyens d'organiser une force Française. Je suis plus que jamais persuadé que tant que V.M. cherchera cette force ailleurs que dans l'élite de l'armée, elle ne la trouvera nulle part, parcequ'il n'y a jamais eu, et qu'il n'y aura jamais en France aucune force qui puisse lutter avec l'armée que des portions de cette même armée. Toute autre espèce de force a toujours été et sera toujours inefficace. Ainsi de deux choses l'une, ou on croit pouvoir exterminer par la guerre actuelle toute l'armée Française, ce que je crois aussi impossible à opérer qu'impolitique à annoncer, et encore plus à faire, si cela étoit faisable; ou on doit se préparer à chercher dans cette armée les moyens de force nécessaires au soutien du gouvernement, lorsque nous serons assez heureux pour que V.M. ait pû rétablir le sien.

Il me semble que l'essai que V.M. a fait l'année dernière par l'organisation de la maison du Roi a prouvé jusqu'à l'évidence qu'aucun corps formé sur cette base et de ces élémens-là ne pourrait jamais lutter contre des portions et des réunions de l'armée. Il en a coûté bien cher à V.M. pour la formation et l'équipement de cette maison, tandis que d'un trait de plume Buonaparte vient de former autour de lui 30,000 hommes de jeune Garde, qui ne lui coûteront pas même plus que la simple troupe de ligne, et qui mettent dans sa main une force supérieure à toutes celles qui pourroient se réunir contre lui en France, tant qu'il n'auroit à réprimer que des troubles intérieurs, et qu'il n'auroit pas à lutter avec les Puissances étrangères. C'est une force comme celle-là, et organisée d'après les principes de la tactique moderne, qu'il faut à quelque prix que ce soit que V.M. se procure après son rétablissement, sans quoi une seconde chute seroit inévitable.

Je n'ignore pas, Sire, que bien des gens pensent, et peut-être n'ont-ils pas entièrement tort, qu'un corps de garde ainsi organisée seroit jusqu'à un certain point une garde Prétorienne; mais je réponds que dans l'état actuel des opinions en France, aucun corps armé ne défendra et ne soutiendra que ce qu'il trouvera son intérêt à défendre et à soutenir; ainsi, il n'est pas douteux que V.M. ne doive faire en sorte que cet intérêt s'y trouve, et je suis persuadé qu'avec de l'adresse et un bon système de conduite, on les contiendrait dans de justes bornes. Mais je crois que personne ne me contestera qu'il vaudroit bien mieux que V.M. fut aux Tuileries entourée d'une garde Prétorienne, que de la voir à Gand entourée des débris de sa maison militaire.

Quoiqu'il en soit, il est certain qu'il n'y a point de partie de la nation Française plus importante et plus difficile à gagner pour le Roi que l'armée. Plus on adoptera l'opinion que V.M. m'enjoint d'inculquer que la nation désavoue la défection de l'armée, et plus on doit, il me semble se persuader que la nation seule ne peut pas soutenir un gouvernement que l'armée repousse, et par conséquent plus on sera dévoué au Roi plus on désirera son rétablissement, et plus on devra le supplier très humblement, mais très vivement, d'adopter, et de faire adopter à ses Princes, un système de conduite et des mesures qui laissent toujours la porte ouverte à un rapprochement avec l'armée, sans lequel le rétablissement de V.M. ne sauroit jamais acquérir la solidité qui lui a manqué cette fois-ci.

Je supplie V.M. de me pardonner la longueur de cette lettre, et l'importunité des détails dans lesquels j'ai cru de mon devoir d'entrer. J'espère au moins qu'elle y verra une preuve de plus de mon zèle pour son service et de mon dévouement pour son auguste personne. Je la prie d'agréer, avec sa bonté ordinaire, l'hommage de mon profond respect.

Sire, &c., &c.

III.

The King of France to the Duke of Orleans.

Gand, ce 10 Mai, 1815.

J'ai reçu, mon cher neveu, votre lettre du 25 Avril, et je ne puis que vous rendre grâce de la franchise avec laquelle vous me parlez de nos plus chers intérêts. J'approuve entièrement le principe de conciliation qui fait la base de votre opinion, et qui, comme vous le savez, a été la règle invariable de ma conduite. Je ne puis, cependant, en tirer les mêmes conséquences; et vous verrez par ma déclaration du 2 de Mai, faite d'accord avec les Ministres des Puissances Alliées, qu'en distinguant leur cause de la mienne, il n'en est pas moins indispensable que j'agisse avec elles, conformément au traité fait entre nous. En me tenant éloigné de la France, je ne ferois qu'accréditer les bruits que Buonaparte cherche à répandre sur les vues intéressées des Alliées, et je contribuerois ainsi à soulever contre eux la nation entière. Mon dessein est de paroître dans mes états dès que la moindre portion du territoire Français me deviendra accessible, mais d'y paroître à la tête d'un corps Français, entouré des Princes de ma maison, et m'occupant à prévenir ou du moins à tempérer les maux que la guerre entraîne à sa suite. J'ai formé dans cette vue un plan que je vous communiquerai; l'exécution n'en peut maintenant être différée, et je crois, mon cher neveu, que le moment est venu de vous rappeler auprès de moi sans délai. Partez donc tout de suite. Votre prochaine arrivée me dispense d'entrer dans de plus amples détails sur des objets dont je me réserve de vous entretenir avec toute la confiance dont j'aime à vous donner ici un nouveau témoignage, en vous renouvelant l'assurance de ma bien sincère amitié.

J'espère que vous m'apporterez de bonnes nouvelles de ma nièce et de ses enfans.

LOUIS.

IV.

The Duke of Orleans to the King of France.

SIRE, Richmond, ce 17 Mai, 1815.

J'ai reçu la lettre dont V.M. m'a honoré le 10 de ce mois. Je suis bien flatté de ce que vous daignez me dire au sujet de la lettre que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous écrire le 25 Avril, et bien heureux que les principes que j'y ai posés ayent obtenus votre approbation. Cependant, comme V.M. ajoute qu'elle n'en tire pas les mêmes conséquences que celles que j'ai déduites dans ma lettre, je regrette vivement que V.M. n'ait pas daigné me faire connoître quelles sont les conséquences qu'elle tire elle-même de ces principes, et en quoi elle trouve que je me suis trompé. Je regrette plus encore que vous n'avez pas daigné me communiquer le grand plan que vous m'annoncez, et à l'exécution duquel vous voulez bien me faire espérer que mes foibles services pourraient être de quelqu'utilité. V.M. daigne me dire qu'elle me le communiquera lorsque je serai arrivé auprès d'elle; mais j'attacherois un grand prix à le connoître avant de m'y être rendu, car s'il se trouvait, comme j'en ai quelque crainte, que je ne crusse pas pouvoir entreprendre ce dont V.M. peut avoir l'intention de me charger, il deviendrait encore bien plus pénible pour moi d'être obligé alors de m'éloigner d'elle, que de continuer dans la retraite où je suis aujourd'hui, si après avoir eu connaissance de ses intentions je reconnaissais cette impossibilité. Cela serait plus pénible pour moi, Sire, parceque cela serait infiniment plus marquant, et que cela pourrait par conséquent fournir plus de prétextes aux malveillants pour donner à ma conduite la couleur que j'ai désiré qu'on ne put jamais lui donner. J'ai lieu de me flatter que jusqu'à présent du moins V.M. a rendu à ma conduite une justice à laquelle à la vérité je crois avoir quelques titres. Il ne m'a pas été difficile de m'apercevoir dès les premiers momens de mon retour en France qu'il n'entrait pas dans les vues de V.M. de m'admettre à sa confiance intime, je pourrais même presque dire à sa Cour, où les distinctions perpétuelles entre les Princes de sa famille et ceux de sa maison produisaient sans cesse des étiquettes qui, en ravalant les Princes de votre sang presqu'au niveau des particuliers, les séparaient de votre famille aux yeux du public, et les plaçaient nécessairement dans leurs rapports avec les autres Princes des maisons souveraines de l'Europe dans une position d'infériorité, quoiqu'ils eussent au moins le droit d'être leurs égaux, et qu'ils eussent été souvent les supérieurs de quelques têtes couronnées, ainsi que V.M. a daigné elle-même me l'apprendre, car je l'ignorais lorsque les désagrémens que nous éprouvions m'ont porté à lui faire aux Tuileries quelques représentations respectueuses à cet égard. Cependant V.M. a pu voir que ces considérations n'ont eu aucune influence sur ma conduite, et que j'ai tout supporté pour empêcher que cela ne fut remarqué, et qu'il put en résulter des doutes sur la sincérité de mon attachement pour V.M.

Il est bien connu, Sire, de toute la France, il est même probablement connu de toute l'Europe, que tandis que tous les Princes de votre famille étaient appelés constamment et une fois pour toutes à votre conseil, j'en ai été constamment exclus. V.M. peut me dire que je ne m'en suis jamais plaint, que je ne l'ai jamais demandé. Rien n'est plus vrai; et qu'elle me permette d'ajouter ici une autre vérité, c'est que je ne l'ai jamais désiré. Je n'ai pas désiré davantage d'aller siéger à la Chambre des Pairs, dont V.M., selon l'ancien usage de la monarchie Française, nous a déclaré membres nés, et de droit dans la chartre constitutionnelle; mais dont néanmoins elle nous a effectivement exclus par l'innovation d'exiger l'assentiment Royal pour que les Princes pussent y siéger, et de frapper de nullité tout ce qui serait fait en leur présence lorsque cet assentiment n'aurait pas été préalablement exprimé et renouvelé à chaque session. Et pourquoi ne l'ai-je pas désiré? Sire, je l'aurais vivement désiré si j'avois pu me flatter d'obtenir de votre part cette confiance intime sans laquelle il est impossible de pouvoir être utile dans un conseil; ou si j'avais cru que ma présence ou mes discours dans la Chambre des Pairs pussent consolider V.M. sur son trône, et fortifier son gouvernement. Mais sentant comme je le faisois que mes opinions ne coincideraient pas toujours avec celles de V.M. et de ses Ministres, j'ai préféré être dispensé de manifester les miennes; j'ai préféré ne pas être placé dans l'alternative fâcheuse pour tous, mais bien plus fâcheuse pour le premier Prince de votre sang, d'approuver en apparence ce qu'il désapprouve en réalité, ou d'acquérir une funeste popularité par l'opposition qu'il apporte aux mesures du gouvernement, et par la défaveur de la Cour.

J'ai donc préféré, Sire, la nullité absolue dans laquelle vous me placiez vous même, et V.M. a vu combien je m'y suis religieusement renfermé; ceux qui avaient le plus de prévention contre moi ont été forcés de me rendre la justice que je ne me mêlais de rien au monde que de soutenir le gouvernement de V.M. par tous les moyens qui restaient en mon pouvoir, et d'éviter scrupuleusement tout ce qui pouvait même ressembler à une opposition.

Sire, le premier vœu de mon cœur est de voir V M. rétablie sur son trône, et de jouir en France sous ses auspices de l'existence et du rang de premier Prince du sang. Voilà ce que je désire bien sincèrement, et ce que dans mon âme et conscience je préfère à tout, ainsi que j'ai déjà eu l'honneur de le dire à V.M.; mais plus je le désire, et plus je désire que V.M. adopte les mesures et le système qui peuvent le consolider plus efficacement, et nous préserver par cette consolidation d'un second renversement, lorsque nous aurons eu le bonheur de voir une seconde restauration.

Il me semble, Sire, que la principale difficulté n'est pas aujourd'hui de renverser Buonaparte, et de reconduire V.M. à Paris, mais c'est de consolider votre rétablissement, et de vous procurer en France une force capable de vous préserver, ainsi que nous, d'une rechute comme celle du mois de Mars dernier. C'est cela qu'en général on entend bien mal hors de France, non pas par défaut de bonnes intentions à votre égard, car je suis persuadé que tous les gouvernemens désirent sincèrement que V.M. soit rétablie, et qu'elle le soit solidement; mais par défaut de connoissance de la France, et du caractère Français; et malheureusement la plupart des Français qui sortent de France se laissent tellement entramés par leurs passions et s'échauffent tellement entr'eux, que leurs opinions achèvent d'égarer ceux qui, étant étrangers à la France, auraient eux-mêmes besoin d'être éclairés et guidés sur le véritable état de choses en France, et sur la véritable disposition des esprits. Je dois avouer à V M. que cette exaltation d'opinions parmi les émigrés est un des motifs qui m'a toujours éloigné de m'agréger à eux; car outre que je la crois très dangereuse et même funeste pour les intérêts de V.M., je sens et j'ai souvent éprouvé que la différence de mes opinions m'attire de leur part des désagrémens auxquels je ne me soucie point d'être exposé.

C'est pour cela, Sire, que je croirais infiniment fâcheux pour les intérêts de V.M. qu'elle se présentât en France entourée d'une réunion de Français professant des opinions semblables. L'expérience de l'année dernière doit nous faire sentir combien il importe que V.M. mette beaucoup de circonspection dans votre conduite à cet égard, et la lettre de V.M. me fait craindre que ce ne soit votre intention de vous mettre à la tête d'un corps semblable à celui qui entra sous vos ordres en France en 1792. et cette crainte est pour moi un motif bien puissant pour vous supplier de daigner permettre que je reste encore dans ma retraite. J'aime à me flatter que la sagesse de V.M. remédiera aux maux que la partie de son plan qu'elle m'a permis d'apercevoir me fait craindre et prévoir. J'aime même à me flatter que je me trompe dans ma manière de voir; mais je ne puis me persuader que le gouvernement de V.M. soit reconnu en France tant que le siége en sera dans un lieu occupé et entouré par des armées étrangères. Je n'en excepterais que Paris, dont (comme j'ai déjà eu l'honneur de le mander à V.M.) l'occupation me paraît être néccssairement momentanée, parceque je la regarde comme un coup mortel pour le gouvernement de Buonaparte.

Je sens avec quels soins V.M. doit éviter ainsi qu'elle daigne me le dire " tout ce qui pourroit accréditer en France les bruits que Buonaparte cherche à répandre sur les vues intéressées des Alliés," mais je n'en sens pas moins vivement combien il importe à V.M. de ménager la délicatesse, je dirais presque la susceptibilité, de la nation Française à cet égard. Que V.M. pense bien au cri qui sera poussé en France si c'est elle qui fait ouvrir les portes des places fortes aux troupes alliées, et si c'est d'une de ces places, et sous la garde d'une garnison étrangère, dont un petit corps d'émigrés ne changera point la nature, et ne fera probablement que l'aggraver aux yeux de la nation Française, que V.M. entreprend de gouverner la France. Plus je crois que les Puissances étrangères veulent sincèrement le renversement de Buonaparte, et votre rétablissement, et moins je me persuade qu'elles puissent exiger de V.M. des démarches qui me semblent devoir être aussi pénibles pour elle que fâcheuses pour sa cause, et nuisibles à son intérêt.

Je n'importunerai pas davantage V.M. avant de connaître plus en détail le plan dont elle a daigné me parler.

Que V.M. daigne agréer avec bonté l'hommage de mon profond respect, et de mon entier dévouement.

Sire, de V.M., &c.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 21st May, 1815, 7 P.M.

I have received your Lordship's letter of yesterday morning, and have communicated on the subject of it with General Gneisenau.

The battering train he conceives to be necessary for the use of the two armies is stated at nearly 500 pieces. This much exceeds the estimate of any other officer here: however, I am desired to say that in six weeks the Prussians expect to be able to bring forward 120 pieces, and that the total number they are preparing amounts to 200 pieces. These, I am told, are divided into eight divisions of 25 pieces each, with every part of the siege equipment complete; and the 1st division, which is in readiness, will move to Liège in a few days.

In regard to the bridges, there is a small train of seven tin pontoons at Wesel, which is ordered up, and the great train of 75 pontoons is about to leave Berlin. The desire to have rope bridges originated in my having in conversation mentioned that your Lordship had used them across the broken bridge of Alcantara, and at the mouth of the Adour. During the last campaign, in most instances the passage of rivers was effected by means of Russian pontoons of canvas; and I understand the Prussians had of their own only seven or eight pontoons.

General Gneisenau desired me to acknowledge his sense of your Lordship's readiness to meet his wishes in recommending that the 30,000 stand of arms should be given, and seemed to think Rotterdam the most convenient port for their delivery.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 21st May, 1815.

The man I sent to Laon returned late last night, and gives the following report:—

At Laon he found about 8000 infantry and 1200 cavalry, with two Generals, whose names he could not learn: 900 Gardes Nationales arrived when he was there from the neighbourhood of Paris, but a great number of them had deserted on the road. 37 field pieces were in a park at Laon, at which about 3000 peasants were occupied in fortifying it.

At Guise, which they fortify also, this man found General Balan with the 81st infantry, the 7th Lanciers, and twelve pieces of ordnance.

At Landrecy General du Pin, the 4th infantry, the 9th Chasseurs, and 22 pieces of ordnance.

At Englefontaine the 82nd infantry: besides, all the villages between Laon and Landrecy are full of troops; they are reckoned from 20,000 to 25,000 men.

Head quarters are at Avesnes. At Bavay there was a false alarm the day before yesterday, and the garrison, consisting of the 1st Chasseurs and one battalion of the 11th, fell back to Pont sur Sambre.

A Marshal was expected at Laon, which this man called le Duc d'Istrie; but as I don't know of any one having got this title since Marshal Bessières, I think it is an error.*

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 22nd May, 1815, 8 P.M.

I have shown General Gneisenau the papers on the subject of the town and duchy of Bouillon. He is not aware that any orders of severity have been issued against the town of Bouillon, or any threat to consider it as an enemy's country, excepting that the Prussian advanced posts take the usual precautionary measures of a military nature against persons going or coming from thence, which he thinks indispensable so long as the citadel is held by French soldiers. At Pallizeul the Prussians have about half a dozen men, and on that line merely have a few hussars to keep up the communication. He will, however, inquire whether any grounds have been given for the alarm of the Governor, and desires me to say Prince Blücher will be happy to meet your Lordship's further wishes on the subject.

General Gneisenau informs me a letter has just been received from the King of the Netherlands, the substance of which announces that the Prussian troops are felt to be a very heavy charge to this part of this country, and that it is desirable to consider of means to alleviate the pressure. It is intended to answer that the Prussians did not come uninvited, or purely for Prussian objects; and that if the King is decidedly of opinion that their services are no longer required, they will move on the Moselle, where, he added, the right bank afforded abundant subsistence, and where the entrance into France presented none of the impediments of fortified places with which the Belgian frontier was crowded.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Enclosed is the passport for Mrs. Sutton.

[Extract for the Duke de Bouillon.

WELLINGTON.]

Sir C. W. Flint to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Irish Office, 22nd May, 1815.

As I think it material that your Grace should be put in possession of everything that relates to the state of France, and the opinions that prevail there, I beg leave to send you the enclosed, which is written by a respectable inhabitant of Martinique, now at Paris.

There appears to be a very decided opinion that Buonaparte intends making his great stand at Paris, suffering the Allies to penetrate into France, with a view of falling upon their weakest corps, and breaking their line. This strikes me as being a very hazardous operation, and therefore I hope he may adopt it.

Believe me ever, my dear Lord,

Your Grace's most faithful and obliged servant,

C. W. FLINT.

P.S.—I congratulate your Grace on the very important news received last night from La Vendée, where it appears 50,000 men are in arms.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Paris, 9 Mai, 1815.

Paris est toujours tranquille. On passe en revue beaucoup de troupes qui partent de suite pour les frontières; et vu l'état où étoit l'armée il y a deux mois, on ne peut que s'étonner de l'activité du gouvernement actuel. Nous ne craignons point les Alliés; mais nous avons à redouter un ennemi cruel. Il ne faut qu'une étincelle pour rallumer la flamme révolutionnaire. Il reste un noyau de Jacobins en France, qui veille l'occasion de se faire valoir, et qui donnent déjà l'épouvante aux honnêtes gens.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 22nd May, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose for your Grace's information reports on the state of some of the fortified towns from Montmédy to Philippeville, together with some details on the state of Paris on the 15th May.

It appears that the enemy are strongly fortifying Soissons, but that they have not thrown up any works for their intended intrenched camp between that place and Laon.

Reports from persons arrived from Paris deserving of credit assert that Murat had arrived in that city.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect,
My Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient very humble servant,
LIONEL HERVEY.

E. Cooke, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Rome, 22nd May, 1815.

I have kept the courier to hear from Lord Burghersh. Lady Burghersh has just received a letter from him, and I give your Grace the following extract. You can consider it as a letter to me.

Extract of a Letter from Lord Burghersh, dated Tiano, 21st May, 1815.

"I send this letter in great haste by the courier who takes the military convention that has been signed, by which the whole of the kingdom of Naples, save a few places, Gaeta, Pescara, and Ancona, has been surrendered to the Allies. Murat has not yet treated, nor is it exactly known where he is; but he has been told that he must go under a guard of honour to Austria. The army goes into Capua to-day; to-morrow we occupy the heights above Naples; and the next day, the 23rd, we enter the city."

The officer who brought the despatch says Murat was at Salernum. Gaeta is blockaded.

I congratulate your Grace most cordially on this great event.

Ever most truly your Grace's servant,
E. COOKE.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Vienna, 22nd May, 1815.

I do myself the honour of enclosing to your Grace a copy of the last Declaration published here by the Allied Sovereigns, and have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's very obedient humble servant,

STEWART.

CONGRÈS DE VIENNE.

EXTRAIT du Procès-Verbal des Conférences des Puissances Signataires du Traité de Paris.

Conférence du 12 Mai, 1815.

La commission nommée le 9 de ce mois, et chargée d'examiner si, après les événemens qui se sont passés depuis le retour de Napoléon Buonaparte en France, et en suite des pièces publiées à Paris sur la Déclaration que les Puissances ont fait émaner contre lui le 13 Mars dernier, il serait nécessaire de procéder à une nouvelle Déclaration, a présentée à la séance de ce jour le rapport qui suit :—

Rapport de la Commission.

La Déclaration publiée le 13 Mars dernier contre Napoléon Buonaparte et ses adhérens, par les Puissances qui ont signé le Traité de Paris, ayant depuis son retour à Paris été discutée dans différentes formes par ceux qu'il a employés à cet effet; ces discussions ayant acquis une grande publicité, et une lettre adressée par lui à tous les Souverains, ainsi qu'une note adressée par le Duc de Vicence aux chefs des Cabinets de l'Europe, ayant également été publiée par lui dans l'intention manifeste d'influer sur l'opinion publique, et de l'égarer, la Commission nommée dans la séance du 9 de ce mois a été chargée de présenter un travail sur ces objets; et attendu que, dans les publications susdites, on a essayé d'invalider la Déclaration du 13 Mars, en posant en fait :—

1. Que cette Déclaration dirigée contre Buonaparte à l'époque de son débarquement sur les côtes de France se trouvait sans application, maintenant qu'il s'était emparé des rênes du gouvernement sans résistance ouverte, et que, ce fait prouvant suffisamment le vœu de la nation, il se trouvait non-seulement rentré dans ses anciens droits vis-à-vis de la France, mais que la question même de la légitimité de son gouvernement avait cessé d'être du ressort des Puissances ;

2. Qu'en offrant de ratifier le Traité de Paris, il écartait tout motif de guerre contre lui ;

La Commission a été spécialement chargée de prendre en considération :

1. Si la position de Buonaparte vis-à-vis des Puissances de l'Europe a changé par le fait de son arrivée à Paris, et par les circonstances qui ont accompagné les premiers succès de son entreprise sur le trône de France ;

2. Si l'offre de sanctionner le Traité de Paris du 31 Mai, 1814, peut déterminer les Puissances à adopter un système différent de celui qu'elles avaient énoncé dans la Déclaration du 13 Mars ;

3. S'il est nécessaire ou convenable de publier une nouvelle Déclaration pour confirmer ou pour modifier celle du 13 Mars.

La Commission, après avoir mûrement examiné ces questions, rend à l'assemblée des Plénipotentiaires le compte suivant du résultat de ses délibérations :—

PREMIÈRE QUESTION.

La position de Buonaparte vis-à-vis des Puissances de l'Europe a-t-elle changée par les premiers succès de son entreprise, ou par les événemens qui se sont passés depuis son arrivée à Paris ?

Les Puissances, informées du débarquement de Buonaparte en France, n'ont pu voir en lui qu'un homme qui, en se portant sur le territoire Français à main armée, et avec le projet avoué de renverser le gouvernement établi, en excitant le peuple et l'armée à la révolte contre le Souverain légitime, et en usurpant le titre d'Empereur des Français,* avait encouru les peines que toutes les législations prononcent contre de pareils attentats ; un homme qui, en abusant de la bonne foi des Souverains, avoit rompu un traité solennel ; un homme enfin, qui, en rappelant sur la France, heureuse et tranquille, tous les fléaux de la guerre intérieure et extérieure, et sur l'Europe, au moment où les bienfaits de la paix devaient la consoler de les longues souffrances, la triste nécessité d'un nouvel armement général, était regardé à juste titre comme l'ennemi implacable du bien public. Telle fut l'origine, tels furent les motifs de la Déclaration du 13 Mars, Déclaration dont la justice et la nécessité ont été universellement reconnues, et que l'opinion générale a sanctionnée.

Les événemens qui ont conduit Buonaparte à Paris, et qui lui ont rendu pour le moment l'exercice du pouvoir suprême, ont sans doute changé de fait la position dans laquelle il se trouvait à l'époque de son entrée en France ; mais ces événemens, amenés par des intelligences criminelles, par des conspirations militaires, par des trahisons révoltantes, n'ont pu créer aucun droit ; ils sont absolument nuls sous le point de vue légal ; et pour que la position de Buonaparte fut essentiellement et légitimement changée, il faudrait que les démarches qu'il a faites pour s'établir sur les ruines du gouvernement renversé par lui eussent été confirmées par un titre légal quelconque.

Buonaparte établit dans ses publications que le vœu de la nation Française en faveur de son rétablissement sur le trône suffit pour constituer ce titre légal.

La question à examiner par les Puissances se réduit aux termes suivans : Le consentement réel ou factice, explicite ou tacite, de la nation Française au rétablissement du pouvoir de Buonaparte, peut-il opérer dans la position de celui-ci vis-à-vis des Puissances étrangères un changement légal, et former un titre obligatoire pour ces Puissances ?

La Commission est d'avis que tel ne peut point être l'effet d'un pareil consentement ; et voici les raisons sur lesquelles elle s'appuie :

Les Puissances connoissent trop bien les principes qui doivent les guider dans leurs rapports avec un pays indépendant pour entreprendre (comme on voudroit les en accuser) " de lui imposer des lois, de s'immiscer dans ses affaires

* L'article 1 de la Convention du 11 Avril, 1814, est conçu en ces termes : " L'Empereur Napoléon renonce pour lui, ses successeurs et descendans, ainsi que pour tous les membres de sa famille, à tous droits de souveraineté et de pouvoir, non-seulement sur l'Empire Français et sur le royaume d'Italie, mais sur tout autre pays." Nonobstant cette renonciation formelle, Buonaparte, dans ses différentes proclamations, du Golfe de Juan, de Gap, de Grenoble, de Lyon, s'intitula " Par la grâce de Dieu et les Constitutions de l'Empire, Empereur des Français, etc., etc., etc." V. 'Moniteur' du 21 Mars, 1815.

intérieures, de lui assigner une forme de gouvernement, de lui donner des maîtres au gré des intérêts ou des passions de ses voisins;" * mais elles savent aussi que la liberté d'une nation de changer son système de gouvernement doit avoir ses justes limites; et que, si les Puissances étrangères n'ont pas le droit de lui prescrire l'usage qu'elle fera de cette liberté, elles ont au moins indubitablement celui de protester contre l'abus qu'elle pourrait en faire à leurs dépens. Pénétrées de ce principe, les Puissances ne se croient point autorisées à imposer un gouvernement à la France; mais elles ne renonceront jamais au droit d'empêcher que sous le titre de gouvernement il ne s'établisse en France un foyer de désordres et de bouleversemens pour les autres Etats. Elles respecteront la liberté de la France partout où elle ne sera pas incompatible avec leur propre sûreté, et avec la tranquillité générale de l'Europe.

Dans le cas actuel, le droit des Souverains Alliés d'intervenir dans la question du régime intérieur de la France est d'autant plus incontestable, que l'abolition du pouvoir que l'on prétend y rétablir aujourd'hui était la condition fondamentale d'un traité de paix sur lequel reposaient tous les rapports qui, jusqu'au retour de Buonaparte à Paris, ont subsisté entre la France et le reste de l'Europe. Le jour de leur entrée à Paris les Souverains déclarèrent qu'ils ne traiteraient jamais de la paix avec Buonaparte.† Cette déclaration, hautement applaudie par la France et par l'Europe, amena l'abdication de Napoléon, et la Convention du 11 Avril; elle forma la base de la négociation principale; elle fut explicitement articulée dans le préambule du Traité de Paris. La nation Française, supposé même qu'elle soit parfaitement libre et unie, ne peut se soustraire à cette condition fondamentale sans renverser le Traité de Paris, et tous ses rapports actuels avec le système Européen. Les Puissances Alliées de l'autre côté, en insistant sur cette même condition, ne font qu'user d'un droit qu'il est impossible de leur contester, à moins d'admettre que les pactes les plus sacrés peuvent être dénaturés au gré des convenances de l'une ou de l'autre des parties contractantes.

Il s'ensuit que la volonté du peuple Français ne suffit pas pour rétablir, dans le sens légal, un gouvernement proscrit par des engagemens solennels que ce même peuple avoit pris avec toutes les Puissances de l'Europe, et ne qu'on saurait, sous aucun prétexte, faire valoir contre ces Puissances le droit de rappeler au trône celui dont l'exclusion avait été la condition préalable de tout arrangement pacifique avec la France. Le vœu du peuple Français, s'il était même pleinement constaté, n'en serait pas moins nul et sans effet vis-à-vis de l'Europe pour rétablir un pouvoir contre lequel l'Europe entière a été en état de protestation permanente depuis le 31 Mars, 1814, jusqu'au 13 Mars, 1815; et sous ce rapport la position de Buonaparte est précisément aujourd'hui ce qu'elle était à ces dernières époques.

SECONDE QUESTION.

L'offre de sanctionner le Traité de Paris peut-elle changer les Dispositions des Puissances?

La France n'a eu aucune raison de se plaindre du Traité de Paris. Ce traité a réconcilié la France avec l'Europe; il a satisfait à tous ses véritables intérêts, lui a assuré tous les biens réels, tous les élémens de prospérité et de gloire qu'un peuple appelé à une des premières places dans le système Européen pouvait raisonnablement désirer, et ne lui a enlevé que ce qui était pour elle, sous les dehors trompeurs d'un grand éclat national, une source intarissable de souffrances, de ruine, et de misère. Ce traité était même un bienfait immense pour un pays réduit par le délire de son chef à la situation la plus désastreuse.*

* C'est ainsi que le rapport du Conseil d'Etat de Buonaparte s'exprime sur les intentions des Puissances.—V. 'Moniteur' du 13 Avril.

† Déclaration du 31 Mars, 1814.

Les Puissances Alliées eussent trahi leurs intérêts et leurs devoirs, si, au prix de tant de modération et de générosité, elles n'avoient pas, en signant ce traité, obtenu quelque avantage solide; mais le seul qu'elles ambitionnaient était la paix de l'Europe et le bonheur de la France. Jamais, en traitant avec Buonaparte, elles n'eussent consenti aux conditions qu'elles accordèrent à un gouvernement lequel, "en offrant à l'Europe un gage de sécurité et de stabilité, les dispensait d'exiger de la France les garanties qu'elles lui avaient demandées sous son ancien gouvernement." † Cette clause est inséparable du Traité de Paris; l'abolir, c'est rompre ce traité. Le consentement formel de la nation Française au retour de Buonaparte sur le trône équivaudrait à une déclaration de guerre contre l'Europe; car l'état de paix n'a subsisté entre l'Europe et la France que par le Traité de Paris, et le Traité de Paris est incompatible avec le pouvoir de Buonaparte.

Si ce raisonnement avait encore besoin d'un appui, il le trouverait dans l'offre même de Buonaparte de ratifier le Traité de Paris. Ce traité avait été scrupuleusement observé et exécuté: les transactions du Congrès de Vienne n'en étaient que les supplémens et les développemens; et sans le nouvel attentat de Buonaparte, il eût été pour une longue suite d'années une des bases du droit public de l'Europe. Mais cet ordre de choses a fait place à une nouvelle révolution; et les agens de cette révolution, tout en proclamant sans cesse "qu'il n'y a rien de changé," ‡ conçoivent et sentent eux-mêmes que tout est changé autour d'eux. Il ne s'agit plus aujourd'hui de maintenir le Traité de Paris; il s'agirait de le refaire. Les Puissances se trouvent rétablies envers la France dans la même position dans laquelle elles étaient le 31 Mars, 1814. Ce n'est pas pour prévenir la guerre, car la France l'a rallumée de fait; c'est pour la terminer que l'on offre aujourd'hui à l'Europe un état de choses essentiellement différent de celui sur lequel la paix fut établie en 1814. La question a donc cessé d'être une question de droit; elle n'est plus qu'une question de calcul politique et de prévoyance, dans laquelle les Puissances n'ont à consulter que les intérêts réels de leurs peuples, et l'intérêt commun de l'Europe.

La Commission croit pouvoir se dispenser d'entrer ici dans un exposé des considérations qui, sous ce dernier rapport, ont dirigé les mesures des Cabinets. Il suffira de rappeler que l'homme qui, en offrant aujourd'hui de sanctionner le Traité de Paris, prétend substituer sa garantie à celle d'un Souverain dont la loyauté était sans tache, et la bienveillance sans mesure, est le même qui, pendant quinze ans, a ravagé et bouleversé la terre pour trouver de quoi satisfaire son ambition; qui a sacrifié des millions de victimes et le bonheur d'une génération entière à un système de conquêtes, que des trèves, peu dignes du nom de paix, n'ont rendu que plus accablant et plus odieux;§ qui, après avoir

* "L'Empereur, convaincu de la position critique où il a placé la France, et de l'impossibilité où il se trouve de la sauver lui-même, a paru se résigner et consentir à l'abdication entière et sans aucune restriction."—Lettre du Maréchal Ney au Prince de Bénévent, en date de Fontainebleau, 5 Avril, 1814. (V. 'Moniteur' du 7 Avril, 1814.)

† Préambule du Traité de Paris.

‡ C'est l'idée qui reparoit perpétuellement dans le rapport du Conseil d'Etat de Buonaparte, publié dans le 'Moniteur' du 13 Avril, 1815.

§ La Commission croit devoir ajouter ici l'observation importante, que la plus grande partie des envahissemens et des réunions forcées, dont Buonaparte par des entreprises insensées fatigué la fortune, armé toute l'Europe contre lui, et épuisé tous les moyens de la France, a été forcé d'abandonner ses projets, et a abdiqué le pouvoir pour sauver quelque débris de son existence; qui, dans un moment où les nations de l'Europe se livraient à l'espoir d'une tranquillité durable, a médité de nouvelles catastrophes, et par une double perfidie, envers les Puissances qui l'avaient trop généreusement épargné, et envers un gouvernement qu'il ne pouvait atteindre que par les plus noires trahisons, a usurpé un trône auquel il avoit renoncé, et qu'il n'avait jamais occupé que pour le malheur de la France et du monde. Cet homme n'a d'autre garantie à proposer à l'Europe que sa parole. Après la cruelle expérience de quinze années, qui aurait le courage d'accepter cette garantie? et si la nation Française a réellement embrassé sa cause, qui respecterait davantage la caution qu'elle pourrait offrir?

La paix avec un gouvernement placé entre de telles mains, et composé de tels élémens, ne serait qu'un état perpétuel d'incertitude, d'anxiété, et de danger. Aucune Puissance ne pouvant effectivement désarmer, les peuples ne jouiraient d'aucun des avantages d'une véritable pacification; ils seraient écrasés de charges de toute espèce; la confiance ne pouvant se rétablir nulle part, l'industrie et le commerce languiraient partout; rien ne serait stable dans les relations politiques; un sombre mécontentement planeroit sur tous les pays; et du jour au lendemain l'Europe en alarme s'attendrait à une nouvelle explosion. Les Souverains n'ont certainement pas méconnu l'intérêt de leurs peuples en jugeant qu'une guerre ouverte, avec tous ses inconvéniens et tous ses sacrifices, est préférable à un pareil état de choses, et les mesures qu'ils ont adoptées ont rencontré l'approbation générale.

L'opinion de l'Europe s'est prononcée dans cette grande occasion d'une manière bien positive et bien solennelle; jamais les vrais sentimens des peuples n'ont pû être plus exactement connus, et plus fidèlement interprétés, que dans un moment où les représentans de toutes les Puissances se trouvaient réunis pour consolider la paix du monde.

TROISIÈME QUESTION.

Est-il nécessaire de publier une Nouvelle Déclaration?

Les observations que la Commission vient de présenter fournissent la réponse à la dernière question qui lui reste à examiner. Elle considère:

1. Que la Déclaration du 13 Mars a été dictée aux Puissances par des motifs d'une justice si évidente, et d'un poids si décisif, qu'aucun des sophismes par lesquels on a prétendu attaquer cette Déclaration ne saurait y porter atteinte;

2. Que ces motifs subsistent dans toute leur force, et que les changemens survenus de fait depuis la Déclaration du 13 Mars n'en ont point opéré dans la position de Buonaparte et de la France vis-à-vis des Puissances;

3. Que l'offre de ratifier le Traité de Paris ne sauroit, sous aucun rapport, changer les dispositions des Puissances.

a successivement formé ce qu'il appelait "le grand Empire," a eu lieu pendant ces perfides intervalles de paix, plus funestes à l'Europe que les guerres mêmes dont elle fut tourmentée. C'est ainsi qu'il s'empara du Piémont, de Parme, de Gênes, de Lucques, des Etats de Rome, de la Hollande, des pays composant la 32e division militaire. Ce fut aussi dans une époque de paix (au moins avec tout le Continent) qu'il porta ses premiers coups contre le Portugal et l'Espagne, et il crut avoir achevé la conquête de ces pays par la ruse et par l'audace, lorsque le patriotisme et l'énergie des peuples de la Péninsule l'entraînèrent dans une guerre sanglante, commencement de sa chute, et du salut de l'Europe.

En conséquence, la Commission est d'avis qu'il serait inutile d'émettre une nouvelle Déclaration.

Les Plénipotentiaires des Puissances qui ont signé le Traité de Paris, et qui, comme telles, sont responsables de son exécution vis-à-vis des Puissances accédantes, ayant pris en délibération et sanctionné par leur approbation le rapport précédent, ont résolu qu'il serait donné communication du procès-verbal de ce jour aux Plénipotentiaires des autres Cours Royales. Ils ont arrêté en outre que l'extrait du susdit procès-verbal sera rendu public.

Vienne, le 12 Mai, 1815.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 23rd May, 1815.

French patrols have shown themselves yesterday afternoon before our piquets at Boussu and Pâturages, and in the night they drove in our videttes at Genly, on the Bavay road; but when the piquet came out and charged them, they dispersed in the corn-fields. They were about twenty strong, and have left a horse killed, but which they probably killed themselves, not being able to follow.

The 5th Dragoons arrived at Valenciennes some days ago from Paris:

they are represented as well disposed for Louis XVIII., particularly their Colonel, Count St. Amand.

People that come from France assure that all the troops on the frontier have orders, in case of an attack from our side, to fall back on Laon, where Buonaparte was expected immediately after the Champ de Mai.

A deserter pretends to have seen at Paris a proclamation of Buonaparte saying that he expected the Empress Maria Louisa at Paris on the 26th; but in the event of her not coming, he would consider it as a declaration of war, and attack the Allies. It is also asserted that great troubles are in the South.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Prince Metternich to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MON CHER DUC, Vienne, ce 23 Mai, 1815.

Le Baron de Vincent vous parlera du sujet qui amène l'envoi du présent courrier à Bruxelles. Le Roi de Saxe désire par dessus tout que vous ne vous refusiez pas à commander ses troupes: il croit pouvoir en répondre, et il n'attribue les derniers événemens qu'à la forme que les Prussiens ont mis à leur séparation, et surtout au manque d'ordres de leur Roi. Il croit en outre que ces troupes ne cesseront pas de donner des preuves de zèle et de dévouement à la bonne cause si elles sont placées sous un autre commandement que le Prussien. Si en dernier cas vous n'en voulez pas, il veut les faire réunir avec Schwarzenberg. Vous êtes à même de sonder les dispositions véritables des principaux militaires Saxons ou de pouvoir même vous passer de cette recherche après le contact qui s'est établi entre les deux armées. Si de véritables motifs devaient s'opposer à ce que le corps Saxon peut être réuni à vous, je vous prierai de même de m'en faire part, parcequ'ils ne seraient pas moins valables pour nous.

Les nouvelles d'Italie sont telles que nous pouvons regarder l'affaire de Murat comme fini. J'envoye aujourd'hui à Vincent les derniers détails, d'après lesquels il est possible, et même probable, que notre armée peut avoir été le 22 ou le 23 sous les murs de Naples. Je me flatte que vous nous rendez la justice que quand nous commencons une besogne nous savons la finir sans nous laisser arrêter par des moyens termes ou par des considérations secondaires, également nuisibles en militaire et en politique quand il s'agit de grands intérêts.

Le départ des Souverains est fixé du 26 au 27. Je compte me mettre en route le 30, et je serai à Heilbronn le 2 ou le 3.

Agréez, mon cher Duc, l'assurance de mon attachement et de ma haute considération.

METTERNICH.

Je vous prie de ne pas juger des Saxons sur ce que les généraux Prussiens vous en diront, car je les connais beaucoup les uns et les autres, et la troupe Saxonne est excellente, à moins que le vertige du Nord l'ait gagné.

The Duke de Saxe Cobourg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Vienne, 23 Mai, 1815.

Je saisis avec empressement l'occasion du départ d'un courrier pour me rappeler au gracieux souvenir de Votre Excellence, et pour lui faire part que Sa Majesté le Roi de Saxe m'avait offert le commandement du corps d'armée de troupes Saxonnes qui d'après ses désirs était destiné à s'unir à l'armée de Votre Excellence. Flatté de la confiance du Roi et de l'espoir de servir sous les ordres d'un aussi digne chef, j'étais prêt à me rendre à ma destination, lorsque j'appris avec autant d'étonnement que de peine la malheureuse catastrophe qui vient d'avoir lieu.

Votre Excellence verra cependant par la lettre que Sa Majesté le Roi de Saxe m'a fait l'honneur de m'adresser, et dont j'ai l'honneur de joindre la copie sous ce pli, qu'il a pris des mesures pour ramener ces troupes égarées à leur devoir, et qu'il désire toujours qu'elles s'unissent à l'armée de Votre Excellence.

Je suis persuadé que le Général de Lecoq, lequel est désigné pour réorganiser les troupes, portent toutes les qualités pour remplir dignement les vues de son maître ; et je me flatte que lorsque l'ordre sera rétabli Votre Excellence voudra bien se rendre aux vœux de Sa Majesté, et recevoir dans son armée des troupes qui sous la direction d'un éclairé et probé s'empresseront de mériter sa bienveillance.

J'ose encore recourir à Votre Excellence pour l'accomplissement d'un désir qui m'est plus particulier, et dont j'ai déjà eu l'honneur de lui faire part lors de son séjour à Vienne ; il s'agit de soulager autant que possible mon pays, déjà entièrement épuisé par les guerres précédentes, et je puis dire écrasé dans ce moment par les charges énormes qu'on lui impose, et auxquelles il ne peut suffire ; car non-seulement presque toute l'armée Russe passe et séjourne dans mon pays, mais on exige encore des fournitures de vivres pour trois mois, ce qui doit naturellement entraîner sa ruine totale, vu que les mesures bienfaisantes adoptées par Votre Excellence n'existent point dans le rayon qui me concerne, et en outre je dois fournir, équiper, et nourrir le double de mon contingent ordinaire.

Je ne vois donc d'autres moyens pour subvenir à toutes ces dépenses que d'appeler à la munificence du gouvernement Anglais, pour qu'il daigne m'accorder des subsides pour mon contingent, ainsi que pour celui de Saxe Meiningen et Hildburghausen, qui se trouvent dans le même cas, et qui doivent, réuni à mon contingent, former l'ensemble d'un régiment fort de deux mille hommes.

La justice reconnue de Votre Excellence, ainsi que la bienveillance qu'elle m'a constamment témoignée, me sont un sûr garant qu'elle voudra bien être l'interprète de mes désirs près de son gouvernement.

D'abord que je saurai les intentions de Votre Excellence à cet égard, j'aurai l'honneur de lui envoyer le Colonel Baron de Hardenbrock pour traiter de cette affaire définitivement.

Je supplie Votre Excellence de me les faire parvenir aussitôt que possible à Cobourg, pour où je compte partir après demain, et d'agréer l'assurance de la haute considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ERNEST, DUC DE SAXE COBOURG.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

The King of Saxony to the Duke of Saxe Cobourg.

MONSIEUR MON COUSIN, Laxenbourg, le 22 Mai, 1815.

Désirant de changer aussitôt que possible la situation dans laquelle mes troupes sur le Rhin se sont trouvées jusqu'ici, je fais partir mon Lieutenant-Général de Lecoq, chargé de concourir au partage des troupes Saxonnes et de réorganiser le contingent que je m'engage de fournir par suite de mon accession à l'alliance du 25 Mars. Je sollicite en même temps par l'entremise de la

Cour d'Autriche l'emploi de ce corps près de l'armée réunie sous les ordres du Duc de Wellington.

Je réitère à Votre Altesse le vœu que mes troupes puissent faire partie du corps d'armée qui lui seraient confié, et jouir de l'avantage de sa direction éclairée et bienveillante, et c'est dans cette espérance que je m'empresse de lui faire part des démarches que je viens de faire.

Je prie Votre Altesse d'être bien persuadée de la sincère amitié et de la considération très distinguée avec lesquelles je ne cesserai d'être,

Monsieur mon Cousin, de Votre Altesse le très affectionné Cousin,

FRÉDÉRIC AUGUSTE.

II.

The King of Saxony to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC DE WELLINGTON, Laxenbourg, le 22 Mai, 1815.

Venant d'accéder à l'alliance conclue à Vienne le 25 Mars dernier en renouvellement du Traité de Chaumont, et faisant joindre en conséquence aux armées alliées les troupes Saxonnes, je désire que ce corps puisse faire partie de l'armée qui se trouve sous vos ordres. La Cour Impériale d'Autriche m'ayant promis son intervention à cet effet, il me reste à réclamer directement vos bons offices.

Quelque répréhensible que soit la conduite tenue en dernier lieu par une partie de mes troupes, je crois pouvoir m'attendre que, soumises à vos ordres et inspirées par l'ambition de mériter l'approbation d'un chef admiré si généralement et à tant de titres, elles justifieront de nouveau la réputation de bravoure et de discipline acquise de tout temps au nom Saxon.

Me flattant, Monsieur le Duc, que vous voudrez bien accueillir et appuyer auprès de votre auguste Souverain la destination sollicitée pour mes troupes, j'ordonne éventuellement à mon Lieutenant-Général de Lecoq, qui sera chargé du commandement du contingent Saxon, de vous en soumettre l'état aussitôt que possible, de vous tenir informé des mesures prises pour sa réorganisation, et de se conformer aux ordres que vous jugeriez à propos de lui donner en suite des plans arrêtés entre les Puissances Alliées.

En vous assurant de mes sentimens très distingués, je prie Dieu qu'il vous ait en sa sainte et digne garde.

Votre très affectionné

FRÉDÉRIC AUGUSTE.

General Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, le 23 Mai, 1815.

Je m'empresse de faire part à Votre Altesse que d'après tous les renseignements que j'ai pu faire, l'ennemi depuis Givet jusqu'à la mer du Nord peut se monter vers 60,000 combattans, y compris les garnisons des forteresses.

Le tout est divisé en trois corps, dont l'un est commandé par le Général Vandamme, qui a son quartier-général dans les environs de Philippeville, à Villers Tambin ou à Franchimont, deux campagnes qui sont destinés à servir successivement pour ce but. L'autre corps est commandé par le Général Reille à Avesnes, le troisième par le Général Erlon à Valenciennes.

On forme à Laon un camp de réserve; le 18 du mois il pouvoit se monter vers 10,000 hommes, dont 6000 à pied. L'on dit que les forces de ce corps de réserve doivent être portés au nombre de 25,000 hommes.

Dans les environs de Philippeville le Général Domant commande une brigade de cavalerie, savoir, le 2me. housards, le 5me. lanciers, le 11me. chasseurs.

Il y a quelques jours que le Général Ameille a parcouru les frontières pour exhorter les habitans de prêter sermens à Buonaparte, et d'entrer dans la garde nationale. Ses peines n'ont guère été couronnés de succès, autant que je sais il y a plus de 500 personnes destinés pour la garde nationale qui sont venu de ce côté-ci : une grande partie désire rentrer sous les drapeaux de Louis XVIII.

J'avais la semaine passée fait concentrer les troupes du 1r. corps d'armée, pour les faire manœuvrer. L'ennemi, qui en avait connaissance, y avait voir une attaque, et retirait tous ses postes avancés.

Je supplie Votre Altesse d'agréer en bonté les sentiments respectueux avec lesquelles j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

De Votre Altesse le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

[Acknowledge the receipt; et je vous suis bien obligé pour les nouvelles que vous me donnez, qui accordent avec celles que je reçois.

WELLINGTON.]

G. O. Bruxelles, 24th May, 1815. [879.]

5. In order that the baggage of the army may be regulated, the Commander of the Forces requests that the Earl of Uxbridge, commanding the cavalry, and the General officers commanding divisions of infantry, will recommend a steady serjeant to be appointed Assistant Baggage Master to the cavalry, and an Assistant Baggage Master to each division of infantry.

6. The Assistant Baggage Masters will have the same pay and allowances as the Assistant Provost Marshals.

7. It will be the duty of the Assistant Baggage Master to have a regular return of the baggage belonging to the division which is to march under his direction, by regiments, departments, brigade and divisional staff; specifying how moved, and the name of the driver.

8. To see that every carriage in the division is marked with the name of the individual, or department, or the number of the regiment to which it belongs.

9. To see that the baggage belonging to the division marches in regular order, according to the route which will be given for it from time to time.

10. He will make such returns to the officer at the head of the Baggage department as he may occasionally require.

11. His Royal Highness the Prince Regent has been pleased to direct that the duties and authority vested in the Comptrollers of Army Accounts should be exercised upon the spot with armies of considerable magnitude.

12. The Honourable J. Erskine, and A. Rosenhagen, Esq., Comptroller of Army Accounts, have in consequence joined this army.

13. The following officers and clerks have been appointed to their department:

Chief Inspector, Assistant Commissary-General W. Booth,
One Sub-Inspector,
Principal Examiner,
Two Examiners,
Three Superior Clerks,
Three Inferior Clerks,
Two private Secretaries,

14. The Comptrollers are to be considered in all respects as Commissaries-General; the Inspectors as Deputy Commissaries-General.

15. The principal Examiner, and private Secretary, to the first Comptroller, as Assistant Commissaries-General; the Examiners, and private Secretary, to the second Comptroller, as Deputy Assistant Commissaries-General; the Clerks, as clerks of other departments.

16. Allowance of forage money is throughout excepted.

17. All Accountants (those of the Commissariat excepted) are to render their accounts to the Comptroller, in the same manner as they have hitherto done to the Commissary of Accounts.

18. The proper officers of each department are to transmit to the Comptroller of Army Accounts the monthly estimates of their respective pecuniary demands.

19. The warrants for the regular pay and allowances of the Staff, and regiments, are in future to be granted by the Comptroller of Army Accounts.

20. The regimental estimates for pay, hitherto transmitted to the Commander of the Forces, are in future to be transmitted to the Comptroller of Army Accounts.

21. The aforegoing orders are to take effect from the 25th instant inclusive.

22. The Adjutant and Quartermaster-General, and all other Staff officers, are directed to afford the Comptrollers of the Army Accounts such information as they may require, in order to enable them to perform the duties with which they are intrusted.

Which opinion and sentence have been confirmed by his Grace the Commander of the Forces.

24. The Commander of the Forces is concerned that his sense of duty obliged him to bring Lieutenant ——— to trial before a General Court Martial, for the neglect of which he has been found guilty, and for which he is now to receive a reprimand.

25. The Commander of the Forces wishes to impress upon the minds of the officers of the army, that the most minute parts of their duty are not trifles, and that the omission to perform any of them must be attended by the most serious public inconveniences, and even misfortunes.

26. Lieutenant ——— having charge of a party of troops, ought not to have quitted it on any account, and ought not to have delegated to a corporal a trust reposed in him.

WELLINGTON.

Prince Hardenberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Vienne, le 24 Mai, 1815.

Permettez que je vous fasse mille remerciemens de la lettre que vous avez bien voulu m'adresser en date du 3 de ce mois. L'événement qui a eu lieu à l'armée Saxonne est très répréhensible et désagréable. J'espère que tout a été aplani par les mesures du Maréchal Blücher, et que le plus grand nombre de ces troupes ne se seront pas rendues indignes de servir sous votre commandement. Le traité avec le Roi de Saxe a été enfin signé; et les dispositions à l'égard de l'armée sont entièrement conformes aux mesures qui avaient pris nos militaires. Le Roi accède d'ailleurs au traité du 25 de Mars, et fournit un contingent de 16,000 hommes, dont les troupes qui lui restent là bas formeront le noyau. S.M. le Roi de Prusse l'on laisse toute l'artillerie de campagne, afin de les rendre d'autant plutôt capables de servir.

Lord Castlereagh me marque qu'il a mis la somme de 2,100,000 livres sterling à votre disposition pour les subsides. Je me flatte que vous trouverez les moyens d'en accorder aux Princes Allemands, et me permets de parler pour ceux dont les troupes servent avec l'armée Prussienne, d'après la liste ci-jointe. Leurs troupes seraient bien découragées si elles se voyaient moins bien traitées que celles des grandes Puissances.

Veuillez agréer enfin l'assurance de mon plus parfait dévouement et de la plus haute considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être, My Lord Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

HARDENBERG.

Le Roi part demain pour Berlin. Nos affaires vont être terminées, et je compte le suivre dans le courant de la semaine prochaine. L'Empereur de Russie part le même jour; l'Empereur d'Autriche le 27. Nous ne tarderons pas de nous réunir bientôt à l'armée.

INTELLIGENCE FROM BÂLE, DATED 24TH MAY.

I.

Buonaparte au 4 Mai, 1815.

Le système des journaux de Buonaparte n'est pas changé quant au fonds. C'est toujours le même esprit de mensonge, d'impudence, et de perfidie; mais dans la vue d'un résultat différent. On cherchait autrefois à nous tromper sur les intentions de l'étranger, qui ne peuvent plus nous être suspects: maintenant c'est l'étranger qu'il s'agit d'abuser sur l'état et les intentions de la France; c'est à l'étranger qu'il s'agit de prouver que la dictature de Buonaparte a la sanction de l'enthousiasme populaire, qu'un parti puissant et nombreux appuie le trône de cet aventurier, et qu'il peut espérer de rendre nationale la guerre qu'il attire de nouveau sur notre pays. Ces impostures honteuses ne prouvent que l'infamie des misérables qui les écrivent.

La France entière a le sentiment de la chute prochaine de Buonaparte; chaque jour dont son existence se prolonge est un sujet d'étonnement pour le peuple et pour Buonaparte lui-même. Il sait qu'il a été trompé par quelques factieux sur l'esprit de la nation; que l'opinion publique rappelle le meilleur des Rois, et repousse le plus odieux des tyrans; que la partie saine de l'armée, qui est encore plus forte qu'on ne pense, est prête à lui échapper; que les vétérans de la démocratie qui l'ont ramené de l'exil sapent déjà son pouvoir en feignant de le servir; et que le plus affidé de ses valets lui cache peut-être un assassin. Cette anxiété qui le tourmente, qui le dévore, qui suffirait à consommer sa ruine au défaut des hommes et de la Providence, se manifeste dans tous les actes de son gouvernement éphémère. Incertain dans ses plans, dans ses moyens, dans ses ressources, il promet, il place, il caresse, il menace; et, suivant la nature ou l'objet de ses alarmes, tantôt c'est un maître absolu qui fait tout fléchir sous ses caprices, tantôt c'est un démagogue furieux qui cherche à attiser les passions de la populace pour exciter en faveur du despotisme les séditions de la liberté. L'instabilité de sa dictature est si évidente à tous les yeux, que la cupidité craint d'y lier ses espérances, et que la bassesse elle-même hésite, pour la première fois, à se couvrir d'un opprobre de plus. Qu'on n'en doute pas! C'est à la conviction universelle dont je parle que nous avons été redevables de la modération timide et forcée de ses mesures; et le monde sait bien que Buonaparte ne pardonne point quand Buonaparte peut punir.

Les partisans de Buonaparte qui le servent pour lui se réduisent donc à un petit nombre d'hommes flétris, qu'il a compromis par de grands crimes, ou souillés par de grandes ignominies, et qui ne peuvent rattacher leur hideuse existence à aucun ordre de choses. C'est pour la conservation de la fortune et des priviléges de ces exécrables sicaires qu'on forcerait la nation à braver l'effort de l'Europe, et à prodiguer le sang de ses citoyens; et c'est au nom de la gloire qu'on oserait dévouer la patrie aux intérêts de quatre ou cinq misérables dont Sylla n'aurait pas voulu faire des bourreaux.

Buonaparte ne peut désormais abuser personne en France; car de tous les partis qui ont survécu à nos discordes civiles, le plus facile à tromper a déjà les yeux ouverts sur ses perfidies. Quelques-uns de ces hommes irritables, passionnés, et surtout crédules, parcequ'ils sont ordinairement généreux et sensibles; quelques-uns de ces hommes, dis-je, qui ont rêvé pendant vingt ans une République imaginaire, et qui ont poursuivi leurs illusions à travers tous les gouvernemens et toutes les anarchies, avaient senti leurs espérances se reveiller au cri imposant de la liberté que la valetaille de Buonaparte a fait retentir sur son passage. Ils oubliaient que Buonaparte est l'ennemi né de la libérté, l'assassin de la République, et le premier violateur de ces droits sacrés dont nous avons payé si cher la conquête; ils oubliaient que Buonaparte parlait aussi de liberté quand il détruisait la représentation nationale à St. Cloud; ils oubliaient que c'était au nom de la République Française que Buonaparte avoit établi le despotisme le plus insolent dont l'espèce humaine ait jamais supporté le joug; ils oubliaient que Buonaparte avoit entrepris d'étouffer tous les sentimens qui unissaient les citoyens à la patrie, d'éteindre toutes les lumières de la civilisation, de paralyser tous les moyens de l'enseignement; ils oubliaient que Buonaparte avait proscrit les idées libérales et philosophiques sous le nom d'idéologie; qu'il faisait consacrer les principes les plus destructeurs du despotisme dans des livres avoués par ses ministres; qu'il promettait la féodalité à ses sbirres, et qu'il donnait des peuples à ses satrapes; ils oubliaient que le ciel et l'enfer sont plus près de se rapprocher que les deux idées extrêmes de toute la série des idées humaines, Buonaparte et la liberté. Le brigand qui a volé à Louis XVIII. son trône pour quelques jours n'a pas même eu l'adresse perfide de vous tromper quelques jours encore: il n'a pas eu le talent funeste de vous ménager un regret.

Et vous, Soldats, vous avez des amis, des parens, une patrie, une mère peut-être, et vous ne les sacrifiez point à la fatale gloire d'un étranger qui n'est grand que par vos sacrifices, et dont la pourpre impériale s'est lentement teinte de votre sang. Vous êtes Français, soldats, et la trahison vous indigne. Une noble rougeur couvre vos fronts au nom d'Elchingen et de Labédoyère; j'ai vu de saintes larmes rouler dans vos yeux au souvenir du Roi. Vous justifierez l'armée Française devant l'histoire qui l'attend.

Disons en peu de mots quelle est la situation actuelle de la France entière à l'égard de Buonaparte:

Les Royalistes n'en voudront jamais.
Les Républicains n'en veulent plus.
L'Armée regrette d'en avoir voulu.
Les Buonapartistes n'osent avouer qu'ils en veulent.

Préfecture du Département de la Seine.

DÉCRET IMPÉRIAL, contenant différentes Dispositions tendant à réprimer les Manœuvres qui pourraient troubler la Tranquillité Publique.

Au Palais de l'Elysée, le 9 Mai, 1815.

NAPOLÉON, Empereur des Français,

Sur le rapport de notre Ministre de la Police Générale,

Notre Conseil d'Etat entendu,

Nous avons décrété et décrétons ce qui suit :

Art. 1. Tous les Français, autres que ceux compris dans l'article 2 de notre décret d'amnistie du 12 Mars dernier, qui se trouvent hors de France, au service ou auprès soit de Louis Stanislas Xavier, Comte de Lille, soit de Princes de sa maison, sont tenus de rentrer en France et de justifier de leur retour dans le délai d'un mois, conformément aux articles 7, 8, et 9 de notre décret du 6 Avril, 1809, à peine d'être poursuivis aux termes dudit décret.

2. Les officiers de police judiciaire, y compris les préfets et les maires, remettront à nos procureurs généraux ou impériaux l'état des noms, prénoms, qualités, et demeures des individus domiciliés dans leur ressort, et qu'ils croiront susceptibles de l'application de l'article précédent.

3. Nous enjoignons à nos procureurs généraux et impériaux de poursuivre, sans délai, les auteurs et complices de toutes relations et correspondances qui auraient lieu de l'intérieur de l'Empire avec le Comte de Lille, les Princes de sa maison, ou leurs agens, lorsque les dites relations ou correspondances auraient pour objet les complots ou manœuvres spécifiés dans l'article 77 du Code Pénal.

4. Toute personne convaincue d'avoir enlevé le drapeau tricolore placé sur le clocher d'une église ou tout autre monument public sera punie conformément à l'art. 257 du Code Pénal.

5. Les communes qui ne se seront point opposées à l'enlèvement du drapeau tricolore, fait par attroupement public, seront poursuivies en exécution de la loi du 10 Vendémiaire, an 4, relative à la responsabilité des communes.

6. Toute personne convaincue d'avoir porté un signe de ralliement autre que la cocarde nationale sera punie d'une année d'emprisonnement, conformément à l'article 9 de la loi du 27 Germinal, an 4, sans préjudice des peines portées par l'art. 91 du Code Pénal, dans les cas prévus par cet article.

7. Les préfets feront réimprimer et afficher le chapitre 1 du titre 1, livre 3, du Code Pénal.

Il en sera de mêmes des §§ 2 et 3 de la section 3 du chapitre 3 des mêmes titre et livre.

8. Notre cousin le Prince Archichancelier de l'Empire, chargé du portefeuille du Ministère de la Justice, et notre Ministre de la Police Générale, sont chargés, chacun en ce qui le concerne, de l'exécution du présent décret, qui sera inséré au bulletin des lois.

(Signé) NAPOLÉON.

CODE PÉNAL.

Livre III.—Des Crimes, des Délits, et de leur Punition.

Titre Premier—Crimes et Délits contre la Chose Publique.

Chapitre Premier—Crimes et Délits contre la Sûreté de l'Etat.

SECTION I. Des Crimes et Délits contre la Sûreté Extérieure de l'Etat.

Art. 75. Tout Français qui aura porté les armes contre la France sera puni de mort; ses biens seront confisqués.

76. Quiconque aura pratiqué des machinations ou entretenu des intelligences avec les Puissances étrangères ou leurs agens, pour les engager à commettre des hostilités ou entreprendre la guerre contre la France, ou pour leur en procurer les moyens, sera puni de mort, et ses biens seront confisqués.

Cette disposition aura lieu dans le cas même où les dites machinations ou intelligences n'auraient pas été suivies d'hostilités.

77. Sera également puni de mort et de la confiscation de ses biens quiconque aura pratiqué des manœuvres ou entretenu des intelligences avec les ennemis de l'Etat, à l'effet de faciliter leur entrée sur le territoire ou dépendances de l'Empire Français, ou de leur livrer des villes, forteresses, places, postes, ports, magasins, arsenaux, vaisseaux, ou bâtimens appartenant à la France, ou de fournir aux ennemis des secours en soldats, hommes, argent, vivres, armes, ou munitions, ou de seconder les progrès de leurs armes sur les possessions ou contre les forces Françaises de terre ou de mer, soit en ébranlant la fidélité des officiers, soldats, matelots, ou autres, envers l'Empereur et l'Etat, soit de toute autre manière.

78. Si la correspondance avec les sujets d'une Puissance ennemie, sans avoir pour objet l'un des crimes énoncés en l'article précédent, a néanmoins eu pour résultat de fournir aux ennemis des instructions nuisibles à la situation militaire ou politique de la France ou de ses alliés, ceux qui auront entretenu cette correspondance seront punis du bannissement, sans préjudice de plus fortes peines dans le cas où ces instructions auraient été la suite d'un concert constituant un fait d'espionnage.

79. Les peines exprimées aux articles 76 et 77 seront les mêmes, soit que les machinations ou manœuvres énoncées en ces articles aient été commises envers la France, soit qu'elle l'ait été envers les alliés de la France, agissant contre l'ennemi commun.

80. Sera puni des peines exprimées dans l'article 76 tout fonctionnaire public, tout agent du gouvernement, ou toute autre personne qui, chargée ou instruite officiellement ou à raison de son état du secret d'une négociation ou d'une expédition, l'aura livré aux agens d'une Puissance étrangère ou de l'ennemi.

81. Tout fonctionnaire public, tout agent, tout préposé du gouvernement chargé, à raison de ses fonctions, du dépôt des plans de fortifications, arsenaux, ports, ou rades, qui aura livré ces plans ou l'un de ces plans à l'ennemi ou aux agens de l'ennemi, sera puni de mort, et ses biens seront confisqués.

Il sera puni de bannissement s'il a livré ses plans aux agens d'une Puissance étrangère, neutre ou alliée.

82. Toute autre personne qui, étant parvenue, par corruption, fraude, ou violence, à soustraire lesdits plans, les aura livrés ou à l'ennemi ou aux agens d'une Puissance étrangère, sera punie comme le fonctionnaire ou agent mentionné dans l'article précédent, et selon les distinctions qui y sont établies.

Si les plans se trouvaient, sans le préalable emploi de mauvaises voies, entre les mains de la personne qui les a livrés, la peine sera, au premier cas mentionné dans l'article 181, la déportation;

Et au second cas du même article, un emprisonnement de deux à cinq ans.

83. Quiconque aura récélé ou fait récéler les espions ou les soldats ennemis envoyés à la découverte, et qu'il aura connus pour tels, sera condamné à la peine de mort.

84. Quiconque aura, par des actions hostiles, non approuvées par le gouvernement, exposé l'Etat à une déclaration de guerre, sera puni du bannissement, et, si la guerre s'en est suivie, de la déportation.

85. Quiconque aura, par des actes non approuvés par le gouvernement, exposé des Français à éprouver des représailles, sera puni du bannissement.

SECTION II. Des Crimes contre la Sûreté Intérieure de l'Etat.

§ 1. Des Attentats et Complots dirigés contre l'Empereur et sa Famille.

86. L'attentat ou le complot contre la vie ou contre la personne de l'Empereur est crime de lèse majesté : ce crime est puni comme parricide, et emporte de plus la confiscation des biens.

87. L'attentat ou le complot contre la vie ou la personne des membres de la famille Impériale.

L'attentat ou le complot dont le but sera—

Soit de détruire ou de changer le gouvernement ou l'ordre de successibilité au trône ;

Soit d'exciter les citoyens ou habitans à s'armer contre l'autorité Impériale ;

Seront punis de la peine de mort et de la confiscation des biens.

88. Il y a attentat dès qu'un acte est commis ou commencé pour parvenir à l'exécution de ces crimes, quoiqu'ils n'aient pas été consommés.

89. Il y a complot dès que la résolution d'agir est concertée et arrêtée entre deux conspirateurs ou un plus grand nombre, quoiqu'il n'y ait pas eu d'attentat.

90. S'il n'y a pas eu de complot arrêté, mais une proposition faite et non agréée d'en former un pour arriver au crime mentionné dans l'art. 86, celui qui aura fait une telle proposition sera puni de la réclusion.

L'auteur de toute proposition non agréée tendant à l'un des crimes énoncés dans l'art. 87 sera puni du bannissement.

§ 2. Des Crimes tendant à troubler l'Etat par la Guerre Civile, l'illégal Emploi de la Force armée, la Dévastation, et le Pillage public.

91. L'attentat ou le complot dont le but sera, soit d'exciter la guerre civile en armant ou en portant les citoyens ou habitans à s'armer les uns contre les autres, soit de porter la dévastation, le massacre, le pillage dans une ou plusieurs communes, seront punis de la peine de mort, et les biens de ces coupables seront confisqués.

92. Seront punis de mort et de la confiscation de leurs biens ceux qui auront levé ou fait lever des troupes armées, engagé ou enrôlé, fait engager ou enrôler des soldats, ou leur auront fourni ou procuré des armes ou munitions, sans ordre ou autorisation du pouvoir légitime.

93. Ceux qui, sans droit ou motif légitime, auront pris le commandement d'un corps d'armée, d'une troupe, d'une flotte, d'une escadre, d'un bâtiment de guerre, d'une place forte, d'un poste, d'un port, d'une ville ;

Ceux qui auront retenu, contre l'ordre du gouvernement, un commandement militaire quelconque ;

Les commandans qui auront tenu leur armée ou troupe rassemblée après que le licenciement ou la séparation en auront été ordonnés ;

Seront punis de la peine de mort, et leurs biens seront confisqués.

94. Toute personne qui, pouvant disposer de la force publique, en aura requis ou ordonné, fait requérir ou ordonner, l'action ou l'emploi contre la levée des gens de guerre légalement établie, sera punie de la déportation.

Si cette réquisition ou cet ordre ont été suivis de leur effet, le coupable sera puni de mort, et ses biens seront confisqués.

95. Tout individu qui aura incendié ou détruit, par l'explosion d'une mine, des édifices, magasins, arsenaux, vaisseaux, ou autres propriétés appartenant à l'Etat, sera puni de mort, et ses biens seront confisqués.

96. Quiconque, soit pour envahir des domaines, propriétés ou deniers publics, places, villes, forteresses, postes, magasins, arsenaux, ports, vaisseaux, ou bâtimens appartenans à l'Etat, soit pour piller ou partager des propriétés publiques ou nationales, ou celles d'une généralité de citoyens, soit enfin pour faire attaque ou résistance envers la force publique agissant contre les auteurs de ces crimes, se sera mise à la tête des bandes armées, ou y aura exercé une fonction ou commandement quelconque, sera puni de mort, et ses biens seront confisqués.

Les mêmes peines seront appliquées à ceux qui auront dirigé l'association, lever ou fait lever, organisé ou fait organiser les bandes, ou leur auront, sciemment et volontairement, fourni ou procuré des armes, munitions, et instrumens de crimes, ou envoyé des convois de subsistances, ou qui auront de toute autre manière pratiqué des intelligences avec les directeurs ou commandans des bandes.

97. Dans le cas où plusieurs des crimes mentionnées aux articles 86, 87, et 91 auront été exécutés ou simplement tentés par une bande, la peine de mort avec confiscation des biens sera appliquée, sans distinction de grades, à tous les individus faisant partie de la bande, et qui auront été saisis sur le lieu de la réunion séditieuse.

Sera puni des mêmes peines, quoique non saisi sur le lieu, quiconque aura dirigé la sédition, ou aura exercé dans la bande un emploi ou commandement quelconque.

98. Hors le cas où la réunion séditieuse aurait eu pour objet ou résultat l'un ou plusieurs des crimes énoncés aux articles 86, 87, et 91, les individus faisant partie des bandes dont il est parlé ci-dessus, sans y exercer aucun commandement ni emploi, et qui auront été saisis sur les lieux, seront punis de la déportation.

99. Ceux qui, connaissant le but et le caractère des dites bandes, leur auront, sans contrainte, fourni des logemens, lieux de retraite ou de réunion, seront condamnés à la peine des travaux forcés à temps.

100. Il ne sera prononcé aucune peine, pour le fait de sédition, contre ceux qui, ayant fait partie de ces bandes sans y exercer aucun commandement, et sans y remplir aucun emploi ni fonction, se sont retirés au premier avertissement des autorités civiles ou militaires, ou même depuis, lorsqu'ils n'auront été saisis que hors des lieux de la réunion séditieuse, sans opposer de résistance et sans armes.

Ils ne seront punis, dans ces cas, que des crimes particuliers qu'ils auraient personnellement commis; et néanmoins ils pourront être renvoyés pour cinq ans, ou au plus jusqu'à dix, sous la surveillance spéciale de la haute police.

101. Sont compris dans le mot armes toutes machines, tous instrumens ou ustensiles tranchans, perçans, ou contondans.

Les couteaux et ciseaux de poche, les cannes simples, ne seront réputés armes qu'autant qu'il en aura été fait usage pour tuer, blesser, ou frapper.

Disposition commune aux Deux Paragraphes de la présente Section.

102. Seront punis, comme coupables des crimes et complots mentionnés dans la présente section, tous ceux qui, soit par discours tenus dans des lieux ou réunions publics, soit par placards affichés, soit par des écrits imprimés, auront excité directement les citoyens ou habitans à les commettre.

Néanmoins, dans le cas où lesdites provocations n'auraient été suivies d'aucun effet, leurs auteurs seront simplement punis du bannissement.

SECTION III. De la Révélation et de la non-Révélation des Crimes qui compromettent la Sûreté Intérieure ou Extérieure de l'Etat.

103. Toutes personnes qui, ayant eu connaissance de complots formés ou de crimes projétés contre la sûreté intérieure ou extérieure de l'Etat, n'auront pas fait la déclaration de ces complots ou crimes, et n'auront pas révélé au gouvernement, ou aux autorités administratives, ou de police judiciaire, les circonstances qui en seront venues à leur connaissance, le tout dans les vingt-quatre heures qui auront suivi ladite connaissance, seront, lors même qu'elles seraient reconnues exemptes de toute complicité, punies, pour le seul fait de non-révélation, de la manière et selon les distinctions qui suivent:

104. S'il s'agit du crime de lèse-majesté, tout individu qui, au cas de l'article précédent, n'aura point fait les déclarations qui y sont prescrites, sera puni de la réclusion.

105. A l'égard des autres crimes ou complots mentionnés au présent chapitre, toute personne qui, en étant instruite, n'aura pas fait les déclarations prescrites par l'article 103, sera punie d'un emprisonnement de 2 à 5 ans, et d'une amende de 500 fr. à 2000 fr.

106. Celui qui aura eu connaissance des dits crimes ou complots non révélés ne sera point admis à excuse sur le fondement qu'il ne les aurait point approuvés, ou même qu'il s'y serait opposé, et aurait cherché à en dissuader leurs auteurs.

107. Néanmoins, si l'auteur du complot ou crime est époux, même divorcé, ascendant ou descendant, frère ou sœur, ou allié aux mêmes degrés, de la personne prévenue de réticence, celle-ci ne sera point sujette aux peines portées par les articles précédens; mais elle pourra être mise, par l'arrêt ou le jugement, sous la surveillance spéciale de la haute police pendant un temps qui n'excédera point dix ans.

108. Seront exemptés de peines prononcées contre les auteurs de complots ou d'autres crimes attentatoires à la sûreté intérieure ou extérieure de l'Etat, ceux des coupables qui, avant toute exécution ou tentative de ces complots ou de ces crimes, et avant toutes poursuites commencées, auront les premiers donné aux autorités mentionnées en l'article 108 connaissance de ces complots ou crimes et de leurs auteurs ou complices, ou qui, même depuis le commencement des poursuites, auront procuré l'arrestation des dits auteurs ou complices.

Les coupables qui auront donné ces connaissances ou procuré ces arrestations pourront néanmoins être condamnés à rester pour la vie ou à temps sous la surveillance spéciale de la haute police.

Chapitre III.—Crimes et Délits contre la Paix Publique.

SECTION III. Des Troubles apportés à l'Ordre Public par les Ministres des Cultes dans l'Exercice de leur Ministère.

§ 2. Des Critiques, Censures, ou Provocations dirigées contre l'Autorité Publique dans un Discours Pastoral prononcé publiquement.

201. Les Ministres des cultes qui prononceront, dans l'exercice de leur ministère et en assemblée publique, un discours contenant la critique ou censure du gouvernement, d'une loi, d'un décret impérial, ou de tout autre acte de l'autorité publique, seront punis d'un emprisonnement de trois mois à deux ans.

202. Si le discours contient une provocation directe à la désobéissance aux lois ou autres actes de l'autorité publique, ou s'il tend à soulever ou armer une partie des citoyens contre les autres, le ministre du culte qui l'aura prononcé sera puni d'un emprisonnement de deux à cinq ans si la provocation n'a été suivie d'aucun effet, et du bannissement si elle a donné lieu à désobéissance, autre toutefois que celle qui aurait dégénéré en sédition ou révolte.

203. Lorsque la provocation aura été suivie d'une sédition ou révolte dont la nature donnera lieu contre l'un ou plusieurs des coupables à une plus forte peine que celle du bannissement, cette peine, quelle qu'elle soit, sera appliquée au ministre coupable de la provocation.

§ 3. Des Critiques, Censures, ou Provocations dirigées contre l'Autorité Publique dans un Ecrit Pastoral.

204. Tout écrit contenant des instructions pastorales, en quelque forme que ce soit, et dans lequel un ministre de culte se sera ingéré de critiquer ou censurer, soit le gouvernement, soit tout acte de l'autorité publique, emportera la peine du bannissement contre le ministre qui l'aura publié.

205. Si l'écrit mentionné en l'article précédent contient une provocation directe à la désobéissance aux lois ou autres actes de l'autorité publique, ou s'il tend à soulever ou armer une partie des citoyens contre les autres, le ministre qui l'aura publié sera puni de la déportation.

206. Lorsque la provocation contenue dans l'écrit pastoral aura été suivie d'une sédition ou révolte dont la nature donnera lieu contre l'un ou plusieurs des coupables à une peine plus forte que celle de la déportation, cette peine, quelle qu'elle soit, sera appliquée au ministre coupable de la provocation.

RAPPORT à Son Excellence Monseigneur le Feld-Maréchal Duc de WELLINGTON, Général en Chef des Armées Alliées dans le Nord, etc.

Composition de l'Armée Française.

L'armée Française, telle qu'elle s'est trouvée au 20 Mai, malgré les efforts immenses et les moyens les plus raffinés pour l'augmenter, ne comptait que 250,000 combattans, qui s'étendaient sur une ligne à partir de Chambéry jusqu'à Dunkerque. Cette armée forme dix divisions ou corps d'armée, dont trois n'étaient point encore complétés.

Le 1er est commandé par le Général Comte d'Erlon, qui a transféré son quartier-général de Lille à Valenciennes.

Le 2e, sous les ordres du Général Comte Reille, a établi son quartier-général à Avesnes.

Le 3e est commandé par le Général Sébastiani, qui a établi son quartier-général à Mézières. Ce dernier corps n'est pas encore complété, mais il reçoit journellement des renforts qui lui arrivent de Paris.

Ces trois corps d'armée comptent 80,000 hommes effectifs, pourvus de l'artillerie et de tous les équipages nécessaires, que les moyens extraordinaires employés par Buonaparte, ainsi qu'il sera dit plus bas, ont su procurer en si peu de tems. Il faut remarquer que les forces numériques de ces trois corps ainsi que celles des autres corps augmentent tous les jours; attendu que les régimens sous les Bourbons ne formaient que deux bataillons, et qu'on s'occupe dans ce moment à en former trois autres, dont cependant on n'a pu encore réussir à compléter que le 3e.

Le 4e corps d'armée est sous les ordres du Général Gérard, qui a son quartier-général à Metz. Ce corps, étant maintenant en ligne, s'appelle Armée de la Moselle; elle est en avant de Thionville et de Longwy, et se lie avec l'Armée du Rhin, par Bitche. Les Lieutenans-Généraux Lanusse, Pescheux, Wichery, de Bourmont, Morin, et Jacquinot sont employés à cette armée.

Le 5e est commandé par le Général Rapp, dont le quartier-général est à Strasbourg. Le Général Sémélé est gouverneur de la ville et de la citadelle de cette ville.

Le 6e est à Paris, sous les ordres du Général Lobau. Les forces numériques de ce corps varient suivant que Buonaparte en détache un ou plusieurs régimens vers le point qu'il veut renforcer.

Le 7e est à Béfort, et s'étend jusqu'à Huningue. Il est commandé par le Général Lecourbe, qui a sous ses ordres cinq Lieutenans-Généraux, parmi lesquels les Généraux Abbé, Castex, et Marulaz. D'autres divisions de réserve se réunissent à Vésoul et à Bésançon, et se lient à un camp qui va s'établir au fort l'Ecluse, et forme la gauche de l'Armée des Alpes. Le Général Chouard est gouverneur de Huningue.

Le 8e corps se forme avec promptitude, sous les ordres du Maréchal Suchet, qui a établi son quartier-général à Chambéry. Cette armée est évaluée à 25,000 hommes, mais elle n'a effectivement que 16,000.

Le 9e a également commencé à se former à Antibes, sous les ordres du Maréchal Brune.

Le 10e, enfin, est encore sur le papier; il doit se former à Perpignan, et sera, dit-on, commandé par le Général Decaen, sous la dénomination d'Armée des Pyrénées. Ce général est actuellement à Paris, sans aucune destination, ainsi que les Maréchaux Masséna, Grouchy, Moncey, Ney, et Lauriston.

Cette armée de 250,000 hommes, d'après le calcul le plus rigoureux, n'avait pas plus de 25,000 à 27,000 hommes de cavalerie; et c'est là que tous les efforts de Buonaparte ont échoué jusqu'à présent, ce qui prouve combien en France il est difficile de former une cavalerie. Il faut remarquer que les garnisons que le gouvernement est obligé de tenir à Marseille, Bordeaux, Lyon, etc., sont comprises dans le nombre de la grande armée.

La Garde Impériale, qui est déjà forte de près de 20,000 hommes, sera portée à 35,000. Il n'était pas difficile de l'augmenter aussi promptement, vu que tous les anciens gardes sont rentrés, et que la jeune Garde a été formée des fractions qu'on a tirées dans toute l'armée, en levant vingt hommes de choix dans chaque compagnie. Voici les noms des différens commandans de la Garde Impériale: Le Général Drouot, Aide-Major-Général de la Garde; le Général Friant commande les grenadiers à pied; le Général Morand les chasseurs à pied de la Vieille Garde; le Général Guyot les grenadiers à cheval; le Général Ornano les Dragons; le Général Colbert les Lanciers; le Général Lefebvre

Desnouettes les chasseurs à cheval. Le Colonel Deschamps commande l'artillerie légère, qui doit être composée de 80 pièces. Les Polonais sont commandés par le Général Germanowsky, qui était à l'Ile d'Elbe.

L'artillerie, dont l'armée Française manquait il y a deux mois, est plus que suffisante; et j'ai été assuré par un officier général qui a parcouru la ligne du Rhin, que sur cette partie seulement il y avait plus de mille pièces de canon. D'ailleurs, on a désarmé presque tous les vaisseaux de guerre, dont les canons doivent servir à armer les divers ouvrages de fortification que l'on construit sur les différens points, ainsi que ceux qu'on fait pour la défense de la capitale.

Le même coup électrique qui a donné impulsion à toutes les réproductions de forces a opéré aussi dans les divers ateliers de la France, qui fournissent actuellement 48,000 fusils par mois, et non pas 10,000 par jour, comme les journaux Français se plaisent à le dire. Il y a en France quatre manufactures d'armes actuellement en activité, qui ne fournissent que 30,000 fusils par mois. On a établi à Paris quatre ateliers qui en confectionnent 18,000 par mois. D'ailleurs, les paysans qui avaient été armés en 1814, dans les différens départemens, ont été obligés de rendre leurs fusils, dont le nombre monte à plusieurs milliers.

Le gouvernement a trouvé aussi le moyen de compléter son train d'artillerie et d'équipage. Il a fait à cet égard à peu près comme il en avait fait des chevaux de la gendarmerie. Chaque maître de poste, dans toute l'étendue de la France, a été obligé de fournir deux de ses meilleurs chevaux et un postillon, ce qui a produit à Buonaparte par un seul trait de plume 3000 chevaux et 1500 postillons pour les conduire. Ce nombre n'étant pas suffisant, il fait maintenant une réquisition des chevaux de luxe, ce qui lui donnera encore plusieurs milliers de chevaux. Tout ceci s'exécute sans décret, sans aucune loi préalable; les préfets reçoivent les ordres nécessaires, et les mettent à exécution avant qu'on se doute seulement à Paris de ce qui se passe dans les départemens, où l'on exerce toutes sortes de vexations pour complaire au maitre; et comme le taux à prélever sur les chevaux n'est pas déterminé, il y a des propriétaires auxquels on a pris deux chevaux sur cinq qu'ils avaient. Buonaparte ménage beaucoup les Parisiens; jusqu'à présent ils ignorent qu'il existe un emprunt forcé; mais probablement la foudre qu'il réserve pour eux ne tardera pas à les frapper, comme elle a déjà frappé toute la France.

Forces Auxiliaires de l'Armée Régulière.

Le gouvernement de Buonaparte ne voulant pas introduire ostensiblement la conscription, a adopté un autre système, qui est encore plus funeste à la population. Il a commencé d'abord par appeler les Gardes Nationales dans toute la France, qui dans l'origine ne devaient que défendre le territoire de leurs départemens, ce que l'on fait marcher maintenant dans une direction quelconque suivant le bon plaisir de Buonaparte. Depuis l'âge de 18 jusqu'à 40 ans tout homme, marié ou non, fait partie de la garde nationale mobile, qu'on exerce tous les jours aux maniemens des armes. Tous les militaires retirés ou pensionnés, officiers, sous-officiers, et soldats qui se trouvent inhabiles pour l'armée régulière, ont été appelés pour l'instruction et le commandement de ces Gardes Nationales. Ceux-ci les électrisent tant qu'ils peuvent; et il faut dire que dans l'Alsace, la Lorraine, la Franche Comté, le Dauphiné, et dans le département de l'Aisne, les gardes nationales rivalisent de zèle et de dévouement avec les troupes de ligne. Comme Buonaparte n'a point une armée suffisante pour opposer à ses adversaires, il a pris la détermination de confier la garde et la défense des places fortes aux gardes nationales, sur la fidélité desquelles il croit pouvoir compter; de sorte qu'il épargne à son armée active près de 100,000 hommes qu'il serait autrement obligé de laisser dans les dix-huit places fortes de la France. Mais comme il connait le mauvais esprit des habitans de plusieurs places frontières, il a fait remplacer les gardes nationales de ces villes par d'autres des départemens éloignés. C'est ainsi que, se méfiant de la garde nationale de Lille et de Valenciennes, il l'a remplacée par celle des départemens de l'Aisne et de la Somme. On en fait de même sur cette frontière : la garde nationale du département de Jura est en marche pour Béfort. Langres en fourmille, ainsi que Huningue. Enfin, j'ai remarqué que depuis Lille jusqu'à Huningue les troupes de ligne étaient déjà concentrées sur l'extrême frontière, et que les places fortes se trouvaient exclusivement entre les mains de la garde nationale, commandée par des officiers de ligne entièrement dévoués à Buonaparte.

Il faut ajouter à cette masse d'hommes, déjà armés en grande partie, 50 bataillons que le département de la Marine met à la disposition de celui de la Guerre. Chaque bataillon est composé de 770 hommes, et commandé par des officiers de cette arme. Cette masse est destinée à défendre les différens ouvrages de fortification qu'on fait dans la capitale et ceux que l'on construie dans les passages des Vosges, qui se garnissent déjà de retranchemens.

Enfin, pour ne rien oublier de tout ce qui peut augmenter ses forces, Buonaparte a fait partir pour l'armée les gardes royaux qui s'étaient formés dans quelques départemens dans les derniers moments du gouvernement de Louis XVIII. Il leur a pris d'abord leurs armes et leurs chevaux, et les a envoyés à l'armée, pour être répartis dans différens régimens. Il a fait payer en même tems les souscriptions qui avaient été faites pour subvenir aux dépenses extraordinaires de Louis XVIII. à l'occasion des préparatifs de résistance contre Buonaparte. La seule ville de Toulouse avait offert au Roi 130,000 francs, qu'elle est forcée actuellement de verser dans les coffres de Buonaparte.

Pour se donner un nouvel appui d'une nature extraordinaire, Buonaparte a imaginé, à la surprise de tout le monde, d'armer les habitans des faubourgs St. Marceau et St. Antoine. Cette vile populace, la lie de toute la populace de Paris, a défilé, le 14, devant Buonaparte aux Tuileries, aux cris bruyans de " Vive l'Empereur! Vive la liberté! " Ses amis les plus chauds ne peuvent pas l'excuser d'avoir eu recours à cet expédient aussi méprisable que dangereux. On se demande, est-ce pour inspirer de la terreur à la garde nationale Parisienne, dont l'esprit est toujours le même, c'est-à-dire, qu'il ne faut nullement compter sur son secours? Est-ce pour forcer cette garde, déjà assez mal disposée, à se battre à l'approche du danger? Ou enfin, est-ce pour mettre la capitale en feu et flamme, si elle est attaquée? Mais quoi qu'il en soit de ces hypothèses, on est généralement persuadé que cette mesure annonce quelque chose de sinistre, et le public témoin de cette scène, digne du tems de sans culotisme, a marqué son indignation par le silence profond qu'il a gardé au milieu des cris et des chansons révolutionnaires de ces forcenés, qui ont, en cette occasion, parfaitement rappelé le tableau des scènes produites par l'effervescence populaire dans les premières époques de la Révolution.

Buonaparte a dû être instruit par la police du mauvais effet qu'a produit sur le public cette mesure détestable d'armer des hommes qui n'ont rien à perdre et tout à gagner. Il a dû voir l'indignation de sa propre Garde, qui a fait là-dessus des commentaires en des termes peu mesurés. Cependant, il vient d'autoriser une pareille confédération des autres faubourgs, et ces nouveaux confédérés devaient incessamment défiler comme les premiers devant leur digne chef. 50,000 fusils sont déjà préparés pour armer ces défenseurs des propriétés. C'est le Général Darricau qui les commandera; il aura sous ses ordres 6 maréchaux de camp, 12 colonels, et 24 lieutenans-colonels, qui tous doivent s'établir dans les différens faubourgs au milieu de ces braves, afin de les former à l'exercice sous la surveillance et la direction de mille officiers en demi-solde, qui ont déjà pris logement parmi leurs nouveaux camarades. Ainsi Paris dans la dernière consternation se voit entouré d'hommes dont il s'attend plutôt à être pillé qu'à être défendu. Ces confédérations se renouvellent aussi dans les départemens; et il y a bien des personnes qui croient que c'est par elles que la chute de Buonaparte sera achevée, s'il n'a pas de succès à l'armée. On va encore plus loin, et l'on croit apercevoir au travers de ces mesures excentriques une mystification dont l'objet est Buonaparte lui-même. Et en effet lorsque l'on considère le caractère altier de Buonaparte, qui a dans tous les tems cherché plus que tout autre Souverain à s'entourer des dehors de la majesté royale, on est forcé de convenir que le projet d'armer une populace qui a joué un rôle si sanguinaire dans le cours de la Révolution n'a pu sortir de son cerveau, mais que plutôt c'est l'ouvrage des Républicains qui préparent d'avance leurs batteries pour renverser le colosse aussitôt que l'occasion s'y présentera. De l'autre côté, si l'on doit ajouter foi aux bruits qui acquièrent tous les jours de la consistance, le parti le plus fort aujourd'hui (j'en excepte l'armée) est celui des Républicains, qui ont à leur tête des hommes tels que Fouché, Carnot, Lucien Buonaparte, et tant d'autres, dont l'opinion bien prononcée est plus que connue. Et comment oserait-on écrire contre Buonaparte des choses qui doivent le terrasser même dans l'opinion de ses partisans, si Fouché et Carnot, chargés de la surveillance de l'imprimerie, ne favorisaient pas ces publications pour atteindre leur but?* Comment le croire dans un moment où Buonaparte rend un décret qui frappe de terreur même les plus innocens? Ce décret, dont j'ai l'honneur d'y joindre un exemplaire, porte la date du 9 Mai, mais il n'a été affiché que le 19 Mai, par un motif que l'on devine aisément. Comme Buonaparte savait que la publication de ce décret montrerait à l'Europe la crainte dont il est entouré, il en a prohibé l'insertion dans les journaux. Des personnes bien instruites prétendent que les Républicains, pour se déclarer, n'attendent que le départ de Buonaparte pour l'armée et le commencement des hostilités, ainsi que la dernière déclaration des Puissances Alliées, lancée contre la personne de Buonaparte. En attendant, ils ont formé à Paris une société, sous le titre de "Amis Libres de la Patrie et de l'Humanité," et en ont nommé Carnot président.

Esprit Public dans l'Intérieur.—Esprit dans l'Armée.

Avec des mesures telles que Buonaparte se permet aussi arbitrairement, il est facile de concevoir qu'un Français qui aime son pays doit nécessairement détester ce fléau des nations. Les emprunts forcés, l'enlèvement des chevaux et des bestiaux et surtout des hommes nécessaires à la culture des terres, font une profonde et triste impression sur les habitans de toutes les classes; ils en gémissent, mais les baïonnettes les contiennent en respect. Il y a cependant de ces hommes infatués qui croient que sans Buonaparte il n'y a pas de salut pour la France; que lui seul peut désormais empêcher que ce pays ne soit pas partagé; et le gouvernement actuel emploie tous les moyens pour persuader au peuple que les Puissances Alliées viennent pour conquérir et partager la France. Au milieu de ces fluctuations des esprits et des opinions, la France n'est pas aussi tranquille que le gouvernement voudrait faire accroire au-dehors: à l'exception des départemens mentionnés plus haut, le reste de la population montre des symptômes de mécontentement, et même de rebellion. Au-delà de Lyon, depuis Marseille jusqu'à Perpignan, les habitans sont évidemment prononcés contre Buonaparte. Aussi n'ose-t-il pas dégarnir ces pays de troupes. On voulut dernièrement tenter de désarmer les Marseillais; mais ceux-ci s'y sont opposés. La fermentation, cependant, y continue toujours, et les théâtres y étaient fermés depuis plusieurs jours. Le même esprit règne dans le Languedoc, la Normandie, la Bretagne, et la Picardie. Dans la Vendée, plusieurs bandes armées attaquent les diligences, qui ne vont plus qu'escortées par la gendarmerie, laquelle à son tour est souvent attaquée et battue. Une de ces bandes a eu la hardiesse d'enlever les caisses publiques dans la ville de Chollet, en plein jour. Aussi bien le général commandant à Rennes a été obligé de former des colonnes mobiles qui parcourent les districts les plus rebelles. Les arrestations se succèdent, se multiplient à Marseille, Nîmes, Bordeaux, Lyon, et Paris : enfin, c'est le règne de la terreur.

* Ci-joint une échantillon de ces publications.

Dans la Picardie on voit les mêmes symptômes de mécontentement. La garde nationale d'Amiens a fait une adresse à toutes les gardes nationales de France, dans laquelle elle les invitait à ne pas sortir des limites de leurs départemens; mais le gouvernement a arrêté à tems la publicité de cette adresse, et en a puni les auteurs.

Dans la capitale, quoique Buonaparte paraisse vouloir la ménager, la consternation est à son point. Les personnes qui ont des propriétés ou des parens dans les départemens quittent cette ville, devenue le siége et le foyer des mesures les plus violentes, et qui peut-être est réservée à éprouver toutes les horreurs de la guerre. Les ouvrages de défense qu'on y fait sont vraiement formidables ; des boulevards, des retranchemens, des batteries s'élèvent de tous côtés. Les canons enlevés de dessus le bord des vaisseaux de guerre doivent les garnir, ou plutôt les hérisser. Outre un grand nombre d'ouvriers, la Garde Impériale fournit 500 hommes tous les jours pour les travaux, et bientôt les citoyens doivent être requis, par quartier, pour y travailler, surtout si le danger approche. Les mêmes mesures de défense sont adoptées à Langres, à Béfort, à Huningue, et dans les passages des Vosges ; mais les ouvrages ne sont encore que commencés. J'ai rencontré en route des canons tout nouvellement fondus à Strasbourg, qu'on transportait à Langres. Cette place, par sa situation même, est susceptible de la meilleure défense.

Au milieu de tous ces préparatifs poussés avec la plus grande vigueur, comme les Puissances Alliées laissent à Buonaparte tout le tems de se mettre en mesure, celui-ci ne manque pas d'insinuer au peuple Français que les avis dans les Conseils des Souverains sont partagés sur la nécessité de lui faire la guerre; que la Russie a fait retrograder une partie de ses troupes à cause de la Pologne et de la Turquie, qui lui donnaient des vives inquiétudes; que l'Autriche était sur le point de se retirer de la coalition, or qu'elle a déclaré sa neutralité. Tous ces mensonges servent parfaitement les vues de Buonaparte, puisqu'ils entretiennent le bon esprit dans ses troupes, et soutiennent l'espoir de ses partisans. Mais le plus grand triomphe auquel s'attend Buonaparte est celui qui doit résulter de la convocation du Champ de Mai. Cette assemblée des représentans de la nation, quoiqu'illégitimément et irrégulièrement convoquée, doit lui fournir le dernier appui pour étayer son pouvoir. Ce sera le lendemain, dit-on, de la tenue du Champ de Mai qu'il doit publier une déclaration aux Puissances Alliées, et les sommer de se retirer des frontières. C'est aussi pour cette époque qu'on fixe le moment de son attaque sur toute la ligne, afin de porter un coup décisif avant l'arrivée de l'armée Russe. Voilà quant à l'esprit dans l'intérieur : je vais maintenant tracer l'esprit de l'armée.

Pour donner une juste idée de l'esprit, de l'unanimité, et de l'enthousiasme de l'armée de Buonaparte, je n'ai besoin que de tirer un parallèle entre les époques de 1792 et la présente année, et encore la balance sera en faveur de Buonaparte ; car aujourd'hui ce n'est plus un enthousiasme, mais une frénésie, qui se manifeste dans les troupes. Comme elles n'ont rien à espérer après la chute de leur chef, leur cause est inséparable de celle de ce général. Aussi, je ne dois pas dissimuler à votre Excellence, quoi qu'en disent les Bourbonistes, que la lutte sera sanglante et contestée à l'outrance; et je remplirais mal mon devoir envers votre Excellence si je ne lui rappelais pas combien sont fausses les insinuations que les émigrés tâchent sans doute de faire auprès des Puissances Alliées, en voulant leur persuader que la moitié de la France et une partie de l'armée sont pour les Bourbons. Je dois répéter ici d'après la conviction que j'en ai, que les partisans de la famille des Bourbons en France sont d'un si petit nombre que si ces Princes en attendent leur salut, j'en désespère d'avance. Oui, il y a des mécontens; car on peut compter dans ce nombre presque la totalité des Français; mais c'est la présence de Buonaparte, la crainte qu'il inspire, les guerres qu'on a continuellement en perspective sous lui, c'est enfin la terreur qu'il répand autour de lui, qui font désirer un changement quelconque; mais la France est bien loin de vouloir rappeler de son gré la famille des Bourbons. Qu'on l'érige en république; qu'on lui donne le Duc d'Orléans pour Roi constitutionnel, tout lui sera préférable au retour des Bourbons.

Je dois ajouter en dernière analyse que l'édifice que Buonaparte a érigé depuis son retour pour soutenir son pouvoir repose sur un fondement bien faible, si l'on applique les instrumens propres à le renverser; et la réussite sera facile si les Puissances Alliées n'insistent pas sur le replacement des Bourbons sur le trône de France, et si elles déclarent solennellement, en en appelant à la nation, qu'elles ne veulent nullement s'immiscer dans le choix de son gouvernement, mais qu'elles exigent absolument l'éloignement ou l'extradition de l'homme qui s'est injustement emparé du pouvoir suprême, contre la dignité des Souverains qui en ont garanti la possession à un autre. Cette déclaration animera les différens partis en France, et Buonaparte pourrait tomber victime par les mains même de ceux qui semblent former aujourd'hui son appui le plus ferme. Au reste, tout dépendra des premiers succès des armées Alliées: si au contraire la fortune se déclarait en faveur de Buonaparte, ce que la Providence ne permettra jamais, la guerre pourrait bien prendre le caractère de celle de 1792; et on dit déjà secrètement que Buonaparte, dans ce cas, se propose de publier un manifeste aux Allemands et aux autres peuples du Continent, pour les exciter à se donner une autre forme de gouvernement et une autre constitution; que quant à lui, ne voulant plus faire de conquête, il serait prêt à leur offrir ses secours pour les aider à secouer le joug de leurs Souverains actuels. Voilà la vengeance qu'il se propose contre les Souverains; et il est vrai de dire que si les Puissances Alliées n'opposent pas toutes leurs forces et n'agissent pas avec unanimité, tout est à craindre que la guerre ne prenne les symptômes les plus alarmans pour le repos de l'Europe.

Les communications qui subsistent entre la France et la Suisse sont extrêmement favorables à Buonaparte, car il communique avec l'Italie et l'Allemagne, et ses agens sont partout répandus. D'ailleurs, je sais que dans cette ville même il y a beaucoup de partisans Français qui favorisent les communications.

Lucien Buonaparte, après avoir montré pendant dix ans un caractère Républicain, et une inimitié envers son frère, s'est enfin réconcilié avec lui, et pour gage de cette réconciliation il a accepté le Grand Cordon de la Légion d'Honneur, dont il porte le crachat sur tous ses habits. Il est désigné pour être Président du Conseil de Régence qui sera établi pendant l'absence de Buonaparte. On dit qu'il y avait eu différens avis dans son Conseil concernant son départ; plusieurs membres y ont même manifesté la crainte d'un soulèvement dans la capitale s'il la quittait. Cependant, comme l'armée, de l'autre côté, demande sa présence, il fut résolu qu'après le Champ de Mai il quitterait la capitale, et confierait les affaires à un Conseil de Régence.

Francfort, le 28 Mai, 1815.

Le présent rapport n'ayant pas pu partir de Bâle par le motif exposé dans ma lettre à M. le Major Percy, j'ai l'honneur de le transmettre à votre Excellence de cette ville, et d'y joindre quelques détails sur ce que j'ai remarqué sur toute la ligne depuis Bâle jusqu'à Francfort.

Le Prince Hohenzollern, qui commande l'extrême aîle gauche de la Grande Armée, vers les frontières de la Suisse, a 37,000 Autrichiens et 22,000 Badois sous ses ordres. Le poste le plus avancé est à Lorrach, à deux lieues de Bâle ; il est commandé par le Major-Général Bruckner, sous les ordres immédiats du Lieutenant-Général Schaeffer, Badois, qui a son quartier-général à Mühlheim.

Le corps Badois compte 10,000 hommes de troupes réglées et 12,000 hommes de Landwehr. Ces derniers sont bien disciplinés, et ont déjà fait la guerre.

Les troupes Badoises et Wurtembergeoises s'étendent jusqu'à Bruchsal. C'est dans cette ville qu'est le quartier-général du Prince Royal de Wurtemberg, où il se trouve aussi 4000 hommes d'infanterie Autrichienne. Ce corps est magnifique, et bien équipé.

Depuis Bruchsal jusqu'à Heppenheim s'étendent les troupes Bavaroises, qui sont nombreuses et de bonne tenue.

Le quartier-général du Prince Schwarzenberg est à Heidelberg. Ce général était parti hier, 27, pour Mannheim, avec son quartier-maître-général, M. Langenau ; mais il devait revenir le soir. On assure que son quartier-général sera transféré Lundi, 29, à Mannheim, et que les deux Empereurs établiront les leurs à Heidelberg.

Il arrive du côté d'Heidelberg des officiers Français déserteurs, parmi lesquels était un colonel.

La première colonne Russe n'est arrivée encore qu'à Nurenberg. Le 13 Juin il en arrivera à Francfort et passera le Rhin un corps de 14,000 hommes, dont Son Altesse Sérénissime Prince de Reuss, Gouverneur-Général, Feldzeigmeister Autrichien, a eu la bonté de m'assurer.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 25th May, 1815.

By different reports it appears that some regiments from the vicinity of Maubeuge, and some others from Laon, have been ordered to march to Metz: between the first is the 6th chasseurs.

The works at Valenciennes, Condé, and Quesnoy are carried on with great activity; those of Maubeuge are represented as being finished, as well as the Camp de Rousies; the suburbs are demolished, and the peasants that worked at the fortifications of Maubeuge are sent to Avesnes. Besides Laon, the towns of La Fère, Soissons, St. Quentin, and Guise are also fortified.

The requisitions the French make on the frontiers are enormous, not only in provisions and forage, but also money, so that small villages are obliged to pay 5000 to 6000 francs.

Two officers of the 8th line came this morning from Valenciennes; they say that Buonaparte has postponed the Champ de Mai for two days, so that it is to be on the 28th. All the colonels, and one captain and two subalterns per regiment, are to be at Paris for that occasion. Four battalions of the national guards and the canonniers de la bourgeoisie are only to form the garrison of Valenciennes. These battalions are only half armed, and the officers represent them as consisting of mere rabble, very badly officered, but well inclined for Buonaparte. One of these battalions is of the department du Cher, another de la Côte d'Or.

I send a man to Laon and vicinity to remain there, if possible, till after the Champ de Mai, to give the earliest information if Buonaparte is joining the army after it, as expected.

I am very much disappointed that the papers do not yet arrive, as I had every reason to expect; but I still hope to have it soon settled. Papers to the 20th are enclosed herewith.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 25th May, 1815, 8 P.M.

I have had the honour of receiving both your Lordship's letters of yesterday.

I spoke with General Gneisenau this forenoon on the subject of the subsistence of the Prussian troops by the King of the Netherlands. I introduced the conversation by asking if the General had received the Vienna arrangements for the subsisting of the Allied armies by rayons of countries. He said he had not; and that he knew nothing more on the subject than the references made to such a system in the letters he had lately received, and by the information he had obtained from General Grollmann, who happened to be at Vienna at the time the Commission was sitting. I then explained the points, according to your Lordship's instructions, which render the case of the King of the Netherlands a hard one. The General admitted the expense to be very heavy: his reasoning on the question was, that when circumstances rendered it expedient that the Prussian troops should enter Belgium, it was stipulated that their subsistence should be provided at the expense of the King of the Netherlands, and that your Lordship was a party, or the guarantee, to this stipulation, and the principal cause of the readiness with which the movement was made without magazines or means to supply their troops; that the King of the Netherlands can only complain of the heaviness of the expense, and require an indemnity, since the period of the Vienna arrangement taking effect; and that he has no doubt the redress which those arrangements point out for the case of a rayon furnishing more than its own army will be fairly fulfilled on the part of the King of Prussia; and that he knows corn and other supplies are sending by Prussia to Rotterdam; but that the agitating of this subject by the King in writing in the style of a complaint to this head quarters on a matter requiring representation between the two Courts is calculated to have any but a good effect; and that on several occasions of unpleasant communications from the Netherlands government, he has abstained from any mention of them in his despatches to the King of Prussia for the purpose of avoiding any sharp correspondence. However, if the King's ministers continue to seize with eagerness every opportunity of collecting grievances of the ruin of the country by the Prussians, that the latter may be compelled to make a printed statement of the causes to which these misfortunes are attributable, which, he acknowledged, were severe, but maintained were owing to the bad measures of the government in their arrangements of magazines, and to the ignorance of their commissaries, and that in most instances the irregularity in the supplies had produced the irregularities of discipline. The General then remarked, that if a country like Prussia, poor in money, makes an extraordinary effort in men, and raises 25,000 upon each million of its population, whilst its wealthy ally has not raised 8000 on a million, the more energetic proceeding ought to be assisted.

During this conversation strong expressions were used towards the Belgian government, showing the acrimony and bad understanding which exist between the two Courts.

I have thought it proper to enter into these details, as General Gneisenau will no doubt personally confer with your Lordship on the subject next week.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's obedient servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Marshal Prince Wrede to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MON CHER DUC, Mannheim, ce 25 Mai, 1815.

J'ai reçu votre aimable lettre, et vous remercie bien des détails que vous m'avez communiqué sur les forces de Napoléon.

En effet, tout énorme que les efforts qu'il fait pour organiser son armée échouent en partie, en général il paraît qu'il a renoncé de prendre ou commencer l'offensive. Vue à vue de moi à commencer du Rhin jusqu'à la Moselle les forces que Napoléon a placé dans l'Alsace et la Lorraine ne sont pas très considérables, quoique entre Strasbourg et Landau elles ont augmenté depuis 8 jours, près de Hilden sont arrivé quelques renforts; mais en revanche mes postes le long de la Saar me rendent compte que plusieurs régiments d'infanterie, et le 6e de Housards, sont subitement partis de la Saar et des environs de Metz pour se rendre en Flandre.

J'ai vu aujourd'hui le Prince de Schwarzenberg, qui a depuis hier son quartier-général à Heidelberg. Il a reçu ce matin un courrier de Vienne, qui lui annonce l'arrivée des Souverains pour le 2 Juin à Heilbronn.

L'armée Russe est arrivée en Nuorin, c'est-à-dire deux têtes de colonne. Jusqu'au 8 Juin 100,000 hommes d'eux seront arrivé, et je pense donc que vers le 10 le plus tard on pourra commencer les opérations. Nous perdons beaucoup de tems, et fatiguons les pays dans lesquels nous cantonnons si longtems.

Je vous tiendrai, mon cher Duc, toujours au courant de ce qui se passera chez moi.

Je vous prie d'agréer l'assurance de ma haute considération et attachement avec lequel j'ai l'honneur d'être

Votre très humble et fidèle serviteur,

WREDE.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 25th May, 1815.

The Duc de Reggio (Marshal Oudinot), who has hitherto feigned sickness to avoid serving under Buonaparte, has signified his wish to espouse the cause of His Majesty Louis XVIII., and has placed himself at the disposal of the Minister at War.

Monsieur Frasans, who held a high situation in the War Department during the Duc de Feltre's first administration under Buonaparte, and who has remained in that situation ever since, is lately arrived. He left Paris so long ago as the 14th of April, and escaped with much difficulty.

The strength of the army at that period was lower by 5000 men than at the time of Buonaparte's arrival, although 15,000 recruits had joined the different regiments.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient very humble servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 25th May, 1815.

In compliance with the opinion I expressed at the close of my last letter, I gave to Lord Cathcart your private military despatch for the purpose of showing it at a convenient moment to the Emperor of Russia as a confidential communication to me. It has had the best effect. The Emperor read it three times over in Lord Cathcart's presence. He said, "Les raisonnemens étoient extrêmement sages, et d'une importance excessif." He begged immediately to have a copy of the letter, and Lord Cathcart pressed me on this subject. As I could not see the mischief of a private letter to me, which was in no shape a committal of your more reasoned opinions, nor an impediment to their alteration according to circumstances, being communicated, and I was sure any little risk I incurred on this subject was not to be compared to the advantage of keeping the Emperor to any basis you laid down, I consented to give the copy of the letter, and both the Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia have expressed themselves (I understand since) in the most unqualified approbation of its contents.

I trust in this business you will feel no impropriety in my proceedings.

I have read with great attention your admirable letter relative to the Subsistence Commission, and it will have, I trust, great effect. I feel very much satisfied that the King of the Netherlands will come into the arrangement proposed generally for the other Princes whose countries are likely to be the theatre of war; and I am sure this devotion and consideration for the common cause will tend to reduce the jealousy which his new position and great advantages, chiefly promised to him by England, have inspired in the minds of the Russian, Prussian, and Austrian cabinets, and which a contrary line of conduct would have confirmed and increased.

I have not seen Baron Stein since your letter, nor have we been called again to assist in the Commission. The Bavarians have made great remonstrances on its proceedings, and there are considerable difficulties; but I apprehend the main points, as already detailed, will be ultimately decided on.

Lieutenant-General Wallmoden, since I wrote last, has been reinstated in his rank and situation in the Emperor of Austria's service, and proceeds to Prince Schwarzenberg's head-quarters. I apprehend he is to command the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg's advanced guard. The Prince Regent has interested himself in this decision, and has effected it through General Meerfeldt.

The Duke de Cobourg is very much disappointed at finding the Saxons are deemed useless, and that there is no opening for him. He is endeavouring to negotiate their resurrection with you, together with all the Ducal appurtenances.

You will find from Lord Clancarty's despatches how our affairs stand here.

As it is evident from many circumstances that the Emperor of Russia is desirous of not finishing, and, having secured the outline of all his objects, would like to take his probable chance of dictating further when Buonaparte is put an end to, so am I of opinion that we should sacrifice minor objects to force that conclusion; and if the Emperor decided to break up rather than yield his chevaleresque honour on the Parma question, I think it will be wise in us to descend from our high horse, however disagreeable, and conform to any suggestion that will induce a conclusion. I live, therefore, in hopes that we may finish and sign in a day or two.

Ever, my dear Lord, yours most affectionately,

STEWART.

The Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia left this, the former last night, and the latter this morning. The Emperor of Austria will set off to-morrow, and I shall follow on the 1st of June to proceed to Heilbronn.

REPORT of the STATE of the FRENCH ARMY, and proposed PLAN of OPERATIONS of the ALLIES. From the Duke de FELTRE.

Mai, 1815.

La France commençait à jouir du bonheur qu'un gouvernement doux et paterfiel lui avait procuré après 25 ans de malheurs et de troubles quand l'homme dont l'ambition a été si désastreuse pour l'Europe, dont la déraison ancienne, renonçant à la retraite que trop de magnanimité peut-être lui avait fait accorder dans l'île d'Elbe, est venu replonger la France dans les dangers dont le retour du Roi l'avait enfin affranchie.

L'entreprise de Buonaparte a été préparée par des trames clandestines et perfides. Des officiers généraux, des chefs de corps, ont provoqué la défection des soldats. Les mêmes impostures, les mêmes illusions, qui avaient abusé l'armée pendant si long temps, en ont encore séduit aujourd'hui une partie ; le mauvais exemple et la rapidité de l'événement ont entraîné le reste.

C'est ainsi qu'une moitié de l'armée Française, oubliant les sermens qu'elle avait prêtés à son Roi légitime, a trahi à la fois ce monarque et la nation elle-même. Mais la population de la France, appréciant mieux que des soldats illitérés le bonheur dont elle jouissait et dont elle devait jouir sous l'autorité du Roi, n'a pas partagé le délire d'une partie de l'armée. Ainsi les intêrets et les pensées de la nation sont en opposition directe avec la conduite de ceux qui ont séduit l'armée.

Lorsque les Alliés du Roi entreront en France pour soutenir sa cause, la très grande majorité de la nation les secondera ; et il n'est pas douteux qu'en fournissant des armes à tous ceux qui voudront combattre pour le Roi, on ne rassemble bientôt des forces très considérables qui assureront le triomphe de la cause sacrée du Roi, qui est celle de toute l'Europe ; et cette même armée, que des mensonges et des illusions passagères ont entraînés hors de son devoir, sera bientôt rendue au sentiment de la fidélité envers le Roi, surtout si l'action des Puissances qui veulent de nouveau renverser l'usurpateur est prompte et immédiate.

Les espérances qu'on vient de donner reposent principalement sur les démonstrations du plus sincère dévouement données par toute la population qui s'est trouvée sur le passage du Roi depuis Paris jusqu'à Menin ; sur les vœux que cette même population formait pour le retour du Roi accompagné de troupes étrangères dont l'entrée en France était déjà regardée comme indispensable ; sur l'empressement de plusieurs maréchaux de France et officiers généraux Français à se réunir au Roi ; sur les nombreuses démissions que des officiers restés en France ont données à Buonaparte, qu'ils ont refusé de servir ; sur les regrets que la garde nationale de Paris a témoigné, par ses sanglots même, au Roi au moment de sa sortie du palais des Tuileries ; sur l'insurrection des habitans de Lille, de Dunkerque, de Metz, contre les garnisons dès l'instant que les habitans ont cru qu'une partie de l'armée trahissait le Roi ; sur la désertion de beaucoup de soldats ; sur la certitude qu'a eu le Roi que plus de 40,000 hommes sont disposés à prendre les armes pour Sa Majesté dans l'ouest de la France ; sur l'excellent esprit qu'ont manifesté les villes de Marseille, de Bordeaux, et en général toutes celles du Midi ; car il est vrai de dire qu'il n'y a que la Dauphiné, la Bourgogne, et partie de la Champagne qui aient montré des sentimens favorables à Buonaparte ; enfin, sur une foule de faits qu'il serait trop long de rappeler, et qui démontrent clairement que la grande majorité de la nation est restée fidèle au Roi, et que la majorité de l'armée ne peut manquer de revenir à des sentimens semblables.

On ne peut se dissimuler toutefois que Buonaparte, en mettant à la tête de chaque régiment des officiers de son choix et qui lui sont dévoués, en fesant commander ses brigades, ses divisions, et ses corps d'armée par des officiers dont les opinions révolutionnaires sont les plus exaltées, ne parvienne à maintenir sous ses drapeaux dans les premiers moments les troupes qui viennent de prendre la cocarde tricolore. Les premiers succès des Alliés ébranleront sans doute l'esprit de l'armée de Buonaparte; mais il est permis de croire que dans la situation où sont les esprits, les troupes se battront avec moins d'ardeur qu'elles ne l'ont fait précédemment.

Il convient donc d'examiner quelles peuvent être les forces dont Buonaparte peut disposer.

On peut évaluer ce qui reste de son ancienne Garde, y compris ce qu'il a ramené de l'île d'Elbe, à 6000 hommes, tant d'infanterie que cavalerie.

En supposant que la totalité des régimens de ligne se soit rangée du côté de Buonaparte, et en évaluant à 1000 baïonnettes l'effectif de chaque régiment, les 90 régimens de ligne donneraient un effectif de 90,000 hommes ; et les 15 régimens d'infanterie légère 15,000.

Toute la cavalerie, composée de—

2	Régimens	de Carabiniers
12	.. ..	de Cuirassiers
15	.. ..	de Dragons
6	.. ..	de Lanciers
15	.. ..	de Chasseurs
7	.. ..	de Housards

présente en ce moment une force de 25,000 à 26,000 hommes, dont 21,000 seulement étaient montés au moment du départ du Roi.

On évalue l'artillerie, composée de 8 régimens à pied et de 4 régimens à cheval, à 15,000 au plus.

L'arme du génie est composée de 3 régimens de sapeurs et de compagnies isolées d'ouvriers, dont on évalue la force de 2000 à 2400 hommes.

Les compagnies de vétérans, au nombre de 36, forment une force de 3600 hommes, qui ne peuvent occuper que des postes dans l'intérieur.

La gendarmerie est formée de 9000 hommes à cheval, et de 3000 hommes à pied. Cette arme ne pourra guères lui fournir pour le service de guerre que 2000 hommes de cavalerie, peu exercés aux manœuvres, le reste étant indispensable pour le service de l'intérieur.

Récapitulation.

Infanterie de ligne et légère	105,000
Cavalerie	25,000
Artillerie	15,000
Génie	2,400
Gendarmerie	2,000
Garde	6,000
	155,400

On pourrait demander quelle répartition Buonaparte pourra faire de ces troupes ?

Il paraît impossible qu'il ne dispose pas au moins de 6000 hommes contre

Bordeaux	6,000
Armée de Lyon	4,000
Armée des Alpes	10,000
Armée de la Vendée	5,000
Armée d'Alsace	20,000
Armée de Lorraine	20,000
Corps détachés sur les côtes de la Flandre	6,000
	71,000

Il sera forcé de jeter des garnisons dans ses places fortes et dans ses portes : on croit pouvoir les évaluer de la manière suivante :—

Garnisons de Bretagne et de la Normandie		5,000
De la Flandre et des Ardennes		10,000
De la Lorraine		6,000
De l'Alsace		7,500
De la Franche Comté		2,500
Des Alpes, Provence, et Pyrénées ..		4,400
		35,400
On a vu plus haut que les forces disponibles de Buonaparte ne peuvent guères s'élever à plus de		155,400
Les différents corps d'armée qu'il sera obligé de former emploieront	71,000
Il faudra qu'il laisse dans les places	35,400
		106,400
Il ne pourra donc réunir sur les frontières de la Flandre, dans l'état actuel des choses, que		49,000
Corps détachés		6,000
		55,000

Il reste à examiner quel est le meilleur système d'opérations que les armées alliées puissent suivre pour anéantir l'usurpateur et ramener le Roi dans sa capitale.

Quoique l'ensemble de ces opérations dépende principalement des projets de son Excellence M. le Général-en-Chef, Duc de Wellington, on pense qu'il ne peut pas être inutile de lui soumettre quelques idées que son Excellence adoptera où rejettera, suivant qu'elle les trouvera conformes à sa manière de voir.

Placée par ses talens, et par une suite de succès que ses opérations sagement combinées lui ont fait constamment obtenir, au premier rang des généraux d'armée, son Excellence peut, mieux que personne, se faire un plan qui embrasse toutes les vues, et qui fasse triompher la cause du Roi et celle de l'Europe.

On soumet donc à Son Excellence les observations suivantes.

Si la droite de l'armée des Alliés veut pénétrer en France en débouchant soit de Furnes ou d'Ypres entre Dunkerque, Calais, ou Lille, sa marche sera nécessairement lente ; car en supposant même qu'elle put obtenir dès l'abord la possession de Dunkerque en raison de l'attachement que les habitans ont témoigné au Roi, les premières opérations dans cette partie seraient une guerre de siége. Il faudrait prendre Bergues, Gravelines, St. Omer, Aire, Bethune, et ensuite il faudrait encore, avant d'arriver sur Paris, s'emparer d'Arras, de Bapaume, de Doullens, et des places de la Somme, ou laisserait derrière soi et sur son flanc Lille, Douai, Cambrai, et Valenciennes. Les obstacles qui se présentent de ce côté pourraient employer tout le tems d'une campagne.

Attaquer Lille et Valenciennes, places soutenues en seconde ligne par Douai et par Cambrai, c'est aller à la rencontre de plus grandes difficultés encore ; et le début des opérations dans cette partie, et en général entre Lille et le cours de la Sambre, ne pourrait être admis, qu'autant que Lille et Valenciennes rentreraient sous l'obéissance du Roi. Dans ce cas même les places de seconde ligne offriraient encore de grands obstacles à vaincre. Le retard qu'elles occasionneraient donnerait à Buonaparte le temps de consolider sa puissance, et de réussir dans la tentative qu'il a déjà faite de rendre nationale la guerre contre les Alliés.

C'est de Douai, qui est l'arsenal central de la France, qui doivent sortir les principaux objets d'artillerie nécessaires à l'armée de Buonaparte en Flandre, et à l'armement de ses places dans cette partie. Si quelques corps de cavalerie bien commandés pouvaient battre la campagne, dès à présent, entre Lille et Valenciennes, et aux abords de Douai, il en résulterait de grands avantages pour la cause du Roi et de ses Alliés. L'armement des places deviendrait incomplet; les troupes de Buonaparte qui se rassemblent prendraient de l'inquiétude; l'approvisionnement des villes de guerre deviendrait plus difficile, et la désertion plus nombreuse.

D'après les réflexions qui ont été présentées plus haut, on croit que l'armée des Alliés en Flandre trouverait d'immenses avantages si elle débouchait en France entre le Sambre et Rocroy, soit en enlevant Maubeuge et Avesnes de vive force, soit en se bornant à s'emparer de cette dernière place, et en prenant la route de Laon par la Capelle. Dès que les troupes Alliées seront à la Capelle, tout l'ensemble de la défense de la France du côté de la Flandre devient inutile. Toutes ses places de guerre sont tournées, et les opérations qui ont lieu sur la frontière depuis Maubeuge jusqu'à la mer appartiennent plus à la guerre de chicane et de stratagème qu'à la grande guerre. Dans cette situation des choses Buonaparte serait forcé de livrer bataille, de ne laisser qu'un petit corps de troupes en Flandre, et de se placer entre Paris et les Alliés, ou de cotoyer la rive droite de l'Oise pendant que les Alliés agiraient sur la route de Laon et sur la rive gauche de cette rivière. Dès que l'armée Alliée paraîtra dans les environs de Laon ou de Soissons, les partisans du Roi pourront agir dans Paris, et cette ville n'appartiendra plus, pour ainsi dire, à l'usurpateur.

Pour rattacher les opérations du corps de l'armée Prussienne à celle de la droite de l'armée des Alliés, il devrait déboucher de Namur sur Sédan, Sténay, ou Dun. Sédan est une mauvaise place, assez facile à enlever; le système de fortifications en est baroque; il est douteux que Buonaparte puisse la faire armer à tems ainsi que Mézières. Les fortifications de Sténay et de Dun n'existent plus. Le corps Prussien par la possession de ces places aurait trois ou quatre passages assurés sur la Meuse, et pourrait se diriger par St. Menehould sur Châlons-sur-Marne, en évitant Reims et la Champagne Pouilleuse, où cette armée vivrait difficilement. Dès lors la possession de Soissons, de Château Thierry, et de Vitry le Français deviendrait d'une grande importance, et Paris serait sérieusement menacé.

Avec ces opérations marcheraient celles d'un 3e. corps d'armée, formé des troupes Prussiennes et Allemandes, qui arriveraient de Mayence et de Mannheim, et qui, rassemblées à Deux Ponts et vers Saarbruck, entreraient en France par St. Avold, placeraient quelques corps pour contenir les garnisons de Metz ou de Thionville, et passeraient la Moselle à Pont à Mousson, et la Meuse à Commercy et à St. Mihiel. C'est par St. Dizier, Bar, et Vitry le Français que ce corps se dirigerait. Il marcherait à la hauteur des deux autres corps d'armée en appuyant sa gauche à l'Aube et à la Seine.

Quelques troupes seraient laissées devant Landau et devant Strasbourg, pour bloquer ces places; quelques Landwehr, rassemblés à Kehl et devant Vieux Brisach, inquiéteraient Strasbourg et Neu Brisach, ou chercheraient à s'emparer de Toul, qui paraît ne pas pouvoir être armé à tems.

Si on avait à s'occuper en ce moment des troupes Autrichiennes, c'est encore par la Haute Alsace, et en bloquant Huningue et Béfort par quelques troupes Allemandes, qu'il faudrait déboucher par Vesoul et Langres. Par cette opération on tourne et on rend inutiles toutes les places de guerre de l'Alsace. On n'a plus à observer que Besançon; on entre en France par un côté qui n'est pas assez défendu; et à peine les troupes seront-elles à Langres et à Chaumont que les partisans de l'usurpateur à Paris seront en alarmes, et regarderont comme perdue la cause qu'ils ont entreprise de défendre.

Ce plan est en quelque sorte de même que celui qui a été suivi l'année dernière. Mais outre le succès qui en a prouvé le mérite, il est encore justifié par le raisonnement. Son exécution est d'autant plus facile que les forces qui doivent en assurer la réussite sont plus considérables que celles que Buonaparte peut opposer. Il paraît d'ailleurs plus conforme à la situation actuelle de la France, parcequ'il amène plus promptement au centre du royaume les forces indispensables pour combattre l'usurpateur au moment où il est encore chancelant sur le trône dont il veut s'emparer, et lorsque tout ce qu'il y a d'honnête en France évite de s'associer aux révolutionnaires exaltés dont il recherche le secours.

Dans d'autres circonstances on aurait recommandé des opérations de guerre plus régulières. On n'aurait pas proposé de lancer au milieu de la France, et par des défilés, des corps d'armée, dont la retraite serait compromise en cas d'échec, s'ils étaient moins nombreux. Mais il est instant que le Roi reparoisse en France, qu'il y réunisse autour de sa personne tous les sujets fidèles, que sa présence et l'action de son gouvernement fassent tomber tout cet échafaudage d'impostures, à l'aide des quelles l'usurpateur veut fasciner tous les yeux.

Si on ne mettait la plus grande célérité dans les opérations, il y aurait lieu de craindre que ses artifices, son habileté, et la terreur qu'il inspire n'augmentassent le nombre de ses partisans, tandis que chaque pas que le Roi fera dans son royaume et la présence des Alliés encourageront les Royalistes, et hâteront la ruine de l'ennemi du Roi de la France et de l'Europe.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Ghent, 25th May, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose for your Grace's information the copy of a report made to the Duc de Feltre by the Comte de Gottstein. This person was Chef d'Escadron in the 12th Regiment of Chasseurs à Cheval, and came in from his cantonments at Câteau Cambresis on the 23rd instant. He left that place on the 20th May.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient, very humble servant,
Lionel Hervey.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Copy of a Report from the Comte de Gottstein, Chef d'Escadron of the 12th Regiment of Chasseurs à Cheval.

Le 12me. régiment fait partie du 2d. corps d'armée sous les ordres du Général Reille, et de la 5me. division de cavalerie sous ceux du Général W. de St. Alphonse. Le Colonel Grouchy, qui commande ce régiment et revenait dans le moment du quartier-général, dit que la force du 2me. corps consistait en 5 divisions d'infanterie, chacune à quatre régiments, et dont la force totale était de 30,000 hommes; que ces régiments devaient être augmentés à la fin du mois de 500 hommes. La cavalerie est composée de 3 divisions à 3 régiments chacune; mais dans ce moment il n'y a que le 1er. régiment de chasseurs et le 1er. de dragons, ainsi que le 6me. de chasseurs qui aie 500 chevaux: tous les autres ont que 300. L'esprit des régiments d'infanterie est fort mauvais, surtout des sous-officiers; celui de la cavalerie est meilleur, surtout des officiers. Tous les capitaines du 12me. régiment pensent bien, mais le colonel est un grand partisan de Buonaparte. Le général de division est très mécontent de servir en sous ordres, et on le croit bien pensant.

Tous les colonels de l'armée sont appelés au Champ de Mai à Paris pour le 26.

[Communicate to Colonel Grant, and let him take an account of the corps in Reille's army, their strength, commanding officers, &c.

WELLINGTON.]

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 26th May, 1815.

I believe I have been led into an error by the officers from Valenciennes, in reporting that the Champ de Mai was only to be on the 28th. A gentleman (the brother of the commandant of Mons, Duvivier) who arrived here yesterday directly from Paris, says that it is to be this day, the 26th, and that he met on the road a great number of officers all going there for that ceremony, at which they are to receive the eagles for their respective regiments. He met also several depôts going to the interior. The National Guards from the interior are sent to the frontiers, and those from the frontiers to the interior.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
DÖRNBERG.

Earl Cathcart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 26th May, 1815.

The Emperor of Russia appears to me to approve very much of your notions concerning the plan of operations, and desired me to take the first opportunity of assuring you from him that his army will arrive on the Rhine as soon as it is physically possible. In addition to the force stated in the paper I enclosed in my last letter, I have now to explain that by parks are understood the carriages with reserve ammunition of all sorts; and that besides the companies of artillery with their ordnance, and the park enumerated in the return, this army is followed by seven companies of reserve artillery with their ordnance complete, and eight parks of ammunition, and that it is proposed to form a laboratory on the Maine, from whence supplies will be forwarded by water.

The Emperor set out last night for Munich, with few attendants. After remaining there a few days, he intends to go to Heilbronn by Stuttgart. The greater part of his aides-de-camp and suite, together with his horses and equipage, are to meet him at the former place.

Your Grace will see by the letters from the Minoritten Platze of this date, that the business here does seem to be drawing to a close; and I have hopes to be enabled to set out so as to reach Heilbronn by the time the Emperor arrives.

Ever, my dear Lord, very faithfully and sincerely yours,
CATHCART.

The Swedish Plenipotentiary has addressed a note to the Commission for receiving the accession of other Powers to the treaty of the 25th of March, stating that although his Court agrees perfectly in principle with those who signed that treaty, and although there is every inclination on the part of Sweden to unite her efforts to those of the Allies, yet such is her penury that it is impossible for her to bring forward any force worth mentioning unless she receives a subsidy equal to the whole expense of embarking her army, maintaining it while on service and until its return to Sweden, and re-conveying it by sea; but that if subsidized, they are ready to furnish troops.

The King of Prussia is gone to Berlin for about a week. The Emperor and Empress of Austria are to go immediately to Munich.

The Earl of Clancarty to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Vienna, 26th May, 1815.

Your excellent letter of the 14th* reached me on the 21st. I requested Charles Stewart to show it confidentially to Hardenberg, in order that the Prussians should be impressed with the liberal ideas it conveys, and mitigate that système tracassier with which their councils are so detrimentally imbued.

Enclosed herewith I send you some papers which Münster sent me to-day, in consequence of my acquainting him with the substance of your letter.

Our business here draws to a close: our great treaty is in an advanced state of redaction; our Parma business is finished by a sort of compromise. The Archduchess is to enjoy the sovereignty of the three Duchies, and their reversion is to be determined at the close of the war. It is not above an hour since this intelligence has been communicated to me. All other matters are easy, and I think we shall sign and seal by the close of the next week; but as I may be mistaken in this, it is intended for your Grace's information only.

My public despatches, except the last, contain but little worth the trouble of reading.

We had some difficulty in obtaining the resolution for a great and comprehensive termination of our labours here. This the Russian Legation opposed, but the Prussians stood by me, and we succeeded. Humboldt and I were commissioned to work with Gentz in the mechanism of the great treaty, and we have made such progress that every one is now convinced that the whole may be speedily terminated.

Yours, my dear Duke, most sincerely,

CLANCARTY.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Count Münster to the Earl of Clancarty.

MY LORD, Vienna, 26th May, 1815.

Having perused, with your Excellency's permission, the private letter addressed to you by his Grace the Duke of Wellington, as likewise his Grace's despatch to Sir Charles Stuart on the subject of the negotiation now entered upon for the purpose of inducing His Majesty the King of the Low Countries to accede to the principle adopted by Austria, Russia, and Prussia, for the maintenance of their armies in the field, I beg leave to offer a few remarks which appear to be necessary in order to put the question in a clear light, as far as the Hanoverian troops are concerned.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 386.

The Duke is perfectly correct in stating that the Hanoverian subsidiary corps (of 15,000 rank and file) has been maintained from the British magazines, and that Hanover has not paid for this expense. It is equally true that the Hanoverian contingent of 10,000 rank and file, lately sent to the Netherlands, has received provisions from the magazines of His Majesty the King of the Low Countries.

If, however, it should be inferred from this circumstance that the objection was made on the part of Hanover against the pretension formed by Prussia, claiming a large quantity of provisions at the fixed price, which pretension was partly objected to on the ground that Hanover was obliged to pay for her own troops at the rate of market price, such an inference under existing circumstances would be erroneous.

Hanover has not as yet paid the expense incurred by the British Commissariat for the maintenance of the subsidiary corps, but the claim has actually been formed (as is known to the Duke of Wellington) by the Commissary-in-Chief, Mr. Herries, to the amount of about 20,000*l.* sterling per month, as will be proved by the enclosed abstracts of letters from His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and a report from Lieutenant-General Decken, which latter document equally shows that the government of the Netherlands had till then insisted on the payment for the maintenance of the Hanoverian contingent of 10,000 men.

Till this question shall have been settled, and the new treaty at present under consideration between the British and Hanoverian governments concluded, the objection opposed on the part of Hanover against the Prussian demands remains unshaken.

There is, however, another argument which I beg your Excellency to consider, in case this question should once more be brought under your consideration. The argument set up by Austria, Russia, and Prussia, to justify their claim on independent states, called for by those Powers to furnish at an arbitrary and very low price provisions of every kind for three months, whilst they keep their own people entirely exempt (with the exception of a small part of the Prussian territory), is grounded on this :—They give to understand that those three Powers are hereafter to send up to the armies the provisions wanted for the remaining nine months in the year.

In the first instance it is to be observed that the promise to provide during those nine months for the troops of the Princes who are now called upon to feed the armies of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, is nowhere given in a positive manner; but supposing even that such a promise was to be fulfilled, what compensation could Hanover derive from such an arrangement, since her troops would in no case be provided from the Austrian, the Russian, or Prussian magazines?

To show the manner in which these claims are carried into effect, I have the honour to communicate to your Excellency the demands made by Prussia on her pretended rayon on a population of about 5,100,000 souls. The calculation is made for 280,000 men and 70,000 horses. Your Lordship knows their real number, as also that three corps d'armée are at present actually maintained by the Low Countries.

The claim, however, does not rest there. I understand (for I have not been called to any of the conferences) that the Princes of Germany are called upon to pay for a heavy train of artillery, a waggon train, &c., although their treaties of accession do by no means warrant such a pretension. Your Lordship will see what consequence it would have for Hanover if she was to be considered as forming part of what is called a rayon, according to the plan of Baron de Stein.

I have, &c.,

MÜNSTER.

REPORT from Lieutenant-General DE DECKEN, dated Brussels, 23rd April, 1815.

Mr. Herries, the Commissary-in-Chief, has but this moment left me, charged by the Duke of Wellington to repeat the observation already made by him, that Hanover is to pay out of her subsidy the whole amount of the expense incurred by the provisioning of the subsidiary corps of 15,000 men, at present in this country, ever since that corps has been stationed in the Netherlands, and at the same time to concert measures with me on this account.

In respect of the provisioning of the 10,000 men arrived with me, I still meet with great difficulties. The Duke of Wellington declared that he will have nothing to do with it on the part of England, and should only provide for the necessaries of the first days. The English Ambassador, Sir Charles Stuart, has now concerted with the Dutch government that this corps shall be provisioned on the same footing as that of the Prussians at present in this country, and has addressed me to the Dutch Minister of War, M. Janssens, for further arrangements. I have had a conference with him three days ago, where he made great difficulties, but at last promised to speak to the King of Holland once more on the subject.

IV.

ABSTRACT of a Letter from His Royal Highness the DUKE of CAMBRIDGE to COUNT MÜNSTER, dated Hanover, April 29, 1815.

Another very unpleasant thing is the claim the British government has made, or rather will make, for the expense of the provisioning of the corps. They value it at 20,000*l.* sterling per month. Decken has had a very long conversation with Mr. Herries, the Commissary-in-Chief, who was very fair upon the subject, and recommended Decken to inform Best of the conversation, in order that he might be able to choose the same answers for his objection that Decken had done. You will see that we are in a sad worry at this moment.

Colonel Washington to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Bruxelles, le 26 de Mai, 1815.

Le soussigné, Envoyé Extraordinaire de Sa Majesté le Roi de Bavière au quartier-général de Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington, s'étant empressé de faire connaître à sa Cour le projet du traité de subside que Son Excellence lui a remis le 11 du courant, a reçu les ordres de son auguste Souverain de lui remettre le contre-projet dont il a l'honneur d'ajouter ici copie.

Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington voudra bien y voir qu'il est à peu près conforme à celui reçu de sa part, et qu'il ne s'en écarte guère que dans l'Article 2, où le gouvernement Bavarois désire une anticipation de deux mois au terme du 1 d'Avril, où les payements doivent commencer: les frais d'équipement et l'armement des troupes ayant extraordinairement portés sur les finances de l'Etat, pareil secours serait fortement à désirer.

Le contenu de l'Art. 4 n'étant pas touché dans le projet que Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington a remis au soussigné, et étant basé sur l'Art. 3 de l'Acte d'Accession, Son Excellence se trouvera indubitablement autorisé à pouvoir le faire insérer au traité.

La seconde partie de l'Article 5 est fondé sur ce que les troupes Bavaroises auront loin avant de rentrer chez eux: réflexion juste, que Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington lui-même a bien voulu faire aux premiers ouvertures de ces négociations, en y ajoutant qu'à raison de cette grande distance deux mois pourraient être accordés.

Quant aux articles additionnels et secrets, il importerait infiniment à Sa Majesté le Roi de Bavière qu'ils fissent partie du traité. Si cependant Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington ne se trouverait pas autorisé à les y recevoir de la manière dont ils sont conçus, le soussigné se permet de les modifier, et de n'en faire qu'un seul article de la teneur suivante :—

"Sa Majesté le Roi de Bavière désirant vivement que Son Altesse Royale le Prince Régent, agissant au nom de Sa Majesté le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne, garantisse à Sa dite Majesté l'intégrité de son territoire et de ses possessions dans l'état et l'étendue où elles se trouvent actuellement, ou qu'elles pourront se trouver quand les échanges arrêtés éventuellement à Vienne, et consignés dans les sections 48 jusqu'à 66 du protocole du Congrès, pourraient recevoir leur exécution, et demandant également que si le succès des armes des Puissances Alliées répond à la justice de leur cause, et qu'on parvienne à obtenir des cessions de la part de l'ennemi commun, Son Altesse Royale le Prince Régent, agissant au nom de Sa Majesté le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne, s'engage à employer son intervention la plus efficace à l'effet de faire obtenir à Sa Majesté le Roi de Bavière une indemnité territoriale proportionnée à ses efforts pour la bonne cause. Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington ayant déclaré qu'il manquait des pleins pouvoirs et les instructions nécessaires à cet égard, il a été convenu et arrêté que tout ce qui concernait ces objets serait remis à un arrangement séparé, et ferait le sujet d'une négociation ultérieure.

"Le présent article séparé et secret sera censé faire partie du traité principal signé aujourd'hui, et aura la même force et valeur comme s'il y était inséré mot pour mot."

La modification portée dans la manière dont le contre-projet au Traité est conçu ne portant aucune atteinte quelconque aux conditions stipulées et convenues entre les hautes parties contractantes, le soussigné se plait à croire que Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington voudra bien y agréer.

Le soussigné saisit de nouveau cette occasion avec empressement pour prier Son Excellence le Duc de Wellington de vouloir bien agréer les assurances de sa très respectueuse considération.

[ENCLOSURE.]

26 Mai, 1815.

Contre-Projet.

Sa Majesté le Roi de Bavière ayant accédé, par un traité signé à Vienne, à l'alliance conclue le 25 de Mars dernier entre les Plénipotentiaires de la Grande Bretagne, de l'Autriche, de la Russe, et de la Prusse, et s'étant engagé à mettre en campagne une armée de 60,000 hommes, dont un dixième de cavalerie avec une artillerie proportionnée, Son Altesse Royale le Prince Régent, agissant au nom de Sa Majesté le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne, voulant donner à Sa dite Majesté une preuve plus particulière de son amitié en lui facilitant les moyens de remplir les engagements qu'elle a contractés, et de concourir au succès de la cause commune, et les deux Puissances étant convenus de consigner dans une convention particulière la manière dont ce double but serait atteint, ont nommé : S.A.R. le Prince Régent, le Duc de Wellington, etc., etc., et S.M. le Roi de Bavière, le Colonel Washington, etc., etc., qui, après l'échange de leurs pleins pouvoirs respectifs, sont convenus des conditions suivantes :—

ARTICLE I.

Le gouvernement Britannique s'engage à payer à celui de S.M. le Roi de Bavière, pour contribuer aux frais de l'entretien d'une armée de 60,000 hommes que Sa dite Majesté s'est engagé à employer activement contre l'ennemi commun, la somme annuelle de onze livres sterlings deux schellings par homme.

ART. II.

Le payement de ce subside commencera au 1 de Février, et sera fait à Londres en termes égaux de mois en mois, le dernier jour de chaque mois. Le Ministre de S.M. le Roi de Bavière à Londres se concertera avec des officiers nommés par le gouvernement Britannique sur la manière la plus convenable de faire passer le montant de ces payements à son gouvernement.

ART. III.

Il sera libre à S.A.R. le Prince Régent, agissant au nom de S.M. le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne, d'envoyer au quartier-général de S.M. le Roi de Bavière un officier qui sera chargé de faire un rapport sur les opérations militaires, et soigner en même tems tout ce qui concerne le service de S.M. Britannique.

ART. IV.

L'article 3 de l'acte d'accession de S.M. le Roi de Bavière relatif à la bonification de l'artillerie de siége qui serait fournie par elle est spécialement rappelé, et on conviendra d'une manière plus particulière d'un taux, et de la manière dont cette indemnité aura lieu dès qu'une demande d'artillerie de siége aura été faite à Sa dite Majesté.

ART. V.

Le présent traité expirera le dernier jour de l'an 1815. Il pourra cependant être renouvelé du gré des deux hautes parties contractantes.

Si l'objet de la grande alliance étoit rempli plutôt, les payements stipulés par l'Articles 1 et 2 cesseroient deux mois après que cet événement aurait eu lieu.

ART. VI.

Les ratifications du présent traité seront échangés dans l'espace de * ou plutôt si faire si peut.

Articles Additionnels et Secrets.

ART. I.

S.A.R. le Prince Régent, agissant au nom de S.M. le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne, garantit à S.M. le Roi de Bavière l'intégrité de son territoire et de ses possessions dans l'état et l'étendue où elles se trouvent actuellement, ou qu'elles pourront se trouver quand les échanges arrêtés éventuellement à Vienne, et consignés dans les sections 48 jusqu'à 66 du protocole du Congrès, pourraient recevoir leur exécution.

ART. II.

Si le succès des armes des Puissances Alliées répond à la justice de leur cause, et qu'on parvienne à obtenir des cessions de la part de l'ennemi commun, S.A.R. le Prince Régent, agissant au nom de S.M. le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne, s'engage à employer son intervention la plus efficace à l'effet de faire obtenir à S.M. le Roi de Bavière une indemnité territoriale proportionnée à ses efforts pour la cause commune.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 27th May, 1815.

A captain of the 6th Chasseurs arrived here last night. He was with the depôt at Compiègne, where, when he left it, three squadrons and two battalions of Buonaparte's Guards, with part of his equipages, were, and a division of the Guards was immediately expected. Buonaparte himself was expected there immediately after the Champ de Mai (which has been put off to the 28th), and then to march to Laon, where the head quarters are to be. This officer also heard that some troops had made a movement towards Metz; but a party of the 6th Chasseurs (which were supposed to be of that number) has been seen yesterday on the Bavay road.

Three regiments of infantry are said to have arrived at Maubeuge to guard the camp de Rousies.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Ghent, 27th May, 1815.

Your Grace will, I believe, receive a communication from the Duke de Feltre in the course of this day.

It appears that the Royalists wish to make an attempt on Lisle, with which place they have long kept up a correspondence. They do not wish for the co-operation of other troops, but solely for permission to pass the frontier with what force they can collect. The Minister at War thinks the attempt feasible, as they have succeeded in getting a company of artillerymen, who are devoted to the King's cause, into the citadel, and they are sure of one regiment in the town. They have also entaméd a negotiation with the Governor.

A General Gobrecht, who commands two regiments on the side of Cassel, has sent to demand instructions from the Duc de Feltre, and orders will be sent to him immediately to join His Majesty Louis XVIII. with as many of his two regiments as he can induce to follow him. The General is in hopes that he may collect from 300 to 400. Your Grace will also receive a communication on this subject from the Minister at War.

This General Gobrecht has reason to believe that the enemy will attack on the 4th of June.

Thus much appears certain, as it comes from him and from other sources, that 80,000 rations of bread and rice sufficient for eight days have been ordered at Valenciennes for the 28th instant.

Accounts received from Paris state that the Assemblée du Champ de Mai is adjourned to the 28th instant, and that Buonaparte is losing ground every day. He has been to visit the catacombs, and they are in great dread of some desperate determination on his part to destroy the city, in case he should be obliged to abandon it.

The enemy are throwing up works at Laon.

I have the honour to be, my dear Lord,

Yours most sincerely,

LIONEL HERVEY.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 27th May, 1815.

Colonel Sir Niel Campbell being about to join his regiment in Flanders, it is with much satisfaction that I avail myself of this opportunity to address your Grace for the purpose of assuring you that His Majesty's government have had every reason to be satisfied with the activity and intelligence manifested by Sir Niel Campbell during the time he was serving under the direction of this department, as well at the siege of Danzig and in the campaigns in Germany and France of 1813 and 1814, as more particularly during the very delicate and difficult charge imposed upon him while residing near the person of Napoleon Buonaparte in the island of Elba.

The unfortunate evasion of that person from Elba, wholly unexpected as it was, and disastrous as the event must prove to the cause of humanity, cannot, in the judgment of His Majesty's government, be attributed to any want of proper exertion and activity on the part of Sir Niel Campbell. It is not, however, judged advisable at the present moment to continue the services of Sir Niel Campbell as resident with any of the Allied armies under the orders of this department, and he has therefore, in a most honourable manner, decided to return to the performance of his military duties.

As I can entertain no doubt that Sir Niel Campbell's conduct under your Grace's command will continue, as on former occasions, to receive your approbation, I have only to add that every mark of confidence which in the course of the ensuing campaign your Grace shall have an opportunity of bestowing upon him will be highly gratifying to His Majesty's ministers and personally to me.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect,

My Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

[880.] G. O. Bruxelles, 28th May, 1815.

1. The Commander of the Forces was sorry to observe the number of carriages attending the march of the British troops into Bruxelles, contrary to his orders.

2. He requests the General officers commanding brigades and divisions will see that the orders upon this subject are obeyed.

3. It is much better that the officers of the army should at once get rid of their useless baggage, as they may depend upon it, that, even if the Commander of the Forces were disposed to allow of their being followed by the number of carts which accompanied the troops into Bruxelles this day, they will more frequently find themselves in situations in which wheel carriages cannot reach them than they are aware of, and they will lose the whole.

4. The Commander of the Forces trusts that he shall not have occasion to name in General Orders the regiments by which his orders on this subject are disobeyed.

WELLINGTON.

The Baron de Dalwig to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Bruxelles, ce 28 Mai, 1815.

Ayant eu l'honneur de faire connaître à Votre Altesse la mission dont je suis chargé par S.A. Royale l'Electeur de Hesse, Monseigneur a désiré d'être plus exactement instruit de l'accession de S.A. Royale au Traité de Vienne du 25 Mars. J'ai reçu sur cet article des réponses satisfaisantes, et en les communiquant à Votre Altesse j'ai l'honneur de lui exposer les considérations suivantes.

La population de l'Electorat de Hesse se montant à peu près à 500,000 âmes, le contingent, d'après des normes généralement reconnues, ne s'élève pas au-delà de 6500 hommes. Malgré cela, S.A. Royale l'Electeur, en accédant au Traité de Vienne de l'époque précitée, s'est engagé à fournir un contingent de 7500 hommes ; mais afin de mieux prouver son zèle pour la bonne cause, elle a augmenté son corps de 4500 hommes ; y compris deux régiments de cavalerie, chacun de 600 chevaux ; 16 pièces d'artillerie, avec leurs caissons ; aussi qu'une colonne de parc, formant ensemble une attelage de 325 chevaux. S.A. Royale a aussi organisé une réserve de 6000 hommes, destinée, en cas de nécessité, à soutenir son corps mobile, fort de 12,000 hommes. Ce dernier a déjà rejoint depuis le mois d'Avril l'armée de Son Excellence le Général Comte de Kleist Nollendorf.

S.A. Royale ne demanderait pas mieux que de mettre sous le glorieux commandement de Monseigneur le Duc de Wellington le corps de ses troupes, qui se vantent d'être d'anciens compagnons d'armes des Anglais ; si la distribution des troupes Allemandes dans les différents corps d'armée n'avait pas été déjà fixée à Vienne par des conventions antérieures, d'après leur situation territoriale ; et S.A. Royale regrette infiniment de n'y pouvoir rien changer.

L'armement contre Buonaparte étant d'une nécessité si reconnue que chaque corps, sous quelque commandement qu'il se puisse trouver, ne doit pas moins contribuer à remplir le but commun, je me plais à croire que le corps Hessois sous ce rapport justifiera pleinement la confiance de Votre Altesse.

Moyennant les efforts extraordinaires que S.A.R. l'Electeur a fait en 1814 pour mettre en campagne un corps de 24,000 hommes, qui a servi à bloquer, sans autre secours, cinq forteresses, tant de la Lorraine que de Luxembourg, il en est résulté un épuisement de ses propres moyens ainsi que de ceux de son pays ; et il n'est pas douteux qu'il se trouvera hors d'état de les continuer. En outre de ces efforts extraordinaires la malheureuse catastrophe de 1806 a fait subir à son pays pendant sept années toutes sortes d'exactions qui ont causé sa ruine totale.

En conséquence S.A. Royale dans les circonstances actuelles éprouve l'impérieuse nécessité de reclamer le généreux secours de la Grande Bretagne, puissance qui de tout temps lui a donné tant de preuves de sa bienveillance ; et c'est à cet fin que S.A. Royale, conformément à l'ouverture que Monseigneur a faite à S.E. Monsieur le Comte de Münster, demande des subsides, et qu'elle attend de ses bontés qu'il voudra bien les lui accorder, de l'époque du premier Avril : c'est une mesure d'autant plus nécessaire que le recensement pour maintenir les corps au complet ne pourrait se faire sans ce soutien.

Ma mission serait heureuse si Votre Altesse daignait accueillir favorablement les propositions que j'ai l'honneur de mettre sous ses yeux, et S.A.R. l'Electeur m'a chargé particulièrement de lui exprimer qu'elle se repose entièrement sur ses bontés.

Je prie Votre Altesse d'agréer l'assurance du respect le plus profond avec lequel j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE BARON DE DALWIG,

Major et Aide-de-Camp de S.A.R. l'Electeur de Hesse.

Lieut.-Gen. the Hon. Sir G. L. Cole to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 28th May, 1815.

Having at length received orders to join your Grace's army, may I request to be appointed to the 6th division in preference to the 5th, as I cannot help feeling a very strong partiality for those regiments which composed the 4th in Spain ; and I understand that General Lambert's brigade, of which the 27th and 40th form a part, are already attached to the 6th division, and that the brigade daily expected from America, among which are the 7th Fusiliers, are likewise to be attached to the 6th division; and if, without inconvenience to the service, the 23rd Fusiliers, which have been for some time in Flanders, could be added to it, I should have four of my old regiments with me, a circumstance by which I should feel much gratified and obliged.

I trust, my Lord, you will not think this a ridiculous feeling on my part, as I am convinced I am more likely to meet your future approbation with officers who are well acquainted with me, and whose merits I can appreciate, than with entire strangers.

I could add another wish, which perhaps your Grace may not think quite so reasonable, namely, that the division might, if possible, resume its old name of the 4th division, one so often sanctioned by your approbation; and both Sir Thomas Picton and myself are considerably senior to all the Lieutenant-Generals in command of divisions.

I remain, my dear Lord, with the highest respect,
Yours most sincerely,

G. Lowry Cole.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Foreign Office, 29th May, 1815.

In answer to your Grace's despatch of the 24th instant, I have the honour to acquaint you that the form you propose to adopt in the conclusion of the treaties of subsidy with the minor Powers of the Continent is approved by the Prince Regent's government.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,

Castlereagh.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My dear Lord Duke, Cheltenham, 29th May, 1815.

I have received your letter of the 22nd respecting the recruiting for the German Legion in Belgium. The Commander in Chief has seen what you say on the subject, and I am authorised to acquaint you that he can have no wish to press a point against which you give such good reasons. Indeed, it was never His Royal Highness's intention that any public order should be given for recruiting in the Netherlands, and he is quite convinced that the King would never consent to any proposal of the kind. The fact is, that the German Legion have been accustomed for years past to recruit in the different states of Germany, not only without authority, but in most cases against the express orders of the local governments; and the colonels of regiments want now to do the same thing in Belgium by picking up such German stragglers as may be found in that country. Considering the jealousy of the King, however, it would be a delicate point to give any order for the execution of this service; and His Royal Highness feels that in the circumstances in which you are placed, it would not be fair to require you to give any such authority. But he has received so many applications on the subject, that he could not fail to bring the matter under your notice. It has occurred to me that a private communication might go from the Legion Office to the different commanding officers with instructions of limitation in regard to the description of the recruit, &c. If you disapprove this, you need not take the trouble of answering this letter, as I should not venture to suggest it without your private concurrence. Something must certainly be done to keep up the Legion, or that excellent corps will fall to the ground.

Ever, my dear Lord Duke, most faithfully and sincerely yours,

H. TORRENS.

The Duke de Feltre to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Gand, le 30 Mai, 1815, au matin.

Suivant des renseignements que j'ai reçu hier de Paris, le premier corps d'armée de Buonaparte serait fort de 20,000 hommes; le second corps serait également fort de 20,000 hommes; et le troisième corps serait aussi de 20,000 hommes. Enfin, le sixième corps ne serait que de 10,000 hommes. Réunis, ils forment la principale armée de Buonaparte. Total, 70,000 hommes.

La Garde de Buonaparte ne sera en tout, au 15 Juin, que de 15,000 hommes; et tout ce qui sera publié pour en faire croire le nombre plus grand sera, me dit on, évidemment exagéré.

Votre Excellence a vu par des renseignements que j'ai précédemment transmis que l'ex-Garde Impériale n'avait que 6000 hommes au 1er. Avril. On a depuis créé plusieurs régimens, mais on n'a pu extraire que 30 hommes de chaque régiment d'infanterie pour recruter la Garde, ce qui pour 105 régimens n'a donné que 3150 hommes d'infanterie. Ainsi l'assurance positive qu'on me donne que le 15 Juin cette Garde ne sera pas de plus de 15,000 hommes paraît vraisemblable.

Le quatrième corps, qui occupe le Département de la Moselle, et qui est commandé par le Lieutenant-Général Gérard, est de 15,000 hommes.

Le cinquième corps, qui occupe l'Alsace et que commande le Général Rapp, est aussi de 15,000 hommes.

En cas d'ouverture de la campagne Buonaparte se propose, m'assure-t-on, d'attirer à sa principale armée ces deux corps. On ne me dit pas sur quelle base pose cette idée. Il réunirait alors 115,000 hommes.

Le Général Le Courbe n'a à Béfort que 2500 hommes d'infanterie, et 800 chevaux. On n'augmentera pas sa cavalerie, mais son infanterie sera portée à 5000 hommes.

On ne me donne aucuns détails sur le nombre des troupes qui sont soit vers Chambery, soit en Provence, ou dirigées vers les Pyrénées et vers la Vendée.

On m'assure que Buonaparte a passé un marché pour 200,000 fusils avec des contrebandiers Anglais. (C'est peut-être pour des fusils dits de Traite.)

Voilà les choses, Monsieur le Duc, qui me parviennent par une voie sûre, et qui me paraissent mériter quelque croyance.

J'ai été indisposé pendant quelques jours. Je suis rétabli. Cela a mis à la régularité de ma correspondance avec Votre Excellence.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec les sentiments de la plus haute considération,

Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE DUC DE FELTRE.

[881.] G. O. Bruxelles, 31st May, 1815.

1. The Commander of the Forces is very desirous of relieving the infantry soldiers of the British army from a part of the weight which they now carry, and he therefore desires that the name and number of each man, and the letter of his company, may be marked upon his great coat, with a view to its being taken into store, and that the great coats may be packed in packages, each containing 20 great coats.

2. The packages must be marked each with the number of the regiment, the letter of the company, and the words "Great Coats belonging to Captain ——'s company."

3. This must be completed throughout the army by the 4th June, on which day the Commissaries attached to brigades are to send the great coats to the stores at Ostend.

4. The Commissaries attached to brigades of infantry are to supply the regiments, upon their requisition, with the means of packing the great coats as above ordered.

5. The Commissary of Stores is to take charge of the great coats.

6. These orders are to be communicated to, and obeyed by, all regiments on their landing.

7. The Commander of the Forces begs the attention of the General officers commanding divisions and brigades, and of the commanding officers of regiments, to the same object of relieving the soldiers from a part of the weight which they carry, and that no soldier may have more than three shirts, of which two only in his knapsack.

8. He likewise desires that some arrangement of distribution may be made by the officers commanding companies, so that the number of brushes which each soldier of the infantry carries may be diminished, and that every soldier may not carry the total number which are necessary for his use.

9. Thirty tents for each battalion of British infantry, and of infantry King's German Legion, and 60 tents for each brigade of Hanoverian infantry, will be sent by the Commissary of Stores and the Commissary-General to each division of infantry.

10. The Commissary-General will send with the tents the means of moving them; that is, one waggon with 2 horses, and a driver, for the tents of each battalion of British infantry, and of the infantry of the Legion; and 2 waggons with 4 horses, and 2 drivers, for the tents of each brigade of Hanoverian infantry.

11. The waggons and drivers are to be under the particular care of the Quartermasters of the regiments, who will see that the tents are properly packed in the waggons for a march.

12. The tents are to be under the direction of the Assistant Quartermaster-Generals attached to divisions, who will apply them as they may think proper, observing always to have the means of moving them from the place at which any of them may be used.

13. Notwithstanding that tents will be sent to the regiments, measures must be taken to render the blankets the soldiers have applicable as tents, in case it should be necessary.

WELLINGTON.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 31st May, 1815.

It appears always more certain that troops from the French frontier are marching to the interior, and that even forty pieces of ordnance from Valenciennes have taken that route, instead of going to the Camp de Rousies, as was said. The French papers, which I enclose to the 26th, confess that serious troubles are in the Vendée and Bretagne. I also enclose the last report I received from Valenciennes.

Numbers of National Guards are said to be willing to pass to this country, and it is expected that some will come this day.

A deserter from the 6th Chasseurs, who came in just now, assures positively that his regiment marched towards Paris, only one squadron remaining here; that several regiments of cavalry and infantry had taken the same route; and that they were told they were going against Spain.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

The Champ de Mai is postponed indefinitely.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Mai, 1815.

Recevez mes remercimens des informations que vous avez eu la bonté de me communiquer sur les forces de l'ennemi, et leur disposition. Il paraît que Buonaparte s'est occupé avec succès des moyens de remonter sa cavalerie, mais sur le total les forces disponibles ne seroient pas au-delà de ce que vous les avez évalué pouvoir être au commencement de Mai. Il semble que l'ennemi fixe son attention principale vers sa frontière Septentrionale. S'il ne parvient pas à augmenter considérablement ses forces effectives, et à organiser dans les départemens que les armées alliées menacent d'invasion un armement général, qui embarrasse les mouvemens en travaillant sur les derrières des armées, et gênant leur subsistance, on ne voit pas cependant qu'il sera à même d'opposer avec fruit une grande résistance aux forces infiniment supérieures qui sont destinés à l'attaquer des diverses frontières.

Agrécz l'expression de la très haute considération avec laquelle je suis

Votre affectionné,

GUILLAUME.

Major-Gen. Sir John Keane to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, May, 1815.

I have the honour of forwarding to your Grace a journal of the late operations against New Orleans, a copy of General Jackson's letter to the Secretary at War, and a plan of the country the army had to act in. Your Grace will readily see the cause of all our misfortunes and ultimate failure.

I very much hope this will find your Grace enjoying good health, and that you may have a long continuance of that blessing is the sincere wish of

Your Grace's ever grateful and obedient servant,

JOHN KEANE.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

A Journal of the Operations against New Orleans.

On the 25th of November, 1814, the squadron, having on board the 93rd and 95th regiments, one squadron of the 14th Dragoons dismounted, a company of Artillery, a detachment of the Rocket Brigade, and a company of Sappers, arrived in Negril Bay, Jamaica, the ultimate rendezvous appointed for these troops previous to commencing operations against the enemy. The force lately under Major-General Ross were found at Negril, and Major-General Keane assumed the command as senior officer.

The united force was as follows :—

14th Light Dragoons, 160 ; Royal Artillery, 360.

Advance under Colonel Thornton :—

85th, 460 ; 95th, 488 ; rocketmen, 40 : Total, 988.

1st Brigade—Major-General Keane :—

93rd, 907 ; 1st W. I., 65 ; 5th W.I., 643 : Total, 1615.

2nd Brigade—Colonel Brooke :—

4th, 893 ; 21st, 995 ; 44th, 647 : Total, 2535.

Two companies of Sappers and Miners.

At this period only one vessel with the 1st W. I. regiment had joined from Guadeloupe.

On the 27th the fleet sailed from Negril, General Keane having preceded the expedition in the Tonnant with Sir A. Cochrane, to concert the necessary measures, and endeavour to procure information and guides for the intended operations. The Tonnant touched at the Appalachicola River and Pensacola, and on the 8th of December anchored off Ship Island to wait the arrival of the fleet. On the morning of the 11th the headmost ships appeared, and by noon the following day the whole had anchored within the Tonnant. On the 13th the troopships and transports moved up to Cat's Island.

From the information obtained, the coast of Lake Borgne afforded the best prospect of success, as it could be gained without fear of discovery, and the smaller vessels could approach nearer to it than any other point. As, however, the distance was still 50 miles, and the boats of the fleet could not accommodate more than 2200 men at one time, it became necessary to select some intermediate point at which to collect the troops, and from whence the probable time of reaching the point of attack could be calculated. Colonel Thornton, with the advance, was directed to proceed and take possession of the point of land most favourable near the Rigolet Pass. Lieutenant Peddir, D.A.Q.M.G., was sent at the same time with the Hon. Captain Spencer of the navy, and an intelligent guide, to reconnoitre the Bayou Catalan, the intended place of debarkation.

Colonel Thornton landed on the Isle au Paix (formed by the branches of the Pearl River) in the afternoon of the 16th, and by the evening of the 19th the whole of the force had landed and hutted themselves ; the 1st W. I. hourly expected. The state of the weather, the shoalness of the water, and consequent difficulty of the navigation, threw the greatest obstacles in our way ; but by the exertions of the navy, and patient perseverance of all, these were overcome. The enemy's gun-vessels were captured on the 14th. . Lieutenant Peddir having returned from his reconnaissance, brought favourable accounts of the intended plan of landing. He entered Lake Borgne, ascended the Bayou Catalan, and landed at the mouth of the Canal la Ronda, whence he had penetrated to the high road on the bank of the Mississippi. He reported the plan as perfectly practicable, and that the enemy had no look-out in that quarter.

On the 21st instant the 21st and 44th regiments embarked in the gun-vessels and smaller craft ; and all arrangements being completed, the Memorandum No. 1 was issued, viz. :—

"The advance and 4th regiment will be in readiness to embark to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock, and the whole of the troops will move from hence as soon after as possible, except the 5th W. I. regiment, which will remain till further orders.

"The vessels having on board the 21st, 44th, and 93rd regiments, with the artillery and reserve ammunition, will come to off the Chefmenteur Passage two hours before sunset ; whilst the advance and 4th regiment will push on to the landing-point, so as to arrive there soon after dark. The troops will immediately land and establish themselves, and the boats return to receive the remainder, which it is presumed will be landed by an hour before daylight on the following morning.

"The whole will be formed as they arrive in column of companies at quarter-distance right in front, throwing out such piquets as may be necessary. No fires on any account to be lighted, and the strictest silence to be observed through the night.

"The 3-pounders will be attached to the advance, and the remainder of the artillery intended for immediate service will be put on shore after the 4th regiment has landed.

"Lieutenant Peddir will lead the advance and superintend its landing. Lieutenant Evans will be attached to the 21st, 44th, and 93rd regiments, and arrange them in the boats which return from landing the advance.

"The strictest attention must be paid that the troops enter the canal in regular succession of companies and regiments, according to the memorandum already issued on that subject."

On the morning of the 22nd the advance and 4th embarked in the boats, the 93rd also in the small vessels which had arrived the preceding night. By half-past 11 A.M. the whole of the expedition was under weigh: at sunset we were off the Chefmenteur Pass. Here the greater part of the vessels were either aground or compelled to anchor from shoal water. The advance continued to pull throughout the night, and at 12 o'clock entered the mouth of Bayou Catalan. A piquet of the enemy being posted half a mile up the creek, Captain Travers and a party of the 95th were sent forward, and succeeded in surprising them. It was broad daylight on the 23rd before the leading boat reached the narrow part of the Bayou, when it was found impracticable to ascend higher, as the water was a foot lower than when Lieutenant Peddir made his reconnaissance. The great object being to make our landing unobserved, General Keane decided upon attempting it at the point we then were, the mouth of the small canal of Monsieur Villeré. The country presented nothing but an extensive plain covered with reeds 7 feet high. About a mile in front was a thick swampy wood. The Bayou did not admit more than one boat at a time, and the troops were therefore obliged to pass over the boats as a bridge for a mile and a half, which necessarily took a considerable time. The sappers, under Captain Blanchard, cleared a passage for the troops, and threw small bridges over such streams as presented themselves in the line of march. By 10 o'clock the 85th and 95th were landed, and an advance guard was sent to occupy the wood. At noon the 4th had arrived, and the column then moved through the wood to its outlet, three-quarters of a mile from the main road. A party was sent to Villeré's house, where it took a militia piquet of 30 men; and having gained the high road, the column advanced along it towards New Orleans about half a mile. The piquets were then posted, resting the right on the wood and left on the river. One hundred men were sent half a mile down the river to our rear, and extended to the left, so as to gain the wood. A few cavalry appeared about 4 P.M. on the main road: a few shots being fired, they retired.

The country through which the army had hitherto moved was a perfect flat, but rather higher near the river than towards the wood, where the ground was swampy and the wood nearly impracticable. The cultivated part varied in breadth from 1000 to 1500 yards, and was much intersected by strong railing 5 feet high, placed horizontally, and a wet ditch or drain. Considerable houses, with large out-buildings and negro huts attached, were scattered at irregular distances along the trail of the cultivated ground; and from most of them a canal ran off in a parallel direction to the one by which we had ascended. The high road was tolerably good, but being simply of the soil of the country (rich mould) would evidently become bad, at least deep, with very little wet weather. The river here is about 1000 yards wide; along both banks a mound of earth 4 feet high is raised to prevent its overflowing the country.

The troops, from the long confinement in the boats, were fatigued by the time they reached their bivouac, and were employed cooking. At 8 o'clock a schooner and two gun-boats which had dropped down the river anchored abreast of our fires, and immediately commenced a heavy fire upon the camp. Half an hour after a column of 3000 moved down the road and attacked us in front, sending a force of 1500 to turn our right near the wood. In both he was repulsed by the 85th and 95th regiments, and 130 men of the 93rd, the 4th being constantly held in reserve. Failing in all attempts to force our position, the enemy retired at 12 o'clock. His loss was 500.

Receiving information on the 24th that 2000 men were in the neighbourhood of Détour des Anglais, our line was changed, throwing back the left so as to rest each flank on a canal, the advance holding its original position. The 25th, afternoon, the whole of the troops were on shore, with two 9-pounders, four 6-pounders, and two howitzers. All boats were despatched for provisions and ammunition; a few bullocks and a little Indian corn were only as yet met with. The schooner fired incessantly these two days: a few casualties occurred. At noon a ship came down and anchored opposite our advanced piquets; she carried 16 long 24's. At 2 P.M. Sir E. Pakenham arrived from England as Commander of the Forces. During the night a battery was constructed for firing hot shot against the schooner, and the guns were placed in it. At daylight on the 27th it opened; the fourth shot set her on fire, and at 9 A.M. she blew up. The ship instantly weighed and ran up the river.

At early day on the 28th the troops moved forward in two columns, driving in the enemy's piquets to within six miles of the town. There we discovered their main body strongly posted behind a canal, having a parapet in front, the extent of which was only 1000 yards. Their right rested on the Mississippi, which was further protected by the armed ship moored in such a position as to enfilade our columns advancing.

The left column, under Major-General Keane, moved along the high road to within 500 yards of the enemy's right; he then opened two heavy guns upon the head of the column, which was immediately placed under cover of some houses. The ship at the same time opened a cross fire, and kept up a very hot fire for an hour. The columns were then deployed, and the line secured as well as the nature of the country would admit.

The enemy had two heavy guns on his right, one 32-pounder in his centre, and a small 9 on his left. With these and the ship he cannonaded us throughout the day, but with little effect, our casualties not exceeding 60 men. In the evening the line was retired to near the habitation of La Ronda, and orders were given to hut. Ground was also marked out for a redoubt on our right, and the guns on our left covered from the enemy's fire. From the 28th to the 31st every exertion was made to get up from the ships ten 18-pounders and four 24-pounder carronades with the stores and ammunition. The canal was of the greatest service, as it enabled us to bring them within half a mile of the high road. For this purpose the canoes of the country were used, and carried a gun with ease: from thence they were transported on the carriages of the country, dragged by the seamen with incredible labour. During this period the enemy established two batteries of one gun each on the opposite bank of the river, and threw shot daily into our camp with some effect.

Four 18-pounders were placed in battery made of sugar in hogsheads on the main road to fire on the ship if she again dropped down, and preparations were made to establish batteries, one for six 18-pounders, and one for four 24-pounder carronades, to breach the centre of the enemy's line; and the field pieces were to keep their fire under while the troops advanced to storm the breach, should it be found practicable. On the evening of the 31st, Lieutenant Wright, of the Engineers, an enterprising and intelligent officer, was killed in the wood reconnoitering. In the night strong working parties were employed in erecting the batteries and getting in the guns; in this service they were ably assisted by the seamen under Sir Thomas Troubridge, whose exertions are deserving of every praise. Before daylight the whole was complete, and the batteries ready to open on the enemy's line.

The Commander of the Forces issued the following order for the attack :—

"Head-quarters, Maison Villeré, 31st Dec., 1814.

"When the batteries have silenced the enemy's fire and opened his works, the position will be carried as follows :—Advance of 400 men divided into a firing party of 100 in line, and 50 paces in rear of them the remaining 300 three deep; arms slung to carry fascines, which are to fill up the ditch opposite the breach. The column to move in close files, and throw the fascines in one spot. When they are lodged, the men will extend along the ditch, the firing party taking ground also to the flanks.

"The 2nd brigade, under Major-General Gibbs, will assault in column of battalions, left in front, at 50 yards interval between each. Not a shot should be fired, and nothing should impede the head of the column till master of the enemy's line : such troops as they may hold upon it should be charged by corps on entry as quick as possible. The leading regiments may attack by wings, and the succeeding by battalion. When the enemy are shaken, a new formation will be made.

"False attacks will be made on both flanks, from the left of the 3rd brigade, and through the wood on the right of the 2nd. General Keane's demonstration should not amount to a committal, unless an evidently favourable opportunity presents itself; but every facility to overcome obstacles should be placed at the Major-General's disposal.

"80 British and 100 blacks to enter the wood in front of the redoubt on the right of the line before day, and endeavour by a small circuit to reach the left flank of the enemy's position. If they fall in with his outposts before the hour of assault, they should conceal themselves till the general attack, when every exertion should be made (at whatever distance) to attract his attention by firing, bugling, &c.; and if circumstances permit, actually penetrate in his rear.

"Three companies of the 4th regiment to be formed in column of half companies close to the wood in line, with the reserve columns to prevent the enemy sortieing from his left at the time of assault; and this will also secure a reserve to the flankers detached through the wood."

The morning of the new year was foggy, and objects could not be discerned at any distance until nine o'clock. The batteries then opened along our line : great confusion was apparent in that of the enemy for some time. They soon, however, returned our fire with considerable effect, our fire making no impression on their parapet. The order for assault was therefore not executed. The troops remained in the advanced position the whole day to protect the guns, and retire them when dark. In the evening it rained hard, and the ground became so deep that it required the whole army as a working party, aided by the seamen, to retire the guns even a short distance before daylight. The troops then fell back to the ground they occupied on the 31st.

The 2nd and 3rd, parties were sent to improve our road to the rear, which was much injured by the late rain, and to continue it as far as possible on the right bank of the Bayou Catalan. The boats still continued incessantly employed in bringing up supplies. A post of 100 men, under Major De Bathe, 85th, was established 3½ miles on the road to Détour des Anglais, and supplies of cattle and horses were drawn from thence. The enemy withdrew the guns from a work they had near that point, and passed them over to the right bank, where they had a work with 8 guns and 100 men.

On the 4th 200 men were employed in widening the canal Villeré, to render it passable for boats, under the idea of passing over a body of troops to the right bank of the river, and carry the batteries the enemy had constructed there, commanding our left flank, and which they continued to improve and work at laboriously.

The 5th, accounts received of the arrival of the Fusiliers and 43rd under General Lambert. The following day great part of these corps landed.

The evening of the 6th the canal was nearly ready: on that of the 7th 50 boats were brought up from the Bayou, and other arrangements made for a general attack on the morning of the 8th. The force destined to cross the river was the 85th regiment, 300 strong, 200 marines, 200 seamen, and a large portion of the 5th W. I. regiment, two 9-pounders, and two howitzers; the whole under Colonel Thornton. This force was to cross in two divisions, and it was hoped they would effect a landing and carry the works before daylight; then turn the guns upon the enemy's line, and thus be in prolongation of our left.

The following memorandum was sent to the General officers for the attack on the morning of the 8th.

"Head-quarters, 7th Jan., 1815.

"The troops to fall in at four o'clock to-morrow morning. The 2nd and 3rd brigades will arrive before clear day on the ground now occupied by the piquets. An advanced guard, to consist of 300 of the 95th and the 44th regiment, to occupy the old batteries. This force is to be divided into 400 to fire, 300 of whom are to be of the 44th, and 250 to carry fascines if required.

"The chief attack will be made by the 2nd brigade advancing from its left in column of companies, covered by the firing party, and preceded by the soldiers who carry the fascines.

"When the fascines are lodged, the men who carried them will join the 44th regiment and commence firing.

"The light infantry companies of the 2nd brigade are to be formed in battalion, having attached to it 100 blacks, under Lieutenant-Colonel Jones of the 4th regiment. This corps will skirt the wood as a protection to General Gibbs's right, and for his after disposal, till possessed of the enemy's lines, when it will be used as a corps of pursuit.

"The left companies of the Fusiliers, 43rd and 93rd regiments, and 100 of the 1st W. I. under Lieutenant-Colonel Renny of the 21st regiment, to be formed on Major-General Keane's left, and be considered as belonging to his command.

"The 1st brigade will compose the reserve, to which the 1st W. I. regiment will be attached, as also the dismounted dragoons off duty. The reserve will form in front of the huts occupied by the 93rd regiment.

"The effect produced by the movement on the right bank must in a great degree influence Major-General Keane's point of attack. Should the batteries dislodge the enemy's right, that would be the line, and the flankers should follow the 95th regiment. Should the enemy be enabled to hold their ground on the right, the attack must be to our left of that of the 2nd brigade, when our impression will answer both columns; and it will be impossible for the enemy to oblique the fire of his flanks sufficiently to enable his injuring the columns from his whole front when close up to his works.

"When the position is carried, the flank battalions to press the enemy's rear for half a mile, or the receipt of instructions. A detachment of sappers to accompany each column.

"The advance guard is to carry forward with it six long ladders with planks on them, and ten small ladders as well as the fascines. The officer commanding the 44th regiment must ascertain where these requisites are this evening, so as there may be no delay in taking them forward to-morrow morning to the old batteries.

"When the advance has taken up its ground and placed a few sentries, the piquets should join their corps.

"The flank battalion under Lieutenant-Colonel Renny will carry the outwork battery on the enemy's right, and spike the guns."

When dark, on the evening of the 7th, the boats commenced passing into the river. A dam had been thrown across below the sternmost boat, which raised the water 2 feet: still there was a very considerable fall from the river, and through which (an extent of 200 yards) the boats were with incredible labour dragged by the seamen. It required the whole night to accomplish this, and the day had dawned before the first part of Colonel Thornton's command, 500 men, had embarked; and they had just reached the opposite bank as the main attack commenced on the enemy's line.

The troops advanced as ordered. The light brigade, under Lieutenant-Colonel Renny, gained the work on the enemy's right; but not being supported, they were overpowered, and in a few minutes scarcely a man remained alive. The 93rd regiment was originally intended to support Colonel Renny, but an order received during the advance placed it too far to the right. The ditch in front of Major-General Keane's column was found to be impassable. The 93rd regiment suffered most severely on this occasion.

In the main attack by the 2nd brigade under General Gibbs, the 44th regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Mullens, advanced without the fascines, &c. The 21st regiment, which followed in support, on being exposed to the fire on the verge of the ditch, wavered, broke its chain of communication, commenced firing, and finally gave way, throwing the 4th regiment into confusion, and leaving its two leading companies, under Brevet-Major M'Haffir, in the enemy's ditch, who were of course made prisoners.

It was in the endeavour to command obedience and conduct from these troops that our noble commander of the forces exposed himself and received two dreadful wounds, the second mortal. Major-General Gibbs was also mortally wounded about the same time, and Major-General Keane on the left severely so.

The attack having failed, the troops were recalled under cover of the artillery. The cannonade continued till nine o'clock, when the firing ceased on both sides.

Our loss on this memorable morning was 2030 in killed, wounded, and missing.

Having thus detailed the events of the 17 days which the army has been employed upon this coast, it is a justice due to it to revert to the difficulties it had to surmount.

The first and most serious appears — the distance we were removed from our supplies, above 60 miles, in an intricate and uncertain navigation.

A second was the absolute impossibility of gaining intelligence. The inhabitants had abandoned their houses, and not a single deserter came over to us. The information of the prisoners was vague and contradictory, that of the negroes trifling and unsatisfactory.

The nature of the soil rendered our operations uncertain, and dependent entirely on the weather. Fortunately it was in general moderate, otherwise little of what was done could have been attempted.

The enemy, long before our appearance on the coast, had been apprised of our intended operations (vide the following extract). He was therefore fully prepared.

Extract from a Proclamation published by Major Nicholls of the Marines serving with the Indians, by order of Sir Alexander Cochrane, dated Pensacola, in August or September last.

"A powerful reinforcement is on its way here, and I hope to prepare for the Americans some employment very different from that of oppressing the inhabitants of Louisiana."

Our extreme want of boats and small vessels rendered it impossible to land more than 2000 men at one time, and it became an act, if not of necessity, of prudence, to wait the remainder, as well as some part of our artillery, ere we could have advanced any distance.

The enemy's line was short, strongly flanked, and not possible to be turned. The flank fire from his floating batteries exposed us to severe loss whenever we advanced beyond the protection of our own guns.

The population of the country, which we had been led to expect would receive us, if not with open arms, at least with an aspect of neutrality, formed the greater part of the force opposed to us; and from letters and documents found in their houses, bore us as little goodwill as the people who were at the moment ruling them with martial law, and forcing them to carry arms with a degree of tyranny not excelled by the conscription.

II.

Copy of a Letter from General Jackson to the Secretary at War, dated Camp below New Orleans, 9th Jan., 1815.

SIR,

During the days of the 6th and 7th the enemy had been employed in making preparations for an attack upon my lines. With infinite labour they had succeeded in the night of the 7th in getting their boats across from the lake to the river by widening the canal, by which they had effected their disembarkation. It had not been in my power to impede these operations by a general attack. Added to other reasons, the nature of the troops under my command, mostly militia, rendered it too hazardous to attempt extensive offensive movements in an open country against a numerous and well-disciplined army. Although my forces, as to number, had been increased by the arrival of the Kentucky division, my strength had received very little addition, as only a small portion of that detachment were provided with arms. Compelled thus to wait the attack of the enemy, I took every measure to repel it when it should be made, and to defeat the object he had in view. General Morgan with the Orleans contingent, the Louisiana militia, and a strong detachment of the Kentucky troops, occupied an intrenched camp at the opposite side of the river, protected by strong batteries on the bank, erected by Commodore Patterson. In my encampment everything was ready for action, when early on the morning of the 8th the enemy, after throwing a heavy shower of bombs and Congreve rockets, advanced their columns on the right and left to storm my intrenchments. I cannot speak sufficiently in praise of the firmness and deliberation with which my whole line received their approach. More could not have been expected from veterans inured to war. For an hour the fire of small arms was as incessant and severe as can be imagined. The artillery, too, directed by officers who displayed equal skill and courage, did great execution. Yet the columns of the enemy continued to advance with a firmness which reflects upon them the greatest credit. Twice the column which approached my left was repulsed by the troops of General Carroll, those of General Coffee, and a division of the Kentucky militia; and twice they formed again and renewed the assault. At length, however, cut to pieces, they fled in confusion from the field, leaving it covered with their dead and wounded. The loss which the enemy sustained on this occasion cannot be estimated at less than 1500 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Upwards of 300 have already been given over for burial, and my men are still engaged in picking them up within my lines and carrying them to the point where the enemy are to receive them. This is in addition to the dead and wounded whom the enemy have been enabled to carry from the field during and since the action, and to those who have since died of wounds they received. We have taken about 500 prisoners, 300 of whom are wounded, and a great part of them mortally. My loss has not exceeded, and I believe has not amounted to, ten killed, and as many wounded. The entire destruction of the enemy's army was inevitable, had it not been for an unfortunate occurrence which at this moment took place on the other side of the river. Simultaneously with his advance upon my lines, he had thrown over in his boats a considerable force to the right bank. These having landed, were hardy enough to advance against the works of General Morgan; and what is strange and difficult to account for, at the very moment when their entire discomfiture was looked for with a confidence approaching to certainty, the Kentucky reinforcements, on whom so much reliance had been placed, ingloriously fled, drawing after them, by their example, the remainder of the forces, and thus yielding to the enemy that most formidable position. The batteries which for many days had rendered me the most important services, though bravely defended, were of course now abandoned, not, however, until the guns were spiked. This unfortunate rout had totally changed the aspect of affairs: the enemy now occupied a position from which they might annoy us without hazard, and by means of which they might have been able to defeat, in a great measure, the effect of our services on this side the river. It became, therefore, an object of the first consequence to dislodge him as soon as possible. For this object all the means in my power, which I could with safety use, were immediately put in preparation. Perhaps it was owing somewhat to another cause that I succeeded even beyond my expectations. In negotiating the terms of a temporary suspension of hostilities to enable the enemy to bury their dead and provide for their wounded, I had required certain propositions to be acceded to as a basis, among which this was one, "That although hostilities should cease on this side the river until twelve o'clock this day, yet it was not to be understood that they should cease on the other side, but that no reinforcements should be sent across by either army until the expiration of that hour."

His Excellency Major-General Lambert begged time to consider of these propositions until ten o'clock, and in the mean time recrossed his troops. I need not tell you with how much eagerness I immediately regained possession of the position he had thus happily quitted.

The enemy having concentrated his forces, may again attempt to drive me from my position by storm. Whenever he does, I have no doubt my men will act with their usual firmness, and sustain a character now become dear to them.

ANDREW JACKSON, Major-General Commanding.

MEMORANDA. [882.]

June, 1815.

The Powers of Europe having agreed, by the Treaty of General Alliance, of the 25th March last, that a separate convention should be entered into for the purpose of regulating the subsistence of the armies; and it being expedient that the stipulations of that convention should be made applicable to the situation in which the Allied armies will find themselves within the French territory, they have named * to discuss, settle, and arrange the terms of the said convention.

ART. 1. The countries within the French frontier which, in the course of the operations of the war, shall fall into the hands of the Allies, shall be made over to the officers to be appointed by His Majesty Louis XVIII., who shall govern them under His Majesty's instructions according to the laws and constitution of France.

ART. 2. These officers shall receive and draw from them all the resources which they can afford for the prosecution of the war and the attainment of the just object the Allies have in view.

ART. 3. All requisitions for subsistence, &c. &c., on the country shall be made by the officers to be appointed by His Majesty Louis XVIII.; and with this view His Majesty is requested to appoint a sufficient number of commissaries or other officers to reside at the head-quarters of the several armies, in order to receive the requisitions of the officers at the head of their several contingents, and to have them executed in the country, and to see that those who supply them receive proper vouchers and receipts.

ART. 4. A stipulation to the same effect as the note attached to our ratification.

WELLINGTON.

MEMOIR by the COMPTROLLERS respecting the SUBSIDIES to the THREE GREAT POWERS. From Mr. ROSENHAGEN.

June, 1815.

It is proposed that the subsidies to be given to the Three Great Powers be fixed in a foreign currency, with an option to Great Britain to pay them in certain coins, the value of which in such foreign currency may be at once agreed upon.

French money (francs) appears to be the most proper for the basis of the agreement, because it is the most current in the theatre of war, whether France or the Netherlands, and because it is probable that the payments will be most easily effected in French gold and silver coin.

	Francs.
If 5,000,000*l.* sterling are to be given to the Three Great Powers, the amount in French money, at 24 francs to the pound sterling, would be ..	120,000,000
But at the present rate of 20 francs it would be only	100,000,000
Which would amount for each of the three Powers to	33,333,333

This sum, then, the British government might bind itself to supply to Austria, Russia, and Prussia respectively, at such places as might be agreed upon, taking upon herself the chances of any variations in the exchanges, and reserving to herself (although with the desire of affording therein every convenience in her power to the Allies) the option of paying it in French money, or in the following coins, at the rates affixed to each:—

Gold.

	Francs.	Cents.
Guineas	25	20
George d'ors or Fredericks d'or	20	50
Ducats (Dutch)	11	70
Doubloons	32	75
German Convention money, reichsthalers, at ..	4	5
Spanish piastres	5	40
Dutch guilders, and other Dutch money, at 11 guilders for	24	—
Hamburg currency, at 13 marks for	24	—

In order to facilitate the first operations of the Allies, it will probably be considered very essential that some advances should at once be made to them.

It would be impossible, considering the demands for specie for our own army, to make them such advances immediately in money; and it would have the worst effect upon our exchanges if we were to give them bills upon England, or allow them to draw upon this country. It is therefore suggested that for such immediate advances bills upon Hamburg and upon Amsterdam should be furnished to them, at three months' date, which we should thereby have time to provide for by means which would less hurt our exchanges with the Continent than any negotiations on their part. Bills for 600,000*l.* (200,000*l.* to each Power) of this description could be furnished immediately.

PRINCIPAL ARTICLES of INSTRUCTION communicated by the KING of the TWO SICILIES to the Members of the Commission for modifying the Constitution, agreeably to the Royal Despatch of June 1, 1815.

1. The kingdom of Sicily continues in the enjoyment of its constitution and of the same national representation now established, and consisting of two Houses, one of Peers and the other of Commons.

2. The Roman Catholic Apostolic religion shall be the only one, to the exclusion of every other. The King must profess this religion.

3. The legislative power is exercised collectively by the King, by the House of Peers, and by that of the members representing the Commons; but laws are proposed by the King, and freely discussed and passed by a majority of votes of each of the two Houses.

4. The King may, as he pleases, propose a law either to the House of Peers or to that of the Commons, except when it relates to a tax, which must be addressed to the House of Commons.

5. It is competent to either of the two Houses to request the King to propose a law upon any subject whatever, and to point out what, in their estimation, the law should contain. His Majesty, upon examination, shall propose the law, if he deem it proper, whereupon the regular discussion of the two Houses commences.

6. The King alone sanctions and promulgates the laws.

7. The House of Peers to be composed of all the present Peers. Should other Bishoprics be erected, the new Bishops and their successors shall be spiritual Peers. It shall be lawful for the King to create as many additional temporal Peers as he pleases, provided they be Sicilians and have a clear income of 2000 ounces. The new Peers created by the King, as well as the successors to the present Peers, shall take their seats in the House at the age of twenty-five, but shall be able to give a deliberative vote only at thirty years of age.

8. All the Princes of the Royal family are Peers in right of their birth, but have no deliberative vote prior to their twenty-fifth year, nor can they be present in the House without the King's permission being given to that effect at the beginning of every session of Parliament.

9. No more than six Jurisconsults shall have seats in the House of Peers, who shall during their lives enjoy all the honours and prerogatives of Peers, and the King shall select them from out of the most distinguished magistrates.

10. The House of Commons shall continue to be formed in the manner now established, but it shall not be lawful to exclude those holding offices under the executive power, according to the practice of the British Parliament. No representative is admissible to a seat in the House unless he be of the age of thirty-five years.

11. The King alone shall possess the privilege of calling, proroguing, or dissolving the Parliament.

12. The executive power resides solely in the King.

13. The King is the supreme head of the state: he commands the land and sea forces; declares war; concludes treaties of peace, alliance, and commerce; appoints to all political, civil, judiciary, and military posts; issues such regulations and edicts as are necessary for the execution of the laws and the security of the state; and he exercises the Apostolic Legation as well as all the rights belonging to the Royal patronage of the Crown.

14. The King's person is sacred and inviolable. The Ministers and Councillors of State are responsible.

15. The succession to the Crown continues to be regulated by the dispositions set forth in the Act of solemn cession, executed by the august King Charles III. on the 6th of October, 1759.

16. The most extensive and most constant enjoyment of civil liberty, and of the security of persons, of properties, and of the rights of Sicilians, is fully guaranteed.

17. A new code of civil and criminal laws, of procedure, of commerce, and of health, and a new and better adapted organisation of the offices of magistrate, shall secure the administration of justice, and render it more firm, more pure, more impartial, and more easy.

18. The power of sitting in judgment emanates from the King, and is exercised by Judges chosen and instituted by the King from among the Sicilians alone. The Judges denominated perpetual, and those for two years, on being elected and instituted by the King, are irremovable, that is to say, the former during their lives, and the latter for the period of their two years, excepting such cases as shall be specified by the law.

19. The liberty of opinions and of the press is maintained with such precautions as were, for the sake of public tranquillity, adopted last year in France by Louis XVIII.

20. The public revenue arises from the ordinary and extraordinary contributions. The former constitute the fixed and permanent endowment of the state, and are distinctly set apart for the payment of the creditors of the state, of the civil list, of the forces by land and by sea, of the magistracy, of the public officers, of the administration and of whatever is necessary for the uniform satisfaction of all the charges and ordinary services of the state, as established with consent of the two Houses and with the sanction of the King: nor shall it be lawful hereafter to alter their amount, but they shall be confirmed every four years in the first sittings of each new Parliament, and only the object and nature of them shall, at those periods, be changed and improved in accordance with the constitutional forms. The latter arise from temporary aids to be, on every emergency, proposed by the King in the same manner as the other laws: it is optional for the two Houses to grant them, and they endure for such time as the same deem it just to provide.

21. The civil list is settled, for the whole duration of the reign, by the first Parliament convened after the raising of the King to the throne.

22. The administration of the public revenue belongs entirely to the executive power. The Minister of Finance is obliged to present annually to Parliament a detailed account of the income and expenditure of that administration, which account shall also be printed and published.

23. The abolition of the feudal system and of feudal jurisdictions and rights is confirmed, according to the Resolutions of the Parliament in 1812.

24. After the King shall have re-entered upon the possession of his kingdom of Naples, the sovereignty of Naples and of Sicily shall continue to be united, as it has been heretofore, in the person of the King and of the Sovereigns his successors.

25. After that event, whenever the King shall be disposed to withdraw from Sicily and reside at Naples, he shall leave in Sicily, as his representative, a Royal Prince of his family, or, in default of such, some Sicilian of distinction, and shall confer either upon the one or the other the exercise, in his Royal name, of so much of the sovereign authority as he shall deem adequate to the despatch of the affairs respecting the internal government of Sicily.

26. The representative of the King shall exercise, with the consent of the Privy Council, and in conformity with the constitutional laws, all the power of the executive authority which shall have been conferred upon him by the King.

27. The King, in the same case of his residing in Naples, shall always leave in Sicily 8000 regular troops of all arms, of his only Royal army, who shall be maintained out of the Sicilian treasury on a sum set apart for that purpose. It shall be competent to the King to change them whenever he shall be so inclined, provided there remain not in the island a number short of that of 8000 troops just mentioned.

28. There shall also, in the said case, be left in Sicily a portion of the only Royal marine, proportioned to the custody of the coast, which portion shall likewise be maintained from the Sicilian treasury upon a separate allowance and according to the tenor of the preceding Article.

29. All the appointments and offices, of whatever description, civil as well as ecclesiastical, depending on the internal government of Sicily, shall exclusively be held by Sicilians, nor shall it be lawful ever to confer them upon any foreigner, in the same manner as it shall not be lawful to bestow upon any Sicilian any post or employment of whatever sort, whether civil or ecclesiastical, belonging to the internal government of Naples, whenever the King shall have re-entered on the possession of the same.

30. The appointments of the Royal household, the orders of knighthood, the titles of nobility, all the military preferments, and the posts connected with the foreign relations, the King shall be at liberty to confer promiscuously upon persons of all his dominions, and to whomsoever he may judge it most proper for his service and the good of the state.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Foreign Office, 1st June, 1815.

In reference to your Excellency's despatch of the 26th ult., enclosing the copy of a Counter Projet for a Subsidiary Treaty between His Majesty and the King of Bavaria, I have the honour to acquaint your Grace that the Prince Regent entirely approves your Grace's reply to the Bavarian envoy on this subject, wherein you declined mixing any political stipulations with the proposed subsidiary arrangement.

With respect to the mode of payment for the battering-train, adverted to in the 4th Article of the Projet, I concur with your Grace's opinion upon that subject.

I have the honour to be, with the highest respect and esteem, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

Castlereagh.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord Fitz Roy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 1st June, 1815.

The French have strengthened yesterday their line in front of Valenciennes, and send about 1500 men to Carouge, Onain, and St. Lauve; but I believe this is only to mask their sending troops to the interior, though there is also a report of 16,000 men having arrived at Chimay with 80 pieces of ordnance, and Buonaparte at Laon, which I think is likewise spread for the same purpose. My man from Laon is not yet returned. I have sent another to Chimay to ascertain the above-mentioned report.

The officer commanding the post at Quivrain told our officer who brought the letter from Marshal Bellune that a French General went over to us some days ago, and seemed apprehensive that some more would follow.

I have the honour to include papers to the 28th.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Ordre du Jour du Maréchal Soult.

Paris, le 1 Juin, 1815.

La plus auguste cérémonie vient de consacrer nos institutions. L'Empereur a reçu des mandataires du peuple et des députations de tous les corps de l'armée l'expression des vœux de la nation entière sur l'Acte Additionnel aux Constitutions de l'Empire, qui avait été envoyé à son acceptation, et un nouveau serment unit la France et l'Empereur. Ainsi les destinées s'accomplissent, et tous les efforts d'une ligue impie ne pourront plus séparer les intérêts d'un grand peuple, du héros que les plus brillants triomphes ont fait admirer de l'univers.

C'est au moment où la volonté nationale se manifeste avec autant d'énergie que des cris de guerre se font entendre; c'est au moment où la France est en paix avec toute l'Europe que des armées étrangères avancent sur nos frontières! Quel est l'espoir de cette nouvelle coalition? Veut-elle plonger dans la servitude 28,000,000 de Français? A-t-elle oubliée que la première ligue qui fut formée contre notre indépendance servit à notre agrandissement et à notre gloire? Cent victoires éclatantes, que des revers momentanés et des circonstances malheureuses n'ont pu effacer, lui rappellent qu'une nation libre, conduite par un grand homme, est invincible.

Tout est soldat en France quand il s'agit de l'honneur national et de la liberté: un intérêt commun unit aujourd'hui tous les Français. Les engagements que la violence nous avait arrachés sont détruits par la fuite des Bourbons du territoire Français, par l'appel qu'ils ont fait aux armées étrangères pour remonter sur le trône qu'ils ont abandonné, et par le vœu unanime de la nation, qui, en reprenant le libre exercice de ses droits, a solennellement désavoué tout ce qui a été fait sans sa participation.

Les Français ne peuvent recevoir des lois de l'étranger; ceux même qui sont allés y mendier un secours parricide ne tarderont pas à reconnaître et à éprouver, ainsi que leurs prédécesseurs, que le mépris et l'infamie suivent leurs pas, et qu'ils ne peuvent laver l'opprobre dont ils se couvrent qu'en rentrant dans nos rangs.

Mais une nouvelle carrière de gloire s'ouvre devant l'armée ; l'histoire consacrera le souvenir des faits militaires qui auront illustré les défenseurs de la patrie et de l'honneur national. Les ennemis sont nombreux, dit-on ; que nous importe? Il sera plus glorieux de les vaincre, et leur défaite aura d'autant plus d'éclat. La lutte qui va s'engager n'est pas au-dessus du génie de Napoléon, ni au-dessus de nos forces. Ne voit-on pas tous les départements rivalisant d'enthousiasme et de dévouement ; former comme par enchantement cinq cents superbes bataillons de gardes nationales, qui déjà sont venus doubler nos rangs, défendre nos places, et s'associer à la gloire de l'armée? C'est l'élan d'un peuple généreux qu'aucune puissance ne peut vaincre, et que la postérité admirera.

Bientôt le signal sera donné ; que chacun soit à son devoir ! Du nombre des ennemis nos phalanges victorieuses vont tirer un nouvel éclat. Soldats, Napoléon guide vos pas ; nous combattons pour l'indépendance de notre belle patrie, nous sommes invincibles.

Le Maréchal d'Empire, Major-Général,

DUC DE DALMATIE.

Marshal Marmont to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Aix-la-Chapelle, le 1er Juin, 1815.

La haute estime que je professe pour votre caractère et la confiance que j'ai en vos sentimens pour moi me déterminent à vous prier de trouver bon que je vous entretienne de la situation particulière dans laquelle les circonstances actuelles m'ont placé. Je mets beaucoup de prix à votre approbation, et je réclame votre appui.

Vous connaissez toutes les circonstances qui ont précédé la Révolution qui s'est opérée, et il serait superflu de vous en entretenir. Il y a eu du remède à tout jusqu'au dernier moment ; mais l'aveuglement et l'imprévoyance qui ont amené le renversement du gouvernement du Roi n'ont pas cessé, même après l'avoir consommé. Etranger à tout ce qui s'est fait, à tout ce qui s'ést décidé, je n'ai pu qu'élever une voix impuissante. Toutefois dans les derniers tems l'urgence du danger m'a décidé à faire diverses démarches directes qui ont été sans aucun succès. J'ai cherché à éveiller la sollicitude du Roi sur les mesures à prendre, soit qu'il voulut rester à Paris, soit qu'il voulut en partir, à lui faire déterminer le point de retraite le plus convenable, et à prendre d'avance les mesures nécessaires pour s'en assurer la possession. Au moment du départ je l'ai supplié de se diriger sur le Havre ou sur Cherbourg, mais tout a été inutile, et il a fallu passer la frontière. Resté en France, le Roi aurait soutenu ses partisans, formé une armée, et peut-être trouvé les moyens de terminer seul sa querelle. Sorti de France, la question a changé de nature. Les armées étrangères sont le seul appui qui lui reste, et leur entrée en France déterminera peut-être un grand nombre de Français dévoués au Roi à se réunir à ses ennemis, tant est populaire l'opinion qu'il faut toujours se réunir contre les étrangers.

Je connais une multitude d'officiers qui certainement l'auraient défendu, qui peut-être combattront contre lui.

Dans cet état de choses quelle étrange situation que celle d'un ancien chef de l'armée Française qui se trouve hors de son pays! Marchera-t-il avec les armées étrangères au mépris des principes qu'il a professés toute sa vie? Combattra-t-il avec elles des hommes qui furent 23 ans ses compagnons, et qui par leur sang servirent sa fortune et son élévation? Non, sans doute. Il est une sorte de fraternité d'armes, qui ne peut cesser, une origine qu'on ne peut méconnaître, et la guerre qu'on fait à son pays ne cesse de porter un cachet odieux qu'autant qu'on la fait avec ses compatriotes mêmes.

Je veux, Monsieur le Duc, conserver une réputation d'amour de la patrie, qui est à mes yeux le premier des biens, et que de longs travaux m'ont mérités, et pour cela je ne peux attacher mon nom qu'à des événemens qui portent un caractère national. Lorsqu'ils naîtront je suis prêt à y prendre la part que mes devoirs et mes intérêts me commandent; jusques-là la seule chose qui me convienne est le repos et l'isolement. Je suis un proscrit; je ne suis pas et ne puis être un émigré. Vous sentirez, Monsieur le Duc, la différence de ces deux mots, vous, qui avez une patrie, et qui l'aimez et la servez si bien. Les émigrés n'en ont pas et ne sauraient me comprendre.

Peut-être des témoignages d'une grande confiance du Roi auraient pu me donner des liens qu'il m'eut été impossible de briser; mais il n'en est rien, et je possède à cet égard toute ma liberté.

Je calcule peu mes intérêts de fortune et de faveur en m'arrêtant au parti que j'adopte, car le mouvement général de toutes les armées de l'Europe annonce assez quel sera le résultat de la lutte qui va s'engager; mais quelque soit mon sort personnel, je n'aurai pas de regrets, parce que je cède au vœu de ma conscience et à l'espoir d'avoir l'approbation des gens que j'estime.

Après avoir réfléchi au point où il me convient de me retirer, j'ai pensé que c'était la Hollande qui offrait le plus d'avantages et le moins d'inconvénients. Un des motifs de mon choix est que ce pays est sous votre commandement, et j'invoque votre bienveillance pour pouvoir y demeurer protégé et tranquille. J'y resterai jusqu'à ce que je puisse servir mon pays, utilement pour lui et honorablement pour moi.

Je charge le Colonel Comte Denys, mon premier aide-de-camp, de porter cette lettre à Votre Excellence, et de lui réitérer de vive voix, comme je le fais ici par écrit, l'assurance de la haute considération et du sincère attachement avec lesquels

J'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE MAL. DUC DE RAGUSE.

[888.] To Earl Bathurst.

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 2nd June, 1815.

This letter will be delivered to your Lordship by General Donnadieu, who has been for some time at my head-quarters.

He is, I believe, very determined in his opinions against Buonaparte; and should he be required or be directed to aid the operations on the western coast of France, I have reason to think that he may be confided in.

Your Lordship's faithful servant,

WELLINGTON.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Vienna, 2nd June, 1815.

You will hear of Talleyrand's notion as to recommending a provisional government to the King.

His nomination of the ministry, I have reason to know, will be as follows:—

Minister of War		Clarke,* assisted by Tabacier.
„	L'Intérieur	Vaublanc or Barbet Marbois.
„	La Police	Anglois.
„	Finance	Louis.
„	Les Cultes	Lally Tolendal.

He will insist upon there being no Minister de la Maison du Roi, and Blacas is to be entirely without employment, and not to be replaced. Neither he nor any of the Princes are to be in the Conseil, or take part in the deliberations, which are never to be in presence of the King. The Ministers are to confer and place their decisions before the King for his approbation. He is to declare he will conduct himself dans un sens tout à fait constitutionnel. Talleyrand will be very positive. He thinks he has secured the consent of all the Powers to this course of conduct, and the least obstinacy or difficulty will make him retreat into the retirement already arranged for him. Noailles accompanies Talleyrand: I think he is quite his dupe. D'Alberg goes to Munich, where he waits the orders of the King, and communication from Talleyrand. I do not think D'Alberg will attend the head-quarters.

As I conceive this information may be interesting to you, and as I have it from a good channel, I have troubled you with this letter.

I think we shall sign on Sunday, and I shall set off immediately after.

What a glorious end to our war in Italy!

Believe me, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

STEWART.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 2nd June, 1815.

Part of the convoy from Halifax, which had on board the 29th and the 98th, has arrived, and the remainder may be expected every day. The

* Duc de Feltre.

29th will be immediately forwarded to Ostend. The 98th will proceed to Ireland; and orders have been sent yesterday for the 38th regiment, now at Cork (a much more efficient regiment than the 98th), to proceed to Ostend, without, however, waiting for the actual arrival of the 98th at Cork. When the remainder of Malcolm's convoy and of the Halifax convoy shall have arrived, your increase from these two will, I hope, stand thus:—

4th Regiment	800
7th „	1000
29th „	700
43rd „	1000
38th „	650
95th (Detachments)	350
	4500

(Independent of Artillery, Sappers and Miners.)

We may also expect, in about a fortnight, the 64th from Halifax. This regiment having been long in the West Indies, will probably not be very fit for service; and will, therefore, be sent to Ireland, and a more efficient regiment sent to Ostend from thence.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

I ought to add that you may expect 200 old drivers from America in the course of next week, and that we have sent a company of Marine Artillery to Ostend, which may enable you to take more efficient artillerymen from thence for service.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 2nd June, 1815.

By smugglers that have been in the neighbourhood of Chimay, I have got the following intelligence.

Along the frontier, and particularly in the vicinity of Ferrière la Petite, all the villages are full of infantry; behind them, and nominally at Beugnies, Sartspoteries, Dimont, Wattignies, Dumousies, and Obrechies, a great number of cavalry. Between Fleuris, Sartspoteries, Solre le Château, and Les Fontaines, a very considerable park of artillery. These smugglers said they saw this park themselves, which appeared to cover a greater space of ground than they could see, but that they heard it estimated by some at 150, by others only 100 pieces of ordnance, with their ammunition waggons. Chimay and Macon are very full of troops of all descriptions: at the first place are four Generals, at the latter one.

Eight hundred men that left Fleuris Saturday last, returned on Wednesday from the neighbourhood of Givet, on account of too much troops being there. They had been immediately replaced at Fleuris by 1000 cavalry.

Reports are spread that 17,000 men from the line between Lille and Maubeuge had been sent to the interior, but these men do not believe it.

I expect every hour my man from Laon, and hope he will be able to clear up this point, if really troops marched to the interior, or if they only marched round to reinforce their right.

I enclose papers to the 30th, and have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY DEAR LORD FITZROY, Namur, 2nd June, 1815.

I am much obliged to you for your letter of yesterday, and should wish to draw for 150*l.* on account, but which I shall not do until I hear further from you.

The reports of insurrections in France, together with the marching of troops from our front into the interior, have made this head-quarters very impatient to begin operations. The power of undertaking any operation in concert with the Duke of Wellington was formally given to General Gneisenau by the King, shortly after the Duke's first application for the Prussians to move forward; and I think it may be as well mentioned to the Duke that Marshal Blücher, in talking of the reported state of things in France, said to me pretty publicly that he was quite ready to begin if the Duke would. General Thielmann, who was here to-day, states that many of the troops in his front have also marched; and General Zieten has repeated the report I mentioned in my letter of the 31st, of the cavalry having moved from Avesnes and Landrecies.

I am, my dear Lord, very truly yours,

H. HARDINGE.

G. O. Bruxelles, 3rd June, 1815. [884.]

5. So much benefit was felt during the late war, particularly by the soldiers of the army, from the system then adopted of paying them every day, that the Commander of the Forces has determined to adopt it again.

6. Accordingly he desires that the balances which shall appear to be due on the face of the accounts to the 24th May last, of each serjeant, trumpeter, drummer, and rank and file, shall be paid to him by daily issues, to the amount of his daily subsistence.

7. The Paymasters of regiments are in future to send in their estimates for the month's pay for their regiments on the 12th of the month, so that the warrants may be signed, and an issue may be made upon them by the 25th of each month.

8. They will thus be provided with means to issue to the Captains of companies the daily subsistence of their men, which, after the balances due on the 24th of the month will have been paid as above ordered in No. 6, is to be paid entire every day.

9. In case any soldier should now be in debt, or should at any time hereafter require necessaries, the Captain is to make arrangements for stopping the payment of his daily subsistence till the debt will be discharged, or the necessaries will be paid for.

WELLINGTON.

Lieut.-Gen. Baron Decken to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, 3rd June, 1815.

I beg leave to inform your Grace that I am authorised, by an order dated the 27th last, from His Royal Highness the Prince Regent (of which I take the liberty to enclose a translation), to conclude with you a new treaty of subsidy on the part of Hanover; and having also received an exact estimate of the 16,400 men from Hanover, I am ready to wait upon your Grace, whenever it will please you to honour me with your commands.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,

FRED. DECKEN.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Power for Lieut.-Gen. Von der Decken.

We, GEORGE Prince Regent, in the name and on the behalf of our Father, His Majesty George the Third, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, &c.; also King of Hanover, Duke of Brunswick and Luneburg, &c.

Whereas the Treaty of Subsidies hitherto consisting between our British Crown and our Kingdom of Hanover expires on the 25th of the current month of May, and whereas the conclusion of another Treaty with regard to our Hanoverian Corps attached to our Army in the Netherlands becomes requisite; We have for such a purpose appointed and constituted our Lieutenant-General Frederick von der Decken, of our German Legion, and We authorise and constitute him by these presents, to stipulate the Terms of a new Treaty of Subsidies from the 25th of this instant month, and to conclude the same for our Kingdom of Hanover with our Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, appointed for the same purpose on account of our British Crown.

In virtue thereof We have put our own signature to the presents, and caused the Impression of our Arms to be affixed thereto.

Given at our Court of Carlton House the 27th of May, in the year 1815, the fifty-fifth of His Majesty's reign.

(L.S.) (Signed) GEORGE, P.R.
(Signed) GEO. BEST.

[Compliments; and if he will do me the favour to call here to-morrow at ten o'clock, I'll arrange a treaty of subsidy with him on the part of Hanover.

WELLINGTON.]

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 3rd June, 1815, 8 P.M.

The enclosed bulletin has just been received from Heidelberg, and I beg to congratulate your Lordship on the surrender of the Neapolitan army at discretion to the Austrian forces. The capital and fortresses were to be given up to the Austrians on the 23rd ult., and to be taken possession of in the name of the King of the Two Sicilies. The report concerning Murat is that he has shut himself in Gaeta, with a part of his dispersed forces.

There is nothing new from the front, further than the continued reports of the marching of troops into the interior of France, and the increasing impatience of this head-quarters to begin operations.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,
H. HARDINGE.

A. Forster, Esq., to Sir Charles Stuart.

Copenhagen, 3rd June, 1815.

The King is just returned, but the pecuniary part of the arrangement does not yet seem to stand quite clear, neither does the number of troops intended to be sent quite tally with what you say Walterstorff states. M. de Mösting, the Finance Minister, told me yesterday they could send 12,000 men bien comptés. They seem to think 11*l*. a man rather little, but I think they will agree to it: however, they sadly want a round sum to begin with, especially to purchase horses. Each district is obliged to furnish a certain number at a stipulated price, and the individual horses wanted are already designated, but not yet bought. To buy as many as will be necessary for the artillery, baggage, &c., he estimates that about 50,000*l*. or 60,000*l*. will be necessary as a mise en campagne. I don't think this seems a great deal, if it is made to include equipment of every kind. I have not as yet, however, had any official communication on the subject, and speak only from confidential conversations. They undertake to get ready to march in a fortnight or three weeks.

Rosencrantz tells me Walterstorff has to propose your antedating the period at which the Danish troops will march, that in this way they may get a sum of money, without which it seems impossible for them to march.

I hope you mean to begin soon.

AUGUSTUS FORSTER.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 4th June, 1815.

By the enclosed papers, it appears that the Champ de Mai was to be held on the 1st of June. I hope to get more intelligence in the course of this day: my man from Laon is not yet returned.

A man of the first class and a very respectable character, who lives in France, on the frontier, and whom I saw yesterday, assures me that the most of the French officers appear very sullen, and even desponding. He saw General Colbert some days ago, who told him that if we could have attacked them four weeks ago, Buonaparte would have been lost in a fortnight; but now he hoped that they would have settled everything in the Vendée before we could arrive. At Maubeuge there are near 10,000 National Guards, but not yet all armed, of which a great number will desert whenever they find an opportunity. At Ferrière la Grande is a park of artillery, probably destined for the Camp de Rousies, where there is no gun till yet.

The 49th and 45th infantry of the line are certainly gone to the interior from Valenciennes and Condé.

A deserter of the Grenadiers à Cheval, of Buonaparte's Guard, arrived here yesterday from Paris. He also assures that the Young Guard is sent from Paris to the Vendée.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
DÖRNBERG.

Lieut.-Col. Aug. Wissell to Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill.

MY LORD, Tournay, 5th June, 1815.

I have the honour to report that, according to the news received from the French frontiers, the enemy has evacuated the town and citadel of Lille thus, that only invalids and National Guards form the garrison. The outpost line ad Bassieux, Willem, Antoin, &c., is, since this morning 4 o'clock, almost not more occupied. All the mentioned troops have taken the road to Maubeuge and Valenciennes.

No Moniteur has yesterday arrived at Lille.

With the highest regard, I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,
AUG. WISSELL.

Grammont, 5th June, 9 P.M.
HILL.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 5th June, 1815.

It seems by the French papers, and by the reports I have received, that the Champ de Mai was to take place on the 1st; and an officer, a native Belgian, just come over from France, tells me that the Emperor is immediately after expected at Laon, which is to be his head-quarters, and the French army expects to attack us within a few days. The infantry wishes for war; the cavalry is desponding.

Ever your most truly devoted and affectionate

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 5th June, 1815, 6 P.M.

I returned this moment from Mons, where everything is finished, and the two redoubts on the St. Ghislain side very complete. I saw the Count de la Porterie, who tells me that he has seen the 'Moniteur' of the 2nd, in which the description of the Champ de Mai is given, which has taken place on the 1st. It is said that all which happened there was very pleasing to Napoleon.

I thought this might be interesting for you to know, and therefore lose no time to acquaint you with it.

Ever your most sincerely affectionate

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

The Duc de Feltre to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Gand, le 5 Juin, 1815, vers minuit.

Je crois devoir transmettre ci-joint à Votre Excellence des détails concernant la place de Lille. Je les ai fait traduire en Anglais, pensant que cela serait plus commode pour les officiers qui sont sous vos ordres; mais Sir Charles Stuart, à qui je l'ai montré, m'a dit que cela n'était pas nécessaire. Je regrette de n'avoir pu le faire copier sur de plus grand papier.

Il paraît que la garnison de Valenciennes n'est plus composée que de gardes nationales.

L'affaire de la Vendée est sérieuse, malgré l'échec que les Royalistes ont éprouvé à Aizenai. Presque tout le pays est insurgé. La Flèche et le Mans paraissaient devoir être occupés par les Royalistes. Le drapeau blanc était arboré à Châteaugontier et à Sablé. On m'assure dans une lettre de Paris du 28 Mai, où je puise ces détails, que Nantes a été sommé le 21 Mai par 10,000 Royalistes. On ignorait le résultat. Bressuire a été vainement attaqué par les troupes de Buonaparte, et cette ville les a repoussées: 200 hommes des troupes de ligne, commandés par le Sr. Grolbon, ont passé du côté des Royalistes.

Voilà mes principales nouvelles d'aujourd'hui.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE DUC DE FELTRE.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Lille, 3rd June, 1815.

The 47th and 19th regiments of infantry left this place for Valenciennes on the 2nd instant.

The 17th regiment has received orders to march on the 4th.

Troops actually within the walls.

	Strength.
6 battalions of national guards of the department de l'Aisne (400 in each bat.) ..	2400
1 battalion of national guards of the Seine Inférieure	300
3 regiments of chasseurs .. .. (horses)	200
Two companies of artillery to do the duty of the town have been raised from amongst the tobacco manufacturers	240
1 grenadier battalion of national guards of the town	720
2 companies of local artillery (canonniers sédentaires)	260

In the Citadel.

3 battalions of retired officers and non-commissioned officers are being formed here, chosen from amongst the worst description of people in France: altogether they are about	1200
1 battalion (the 3rd) of the 13th regiment of the line	500
2 companies of artillery of the 6th regiment of the line	70
1 do. selected from the six battalions of the national guard of the department de l'Aisne	200
1 company of veterans	—
1 company of sappers and miners, about ..	100

The stores in the magazines and arsenals of the town have been all transported to those in the citadel. There are 12 field-pieces and 2 howitzers here, which are quite ready for moving.

In the environs is the 2nd battalion of the 3rd light infantry	1200

General Alix is here president of a commission de la haute police, and has called upon the arrondissement de Lille to furnish 4 battalions of grenadiers, who are to assemble in the town forthwith, and be inspected on the 8th, 9th, and 10th of this month. It is, however, generally thought that this order cannot take place to the extent required.

Notwithstanding the numerous orders and injunctions which have been given to the inhabitants to lay in provisions preparatory to a siege, up to this day not one of them has done so. The face of the citadel which looks towards the town is thickly planted (hérissé) with cannon.

N.B. There is no corps de marine here, although some have been expected.

To Messrs. Perigaux, La Fitte, and Co. [885.]

GENTLEMEN, Bruxelles, 6th June, 1815.

I have received your several accounts, and your letter of the 28th ultimo.

The public and private concerns are so intermixed, that it is impossible for me to settle them without having the original drafts or copies of them, which I will thank you to send me immediately, as I am very anxious to arrange these matters.

In regard to the interest, I have to observe that when I first opened an account with you, it was settled that it should be closed at certain periods at the exchange of the moment; but I never should have adopted such an arrangement, had I supposed that, in addition to the commission and the chance of the exchange, I should be charged with interest. If, however, I am to pay interest, I cannot consent to pay your account at the exchange of the present moment, which is so very much below par, but at the exchange only of the period when I drew the money, which is the fair way of settling the account. I wish to have a copy of the draft for 58*l.* 15*s.*, and the mode of paying the 1265 francs in two payments, of 1110 francs 10 centimes and 155 francs, explained. These two sums, though charged in separate accounts, are, I imagine, the same payment. I also wish to observe that though this draft was given immediately after the receipt of the money, interest is charged upon it; nor am I credited with interest for the 9000 francs paid into your hands by M. Vivarais. You will oblige me by replying to these points as soon as possible.

I have, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, War Department, London, 6th June, 1815.

Herewith I have the honour to submit to your Grace a copy of a proclamation which has been issued for prolonging, according to the provisions of the Mutiny Act, the services of soldiers who have enlisted for limited service, and who would otherwise have been entitled to their discharge on the expiration of the terms for which they originally enlisted.

I have the honour to be your Grace's most obedient servant,

BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

By His Royal Highness the PRINCE of WALES, Regent of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty.

A PROCLAMATION.

GEORGE P. R.

Whereas divers Soldiers now serving in His Majesty's Army, under the Provisions of the Mutiny Act passed in the Forty-sixth Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Sixty-six; and of another Act passed in the Forty-seventh Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Thirty-two; and of another Act passed in the Forty-eighth Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Fifteen; and of another Act passed in the Forty-ninth Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Twelve; and of another Act passed in the Fiftieth Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Seven; and of another Act passed in the Fifty-first Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Eight; and of another Act passed in the Fifty-second Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Twenty-two; and of another Act passed in the Fifty-third Year of His Majesty's Reign, Chapter Seventeen; and which said several Acts are severally and respectively entitled "An Act for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better Payment of the Army and their Quarters;" did, at the Time of their respective Enlistments, engage to serve His Majesty for the limited periods therein respectively expressed, provided His Majesty should so long require the same, and for such further Term, not exceeding Three Years, as should be directed by any Proclamation of His Majesty; provided always, that in case of such Direction, the said additional Period should determine whenever six months of continued Peace, to be reckoned from the Ratification of any Definitive Treaty, should have elapsed, subsequent to the Expiration of such limited Periods as aforesaid: And whereas the Recommencement of Hostilities renders it expedient to exercise the Power vested in His Majesty of enlarging such limited Periods of Service; We have therefore thought fit, in the Name and on the Behalf of His Majesty, and by and with the Advice of His Majesty's Privy Council, to publish this Proclamation; and We do hereby direct, that all Soldiers now serving in His Majesty's Army (the Veteran Battalions excepted) who have been enlisted for such limited Periods as aforesaid, shall continue to serve therein for the Term of Three Years after the Expiration of such limited Periods respectively; provided always, that the said additional Period shall determine whenever Six Months of continued Peace, to be reckoned from the Ratification of any Definitive Treaty, shall have elapsed, subsequent to the Expiration of such limited Periods respectively.

Given at the Court at Carlton House, the Second Day of June One thousand eight hundred and fifteen, in the Fifty-fifth Year of His Majesty's Reign.

God save the King!

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 6th June, 1815.

I received this morning your letter of the 1st, containing General Alten's letter, with its enclosure from Colonel Ompteda. They relate, I observe, not to the general question of recruiting, but simply to that of re-enlisting into the King's German Legion those who were discharged from thence at the beginning of the year. To this I cannot imagine there can be any objection raised (I am sure none in justice can be raised) by the King of the Netherlands. Your Grace, therefore, will authorise the re-enlisting such men at the bounty of four guineas. There are two guineas in addition allowed in Hanover for what is called, I think, bringing money; but as this would be considered as beating up for recruits in the Netherlands, nothing of the kind should be allowed.

As to recruiting in the Netherlands, it cannot be done advantageously against the King's wishes, which we have reason to believe will not be favourable.

Yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 6th June, 1815.

I have the honour of transmitting to you herewith French papers of the 2nd and 3rd inst., as it appears by them that Buonaparte is expected to leave Paris this day, the 6th. I shall use my utmost endeavours to get early intelligence of his arrival at the army, though this becomes daily more difficult.

My man from Laon returned yesterday, not thinking it safe to stay any longer there. He assures that the head-quarters are removed to a château in the vicinity, and that General Balan commands there at present. The garrison consisted only of 200 of the 4th Line, the 9th Cuirassiers, two companies of artillery, and some thousands of National Guards.

This man says that they have fortified Laon so much that the French call it Gibraltar. By the description he gives, there must be a kind of martello towers.

In coming here he found a great number of National Guards coming from the interior and going to the frontiers in all directions: most of them were carried on waggons.

There are also more troops of the line on the frontier near Valenciennes, which he estimates at 30,000; but I think that is exaggerated.

At Lille there have been a great many arrestations.

It is said that the commandant of Condé has shot himself.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient, humble servant.

DÖRNBERG.

I am very sorry to learn just now that a man at Quivrain, from whom I had always very good intelligence, has been arrested last night.

Lieut.-Gen. C. Alten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Soignies, 6th June, 1815.

I do myself the honour of stating to your Grace that I am very anxious to get the two companies of Jägers, who lately came up with the Hanoverian corps of reserve, attached to the division under my command. They consist entirely of foresters' sons, are armed with their own rifles, and remain embodied during the continuance of hostilities only, with the promise of getting situations in the Royal forests of Hanover as vacancies occur, and those who distinguish themselves to be first provided for. As these places, during the period they are actively employed, are to be chiefly obtained through the recommendation of the General commanding the Hanoverian troops, and as these men, who can be made very useful, require a particular management, I am very desirous of having them placed under my immediate eye; and therefore take the liberty to request that in case there are no objections on account of the provisioning, or any others which make it impracticable, your Grace will be pleased to sanction their being transferred to the 3rd division, where they may also have a more immediate opportunity of acting in the field, which they are very anxious to do, than with the corps of reserve.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and most humble servant,

CHARLES ALTEN.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine-le-Comte, 6th June, 1815.

I send March with the two enclosures from General Dörnberg and General Behr, which I thought you might wish to have without loss of time. I received, besides, this morning a report from General Collaert, in which he says that he knew of General Albert, who commands the French cavalry, having said that if we did not attack on the 7th, they would attack us on the 8th or 9th. If nothing happens to-morrow, I hope to see you at your ball.

Ever most truly yours,

WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

A Son Altesse Royale Monseigneur le Prince d'Orange, Commandant en Chef l'Armée des Pays-Bas.

MON PRINCE, Mons, le 6 Juin, 1815.

Rien de nouveau aux avant-postes.

J'ai l'honneur de rendre compte à Votre Altesse Royale que M. Vilnoisy, envoyé en France par S.M. Louis XVIII. il y a 12 jours, est parti de Paris Samedi 3 Juin courant, après avoir vu la fête du Champ de Mai, qu'il rapporte avoir été tout à fait guerrière, enfin absolument martiale, les militaires ayant déployé tous les décorations possible : il dit aussi que les environs de Paris sont fortifiés de manière à ne pouvoir y entrer sans être arrêté, gardés par une réunion de gardes forestiers, champêtres, gendarmes, &c., avec une surveillance très exacte.

Il annonce le départ de l'Empereur pour ce jour, 6 Juin, allant faire l'inspection de la cavalerie Française à Douai, commandée par le Général Milhaud : cette inspection doit avoir lieu le 7. De là il se rendra à Compiègne, sur laquelle route se dirigent beaucoup de troupes venant de Paris : aussi a-t-il vu dans tous les villes, sur les routes et directions de cette derniere ville à la frontière, des voitures en grand nombre pour transporter les troupes en poste ; observant que dans la petite ville de Moye deux cents voitures sont rassemblées destinées à cet objet, et que le bruit courait que la garde nationale devait s'en servir, mais que des personnes mieux instruites assurent que c'est pour les troupes de ligne qui se dirigent vers Laon, Compiègne, et Douai : il assure de même s'être abouché avec des employés travaillants aux mouvemens des opérations militaires à Paris, qui lui ont assuré que l'Empereur se transporterait de sa personne à Avesnes, pour faire faire une fausse attaque sur les Alliés du côté de Maubeuge, tandis que l'attaque principale doit s'opérer du côté de la Flandre, entre Lille, Tournay, et vers Mons : la même personne a vu près Valenciennes un parc d'artillerie de 80 pièces de canon, toutes de 8, qui est établi sur les glacis de cette ville.

La Jeune Garde est partie de Paris pour La Vendée, ayant à sa suite un nombreux parc d'artillerie, ainsi que quelques régimens de ligne.

On craint beaucoup en France la guerre qui s'y allume, et l'on dit que si 25,000 hommes étaient dans La Vendée pour appuyer, Paris serait occupé par les Royalistes avant l'entrée des Alliés sur le territoire de France.

Toutes les troupes qui sont à Paris et dans les environs reçoivent régulièrement leur solde. Pour avoir de l'argent dans cette capitale, on a agi de finesse, en envoyant chez des particuliers des quittances par forme de dons gratuits par les receveurs, comme si ces personnes avaient fait des offrandes à l'Empereur : par ce moyen le gouvernement a d'abord trouvé un bon fond pour faire face à ses dépenses.

Paris est dans ce moment dans la plus grande anarchie : tous les partis se déclarent entre eux, la guerre étant dirigée uniquement contre Buonaparte ; tous veuillent le Duc d'Orléans plutôt que Louis XVIII. pour mettre fin aux maux qui les menacent. Malgré tout cela les gens qui réfléchissent ne voient pas sans crainte les moyens de défense que prépare l'Empereur, connaissant son énergie et son activité infatigable.

La Garde Impériale a la plus belle tenue et l'air plus guerrier qu'elle a jamais offert.

Cet individu a vu le Roi Joachim arriver à Paris avec toute sa famille, ayant à sa suite beaucoup de gros caissons, que l'on prétend être chargés d'argent qu'il apporte en France.

Il a entendu parler entre les généraux de poids et de marque que si Joachim a un commandement, qu'ils refusent de servir sous lui ; qu'ayant trahi la France il y a un an, il n'est pas digne de commander, et n'a d'ailleurs pas de tête pour conduire une armée.

Il dit entre autres choses que les habitans de Cambrai, ainsi que la garde nationale qui s'y trouve, sont tous disposés en faveur des Alliés.

L'arrivée de Marie Louise et du Prince Impérial n'ayant point eu lieu comme on s'y attendait à la fête du Champ de Mai, les esprits Buonapartistes en ont été abattus, fondant sur cette présence à une défection parmi les Alliés, ce qui n'ayant point eu lieu, a fait dire qu'il ne résisterait pas, la lutte étant tout à fait inégale.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec un très profond respect,

Le Général Major Commandant supérieur à Mons,

BARON BEHR.

II.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 6th June, 1815.

The man of whom Count la Porterie speaks in the enclosed letter gives the following intelligence.

Buonaparte will leave Paris on the 6th, and goes to Douai, where he is to inspect the cavalry of General Milhaud. He will certainly attack as soon as possible ; and he has said himself he would have destroyed the Allies before the Russian army could arrive. It is supposed he would make a false attack on the Prussians, and a real one on the English army.

Four battalions of the Young Guard, under General Barrois, were still at Compiègne ; four battalions of the same that were at Louvres, near Paris, have been marched to the Vendée, as well as the armée de réserve that was in the neighbourhood of Paris. A considerable park of artillery (about 150 pieces of 8 and 4) left Vincennes six or seven days ago, and were directed towards Laon. At Valenciennes this gentleman saw still the park of artillery, about 80 pieces, and a great number of troops in the villages.

I have the honour to be, my Lord, your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

III.

The Count de la Porterie to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC,

Votre Excellence a eu la bonté de me permettre de lui faire parvenir les détails importans que je pourrais obtenir de la France. Une personne que j'ai envoyé il y a hier 15 jours à Paris arrive à l'instant avec des avis, des notions qu'il me paraît éssentiel de communiquer à Votre Excellence. J'ai donc pris le parti d'amener sur-le-champ cette personne chez M. le Général Major Baron d'Arnberg, en le priant de vouloir bien vous adresser son rapport.

Si Votre Excellence désirait voir la personne même, elle attendra à ses ordres jusqu'au retour de l'estafette.

J'ai l'honneur d'être avec respect, Monsieur le Maréchal,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

COMTE DE LA PORTERIE.

General Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, le 6 Juin, 1815.

Un officier Français, lieutenant du 11me. chasseurs à cheval, est arrivé hier ici. Il dit que le Champ de Mai a eu lieu le 1r. de Juin, et que Buonaparte s'est déclaré Empereur. Cet officier prétend que cet événement ne peut servir qu'en bien à notre cause, vu que ni le militaire ni le civil ont voté pour la déclaration de Buonaparte. L'officier prétend que le corps de Vandamme n'est fort que 18,000 hommes, ayant 10 régimens d'infanterie et 4 de cavalerie. Il prétend que le corps d'Erlon se porte à 60,000, celui de Reille à 25,000 hommes. Comme la différence entre les corps d'armée est trop grande, je dois croire que l'officier n'est bien instruit que de la force du corps de Vandamme.

Veuillez permettre en bonté que j'ose réitérer à Votre Altesse les sentimens respectueux avec lesquels j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

De Votre Altesse le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

The Duke of Saxe Coburg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Coburg, le 6 Juin, 1815.

Permettez que j'ajoute encore quelques lignes à la lettre que le Colonel de Hardenbrock aura l'honneur de remettre à Votre Excellence, pour lui exprimer combien j'ai été sensible à l'accueil qu'elle m'a fait lors de mon séjour à Vienne, et pour la prier de me conserver ces sentimens de bienveillance qui me flattent d'autant plus parcequ'ils partent d'une source pure et loyale.

J'avais tant désiré, et je désire encore, d'avoir l'honneur de servir sous les ordres de Votre Excellence; mais il paraît qu'un sort fatal s'est attaché à mes désirs, car je vois peu à peu échouer toutes mes espérances; et au lieu d'être dédommagé des pertes que j'ai essuyés en servant la cause commune, je me vois imposé de nouvelles taxes, qui non seulement surpassent mais anéantissent tous mes moyens.

Je ne puis donc compter que sur la promesse éventuelle que Votre Excellence a eu la bonté de me faire à Vienne, qu'elle voudrait, autant qu'il dépendait de son pouvoir, être propice à mes intérêts; ceux-ci se trouveraient très favorisés si Votre Excellence daigne m'accorder les subsides que je désirerais avoir pour mes troupes.

Avec la protection de Votre Excellence je ne manquerais décidément pas le but de mes justes prières ; et je me flatte qu'elle ne la refusera pas à quelqu'un qui croit avoir autant et peut-être plus de droit à la munificence du gouvernement Britannique que beaucoup d'autres qui en jouissent.

Ma plus vive reconnaissance sera le fruit de vos bontés, Monsieur le Duc ; et je vous prie d'agréer l'assurance de la haute considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très dévoué serviteur,

ERNEST, DUC DE SAXE COBURG.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 7th June, 1815.

I have had the honour of receiving your Lordship's letter of yesterday evening.

No intelligence of any importance has been received from the front at this head-quarters in the course of the day, and I have waited till the present hour in the expectation of the arrival of reports.

General Gneisenau told me that Marshal Blücher had in a great measure ceased to communicate with the Saxon corps since their march to the rear ; that, however, Prince Blücher would direct them to place themselves under your Lordship's command ; and desired me, on the part of the Prince, to assure your Lordship of the sense entertained of the considerate attention which marked the proceeding.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 7th June, 1815.

I have the honour of sending to your Lordship papers of the 4th instant.

A French deserter, from Valenciennes, says that Buonaparte is expected there to-day. I have appointed people to give the earliest intelligence of Buonaparte's arrival, as also to watch the movements of the army. The man I had sent to Chimay is returned without having been so far ; he only was at Rance, and can of course give no interesting intelligence. The head-quarters of Vandamme are at Solre le Château ; and the French on that line expect every day to be attacked by us, and are very discontented.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

MEMORANDUM ON THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE PENINSULAR PRIZE MONEY.

8th June, 1815.

It being understood that the share of the Commander in Chief is to be one-sixteenth, the best mode of dividing the remainder into shares may well be left to his judgment, as he can best form an opinion which of those modes will be best adapted to the composition of his army, both with respect to the number of persons who would compose each of the classes, and to the share which would consequently fall to the lot of each.

The idea of assigning a particular sum to each class, instead of a particular fraction of the whole, appears, on reconsideration, to be impracticable in the execution; because the booty will be divided into different parcels, according to the places where it was taken, and will then be subdivided amongst the persons who may be deemed to have a right to share in that particular booty. But by dividing the whole into fractional parts of 80ths, the same result will be obtained.

The second new mode suggested by Sir Colin Campbell seems liable to several objections, some peculiar to itself, and some in common with the old mode adopted in conjunct expeditions.

The setting aside a certain sum to the Commander in Chief, and then leaving the remainder to be divided, is quite new, the Commander in Chief having always had a certain share; but it makes no difference in the pecuniary result to him.

It carries the share allotted to the class of the General officers to 43,750*l.* beyond what it would be according to the old mode; and in order to procure them this advantage, it diminishes the share of every inferior class. It is the only mode according to which the share of the privates would be less than two-eighths; and although the difference to each private would only be one-sixteenth of what he would otherwise have had, yet it is well worth consideration whether it is advisable to give even so slight a ground of complaint to that class.

In common with the old mode, it gives the same sum to each of the classes of captains, subalterns, and serjeants.

Now the subalterns are, it is conceived, in all cases double the number of captains; and where there are three to a company, more than double. This distribution would make the share of each subaltern less than half that of a captain.

The number of subalterns, it is conceived, cannot be very different from that of serjeants. If the share given to the class of subalterns is no larger than that given to the class of serjeants, the share of a subaltern will be no more than that of a serjeant. Should the number of subalterns be somewhat less, still the superiority of their share individually will not correspond with the superiority of rank.

In the two modes now suggested, of division by 32nds or by 80ths, all these objections are endeavoured to be obviated, as will appear upon inspection.

The Commander in Chief will be best able to judge whether there is any weight in the objections, and if there is, by which of the two last modes they are best obviated. The case being a new one, there is no sufficient reason for not adopting a new mode of division; but if precedent is abandoned, both as bad in itself and as inapplicable, it seems desirable that the new mode to be adopted should, as far as possible, both rest upon good general reasons, and be equitable in its application to the case in question.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 8th June, 1815.

I have no intelligence till yet of Buonaparte's arrival on the frontier. By the 'Gazette de France' of the 5th, which I have the honour to enclose, it appears that he is going from Paris directly to Laon.

Troops that were between Landrecy and Avesnes have made a movement on their right towards Solre le Château on Sunday last. The bridge below Pont sur Sambre, at Notre Dame des Quartes, has been taken up. The demolition of the suburbs at Maubeuge has been delayed, but they work again with great activity at the Camp de Rousies. The existence of a park of artillery at Ferrière la Grande, which the Prussians seemed to doubt, has been confirmed to me this morning.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

General Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, le 8 Juin, 1815.

Mettant aux pieds de Votre Altesse mes plus vites reconnaissances de la lettre dont elle m'a honoré en date d'hier, j'ose y ajouter que j'ai fait partir hier à M. le Général de Müffling les nouvelles que j'avais puis avoir des frontières. Depuis sont arrivés des personnes qui sont partis le 2 Juin de Paris. Ils prétendent que Buonaparte n'avait pas lieu d'être content du Champ de Mai, vu qu'il ne s'y trouvait que le tiers des députés qu'on y attendait.

Hier les Français ont retirés leurs postes des frontières dans les environs de Maubeuge, pour les placer non loin de la forteresse. Je n'ose pas croire au départ de Buonaparte de Paris, mais je dois ajouter que le retardement de commencer les hostilités fait accroître considérablement ses forces.

J'aurai soin de faire à Votre Altesse les rapports de tout ce que je puis apprendre, la suppliant d'agréer en bonté les sentimens respectueux avec lesquelles j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

De Votre Altesse le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Charleroi, 6 Juin, 1815.

D'après le rapport d'un militaire Français qui vient d'arriver ici, le total de l'armée Française monte à 300,000 hommes; mais on dit qu'il y a beaucoup de forces dans les dépôts qui ne manquent que d'habits et d'armes. Dans ce total on n'a pas compté 40,000 hommes de la Garde, et une division de grosse cavalerie, composée du 1er. et 5me. régimens de dragons, et du 8me. de cuirassiers.

D'après le rapport de plusieurs militaires Français les troupes entre Maubeuge et Sédan montent à 102,000 hommes, parmi lesquelles on ne trouve que 12,000 de troupes de ligne. Le 3me. corps du Général Vandamme (dont le quartier-général est provisoirement encore à Chimay) appartient à cette armée. Parmi les régimens nommés de ce corps se trouvent 10 régimens d'infanterie, savoir: Nos. 12, 22, 32, 33, 52, 75 de ligne, et 4 régimens légèrs à 1500 hommes, commandés par les généraux de brigade Jengult, Abbé, et Fromont, outre 3 régimens de cavalerie légère, savoir: le 11me. régiment de chasseurs sous le Général Ameil, près de Neuville, derrière Philippeville; le 2d régiment de lanciers, et le 5me. de houssards sous le Général Merlin, commandés, tous les trois, par le Général de division Domann; ensuite une compagnie d'artillerie légère, avec 50 à 60 canons, près de Marienbourg et Pouvin.

Parmi plusieurs généraux dénommés se trouvent le Général Bourcke comme commandant à Givet, et le Général Dumonceau comme général commandant au département des Ardennes.

D'après des rélations du 5 de Philippeville le Général Dupuis s'y trouve comme commandant, dont on dit qu'il surveille l'approvisionnement du fort, et la rénovation des ouvrages de fortification, avec beaucoup de zèle. La garnison consiste de 2000 hommes, parmi lesquels 1500 gardes nationales, une compagnie d'artillerie, et une de sapeurs. Il y avait à Maubeuge au 5 de ce mois (où commande le Général Latur) 3000 hommes de troupe régulière et de gardes nationales. Plusieurs avis s'accordent à ce que les douaniers de l'ennemi ont quitté la ligne qu'ils tenaient occupée auparavant, qu'ils se sont retirés dans une seconde, et qu'ils ont l'ordre de se joindre à l'approche de l'ennemi à un signal donné sur un point, et d'épauler après en tirailleurs la retraite du corps.

Aussi les postes mises près de la Sambre ont l'ordre de se retirer à l'approche des troupes Prussiennes vers les frontières, tout en paix et sans tirer.

Dans la contrée entre Beaufort et Landrecy l'ennemi continue de ruiner les chemins de traverses et de les abîmer.

Il n'y a pas de doute que la plupart de l'armée est portée pour Napoléon, et que les troupes souhaitent la guerre. Dans les gardes nationales l'opinion se montre différemment, mais en général plus contre Napoléon.

La proclamation de Son Altesse le Prince de Blücher adressé il y a peu de tems aux habitans de l'autre côté a été reçue d'eux avec joie, de manière qu'ils attendent l'entrée des troupes Prussiennes avec plaisir.

L'ennemi ne croit pas que la force de l'Armée Alliée qui se trouve ici soit considérable; et le Général Ameil a dit qu'il n'y avait au premier corps de l'armée Prussienne que de la Landwehr de Westphalie, de la garde nationale de Hambourg, et très peu de troupes de ligne.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 8th June, 1815.

Your Grace will receive by this mail a proclamation for continuing the services of men whose term of service may expire. It is desirable to observe that, according to the opinion of our legal advisers, this proclamation will not attach upon those persons whose term of service shall have expired previous to the promulgation of the proclamation, and that therefore those whose term of service may have been prolonged by your Grace's order for six months must be at the end of that time discharged, if their term of service expired previous to the 2nd instant, the day on which the Regent's proclamation was issued.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

W. Hill, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Turin, 8th June, 1815.

The Count de Vallain has so pressed me to give a letter of introduction for the Count de Laval to your Grace, that I could no longer refuse. The Count de Laval is a very faithful servant of the King of Sardinia, and a most respectable person. As he is perfectly acquainted with what is passing here, I need not trouble you with any news: it will be sufficient to say that we are now on this side perfectly prepared to enter France. The Austrians have already above 20,000 men in the King's territory, and as many more are daily expected; the first in the neighbourhood of the Simplon, and the latter will pass over Mont Cenis. The Austrians talk ultimately of sending through the King's dominions not less than 80,000. I conceive this number, though given by the highest authorities, to be exaggerated; probably 20,000 of their best troops may now be withdrawn from Naples: I should think therefore about 60,000 may be relied upon. Added to these will be the 15,000 Piedmontese contingent, which, I fear (although Count Laval may be instructed to say the contrary), will not be quite so efficacious as we might wish for two or three months, on account of its being still in want of several military articles and on the score of discipline. It is, however, but justice to say that the greatest possible pains are now taking to render the contingent complete in every respect, and I believe it will march with or immediately after the Austrians.

I must not omit to add that I have not the smallest doubt this contingent can be doubled in the autumn if a subsidy is allowed as provided for in an article of your Grace's treaty with Count d'Agliè.

As upon the conquest of Naples General Macfarlane is ordered with the whole British force which was in Sicily to Genoa, we shall have in that place nearly 10,000 men under our command, independent of any Piedmontese regiments now there: some part of this force, according to events, may likewise be directed to the south of France.

If I can be of any use to your Grace in this part of the world, I trust I shall receive your commands; but as I have every reason to believe His Sardinian Majesty writes to you himself, and as I can safely refer you to M. de Laval for every species of intelligence, I am sure I need only add how sincerely

I remain, my dear Lord, your Grace's faithful humble servant,

W. HILL.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 8th June, 1815.

I have been very much disappointed at finding that neither the 4th nor 29th have yet sailed, and that the 7th and 43rd will not sail for some days.

With respect to the two first, I think all the expedition which might have been used has not been exercised, and time would certainly have been saved if they had been sent off at once to Ostend to be organised there instead of landing here.

With respect to the two last, the transports which have a company or two belonging to each have not yet arrived, having been separated in the passage. As time now presses, I shall order them to proceed the beginning of the week without waiting, as the remainder may be sent after them, by which I am sure time will be gained, although they may remain at Ostend until the arrival of the missing companies.

I hope to hear of the arrival of the 38th at Ostend from Cork next week.

Yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

There has been also an unaccountable delay in the collecting together the 2nd Garrison Battalion: it is now, however, ready to sail.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 8th June, 1815.

A man who left Valenciennes last night reports: "At Valenciennes are 6000 to 7000 National Guards and 1500 troops of the line; from 4000 to 5000 troops of the line arrived in the villages near Valenciennes, mostly infantry. The Young Guard was expected last night at Valenciennes, and a report spread that the Old Guard was marching to Maubeuge. At Condé 4000 National Guards."

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

[886.] To Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, 9th June, 1815.

I have the honour to lay before your Lordship the subsidiary treaties which I have concluded with the plenipotentiaries on the part of His Majesty the King of Wurtemberg and His Majesty the King of Bavaria.

I have, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

Intelligence from General Müffling.

9 Juin, 1815.

Un émissaire parti d'ici le 31 du mois passé et arrivé le 4 de ce mois à Paris, en passant Mons, Valenciennes, et Péronne, vient de nous communiquer en principal ces nouvelles.

La garnison de Valenciennes se montait à 4000 hommes, du nombre desquels étaient beaucoup de troupes de ligne; ils s'y trouvaient, sans l'artillerie des remparts, 100 pièces de canon et 200 caissons; on a fait prêter serment aux habitans de la ville de ne rendre ni la forteresse ni leurs personnes.

Quinze généraux pas encore nommés pour des commandemens séjournaient dans la ville. Ils se trouvaient des troupes en cantonnemens aux environs de Valenciennes, depuis la frontière Belge jusqu'à Cambrai. Cambrai en renfermait 600 ou 700 hommes. Entre Cambrai et Paris il n'y avait que très peu de troupes.

On ne met pas beaucoup d'activité aux retranchemens commencés à Paris, quoiqu'ils soyent de grande étendue, de manière que les ouvrages ne sont guère avancés. Il y a beaucoup de troupes de ligne et de la Garde dans la capitale; on y fabrique 2000 fusils par semaine. Notre émissaire fut conduit chez Davoust, qui, après lui avoir enjoint de dire que Napoléon partirait pour Strasbourg, l'a envoyé au Duc de Bassano; celui-ci cependant n'ayant plus le portefeuille des affaires étrangères, le fit retourner chez Davoust, qui entre autres s'informa s'il y avait beaucoup de fusils en Saxe, et s'il ne saurait lui donner des nouvelles de la Pologne et de la Bavière? lui recommandant qu'en retournant il se fasse conduire chez Soult, au quartier général. Le public s'attendait que Napoléon partirait le 7 de ce mois pour Valenciennes, et non pour Strasbourg, quoique la Vieille Garde doit être partie pour cette dernière ville. Chaque département doit fournir 3000 conscrits, et l'armée Française sera portée à 400,000 hommes. Les Prussiens ne sont pas aimés; on met de l'intérêt à connaître leurs forces.

Les nouvelles qu'on débite à Paris sont: qu'il venait d'arriver à Paris un courrier Autrichien; que sur les frontières du Nord il doit y avoir 40,000 hommes; mais on ajoute que 60,000 hommes se mettraient en marche pour les renforcer.

Dans la Vendée les insurgés ont essuyé un échec; 12,000 à 13,000 fusils ont été pris par le Général Travot; néanmoins il doit y avoir derechef 25,000 Royalistes sous les armes, de manière qu'on a fait partir de Paris pour la Vendée beaucoup de troupes de ligne et de la Jeune Garde. Les plus grands partisans de Napoléon sont la populace de Paris; en général il n'y a que peu de monde pour les Bourbons en France.

L'émissaire est reparti de Paris le 6 de ce mois; mais on l'a fait passer par Amiens et Arras, disant que sur la route directe par Péronne les chevaux de poste étaient réservés pour l'Empereur; en repassant Valenciennes et ses environs il n'a trouvé rien de changé.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Downing Street, 9th June, 1815.

Your Grace's despatch, No. 7, with a copy of a memorandum received from a French officer employed by the Duke d'Aumont, proposing a plan for a naval operation on the coast of France, was immediately communicated by me to the Admiralty; and I have now the honour of enclosing the copy of a letter from Mr. Croker to my Under-Secretary, stating the steps which have been taken by their Lordships in consequence of your Grace's communication above alluded to.

I have the honour to be

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

Bathurst.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

The Right Hon. J. W. Croker to Major-General Sir H. Bunbury.

SIR, Admiralty Office, 8th June, 1815.

In reference to your letter of the 1st of last month, enclosing a copy of a despatch from the Duke of Wellington, together with a memorandum therein referred to, left with his Grace by a French officer, and in which a plan is proposed for an operation on the coast of France, I have it in command from my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acquaint you, for the information of Lord Bathurst, that their Lordships have given the fullest consideration to the suggestions contained in the Duke's letter and in its enclosure; but that unless they were apprised more fully in detail of the particular operation which his Grace wished to have performed at the mouth of the Seine, they can offer no opinion as to its practicability.

As a general proposition, however, their Lordships have no difficulty in stating, that though seamen and marines may occasionally be employed with advantage in sudden attacks on batteries and other works on an enemy's coast, and may also afford useful assistance to troops in more extensive service on shore, they ought not, without such co-operation, to be opposed to regular troops in the field, or in besieging fortified places.

As their Lordships, however, are very desirous to afford every aid in their power in carrying into effect the objects which the Duke of Wellington may have in view, they have directed Rear-Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm, who commands a small squadron in the Scheldt, to repair to his Grace's head quarters for the purpose of conferring with him, and of communicating thereafter to their Lordships such further information as may enable them to decide on the practicability of such measures of naval co-operation as may be suggested.

I herewith enclose a copy of the instruction given to Sir Pulteney Malcolm, and return you the French memorandum above alluded to, and am, &c.,

J. W. CROKER.

II.

The Right Hon. J. W. Croker to Rear-Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm.

SIR, Admiralty Office, 7th June, 1815.

In reference to my other letter of this date, acquainting you that my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have signed a commission appointing you Commander-in-Chief of a squadron of His Majesty's ships and vessels to be employed on a particular service, I have it in command from their Lordships to acquaint you that it is their intention that you should conduct the service of co-operating, in the event of hostilities, with His Majesty's land forces in the Netherlands and those of his Allies, on all occasions where the assistance of a naval force can be advantageously afforded; and I herewith enclose to you their Lordships' order for your proceeding, without loss of time, to the Scheldt, and taking under your command the ships and vessels therein named.

You will lose no time in acquainting the Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's land forces of your arrival, and communicating with him on the subject of the service entrusted to your charge, repairing personally to the head quarters of the said Commander-in-Chief whenever it may be desirable for the purpose of your communications with him, and you will use every exertion to render him and His Majesty's Allies all the aid, in naval co-operation, which may be in your power and which circumstances may require.

You will make frequent reports to me, for their Lordships' information, of all occurrences that may take place; and you will, in particular, be careful to transmit timely application for any species or increase of force of which you may expect to stand in need in the execution of the service in question.

I am, &c.,

J. W. CROKER.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 9th June, 1815.

I have the honour, by direction of the Commander in Chief, to acquaint your Grace that the 2nd Garrison Battalion and detachments mentioned in margin * have been ordered to proceed to Flanders as a reinforcement to the troops serving under your command.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's faithful and very obedient servant,

H. TORRENS.

P.S. The 2nd Garrison Battalion is intended for garrison duty at Antwerp or Ostend, as your Grace may think proper.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 9th June, 1815.

I forgot to mention in my last private letter the circumstances which had induced the order for the squadron of the Brunswick Hussars to join your army. They are reported to be a very good detachment, well mounted and equipped, and the Commander in Chief thought they might be attached to one of the hussar regiments of the Legion until the remainder of the Brunswick regiment shall arrive from the Mediterranean.

Every exertion has been making for the equipment of the regiments lately arrived from America. The 4th was nearly naked, and by a report received this morning it does not appear they will be all ready until the 12th. The 29th will be ready about the same time, or perhaps sooner. But in consequence of a communication from the Secretary of State this evening, urging the necessity of despatch, an order has been given for their proceeding to Ostend by companies. I cannot believe that it will be satisfactory to receive corps in so slovenly a state; but the order has been given.

As Buonaparte is reported to have left Paris, you may now be considered on the eve of commencing your arduous but interesting operations; and, exclusive of the public interest which all must take in their progress, allow me to express personally my earnest and heartfelt good wishes for your success.

* 2nd Garrison Battalion, about 800 rank and file; 23rd Foot, 50; 27th, 300; 37th, 20; 51st, 34; 59th, 34.

Ever, my dear Lord Duke, most faithfully and sincerely yours,

H. TORRENS.

Unfortunately about one-half of the 7th and 43rd regiments have not yet arrived.

H. T.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 9th June, 1815.

A peasant arriving from Maubeuge assures that Buonaparte came there yesterday at two o'clock, and that he left it this morning at seven o'clock for Valenciennes, from whence, it was said, he was to go to Lille.

By another report, Buonaparte arrived at Laon the day before yesterday (7th), and was yesterday at Avesnes. Almost all the Generals have been out yesterday and inspected their troops.

I forgot to report that nine persons have been arrested at Condé, and that all the military authorities at that place have been changed.

I have still three men in France: one towards Douai, one at Avesnes, and the third at Laon itself; but, as the two former are not yet returned, I am afraid they are arrested.

The Dutch outposts on the Maubeuge road, near Havay, have been reconnoitred this morning by a French party.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 9th June, 1815.

A deserter of the 3rd Lancers, coming from Valenciennes, says that very few new infantry arrived there: he assures that his regiment has 800 horses. A man whom General Zieten sent to Paris said that 30,000 men would be transported on waggons to this frontier; but he met no troops between Paris and Valenciennes.

This instant (half-past nine) a gun firing is heard in the direction from Maubeuge, which is supposed to signify Buonaparte's arrival at the army.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Papers of the 6th.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 9th June, 1815, 9 P.M.

I am informed by General Gneisenau that he has received intelligence, on which he relies, of the march of the 4th corps from the neighbourhood of Thionville, and of the arrival of part of it at Mézières. His report gives no date or numbers.

A good deal of pains has been taken to collect information of the state of the defences of the French fortresses. Should your Lordship be desirous of comparing reports, I will request a copy; and, in this case, beg to be informed whether I may mention that your Lordship will make a similar communication.

I have the honour to be your Lordship's obedient servant,

H. HARDINGE.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine-le-Comte, 9th June, 1815.

I lose no time in forwarding to you the enclosed report I received this moment. Everything seemed quiet when I was in front this morning.

Napoleon having arrived, I think he is likely to attack in a very few days, if he means to attack at all. I shall go again to-morrow morning early to the front, and will let you know if I can observe any movement amongst them.

Ever your most sincerely affectionate

WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE.

[ENCLOSURE.]

General Baron Van Merlen to the Prince of Orange.

MON GÉNÉRAL, St. Simphorien, ce 9 Juin, 1815.

Napoléon a passé hier la revue à Morvilles des troupes dans les environs d'Avesnes et Landrecy. Ce matin il est arrivé à Maubeuge, où on a tiré 101 coups de canon.

Un homme arrivé de Maubeuge dit que les Français doivent attaquer aujourd'hui. C'est un on dit. On remarque sur la ligne cavalerie et infanterie. Je présume qu'il viendra voir lui-même la ligne. Je vais monter à cheval pour venir vous voir, afin de nous concerter ensemble.

Recevez l'assurance, &c.,

LE GÉNÉRAL BARON VAN MERLEN.

General Zieten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Charleroi, le 9 Juin, 1815.

D'après toutes les données que je reçois de mes avant-postes, et des personnes de la France, il paraît que les mouvemens exécutés par l'ennemi ont eu lieu parceque j'avais fait tracer un camp non loin des frontières, dans le cas que le 1er. corps d'armée sous mes ordres pourrait avoir l'honneur d'être passé en revue, et parceque la division du Général de Steinmetz occupant l'aile droite a eu un renfort de 6 bataillons d'infanterie de ligne. L'ennemi a fait partir plusieurs régimens, je crois vers quatre mille hommes, des environs de Marienbourg, les dirigeant sur Maubeuge, où il peut avoir 60 canons dans le camp retranché, et où le Général Vandamme se trouve aujourd'hui.

Jusqu'hier les frontières et environs n'avaient pas encore reçu de renfort. Un jeune homme parti le 4 de Paris assure que Buonaparte n'oserait pas quitter la capitale, et que les suites du Champ de Mai ne serviraient qu'à le faire mépriser.

Je supplie Votre Altesse d'agréer en bonté les sentimens respectueux avec lesquelles j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monseigneur,

De Votre Altesse le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

ZIETEN.

[887.] G. O. Bruxelles, 10th June, 1815.

1. All officers who have heretofore been in the habit of transmitting to the Military Secretary, for the warrant of the Commander of the Forces, their contingent accounts, certificates of glandered horses, horses shot in action, and claims for allowances provided by His Majesty's regulations, will in future send all such accounts in duplicate to the Comptrollers of Army Accounts at head quarters.

2. Regimental Paymasters, on filling up the printed forms of estimates of pay, are desired to attend to the following particulars:

1st. They are invariably to fill up the article specifying the amount of ascertained casualties: if no casualties have occurred, they will insert the word "None."

2nd. In the article stating the amount to be added to, or deducted from, the total amount of the estimate, they are to state the amount of any public money in their hands, and in the column of remarks they are to explain how the same has arisen.

3rd. They are to state the names of all officers opposite to their regimental rank, adding their brevet rank (if any) after the name.

4th. They are to state the amount to be deducted from the pay of officers for the property tax.

WELLINGTON.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 10th June, 1815.

I have the honour to transmit the papers of the 7th, by which it appears that Buonaparte was on that day still at Paris.

Count Rouvroix, who fled from Rouvroix last night, as he had intelligence that he was to be arrested, says that French officers assured him yesterday morning positively that Buonaparte was at Maubeuge, and that he did not doubt it. Most of the great proprietors on the frontier are arrested, and sent to the interior. General Excelmans commands the cavalry near Maubeuge, where it is also said that Vandamme has taken his head-quarters. Very large magazines are formed at that place, and the works at the camp are still carried on with great activity; and General Zieten writes that 60 guns are arrived in it.

Three strong redoubts have been built near Beaufort, on the road from Maubeuge to Avesnes.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your most obedient humble servant,
DÖRNBERG.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 10th June, 1815.

A deserter of the 3rd Lancers coming here just now from Roisin, near Valenciennes, says that they had it in general orders Buonaparte was arrived at Laon, and I believe the salute of yesterday was only for his arrival at the army, because he was not at Avesnes on the 8th, as has been reported.

A man from Valenciennes says that the news there was that Buonaparte left Paris on the 6th with 80,000 men, of whom 40,000 were National Guards, and that quarters for 10,000 men had been made at Valenciennes.

The 4th Lancers coming from St. Amand are come to form a brigade with the 3rd.

No papers have arrived as yet, nor any of my men.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your most obedient humble servant,
DÖRNBERG.

L. Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 10th June, 1815, 9½ A.M.

I have just learnt that General Mattissowitch, the Belgic Governor of this place, received an estafette in the course of the night informing him of the arrival of Buonaparte at Lisle on the night of the 8th.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

Prince Schwarzenberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Heidelberg, ce 10 Juin, 1815.

J'ai reçu la lettre par laquelle Votre Excellence me fait l'honneur de m'informer des mouvemens des troupes Françaises qui se trouvent en position vis-à-vis de son armée, et je m'empresse de vous en faire mes remercimens, Monsieur le Maréchal.

Les deux Empereurs étant réunis, ils viennent de s'accorder sur la manière de disposer leurs armées pour opérer l'invasion en France. Mon premier aide-de-camp, le Colonel Comte de Baar, aura l'honneur de vous remettre la présente. Il est instruit de tous les détails sur les opérations que je vais commencer avec l'armée que je commande, et qui pourraient vous intéresser. Vous verrez, My Lord, que pour ne pas découvrir la flanc gauche de l'armée du Prince Blücher, l'Empereur Alexandre marche avec 150,000 Russes par Trèves, tandis que le Maréchal Wrede a l'ordre de se porter droit en avant pour passer la Saar, et en tournant les Vosges d'effectuer par Luneville le plus promptement que possible sa jonction avec le reste de mon armée, dont il forme l'aile droite. Un corps d'armée Russe, au nombre de 50,000 hommes, marche sur la même hauteur que le Maréchal Wrede, pour former le blocus des forteresses situées sur la Saar, la Moselle, et la Meuse. Si ces deux corps se trouvaient attaqués par des forces supérieures, ils sont assez fort pour faire un beau mouvement rétrograde, et laisser ainsi le temps suffisant pour que l'armée Russe et Prussienne puisse tomber sur le flanc de l'armée ennemie. Je passerai le Rhin le 24 Juin sur différens points près de Bâle ; je ferai longer le Rhin par un corps de troupes destiné à former les blocades des forteresses situées dans cette vallée, et je filerai avec l'armée par Altkirch sur Béfort; je bloquerai cette place ainsi que Besançon ; je ne négligerai rien pour presser mon mouvement de manière à arriver le 1 Juillet sur les bords de la Saône, et le 4 près de Langres. Cet endroit, très avantageusement placé, doit avoir été fortifié avec beaucoup de soins par l'ennemie, ainsi que le château de Montbeillard. C'est alors, Monsieur le Duc, que je me trouverai à la même hauteur que vous. Le Général Frimont doit arriver le 27 a Genève, d'où il se dirigera sans délai sur Lyon.

Voici en peu de mots mes projets pour la première époque de mes opérations : ne pas doutez du zèle qui anime toute l'armée ; nous brûlons du désir de nous rapprocher de vous pour travailler conjointement avec vous à écraser le monstre qui infeste le globe.

Agréez, Monsieur le Duc, les assurances de ma haute considération et de ma plus sincère amitié.

Votre très humble serviteur,

SCHWARZENBERG.

A Son Excellence le Lieut.-Général Baron de Vincent, Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plénipotentiaire près Sa Majesté très Chrétienne.

Heidelberg, ce 10 Juin, 1815.

Monsieur le Général de Langenau a été chargé de porter à votre connaissance un mémoire rédigé à Vienne, en date du 28 Avril, dans le but de faire adopter certains principes généraux sur les opérations de cette guerre.

Le plan ci-annexé (No. I.) que j'ai l'honneur de communiquer à V.E. contient le développement de ces mêmes principes. Il a été sanctionné en substance par un ordre de S.M. l'Empereur notre maître, dont la copie est ci-jointe (No. II.).

Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies a répondu à ce projet par un mémoire (No. III.) dont je vous donne également communication, Monsieur le Baron, et auquel j'ai répondu par la note (No. IV.).

A la suite de ces ouvertures on a tenu une conférence qui a apporté des modifications à ce premier projet, contenues dans un protocole dont je joins à la présente une copie conforme (No. V.), à dessin de tenir Votre Excellence dans une connaissance exacte des résolutions et des événements qui peuvent intéresser l'objet de sa mission.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

COPIE d'un Rapport sur les Opérations fait à Sa Majesté l'Empereur d'Autriche par Son Altesse le Prince de Schwarzenberg.

Quartier Général de Heidelberg, ce 6 Juin, 1815.

Les principes généraux devant servir de base aux opérations contre la France ont été soumis à Sa Majesté mon maître dans un mémoire rédigé en date du 28 Avril, et ont obtenus son assentiment.

Le Duc de Wellington, à qui j'en ai donné communication, les a adoptés quant aux idées fondamentales, ainsi que Monsieur le Feld Maréchal Prince de Blücher. C'est à ces principes généraux que se rapportent les premières dispositions de toutes les armées actives. Il importe maintenant de s'entendre sur la conduite des opérations elles-mêmes, et d'adopter à cet effet des mesures décisives.

Rien depuis cette époque n'a changé dans notre position militaire, si ce n'est que le retard des opérations nous permet maintenant d'attendre l'armée Russe, pour les ouvrir de concert avec elle, et que l'heureuse issue de la guerre contre Naples nous donne la faculté d'élever notre armée du Piémont au nombre de cent mille hommes, qui formeront notre aîle gauche dans cette position agressive contre la France.

J'ai toujours été pénétré de l'inconvénient majeur qu'il y aurait à réunir des forces aussi considérables que les nôtres sur un front trop resserré, et convaincu de l'utilité qu'il y a à occuper des positions plus étendues, qui puissent—

1°. Nous assurer les moyens de subsistance suffisans.

2°. Offrir à chacune de nos armées une base pour ses opérations.

3°. Qui puissent fatiguer l'ennemi par la nécessité d'un mouvement toujours soutenu, puisque, ne pouvant agir qu'avec une seule armée, les succès mêmes qu'il remporterait sur une des armées Alliées ne le sauveraient pas de l'embarras de retourner sur ses pas pour nous faire face sur un autre point.

Si ces considérations m'ont paru importantes, alors elles ont acquit un nouveau degré de force par le besoin que nous avons d'entretenir une communication suivie avec notre armée d'Italie, et de la faire entrer dans le plan général de nos opérations.

C'est sur ces principes que j'ai établi la disposition suivante pour les opérations de l'armée qui est confiée à mon commandement.

Vingt mille hommes de l'armée d'Italie vont se porter sur Turin y faire leur jonction avec dix mille hommes de troupes Piémontaises, et pousser un détachement de dix mille hommes, moitié Autrichiens, moitié Piémontais, jusqu'à Coni.

Cinquante mille hommes sous les ordres du Général de Cavalerie Baron de Frimont vont passer le Simplon et marcher à Genève.

Ce n'est que quand cette colonne principale se sera portée en avant de Genève que celle de Turin pourra, selon les circonstances, ou prendre la direction de Chambery en passant le Mont Cenis, ou bien marcher par Briançon à Grenoble.

En tout cas elle doit se regarder comme une colonne dépendante du gros de l'armée essentiellement destinée à couvrir le Piémont ou à se réunir à la colonne principale dans la direction de Lyon, en cas que le Piémont ne fut point menacé.

Lyon est l'objet principal dans les opérations de ces deux colonnes. Celle de Coni se doit tenir sur la défensive jusqu'au moment où elle sera renforcée par vingt cinq mille hommes, que le Lieutenant-Général Bianchi lui amènera de Naples ; après quoi elle doit diriger ses opérations en passant par Nice dans la Provence, où elle sera à portée d'être puissamment secourue par les Anglais.

Il faut seize jours à l'armée d'Italie pour arriver aux points ci-dessus indiqués de Genève, de Turin, et de Coni, à compter du jour où elle aura reçu l'ordre de se mettre en mouvement. Si donc cette ordre était expédiée le 7 de ce mois, et que quatre jours fussent comptés pour le voyage du courrier, l'armée d'Italie pourrait se trouver dans ses positions le 27 du courant.

Pour établir une communication entre l'armée d'Italie et celle du Haut Rhin, il faut que cette dernière ait passée cette rivière à Bâle avec son premier, son second, son troisième corps d'armée et son corps de réserve le 25 de Juin. Elle doit être mise à portée de cerner la place de Béfort le jour même où l'armée d'Italie aura atteint la ville de Genève.

Jusqu'à cette époque l'armée de M. le Maréchal Prince Wrede doit prendre à tâche d'attirer à elle l'attention de l'ennemi, et de couvrir par là les mouvemens de la grande armée.

Elle doit cependant éviter tout engagement sérieux, et se retirer entre les têtes de pont qu'elle a sur le Rhin, en cas qu'elle soit entamée avec supériorité.

Les têtes des colonnes de l'armée Russe arrivent le 21 de ce mois aux bords du Rhin entre Mayence et Mannheim, et le 29 leurs dernières divisions les auront atteint.

Ce n'est qu'alors que, formant l'avant garde de l'armée Russe, le Maréchal

Prince Wrede pourra ouvrir les opérations offensives : à compter de ce moment ce ne sont que les mouvemens et les positions de l'ennemi qui puissent déterminer les opérations ultérieures.

Il serait à désirer que le jour du 27 fut également adopté par Messieurs les Maréchaux Wellington et Blücher pour commencer leur offensive, ce qui obligerait infailliblement l'ennemi à mettre ses intentions à découvert.

Il a disposé maintenant ses forces principales contre les armées Anglo-Prussiennes ; il n'a que peu de troupes contre nous dans les environs de Metz, Landau, et Altkirch.

En tirant partie de sa supériorité présente il peut entamer les armées Anglo-Prussiennes. En ce cas nous devons chercher à les dégager avec promptitude en pressant les mouvemens offensives vers Nancy et Langres, ou bien vers Langres et Luneville.

Dans la supposition la plus fâcheuse que Napoléon remporta une victoire sur Lord Wellington et le Maréchal Prince Blücher, il ne saurait nous empêcher de nous porter sur Lyon, Langres, et Nancy, et de préparer ainsi sa ruine.

Il pourrait encore réunir des forces majeures devant notre centre, attaquer le Maréchal Wrede et l'armée Russe, et les forcer à se replier sur leurs têtes de pont sur le Rhin.

Ce mouvement obligerait les armées Anglo-Prussiennes et l'armée Autrichienne à pousser leurs opérations avec la plus grande énergie, pour envelopper l'armée ennemie et marcher sur Paris. La première prendrait la direction de Paris ; la seconde celle de Nancy, en passant par Epinal.

Quelle ressource militaire trouverait alors l'armée ennemie ? On ne peut guère admettre la possibilité qu'elle veuille ainsi aller directement à sa perte.

L'ennemi pourrait encore, en réunissant les forces dont il dispose dans l'intérieur de la France à celles qui se trouvent à Béfort et à Strasbourg, tomber sur l'armée Autrichienne.

Le calcul de ses forces et celui des nôtres nous servira de base pour décider si nous devons accepter une bataille ou l'éviter, jusqu'à l'époque où nous pourrons reprendre l'offensive de concert avec l'armée Russe et Bavaroise.

En supposant même que Napoléon eut remporté une victoire contre cette armée, il y aurait nécessairement sacrifié la plus grande partie de ses moyens, tandis que l'immensité des forces que les Alliés lui opposent nous offrent des ressources prodigieuses, et laisse un libre cours aux entreprises que l'armée du Maréchal Wellington, celle du Prince de Blücher, et notre armée d'Italie tenteraient sur Paris et sur le midi de la France, sans avoir aucune résistance à craindre.

En soumettant ces différentes conjectures à un sévère examen, il paraît évident qu'un mouvement de Napoléon qui aurait pour objet l'armée de Wellington et l'armée du Haut Rhin serait bien plus préjudiciable que le projet insensé de sa part de vouloir forcer notre centre.

Un mouvement sur nos flancs ne pourrait devenir dangereux pour nous que si Napoléon avait deux armées également fortes à y employer qui puissent se porter sur les deux aîles, les culbuter successivement, et arriver ainsi jusqu'à notre centre.

Mais c'est précisément dans l'impossibilité où il se trouve de former une seconde armée que consiste notre attitude supérieure vis-à-vis de lui. Nous perdons cette heureuse attitude en nous groupant en une masse, en offrant par là à Napoléon les moyens de réunir ses forces sur un point.

Ce plan d'opération paraît répondre en tout aux intentions des hautes Puissances Alliées.

Chacune des armées garderait la base qui lui est propre, et une communication qui lui est assurée.

En mettant de la circonspection dans ces opérations aucune ne peut être battue de manière à ne pas offrir aux deux autres armées des chances avantageuses, et servir ainsi à la cause générale.

Ce n'est que de cette manière que leur subsistance peut être assurée; l'armée qui aurait essuyée un revers ne pourrait jamais être poursuivie de manière à ne pas reprendre l'offensive contre Napoléon aussitôt qu'il serait forcé de l'abandonner lui-même pour aller défendre ses communications et l'intérieur de la France.

Ces mesures une fois adoptées et mises en exécution amèneront infailliblement la destruction de l'armée Française, quand même une série de succès l'aurait devancés.

Il dérive de la nature de ces projets que l'armée du Haut Rhin formerait le blocus de Besançon, d'Huningue, de Neuf Brisac, et Schelstadt, tandis que l'armée Russe cernerait Strasbourg, Landau, et Phalsbourg.

Il n'en serait pas de même si, en renoncant aux avantages que nous assure la supériorité du nombre, nous voulions réunir deux cent mille Russes à deux cent cinquante mille Autrichiens et Bavarois, pour les porter sur la même route vers Nancy. Les dangers qui résulteraient d'une pareille opération sont à considérer sous un double point de vue; d'abord par rapport à la cause générale, puis par les désavantages dont elle menacerait l'armée Autrichienne en particulier : 450,000 hommes se dirigeant sur la même ligne, soit en échelon, soit en formant une masse, et se portant sur Paris, doivent difficilement échapper à la destruction, que leur prépare le défaut de subsistances pour un aussi grand nombre d'hommes, même sans aucun événement militaire.

Le seul système qui puisse nous menacer d'un danger réel en France ne pourrait être mis en vigueur par Napoléon, que si nous nous attachions à rassembler nos forces dans un seul corps, qui pourrait être tourné par ses flancs, et même entamé sur ses derrières : une bataille livrée dans ces circonstances nous exposerait à voir notre gauche enveloppée par l'ennemi, qui en suivant la direction de notre ligne nous ramenerait battant sur notre aîle droite.

Sans nous présenter la bataille il pourrait en entravant nos communications faire naître au milieu de nous tous les maux de la disette, et les élémens de notre propre désorganisation. Les corps des troupes disposés en arrière pour former le blocus des places fortes ne sauraient nous préserver des conséquences malheureuses d'un pareil système. Elles s'accroîteraient en proportion que, suivant l'exemple de Napoléon dans son expédition de Moscou, nous avancerions sur la même ligne vers Paris.

Il est encore moins admissible pour l'armée Autrichienne en particulière, puisqu'il lui ferait prendre des positions dans lesquelles ses communications avec la base d'opération seroient interceptées par Brisac, Strasbourg, et Schelstadt. En admettant le cas d'une retraite forcée, une entreprise de l'ennemi sur notre flanc gauche menacerait l'armée Autrichienne d'une perte inévitable.

Notre communication si essentielle avec l'armée d'Italie serait interrompue, et la Suisse, ce boulevard de la monarchie Autrichienne, resterait à découvert. On peut être divisé d'opinion en agitant une question de si haute importance; il y en a une cependant qui ne sera combattue par personne : c'est la pressante nécessité d'ouvrir les opérations sans délai, et de faire parvenir à l'armée d'Italie les instructions nécessaires pour les siennes.

The Emperor of Austria to Prince Schwarzenberg.

Heidelberg, ce 7 de Juin, 1815.

MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL PRINCE SCHWARZENBERG,

J'approuve le plan de campagne que vous m'avez soumis en date du 6 du courant. Ce n'est qu'en adoptant les principes qu'il contient qu'on parvient à concevoir la possibilité de pourvoir aux subsistances des armées; c'est également en agissant d'après ces principes que l'on couvre le point important de la Suisse, et que l'ennemi se trouve hors d'état d'agir avec la totalité de ses forces sur une des armées qui lui sont opposées, sans exposer ses communications, et même sans découvrir l'intérieur de la France à l'invasion d'une autre armée.

Il résulte d'ailleurs de la nature de ce projet qu'aussitôt que les Vosges auront été passées les armées chercheront à établir des communications plus directes à mesure qu'elles avanceront vers la force principale de l'ennemi.

Quant à l'opération projetée d'un corps de troupes, qui en passant par Nice se porterait sur Marseille et Toulon, il me paraît qu'elle absorberait des forces que l'on pourrait plus utilement employer d'une autre côté, en renforcant simplement le corps qui s'établie à Coni par cinq mille hommes, tandis que les autres vingt mille que le Général Bianchi aurait à même de Naples se réuniraient à l'armée du Général de Cavalerie Frimont.

Ce corps de troupes pourrait alors former avec succès un détachement intermédiaire entre l'armée du Haut Rhin et celle de l'Italie, et servir en même tems à couvrir les blocus de Besançon et Auxonne.

FRANÇOIS.

Mémoire de S.M. l'Empereur de Toutes les Russies.

Heidelberg, ce 27 Mai (8 Juin), 1815.

Ayant lu avec attention le plan tracé par le Maréchal Prince Schwarzenberg, je suis entièrement du même avis sur les idées principales. Je ne diffère d'opinion avec lui que sur la manière de déboucher en France.

Il me semble que laisser entre l'armée Russe qui doit effectuer son passage du Rhin entre Mannheim et Mayence, et l'armée Autrichienne qui d'après ce plan doit le faire par Bâle, une distance aussi considérable, c'est se priver gratuitement de l'avantage énorme de pouvoir réunir les deux armées, au cas que l'ennemi se porte en force sur l'une d'elles, ce qui se ferait avec facilité si l'armée Autrichienne effectue son passage entre Germersheim et Mannheim.

L'armée Autrichienne se porterait alors par Luneville et Nancy sur Chaumont et Bar sur Aube, tandis que l'armée Russe prendrait sa marche par Saarbruck et Sargemin vers Bar-le-Duc et St. Dizier.

De cette manière le point de direction que le Maréchal a choisi pour l'armée Autrichienne serait également atteint, et même par une ligne plus droite, par conséquent plus courte; mais les deux armées conserveraient constamment la possibilité de se réunir et de présenter à l'ennemi une supériorité imposante: tandis que, manœuvrant sur un éloignement aussi immense que celui entre la Saar et la route de Bâle à Vesoul, on pourroit se trouver forcé à des mouvemens rétrogrades, si on ne voudrait pas risquer de bataille contre un ennemi à forces à peu près égales. Je suis le premier à convenir qu'il y a des cas où les mouvemens rétrogrades sont inévitables, et même nécessaires ; mais on pourra difficilement me contester qu'avec des masses de 200,000 hommes ils ne soyent très difficiles à exécuter ce pratique, influant en même tems d'une manière toujours défavorable sur le morale des troupes.

Ces difficultés deviennent encore plus grandes quand on se trouve dans un pays dont les habitans sont mal disposés, ce qui sera le cas dans les contrées que nous avons à traverser.

Ainsi je conclus que quand on a les moyens de prévenir des résultats pareils, il y a toujours avantage de le faire.

Or ces moyens me semblent être dans nos mains. Conservant les deux armées dans une proximité telle à pouvoir être réunies dans deux ou trois marches, on n'a plus besoin de rétrograder, et on peut, il me semble, sans risquer accepter le combat. Les armées Anglaises et Prussiennes auront toute facilité pendant ce tems de manœuvrer en flanc et sur les communications de l'ennemi ; et si Napoléon jugerait à propos, sans accepter de bataille partielle, de réunir toutes ses forces en arrière, nous aurions de même l'avantage d'y faire concourir toutes les nôtres comme à Leipzig.

Une objection que je dois encore ajouter à toutes les autres, c'est que l'armée Autrichienne pressant sa marche par Bâle, je me trouverais personnellement dans l'obligation de rester avec l'armée Russe, puisqu'il n'y aurait aucune raison valable de me porter par préférence à une armée étrangère, et surtout quand elle se trouvera à l'extrême gauche de votre ligne. Je crois cependant qu'il y aurait un immense avantage, soit pour l'ensemble des résolutions, soit pour l'effet morale qui en résulte, que les Souverains restassent comme par le passé, constamment réunis dans les quartiers généraux aussi rapprochés que possible.

Il ne me reste plus qu'à faire l'observation, que charger l'armée Russe du blocus de Strasbourg ne me paraît pas possible, puisqu'elle a déjà naturellement ceux de Metz, Thionville, Longwy, Saar Louis, Bitsch, Phalsbourg, Petite Pierre, Lichtenberg, et Marsale à faire. Il me semble plus équitable d'en charger l'armée Autrichienne, qui aurait par là Strasbourg, Schelstadt, Brisac, Huningue, Béfort, et Besançon à observer.

Memorandum by Prince Schwarzenberg.

Quartier-Général d'Heidelberg, ce 9 de Juin, 1815.

J'éprouve une grande satisfaction en voyant par les observations que S.M. l'Empereur de toutes les Russies a daignée me faire communiquer, que le plan d'opération que j'ai eu l'honneur de lui soumettre a obtenu sa sanction quant aux idées fondamentales.

Elle a bien voulu prendre en considération le principe que les armées actives contre la France devaient conduire leurs opérations à une assez grande distance les unes des autres pour forcer l'ennemi de découvrir l'intérieur de ses provinces vis-à-vis d'une de ces armées, en voulant combattre l'autre offensivement.

Ce n'est que sur le mode de déboucher en France que ce projet ne paraît pas répondre entièrement aux vues de S.M., et elle fait à ce sujet deux objections du plus grand poids.

Elle a bien voulu dans la première appuyer sur l'utilité qu'il y aurait à dis-poser les armées Russes et Autrichiennes de manière à pouvoir se prêter entre elles des puissans secours.

La seconde porte sur le regret que LL. MM. éprouveraient dans l'alternative de se séparer personnellement, ou de quitter les armées respectives. Je reconnais dans la première de ces observations l'élévation des vues militaires de S.M.; dans la seconde, l'intention infiniment sage et bienveillante de maintenir par un rapprochement personnel le concert le plus unanime dans les opérations politiques et militaires de cette guerre.

Toutes deux sont d'une trop grande importance pour ne pas motiver de ma part des modifications dans le plan projeté, qui a pour but de le rapprocher des intentions de S.M.

Je pars toutefois du principe qu'en aucun cas l'armée Autrichienne ne peut livrer à des chances incertaines sa communication avec l'armée d'Italie, ni abandonner les débouchés de la Suisse aux entreprises de l'ennemi, bien moins encore compromettre le salut de l'armée qui m'est confiée en la privant d'une base d'opération qui lui soit propre, et qui lui assure la faculté de faire sa retraite, si une tentative de l'ennemi sur son aîle gauche rendrait cette mesure nécessaire. Je crois cependant pouvoir proposer les changemens que voici :

Les têtes des colonnes de l'armée Russe destinés à se porter sur Rheinweiler pourraient se réunir à la grande armée, et suivre ses mouvemens jusqu'à Langres. Les dernières divisions de cette armée, fortes de 50,000 hommes, disposés entre Mayence et Mannheim, appuyeraient les mouvemens du Maréchal Wrede, et formeraient le blocus des places fortes.

On peut donc mettre de fait que 150,000 Russes se réuniraient à l'armée du Haut Rhin auprès de Bâle vers la fin de ce mois.

Cette mesure paraît pleinement répondre aux intentions de S.M.; elle admet l'exécution des principes généraux établis et sanctionnés par S.M. l'Empereur de Russie et les autres hautes Puissances Alliées.

Elle assure notre communication avec l'armée d'Italie; elle couvre la Suisse, et nous laisse appuyés sur notre base naturelle.

L'armée du Maréchal Wrede et 50,000 Russes formeraient notre centre.

En saisissant l'esprit de mon plan d'opération il doit particulièrement s'attacher à attirer l'attention de l'ennemi jusqu'au moment où le passage du Rhin sera effectué : en général se tenir en mesure jusqu'à ce que les circonstances lui permettent de se porter sur Nancy ou sur Luneville, époque à laquelle le corps de 50,000 hommes des troupes Russes doit également se porter en avant pour remplir la première destination en formant les blocus des forteresses.

PROTOCOLE de la CONFÉRENCE du 10 Juin, 1815.

Présents.

S.A. le Maréchal Prince de Schwarzenberg.
S.A. le Maréchal Prince de Wrede.
M. le Général Prince de Volkonsky, aide-de-camp de S.M. l'Empereur de Russie.
M. le Lieutenant-Général Comte de Radetzky, quartier-maître général de l'armée Autrichienne.
M. le Lieutenant-Général Baron de Toll, à l'état major de S.M. l'Empereur de Russie.
M. le Lieutenant-Général Baron de Knesebeck, de l'état major Prussien.
M. le Général Major de Langenau, à l'état major Autrichien.

Ayant été munis des ordres de S.M. l'Empereur de toutes les Russies sur la manière dont elle jugeait convenable de faire coopérer son armée à l'ouverture de cette campagne, la haute Conférence a pris les déterminations suivantes :

1. Le gros de l'armée Russe prendra la direction à Trèves, en passant par la chaîne des montagnes dite le Hundsrucken, et sans occuper la route de Kaiserslautern, réservée au mouvement de l'armée Bavaroise. Elle se mettra à portée d'appuyer les mouvemens de l'armée Prussienne, et dirigera ses opérations vers St. Dizier, pour faciliter sa communication avec l'armée Autrichienne.

2. L'armée Autrichienne, suivant le plan d'opération rédigé en date du 6 Juin, marchera par la gauche, passera le Rhin à Bâle, et se portera sur Béfort, Langres, Chaumont, d'où elle se dirigera de manière à établir par la ligne la plus directe sa communication avec l'armée Russe.

3. L'armée Bavaroise, sous les ordres du Maréchal Prince de Wrede, continuant à faire partie de l'armée du Haut Rhin, gardera la rive gauche, et se mettra en mesure de prendre l'offensive aussitôt qu'un corps de l'armée Russe sera arrivé pour former le blocus des places fortes.

4. L'armée Autrichienne doit, avec une armée de 41,000 hommes, cerner les places de Besançon, Béfort, Auxonne, Huningue, Brisac, Schelstadt, les forts de Youx, de Salins, et de l'Ecluse, en outre fournir 18,000 hommes de la garnison de Mayence, pour former le blocus de Strasbourg et de Landau.

5. 35,000 hommes de l'armée Russe seront détachés pour cerner les places de Metz, Thionville, Saarlouis, Bitsch, et Phalsbourg.

Elle fournira en outre 8000 hommes d'infanterie, 3000 hommes de cavalerie, et l'artillerie suffisante au blocus de Strasbourg et de Landau. La garnison de Luxembourg agira de concert avec les troupes dispersées par le blocus de Thionville et de Metz, en les renforçant au besoin par des détachemens.

The Emperor of Russia to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Heidelberg, le 10 Juin (29 Mai), 1815.

Ayant joint le Quartier-Général depuis peu de jours, Monsieur le Maréchal, j'expédie auprès de vous le Général de Division de Toll, pour vous en faire part, et vous exprimer en mon nom combien l'armée Russe et moi nous nous trouvons flattés de vous avoir pour compagnons d'armes. Combattans à vos côtés, nous tâcherons de justifier votre estime et votre confiance.

En même tems je charge le Général Toll de vous rendre compte des différentes déterminations qui ont été arrêtées dans le comité militaire à Heidelberg, et qui diffèrent en partie de ce qui avait été décidé à Vienne. Veuillez nous dire franchement votre sentiment. Ma croyance en vos lumières et vos talens est entière.

Le Général de Brigade Comte Potozky va arriver incessamment à votre Quartier-Général pour y rester à votre disposition et servir à nos rapports mutuels. Je vous prie, Maréchal, d'accorder votre confiance à ces deux officiers, qui s'efforceront de la mériter.

Recevez, Monsieur le Maréchal, l'assurance de tout l'attachement et de la haute estime que je vous ai voué.

ALEXANDRE.

Lionel Hervey, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Ghent, 10th June, 1815.

I have the honour to forward to your Grace a statement of the strength of the French army which the Duc de Feltre received this morning from a person who left Paris on the 4th June.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient servant,

LIONEL HERVEY.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

The Duc de Feltre to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Gand, le 10 Juin, 1815.

J'ai reçu hier fort tard les renseignemens ci-joints, qui méritent beaucoup d'attention. Ils viennent des bureaux du Département de la Guerre, et font voir qu'à l'aide de tous les moyens qu'il a employés Buonaparte est parvenu à augmenter ses troupes assez sensiblement.

La personne qui m'envoi ces détails, et qui est instruite et parfaitement sûre, craignant d'être compromise, n'a pas voulu les donner par écrit. Ils ont été confiés à la mémoire d'un ancien officier qui vient d'arriver, et sur les sentimens duquel on peut compter. Toutefois il était moins certain de ce qu'il m'a dit au sujet des forces de Le Courbe, de Suchet, de Brune, et des Pyrénées, que du reste. On lui a donné la force des corps en nombres ronds et sans fractions; et il me dit qu'on les a élevés au plus haut, parcequ'on y a compté d'avance tout ce qui était destiné à les rejoindre et qui les aura rejoints au moment actuel. Cet officier a quitté Paris le 4 Juin.

Je suis porté à penser qu'il y a dans cet état quelque exagération : c'est pourquoi j'en mets ici la récapitulation, et en regard ce que je crois plus vraisemblable :—

Différence, 45,000 hommes.

Les rapports que Votre Excellence reçoit la mettront à même de rectifier mon calcul, si elle trouve que j'exagère la réduction ; mais elle se rappelera les premières bases d'après lesquelles j'ai établi la force de l'armée Française, et qui posent sur le nombre de régimens qui la constituent.

Je suis très porté à croire que Buonaparte a 500 pièces de canon bien attelées. C'est à mettre son artillerie en bon état qu'il aura employé une grande partie des fonds qu'il a pu se procurer.

Il y a quelques corps de soldats en retraite dans certaines places, même des soldats qui ont des jambes de bois.

Givet est une place en mauvais état : on assure qu'elle se défendrait mal ; et son commandant, dont le nom doit être Bour ou Bauer, a témoigné dans sa correspondance avec le Prince d'Eckmühl (Davoust) l'inquiétude de ne pouvoir résister.

L'officier qui m'est arrivé croyait Buonaparte parti de Paris, et pensait qu'il pourrait attaquer vers le 10, et pousser vers Namur.

Le calcul sur le nombre des gardes nationales est conjectural: on n'a pu se le procurer exactement.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE DUC DE FELTRE.

II.

L'Armée Française.

L'armée principale s'étend de Lille à Rocroi. Elle est composée du 1er. corps, commandé par Drouet, Comte d'Erlon, fort de 25,000 hommes (il tient la gauche) ; du 2me. corps, commandé par le Général Reille, fort pareillement de 25,000 hommes, occupant le centre ; et du 3me. corps, 15,000 hommes, sous les ordres de Vandamme, qui est à la droite. A Laon se trouve un corps de réserve de 15,000 hommes, commandé par Mouton, Comte de Lobau. Le grand quartier-général est dans cette ville. La Garde Impériale a dû se mettre en route Lundi, 5 Juin, pour s'y rendre. Le corps du Général Mouton porte la dénomination du 6me. corps. Le 5me. corps, nommé aussi l'Armée du Rhin, est sous le commandement de Rapp. Son quartier-général était à Weissembourg. Sa force est de 20,000 hommes. Le 4me. corps est celui du Général Gérard, qui se trouve à Metz ; il a aussi 20,000 hommes. Les deux dernières divisions pourraient bien se réunir à l'armée principale. Outre l'induction tirée de l'ordre des numéros, une décision de Buonaparte autorise à adopter cette opinion. Le Major-Général (Soult) et le Ministre de la Guerre (Davoust) ayant soumis à Buonaparte la question de savoir si le Major-Général pouvait donner des ordres aux Généraux Rapp et Gérard, l'Empereur répondit, "Non, tant que leurs corps ne feront point partie de l'armée principale." Suivant cette idée les troupes destinées à combattre dans le nord s'éléveraient à 120,000 hommes. Il faut y joindre la Garde, qui donnerait encore 20,000 hommes, si elle y était employée toute entière ; mais on a été obligé d'en détacher 6000 hommes pour les envoyer contre les Vendéens.

Quelques personnes pensent que Buonaparte a le projet d'attaquer vers le 10 de ce mois, et de se porter en avant de Rocroi.

L'infanterie est généralement en très bon état. La cavalerie manque, et les chevaux, non plus que les cavaliers, ne sont pas exercés. On estime que la cavalerie des corps ci-dessus mentionnés en forment tout au plus le sixième. Quant à l'artillerie de campagne, elle est plus nombreuse et meilleure qu'on ne croit. Buonaparte compte beaucoup sur elle. Il a bien cinq cents bouches à feu à l'armée.

Les places sont en très mauvais état. Elles n'ont ni les munitions ni les pièces nécessaires. Lille, Valenciennes, et Condé sont les seules qui soient bien tenues. Le défaut de troupes de ligne a forcé de les confier à la garde nationale, aux invalides, et aux militaires pensionnés.

Après les corps dont il a été parlé, il reste fort peu de troupes sur les autres points de la France. Le Général Le Courbe n'a pas 8000 hommes dans les environs de Béfort ou d'Altkirch. Buonaparte lui a fait dire qu'il devait se servir des gardes nationales pour défendre cette partie de la France. Effectivement la garde nationale de la Lorraine, de l'Alsace, et de quelques départemens voisines montre la plus vive ardeur pour le service. Cependant le Maréchal Davoust a annoncé qu'en cas de besoin il ordonnerait au Général Gérard d'envoyer quelques renforts au Général Le Courbe. On n'avait d'abord donné que 5000 hommes au Maréchal Suchet, qui est en Savoye. Il refusait ce commandement. On lui a promis une augmentation de force. Pourtant on ne pourra pas lui donner au delà de 8000 hommes en tout. Sur le Var il n'y a pas plus de 6000 hommes. On vient de détacher du commandement du Général Clausel, qui reste à Bordeaux, trois départemens (Toulouse, Perpignan, &c.), que l'on a soumis à Général Decaen. Ces deux généraux n'aurait à eux deux que 15,000 hommes.

Récapitulation des Forces Militaires actuelles de Buonaparte.

1er. corps	25,000
2me.	25,000
3me.	15,000
4me.	20,000
5me.	20,000
6me.	15,000
Garde Impériale	20,000
Le Courbe	8,000
Suchet	8,000
Brune	6,000
Bordeaux, &c.	15,000
Hôpitaux et dépôts	50,000
	227,000

Note.—Un grand nombre de recrues ne peuvent sortir des dépôts faute d'habillement. On éprouve les plus grandes difficultés pour se procurer des fournitures, parceque les fonds manquent absolument.

Buonaparte a fait lui-même la répartition de quatre cent mille gardes nationaux; mais on est bien loin de compte; et si l'on peut en réunir 150,000, c'est beaucoup; encore n'y en aura-t-il peut-être pas 100,000 capables de servir. On avait fait fond sur 54,000 dans les départemens du Nord: il a été impossible d'en avoir plus de 11,000.

The Grand Duke of Nassau to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Weilbourg, ce 10 Juin, 1815.

Votre Excellence me permettra d'interrompre pour un moment le cours de ses affaires importantes pour l'entretenir d'un objet du plus grand intérêt pour notre pays. Vous n'ignorez pas, Monsieur le Duc, que le Duc de Nassau et moi nous nous sommes engagé par le traité d'accession de Vienne de mettre sous les ordres de Votre Excellence un contingent de 6080 hommes, qui doit se trouver présentement dans les Pays-Bas, et en outre nous devons tenir prête une réserve de deux ou trois mille hommes pour le soutien de la garnison de Mayence.

Ces engagemens sont certes très considérables d'après la population de notre duché ; et j'ai lieu de croire qu'aucun état allié ne nous surpassera dans cette proportion, peut-être même qu'aucun ne nous égalera. Vu l'esprit excellent qui anime nos sujets, il sera cependant possible de remplir tous nos engagemens si le gouvernement peut-être soutenu par des subsides, qui seraient de la plus grande urgence, notre pays étant exténué par toutes les calamités de la guerre. A cette fin l'on avait fait remettre, il y a quelque tems, à My Lord Clancarty la note que je prends la liberté de communiquer ci-jointe à Votre Excellence. Par nos ministres au Congrès de Vienne nous venons d'apprendre, My Lord, que vous avez les pleins pouvoirs généraux pour traiter des subsides, par lesquelles Sa Majesté Britannique a déclaré vouloir soutenir les Etats Alliés d'Allemagne.

Ils nous ont rapporté encore qu'avec la Cour de Wurtemberg un traité pareil était conclu, et que d'autres Cours Allemandes étaient entrées en négociations avec Votre Excellence. Le Duc mon cousin, et moi, nous n'osons donc pas perdre de temps de nous adresser à Votre Excellence dans une affaire d'un intérêt si majeur, qui touche autant le bien de nos sujets, que la possibilité que le pays puisse soutenir les efforts militaires qu'il est dans le cas de faire. Par cette raison je vous communique, My Lord, la copie de la note sus-mentionnée, qui contient la narration exacte de notre situation ; et je me permets l'ouverture que notre Général Major Baron de Krusé est autorisé et délegué par nous pour apprendre de celui qu'il plairait à Votre Excellence de nommer à cet effet les conditions d'un traité spécial avec Nassau, et il est aussi instruit à le conclure et signer en notre nom.

Je vous prie instamment, Monsieur le Duc, de recevoir le Général de Krusé avec bienveillance, et de vouloir faciliter l'objet de ses sollicitations. Je me flatte d'autant plus que Votre Excellence voudra acquiescer à ma demande, que je nourris en moi la persuasion que nos troupes s'efforceront de mériter toujours son approbation, et qu'ils obtiendront par leur tenue et leur conduite sa bienveillance toute particulière. Je suis sûr que ce sera le cas autant du 2me. régiment, qui se trouve à la solde des Pays-Bas, que du 1er, qui seul est l'objet de la présente négociation.

Veuillez recevoir, Monsieur le Duc, l'assurance de mon entier dévouement, et de la très haute considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être, My Lord,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

FRÉDÉRIC, GRAND DUC DE NASSAU.

[Let a treaty be drawn with the Grand Duc de Nassau for 3050 men, without the article respecting the officer at head-quarters ; but that the British government shall have the right to see that the corps is kept complete.

WELLINGTON.]

[ENCLOSURE.]

Note.

A la sommation des Puissances Alliées le contingent du duché de Nassau a été mis sur pied dans l'espace de quatre semaines, doublé pour sa force, et porté par là même à 3044 hommes, dont l'équipement a tellement été accéléré qu'il pourra à la mi-Mai se mettre en marche pour sa destination, les Pays-Bas.

Pour obtenir un résultat pareil le gouvernement Nassovien a dû prendre des engagemens, qui, vu l'épuisement total du pays, amené par les désastres de la guerre, et qui rend toute autre opération de finances impossible, ne peuvent être remplis que par le prompt secours d'un emprunt.

Néanmoins il n'y a pas d'espoir qu'un pareil emprunt réussisse dans les états voisins aussi promptement que l'urgence l'exige. Dans cet embarras le gouvernement Nassovien se voit contraint de solliciter avec instance un pareil emprunt, d'au moins cinquante mille livres sterling, auprès de la couronne d'Angleterre. LL. AA. SS. les Duc et Prince Souverains de Nassau croyent que cette demande, justifiée suffisamment par les circonstances en elle-même, sera encore étayée par les observations et les offres suivantes :—

(a) Le duché de Nassau est un des pays de l'Allemagne les plus peuplés, mais les plus pauvres. Sa population suffit par conséquent à un armement bien plus considérable que l'état de ses finances ne lui permet d'entretenir.

C'est pourquoi dans des alliances précédentes la France, conjointement avec plusieurs petits états d'Allemagne, s'était chargé de l'équipement et de l'entretien de toutes les troupes Nassoviennes, qui étaient fournies en sus du simple contingent de 1680, maintenant 1520 hommes.

(b) LL. AA. SS. attendent donc avec confiance le même soulagement des Puissances Alliées dans un moment où elles réclament de leur gouvernement un armement contre l'ennemi commun, qui surpasse les moyens financiels du pays, et cela d'autant plus que sa population concourt près qu'outre mesure au grand but, en fournissant à l'armée des Pays-Bas un second régiment d'égale force, à raison de 3044 hommes (le dépôt y compris), qui cependant est à la solde de Sa Majesté le Roi des Pays-Bas.

(c) LL. AA. SS. comptent trouver ce soulagement dans la part, qui leur reviendra en son tems, et d'après des stipulations ultérieures, des subsides que la couronne d'Angleterre s'est chargée de fournir pour les frais de l'armement général de tous les états de l'Allemagne.

(d) En attendant l'exigence du moment est trop pressant pour pouvoir attendre une pareille stipulation finale.

LL. AA. SS. se trouvent donc dans la nécessité de réclamer cette prompte assistance de 50,000 livres sterling en forme d'emprunt du gouvernement Anglais. Ils sont prêts à fournir pour sûreté toute la garantie qui est en leur pouvoir.

Ils se soumettront à payer exactement les intérêts usités de la dite somme. Le remboursement du capital pourra être stipulé par termes annuels, après le rétablissement de la paix, en se réservant cependant de pouvoir en déduire le pro rata des subsides, qui sur ces entrefaites reviendraient pour sa part, et à différentes époques, à leur caisse d'état.

LL. AA. SS. espèrent que cette proposition sera promptement réalisée, et obtiendra l'accueil bienveillant auquel le zèle qu'ils ont mis à soutenir de tout leur pouvoir, et selon les moyens de leur pays, la cause des Puissances Alliées leur donne droit de s'attendre, accueil qui seul peut les aider à continuer de la façon dont ils ont commencé les efforts qu'ils consacrent à la cause commune.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 10th June, 1815.

I wrote yesterday a private letter to Lord Stewart suggesting a co-operation of part of the Austrian army now at Naples with our fleet upon Marseilles, or any other place on the southern coast of France where there existed a disposition to rise in favour of Louis XVIII. In that case Sir Hudson Lowe would be placed under the command of the Austrian General.

I think the more points the enemy are assailed at the same time the better, provided it does not weaken the main attack; and the force which would under this supposition proceed from Naples would probably not form part of the main army, at any rate this campaign. If, however, you think that this idea had better not be encouraged, write to Lord Stewart to that effect. I had intended to have written this yesterday, but I omitted writing my letter in the earlier part of the day, and was called away afterwards.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 11th June, 1815.

The Hon. H. Dillon, a Colonel in His Majesty's service, arrived here last night. He left Paris the 2nd, and was detained five days at Valenciennes. He says he is quite certain that Buonaparte was yesterday at Avesnes, and that on the 6th part of the Guards marched from Paris towards Strasburg, and the remainder towards this frontier. He saw the park of artillery at Valenciennes, which he estimates at 250 pieces, but I believe that is by far too much. At Valenciennes there were only National Guards. Having remained five days at Valenciennes, and being allowed to walk round the place, he will be able to give a good account of it, as also very interesting intelligence of the whole state of affairs in France, being a relation of General Bertrand. As he intends only in a few days to go to Bruxelles and offer his services to the Duke of Wellington, I beg your Lordship will be pleased to let me know if perhaps his Grace wishes to see Colonel Dillon sooner.

One of my men has established himself at St. Sauve, near Valenciennes, from whence he sends his emissaries, finding it impossible to proceed farther into France. I got from him last night late the enclosed note. The march of about thirty pieces of ordnance from Valenciennes has been confirmed by another man.

The firing at Maubeuge and Valenciennes has been on account of the arrival of the eagles.

There are several hundred officers at Valenciennes not yet employed.

Jerome Buonaparte is at Laon, with the head-quarters, and also General Grouchy.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Bois le Duc, 11 Juin, 1815.

En vous renvoyant ci-jointe la lettre du Maréchal Marmont je peux vous informer ne voir aucune difficulté à son séjour en Hollande. Il y jouira de toute la tranquillité et de la protection que les lois y assurent à tout individu y demeurant et y restant paisible habitant.

Recevez l'assurance de la très haute considération avec laquelle je suis,

My Lord Duc, votre affectionné

GUILLAUME.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 11th June, 1815.

A small French party attacked yesterday morning the post at Bois Bourdon, occupied by the Belgian chevaux légers, which is at the point where the Roman road crosses the high road from Mons to Maubeuge, and we took three prisoners. In case the French were to claim them, I should like to know whether you wish me to send them back or to refuse doing so.

I rode along the whole chain of outposts yesterday, but could not observe any augmentation or change in the situation of the French posts.

Ever, my dear Duke, your most faithful,

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 12th June, 1815, half-past 9 o'clock in the morning.

The French outposts along the frontier, between the Valenciennes and Bavay roads, have been strengthened with infantry. A French patrol of cavalry coming on Belgian ground last night, near Warquignies, was too inconsiderately pursued by some of the Bremen and Verden hussars, two of which have been taken.

I have got no further intelligence from my men, but five deserters of the national guard came in yesterday from Landrecy: they heard only that Buonaparte was at Laon, and assure that the greatest part of the national guard would desert if they had an opportunity. They have seen no great movement amongst the troops.

The man arrested at Valenciennes has been released, and just now returns. He says that Buonaparte was still at Paris Saturday last. He confirms the departure from Valenciennes of part of the park of artillery, and says he is gone to Guise, where to, and to Laon also, those troops were gone that had been ordered here from the frontiers, and were supposed to go to the Vendée.

The park remaining at Valenciennes he estimates at about 60 pieces. 6000 stand of arms arrived there yesterday from Paris for the national guards, which are now all armed. He thinks that the French would make one of these days an incursion into this country to forage the villages next to the frontier, and particularly take all the cattle. From 6000 to 7000 men, being between Valenciennes and Bavay, could be employed for that expedition.

I enclose the papers of the 9th,

And have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 12th June, 1815, 7 o'clock in the evening.

A French gentleman, coming from Maubeuge to join the King, gives the following intelligence. The corps of General Reille is come yesterday to Maubeuge and vicinity. The head-quarters of the army are transferred from Laon to Avesnes, where a division of the Guards is to arrive to-day. Buonaparte is expected every minute, but nothing certain was known when he had left Paris, where it appears he was still on the 10th. Jerome Buonaparte is at Solre le Château. Soult passed through Maubeuge this morning, coming from Laon, but the gentleman did not know where he was gone to. He estimates the forces between Philippeville, Givet, Mézières, Guise, and Maubeuge at more than 100,000 troops of the line. A very considerable corps of cavalry was reviewed at Hirson two days ago by Grouchy. The general opinion in the army is, that they will attack, and that the arrival of Buonaparte at Avesnes will be the signal for the beginning of hostilities.

The camp de Rousies was not yet armed.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Baron de Roisin to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Du Château de Rongy, frontière de la Belgique, le 12 Juin, 1815, à 7 heures du soir.

MON GÉNÉRAL,

J'ai l'honneur d'envoyer à Votre Excellence des détails qui l'intéresseront. Sans doute ils sont certains. C'est un M. de Vallinneuve qui vient à l'instant de mes les remettre : il les fait par lui-même, et par des personnes qui approchent les autorités. On observe cependant que leurs trois corps d'armée ne formant que quarante cinq mille hommes, il paraît difficile à croire qu'ils attaqueront.

J'ai l'honneur d'être de Votre Excellence, avec le plus profond respect,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

BARON ALPHONSE DE ROISIN.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Le 12 de Juin, 1815.

Le Général Soult est venu hier à Valenciennes : il est arrivé incognito. On paraît se disposer à attaquer après demain. On se mettrait en marche vers midi : cela se dit généralement. On le croit d'autant plus que le jour est l'anniversaire de la bataille de Marengo, dit-on. Ce qui est sûre, c'est que le premier corps sous le Général Drouet est en partie réunie aujourd'hui à Valenciennes: on lui a distribué ses aigles. Il en avait quinze régimens qu'on évalue à mille hommes chacun. C'est d'une autorité supérieure que l'on apprit les circonstances de l'attaque projeté. Peut-être ne serait qu'une fausse attaque sur Mons ; mais tous les militaires se flattent de l'espoir d'y être le quinze.

Le Général Soult se sera dirigé sur Avesnes par Maubeuge, n'étant resté à Valenciennes quelques heures. On dit qu'il a donné l'ordre d'y mettre les eaux.

Le reste du parc, qui se trouvait près de Valenciennes, environ 30 pièces, a ordre de partir demain.

Il y a des ordres pour fournir journellement à Valenciennes vingt-deux à vingt-cinq mille rations.

La Gazette du 10 annonce que toutes les postes occupées à Paris par la Garde Impériale ont été relevées par la garde nationale. Jérome, dit-on aussi, doit commander un corps d'infanterie : il est à Laon.

Les quinze régimens en traversant la place de Valenciennes pour se rendre sur la plaine de Mons ont très peu criés "Vive l'Empereur!" Les bourgeois n'ont pas fait un seul cri : cela a été la même chose sur la plaine. Le Général Drouet paraissoit très sérieux : quelqu'un qu'il avait vu la veille au moment qui recevait des dépêches a vu qu'il le rendait très soucieux.

Dans la séance des Représentans du 8 de Juin, Félix Lepelletier a proposé, après de grands mots, une adresse, et qu'on déclara que Buonaparte avait mérité le titre de Sauveur de la Patrie. Toute l'assemblée s'est levée pour demander l'ordre du jour, qui a été adoptée.

Le 12 Juin, à 7 heures du soir.

Les villages de Beuvry, Crillon, Lunda, Sameon, Aunon, et les petites villes d'Orchie et de St. Amand, sont dégarnies de troupes : elles sont toutes parties sur Valenciennes depuis aujourd'hui au matin ; elles ne sont pas encore remplacé.

The Duke of Orleans to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Richmond, ce 12 Juin, 1815.

Je vous remercie infiniment de la lettre que vous avez bien voulu m'écrire le 6 Juin de Bruxelles. J'y ai trouvé avec une satisfaction bien réelle que vous sentiez que je ne devais pas avoir agi autrement que je ne l'ai fait jusqu'à présent; et je vous prie de recevoir l'expression de ma vive reconnaissance pour avoir bien voulu me le dire autant de franchise et d'obligeance. Vous me faites aussi un bien grand plaisir, My Lord, en me disant que le Roi de France sent la force d'une partie des motifs qui me tiennent éloigné de lui actuellement, et ce plaisir est d'autant plus grand que S.M. n'a pas encore daigné ni me répondre ni me faire faire aucune communication quelconque. Il y a même actuellement sept semaines que son ambassadeur n'est venu chez moi. Je n'y attache d'importance que parceque cela me fait craindre qu'on ne désire pas autour Roi que j'envisage l'opinion de S.M. sur ce point, comme étant ce qui vous a été dit ainsi qu'à Sir Charles Stuart, et que vous avez bien voulu me transmettre l'un et l'autre. Au reste, il faudra bien que cela s'éclaircisse avec le tems, et je l'attendrai très patiemment.

Je vois en effet par votre lettre, My Lord, que si nous sommes d'accord sur quelques points principaux, nous différons sur quelques autres; et je regrette bien vivement de ne pouvoir pas en causer avec vous, car nous nous entendrions bien mieux en deux heures de conversation que par dix lettres, quelque longues qu'elles soient.

Le premier point sur lequel je désire arrêter votre attention est un point sur lequel je crois que nous avons toujours été d'accord, ainsi que vous voulez bien me le rappeler: c'est que l'opinion de l'armée a toujours été contraire au Roi et aux Bourbons; mais je ne peux pas aller jusqu'à admettre that the King had not the real command over his army. I only admit that neither the hearts nor the minds of the army were with him. My Lord, j'attache beaucoup de prix à cette distinction; parceque s'il est vrai, comme je le crois incontestable, que depuis sa restauration jusqu'au dernier moment qui a précédé le retour de Buonaparte en France, le Roi n'a jamais rencontré aucune opposition dans tout ce qu'il a voulu faire de l'armée, et qu'il a été le maître absolu d'adopter envers elle tel système et telles mesures qu'il jugeait à propos, il s'ensuit nécessairement qu'on peut penser qu'avec un autre système et d'autres mesures on aurait pu obtenir un résultat différent. Je ne sais pas, My Lord, si nous serons d'accord sur l'opinion que j'ai que le Roi pouvait gagner l'armée s'il l'avait voulu; mais je sais que nous ne différons pas dans celle, que le système du Roi, et surtout celui de sa Cour, étaient vicieux et impolitiques à cet égard; et nous ne différons pas davantage sur le regret que nous nous sommes mutuellement exprimés plus d'une fois sur l'impossibilité de persuader au Roi et aux Princes de sa famille que l'armée était mal disposée à leur égard. Je crois, My Lord, que dans une conversation avec vous, je pourrais vous prouver (ce qui serait beaucoup trop long pour une lettre) qu'aux Tuileries comme à Gand il entrait dans le système de la Cour de repousser l'armée et de la dompter au lieu de la gagner, système inexécutable pour tout le monde, selon moi, mais qui de la part des émigrés envers l'armée était la guerre des pigmées contre les géans. Ce n'est que dans les derniers et très derniers momens de son existence en France que la Cour a eu quelque velléité de gagner l'armée, parceque ce n'est qu'alors que l'illusion s'est détruite, et qu'on a enfin, quoique trop tard, reconnu le besoin qu'on en avait, en éprouvant ce que c'était que la force de l'armée, et que la faiblesse de la Cour. Je gémis que toutes ces illusions se soient renouvelées à Gand par la confiance exagérée que les émigrés prennent toujours dans leurs moyens, et par les faux rapports dont ils aiment toujours à s'enivrer les uns les autres. Il est bien malheureux qu'ils ne puissent jamais voir nulle part les choses telles qu'elles sont. Mais enfin, My Lord, si la Cour avait senti plutôt sa faiblesse, et si dès son retour en France le Roi avait fait son objet principal d'adapter son système à l'opinion publique au lieu de la folle entreprise de vouloir ramener l'opinion publique à celle des émigrés, si le second objet eut été une volonté ferme de s'amalgamer à la nation Française et à l'armée dans tout ce qui ne serait pas contraire au repos et à la prospérité de l'Europe, autant qu'aux traités que le Roi avait signés avec les autres Puissances, je crois fermement, My Lord, que le Roi serait encore sur son trône; et je doute fort que Buonaparte se fût frotté à revenir en France si le Roi avait adopté ce système-là pour base de sa conduite.

Je pense, My Lord, qu'à l'époque de son abdication Buonaparte avait perdu l'opinion en France; que l'armée elle-même ne le soutenait plus que par obstination et par pique, mais que ce support était très faible et très partiel, parceque l'armée n'ignorait pas que la nation était aliénée de lui, et charmée de s'en débarrasser. Je pense aussi que le Roi avait à cette époque tous les avantages qu'un Souverain peut désirer; mais malheureusement dans ce que le Roi a fait de sage et de bon (et je n'hésite pas à dire qu'il a fait beaucoup d'actes de ce genre, entr'autres la Charte), la forme en a presque toujours gâté le fonds, et a privé le Roi ainsi que l'état des avantages qu'il aurait retirés des mêmes actes faits avec d'autres formes. Le Roi n'est pas revenu en France avec la détermination de cultiver la nation Française, comme un amant soigne une maîtresse qu'il craint qui ne lui échappe, et dont il veut s'assurer les bonnes grâces, mais comme un père oubliant les erreurs de ses enfans, et croyant que c'est pour leur bien et leur honneur qu'il ne doit ni douter ni permettre qu'on doute qu'il retrouve tous ces enfans-là (quoiqu'un peu grandis depuis leur séparation) dans les mêmes dispositions et les mêmes opinions que lorsqu'ils étaient sortis de chez-lui pour entrer au collége. Le système du Roi était incontestablement de ramener autant qu'il pourrait les institutions politiques et publiques, les opinions, les usages, et surtout les étiquettes, à ce qu'elles étaient avant la révolution; et c'est cette détermination appliquée à toutes branches du gouvernement qui a amené la catastrophe du mois de Mars. Je peuse, My Lord, que vous avez vu les choses d'assez près en France pour savoir que c'était le système invariablement suivi à la Cour; et je me dispense par conséquent de vous faire la triste et longue énumération de toutes les preuves que je pourrais vous en déduire, qui sont chacune, dans mon opinion, autant de fautes qu'a faites la Cour et autant de pas vers sa ruine.

Or, My Lord, cette tendance rétrograde, et une multitude d'autres circonstances trop longues à détailler, et qui ne sont que trop notoires, avaient créées en France une terreur des intentions de la Cour, et un dégoût de ses allures, d'où il était résulté un mécontentement général, quoique peu mani-festé ; et je crois que ce qui en empêchait la manifestation, ou si vous voulez, l'explosion, était la sagesse du Roi, très grande, selon moi, de ne point persécuter les individus, et de respecter généralement la liberté individuelle, parceque personne n'ayant d'inquiétude pour sa sûreté personnelle, personne n'était pressé de mettre son mécontentement en action, et chacun attendait les événemens pour obtenir satisfaction, selon les chances qu'ils présenteraient. Il est bien malheureux et bien regrettable qu'il soit devenu à la mode à Gand et à Alost d'appeler cette sagesse du Roi sa faiblesse, et la cause de sa ruine. Cette opinion-là, si elle prévaut, prépare à ces messieurs de nouvelles ruines et de nouvelles catastrophes, dont leur légèreté ne leur permet pas même aujourd'hui d'apercevoir la possibilité.

Selon moi, My Lord, ce mécontentement général mais sourd, dont je vous parlais tout-à-l'heure, et dont M. Dandré, je le dis à sa louange, m'a dit avoir bien souvent rendu compte au Roi avec le plus grand détail, est ce qui a déterminé Buonaparte à revenir en France ; et je ne crois pas, quoiqu'on en dise, qu'il y ait eu d'autres conspirations que celles-là. Buonaparte savait très bien qu'on ne voulait plus de lui en France ; que son système l'y avait rendu odieux, et que ses folies l'y avaient déconsidéré ; mais il a compté sur le dégoût qu'une partie de la nation avait pour les Bourbons, pour se flatter qu'elle laisserait agir sans opposition l'éclat magique de son nom sur l'armée, et pour que le plaisir de se débarrasser des Bourbons éclipsât auprès d'un grand nombre le chagrin de se retrouver sous sa férule ; et malheureusement son calcul s'est trouvé juste ; et plus malheureusement encore, depuis qu'il est là, il a fait ce qu'il eut été si facile au Roi de faire s'il l'avait voulu, il a fait les plus grands efforts pour rectifier son système, et pour en adopter un qui plaise à la nation, et lui procure son support. Je suis bien loin de vouloir dire qu'il l'obtiendra, car j'en doute beaucoup, et je ne le crois pas. Je pense au contraire que son caractère est si bien connu en France que personne ne s'y fie ; mais prenons garde, My Lord, que la conduite de ses antagonistes ne le fasse regarder par la France comme un moindre mal qu'eux.

Je crois, My Lord, que les peuples de France dans les campagnes sont extrêmement divisés d'opinions. Dans certaines contrées, telles que les Départemens de l'Ouest et quelques uns des Départemens du Nord, les paysans sont pour le Roi et les Bourbons. Dans d'autres ils sont contraires aux Bourbons et à Buonaparte ; mais dans d'autres ils lui sont décidément favorables. On dit que la plus grande partie des Départemens de l'Est est dans cette disposition. J'ai parcouru tout l'ancien Dauphiné, le Lyonnais, la Bourgogne, et je n'ai aucun doute qu'ils ne soient contraires au Roi et aux Bourbons et favorables à Buonaparte. En Provence, au contraire, tout leur est favorable d'une manière très prononcée ; mais dans le reste du midi, dont le Royalisme est si vanté, croyez que les Protestans ne partagent pas ce sentiment, et que pour connaître l'opinion des différens peuples de France il faudrait presqu'en faire le cadastre. Il faudrait aussi un cadastre, et celui-là serait encore plus important et plus intéressant, de l'opinion des gens des villes petites et grandes, et de la partie pensante de la nation. Je suis persuadé que la majorité de cette classe, la plus importante de toutes, n'est ni pour Buonaparte ni pour les Bourbons, ni précisément contr'eux, et qu'ils n'ont d'opinions fixes que dans le sens négatif ; c'est-à-dire, qu'ils ne veulent ni du système ancien de Buonaparte, ni de ses guerres éternelles, ni de son arrogance, ni de son despotisme, de sa police, de ses vexations et de ses fraudes commerciales; mais que les Bourbons leur sont suspects et désagréables, qu'ils haïssent la noblesse, les prêtres, et les émigrés, qui malheureusement leur paraissent aujourd'hui inséparables des Bourbons.

Voilà en gros, My Lord, mon opinion sur l'état des opinions de la nation Française. Pardonnez-moi de vous y avoir retenu aussi longtems; mais je crois d'une grande importance que vous y donniez une considération très sérieuse: car je pense que vous agirez sur une base fausse si vous agissez sur celle que je trouve dans votre lettre, que vous considérez le Roi comme la victime d'une révolte de son armée, and of his army only. Cela est vrai, My Lord, dans le sens littéral de ce qui est arrivé; car il n'y a que l'armée qui ait pris part à son expulsion: mais cela ne serait jamais arrivé s'il n'y avait eu que l'armée seule qui voulût se débarrasser du Roi et des Bourbons, au moins voilà ce dont je suis bien convaincu.

Je passe, My Lord, à la partie de votre lettre qui contient votre opinion sur la conduite que le Roi doit tenir dans les circonstances actuelles. Cette opinion est très différente de la mienne; mais cependant je crois trouver dans ce que vous voulez bien me dire à ce sujet un moyen de nous rapprocher; car je trouve un point sur lequel nous sommes d'accord, et peut-être qu'en partant de ce point-là nous pourrons arriver au même résultat.

Vous me dites, My Lord, that the King should give an interest to the Allies to support his cause, et en cela nous sommes parfaitement d'accord; mais vous ajoutez, and this can be done only by his coming forward himself in it, et en cela nous différons complètement; car je crois probable que le résultat de cette mesure sera de dégoûter les Alliés de sa cause, en rendant son succès infiniment plus difficile, et encore plus incertain dans sa durée, si on parvenait à l'obtenir.

Je ne vois, My Lord, qu'une seule manière par laquelle le Roi puisse donner honorablement aux Alliés un intérêt de soutenir sa cause; c'est d'abord de gagner assez l'opinion publique en France pour que le vœu national le rappelle au trône, et qu'il présente aux Alliés les plus grandes facilités pour la formation d'un nouveau gouvernement aussitôt après le renversement de celui de Buonaparte; et ensuite de donner lieu d'espérer que son gouvernement serait assez sincèrement soutenu en France, et assez solidement constitué, pour ne plus disparaître comme un nuage emporté sans résistance par le premier coup de vent, et pour donner à l'Europe par cette solidité intérieure une garantie de sa capabilité de la préserver du danger contre lequel elle marche aujourd'hui.

Or, My Lord, si c'est-là l'intérêt général de l'Europe, si c'est cela qu'elle désire comme le meilleur, peut-être, comme l'unique moyen d'établir une paix assez solide pour que chaque Puissance puisse désarmer, et se remettre des maux qu'elle a soufferts, je pense que ce que le Roi a de mieux à faire pour y parvenir, c'est de se tenir, non pas éloigné de la France comme le Roi a cru que je voulais le lui recommander dans ma première lettre, mais dans une attitude de dignité qui convient toujours au malheur, et dans la tranquillité qui convient aussi à ceux qui, ne pouvant rien faire, ne veulent pas se donner l'air de faire ce qu'ils ne font pas.

Je cherche en vain, My Lord, ce que Louis XVIII. fera de plus que cela dans vos armées ou à leur suite; je cherche à quoi vous servira l'armée d'Alost; je crois qu'ils ne vous serviront à rien, et qu'ils vous embarrasseront beaucoup; tandis que dans l'attitude dont je parlais pour lui le Roi serait assez rapproché pour profiter de tout ce qui pourrait arriver en sa faveur en France, et cependant il serait assez éloigné pour que vous n'en soyez pas embarrassé si vous rencontriez des obstacles sérieux à son rétablissement. Croyez qu'il est bien essentiel pour que le rétablissement du Roi soit solide en France, peut-être même pour qu'il s'opère du tout, que ce soit par la nation Française, et non pas par les Alliés, qu'il soit remis sur le trône. D'ailleurs, c'est ce que les Alliés ont promis à la France; ils ont dit, "Nous voulons renverser Napoléon, et nous ne voulons imposer à la France aucun gouvernement particulier, quoique nous désirions beaucoup que le Roi Louis XVIII. soit replacé sur le trône de France." Ce qui me paraît comme si les Alliés disaient aux Français, "Vous nous feriez un vrai plaisir de reprendre Louis XVIII., mais pourvu que vous nous débarrassiez de Napoléon nous sommes contents; et Louis XVIII. restera dehors si vous ne vous souciez pas de lui." Or toute la France soupçonnera la sincérité de cette déclaration, si on voit Louis XVIII. conduit en France par vos armées; et il en résultera deux maux très graves: l'un c'est qu'on croira que vous voulez imposer Louis XVIII. à la France pour vos vues particulières, et l'autre que Louis XVIII. ne paraîtra plus un Roi indépendant, agissant pour le bonheur de son royaume et la prospérité de ses sujets, mais votre instrument sacrifiant la France à vos vues.

Quant à adoucir par sa présence et par ses soins les maux que l'invasion d'un million de combattans va nécessairement faire à son malheureux pays, croyez, My Lord, que rien n'est plus fallacieux et plus impossible. Il n'est au pouvoir de personne d'adoucir ces maux-là, pas plus qu'il n'est au vôtre d'empêcher que des villes et villages ne prennent feu dans une bataille. D'ailleurs un Roi sans armée et sans puissance, au milieu d'une telle masse, dont aucun des chefs n'est sous ses ordres, ne peut y rien faire du tout; et tout ce qu'il gagnerait à être le témoin des misères de la guerre serait que tous les Français qui en seront les victimes le regarderaient comme un des auteurs de leurs maux, et qu'on l'en rendrait responsable.

Enfin, My Lord, pour terminer cette longue lettre, qui, je le crains, a déjà épuisé votre patience, il ne me reste qu'à vous parler de ce que vous me dites de la possibilité qu'il se forme en France un grand parti qui appelle le Roi. Alors, My Lord, il est aussi juste que le Roi s'y rende, qu'il serait injuste aux Alliés de vouloir l'en détourner. Mais je doute beaucoup de la formation d'un parti de ce genre qui mérite l'épithète de grand, et je doute encore plus que ce soit en s'occupant de la formation de ces partis-là qu'on opère une seconde restauration.

Quant à ce qui m'est personnel, My Lord, mes deux lettres au Roi, dont je vous ai remis des copies, et celle que je vous écris à présent, vous mettent tellement au fait de mes opinions, qu'il me semble que vous pouvez pressentir ce que je ferai dans telle et telle circonstance. Je ne peux vraiment pas vous en dire davantage à présent. Je désire toujours de tout mon cœur servir le Roi, et être utile à sa cause; mais il faut que j'en voye les moyens, et qu'on n'exige pas de moi des choses qui me répugnent, et que je ne crois pas plus conformes aux vrais intérêts du Roi qu'à ceux de la France, et même à ceux des Alliés. Voilà, My Lord, tout ce que je puis vous dire quant à présent sur ce que je ferai; mais ce que je puis vous dire en toute sincérité, c'est que je désire bien vivement que ma conduite continue à obtenir votre approbation, à laquelle j'attacherai toujours le plus grand prix, ainsi qu'à vous convaincre, My Lord, de tous les sentimens que je vous porte, et de la très haute considération avec laquelle je suis,

My Lord, votre très affectionné

LOUIS PHILIPPE D'ORLÉANS.

La Duchesse et ma sœur me chargent de vous remercier de votre bon souvenir, et de vous faire tous leurs complimens. La Duchesse se joint à moi pour vous remercier de vos félicitations sur les succès d'Italie, et le rétablissement du Roi Ferdinand IV. à Naples. Nous vous devons beaucoup de reconnaissance à cet égard, et nous vous prions d'en recevoir l'expression bien vive et bien sincère.

Lieut.-Gen. the Earl of Uxbridge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Ninhove, 12th June, 1815.

It is just reported to me, on the one hand, that Buonaparte was to establish his head-quarters at Laon on the 10th, that the Imperial Guard had made two days' march from thence to the front, and that it was his intention to attack immediately; and on the other hand that the troops from Arras and the neighbourhood, and particularly the cavalry, were making forced marches for La Vendée; that at Lille they had shut the three gates towards this frontier, where the garrison consisted of National Guards only.

I have the honour to remain, my dear Lord Duke,

Your faithful and obedient servant,

UXBRIDGE.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Downing Street, 13th June, 1815.

Referring to my despatch to your Grace, No. 11, I have the honour to acquaint your Grace that the last of the transports, with the battering ordnance, &c., alluded to, have sailed for Antwerp, completing a train of siege artillery, according to the enclosed return (No. 1). I likewise enclose a return (No. 2) of a further proportion of battering train which is preparing, and one-half of which will sail, as soon as it is shipped, for Antwerp; the other half will remain at the Nore until further orders.

The 4th and 29th Regiments and the greater part of the 2nd Garrison Battalion have sailed to join the army under your Grace's command.

I am, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

[ENCLOSURE.]

S. R. CHAPMAN.

The Earl of Liverpool to Mr. Canning.

MY DEAR CANNING, Fife House, 13th June, 1815.

I hope you will long ago have recovered from all apprehension about the Princess of Wales. By the last accounts from Italy she had left Genoa for Milan, and intended to pass the summer at one of the villas near the Lago di Como.

You will, I doubt not, have been most truly gratified by the success which has attended the Austrian operations in Italy.

The entire deliverance of Italy at so early a period of the campaign cannot fail to be productive of the most important consequences. The Austrian armies in that quarter will now be disposable, and will probably be enabled to pass the Alps soon after the campaign shall have commenced on the side of the Rhine and of Flanders.

We may now be in daily expectation of hearing that the Allied armies have entered France. The operations will probably begin on the Upper Rhine, as the most distant point from Paris; but we know that the Duke of Wellington and Blücher are both ready to move; and fortunately there subsists between them the most perfect union and cordiality.

During the twenty years we have passed in political life we have never witnessed a more awful moment than the present. It is impossible ever to answer for the result of military operations; but the chances are certainly all in our favour. The two great problems appear to me to be, whether the authorities at Paris, that is, the Jacobins and Constitutionalists, will endeavour to arrest the progress of the Allies by overthrowing Buonaparte, and by proposing some compromise as to the internal government of France? and whether, if the Allies succeed in again reaching Paris, and in replacing Louis XVIII. on the throne, he will be able to maintain himself there?

The latter will be a work of much difficulty. The King is certainly personally popular; Monsieur and the Duc de Berri hated; the Duchess d'Angoulême respected and pitied, but not beloved; the Duc d'Angoulême rather liked. You will be surprised to hear that our old friend Monsieur is, perhaps, the most unpopular of the set. This arises from the influence the Emigrants have over him, and from his being regarded as the essence of emigration. There appears to me to be a great resemblance between his character and that of many of the princes of the Stuart family. He is a perfect chevalier, but has no quality which belongs to a king or a prince in difficult times. The greatest danger to the old line of Bourbons is from the Duke of Orleans. He is the person to whom all the Jacobins and many of the Constitutionalists look up as a resource in case of necessity. His guarded conduct at the present moment has created considerable alarm and suspicion amongst the friends of the King.

There are some, however, who know him, and who think that if even he got the better of all principle and sense of duty, he has not resolution enough to play so desperate a game.

It is unlucky that he should be at this time in this country. When we heard that he was coming over, we sent to stop him; but he arrived without having received our letters, and we could not then send him away.

Our session of Parliament is coming to a close; and since the struggle on the Corn Bill we have had no material difficulties to encounter. Upon the war, the country, with the exception of the old Opposition, has been nearly unanimous. Lord Grenville, Grattan, and Plunket have rendered us much service. Were you not surprised at Lord Wellesley adopting the peace policy, and joining with the Whigs? I hardly know how to account for it: for even supposing it to have been the opinion of any man that, provided the Allies were agreed, a defensive system was under all the circumstances to be preferred, the question really was, whether we should take upon ourselves the responsibility of preventing a war against Buonaparte, in opposition to the opinion of all Europe, after the manifest violations which had taken place of the treaties of Fontainebleau and of Paris. That we might have prevented the war I do not deny; but we could not have done so without giving up all hopes of our rallying Europe again, and without making up our minds to an insulated policy, as alone suited to our situation.

I shall be glad to hear, when you write again, of the state of the health of your eldest son, which I hope has not suffered in consequence of the summer heats.

I beg to be kindly remembered to Mrs. Canning.

I remain, &c.,

LIVERPOOL.

Ordre du Jour. Position de l'Armée le 14.

Avesnes, le 13 Juin, 1815.

Le grand quartier-général à Beaumont. L'infanterie de la Garde Impériale sera bivaquée à un quart de lieue en avant de Beaumont, et formera 3 lignes, la jeune Garde, les chasseurs, et les grenadiers. M. le Duc de Trévise reconnaîtra l'emplacement de ce camp; il aura soin que tout soit à sa place, artillerie, ambulance, équipage, &c.

Le 1er régiment de grenadiers à pied se rendra à Beaumont.

La cavalerie de la Garde Impériale sera placée en arrière de Beaumont, mais les corps les plus éloignés n'en doivent pas être à une lieue.

Le 2e corps prendra position à Laire, c'est-à-dire, le plus près possible de la frontière, sans la dépasser. Les 4 divisions de ce corps d'armée seront réunies et bivaqueront sur 2 ou 4 lignes ; le quartier-général au milieu ; la cavalerie en avant, éclairant tous les débouchés, mais aussi sans dépasser la frontière, et la faisant respecter par les partisans ennemis qui voudraient la violer.

Les bivouacs seront placés de manière que les feux ne puissent être aperçus de l'ennemi ; les généraux empêcheront que personne ne s'écarte du camp ; ils s'assureront que la troupe est pourvue de 50 cartouches par homme, 4 jours de pain, et une demi-livre de riz ; que l'artillerie et les ambulances sont en bon état, et les feront placer à leur ordre de bataille. Ainsi le 2e corps sera disposé à se mettre en marche le 15, à 3 heures du matin, si l'ordre en est donné, pour se porter sur Charleroi, et y arriver avant 9 heures.

Le 1er corps prendra position à Solre sur Sambre, et il bivaquera aussi sur plusieurs lignes, observant, ainsi que le 2e corps, que ses feux ne puissent être aperçus de l'ennemi ; que personne ne s'écarte du camp ; et que les généraux s'assurent de l'état des munitions, des vivres de la troupe, et que l'artillerie et les ambulances soient placées à leur ordre de bataille.

Le 1er corps se tiendra également prêt à partir le 15, à 3 heures du matin, pour suivre le mouvement du 2e corps ; de manière que, dans la journée d'après demain, ces 2 corps manœuvrent dans la même direction, et se protègent.

Le 3e corps prendra demain position à une lieue en avant de Beaumont, le plus près possible de la frontière, sans cependant la dépasser, ni souffrir qu'elle soit violée par aucun parti ennemi. Le Général Vandamme tiendra tout le monde à son poste, recommandera que les feux soient cachés, et qu'ils ne puissent être aperçus de l'ennemi. Il se conformera d'ailleurs à ce qui est prescrit au 2e corps pour les munitions, les vivres, l'artillerie et les ambulances, et pour être prêt à se mettre en mouvement le 15, à 3 heures du matin.

Le 6e corps se portera en avant de Beaumont, et sera bivaqué sur 2 lignes, à un quart de lieue du 3e corps. M. le Comte de Lobau choisira l'emplacement, et il fera observer les dispositions générales qui sont prescrites par le présent ordre.

M. le Maréchal Grouchy portera les 1er, 2e, 3e, et 4e corps de cavalerie en avant de Beaumont, et les établira au bivouac entre cette ville et Walcourt, faisant également respecter la frontière, empêchant que personne ne la dépasse, et qu'on se laisse voir, ni que les feux puissent être aperçus de l'ennemi ; et il se tiendra prêt à partir après demain, à 3 heures du matin, s'il en reçoit l'ordre, pour se porter sur Charleroi, et faire l'avant-garde de l'armée.

Il recommandera aux généraux de s'assurer si tous les cavaliers sont pourvus de cartouches, si leurs armes sont en bon état, et s'ils ont pour 4 jours de pain et la demi-livre de riz qui ont été ordonnés.

L'équipage de ponts sera bivaqué derrière le 6e corps, et en avant de l'infanterie de la Garde Impériale.

Le parc central d'artillerie sera en arrière de Beaumont.

L'armée de la Moselle prendra demain position en avant de Philippeville.

M. le Comte Gérard la disposera de manière à pouvoir partir après demain, le 15, à 3 heures du matin, pour joindre le 3e corps, et appuyer son mouvement sur Charleroi, suivant le nouvel ordre qui lui sera donné ; mais le Général Gérard aura soin de se bien garder sur son flanc droit, et en avant de lui, sur toutes les directions de Charleroi et de Namur. Si l'armée de la Moselle a des pontons à sa suite, le Général Gérard les fera avancer le plus près possible, afin de pouvoir en disposer.

Tous les corps d'armée feront marcher en tête les sapeurs, et les moyens de passage que les généraux auront réunis.

Les sapeurs de la Garde Impériale, les ouvriers de la marine, et les sapeurs de la réserve, marcheront après le 6e corps, et en tête de la Garde.

Tous les corps marcheront dans le plus grand ordre, et serrés. Dans le mouvement sur Charleroi on sera disposé à profiter de tous les passages pour écraser les corps ennemis qui voudraient attaquer l'armée ou qui manœuvreraient contre elle.

Il n'y aura à Beaumont que le grand quartier-général. Aucun autre ne devra y être établi, et la ville sera dégagée de tout embarras. Les anciens règlemens sur le quartier-général et les équipages, sur l'ordre de marche, et la police des voitures et bagages, et sur les blanchisseuses et vivandières, seront remis en vigueur. Il sera fait à ce sujet un ordre général ; mais, en attendant, MM. les généraux commandant les corps d'armée prendront des dispositions en conséquence ; et M. le grand prévôt fera exécuter ces règlemens. L'Empereur ordonne que toutes les dispositions contenues dans le présent ordre soient tenues secrètes par MM. les Généraux.

Par ordre de l'Empereur,
Le Maréchal d'Empire, Major-Général,
DUC DE DALMATIE.

Lieut.-Gen. Baron de Schœffer to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Bruxelles, le 13 Juin, 1815, Hôtel de Wellington.

Le soussigné a l'honneur de mettre sous les yeux de Son Excellence Mylord Duc la lettre qu'il vient de recevoir du Ministre des Affaires Etrangères au service de Son Altesse Royale le Grand Duc de Hesse Darmstadt : elle y trouvera le nombre du contingent fixé, dans l'acte d'accession du Grand Duc son Souverain, au nombre de 8000 hommes. Il prie Son Excellence Mylord Duc de vouloir bien fixer, dans le traité sur les subsides, ce nombre désigné.

Le soussigné saisit cette occasion de renouveler à Son Excellence les assurances de son plus profond respect.

Mylord Duc,
De Son Excellence le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,
DE SCHÆFFER.

[ENCLOSURE.]

The Baron de Lichtenberg to Lieut.-Gen. Baron de Schœffer.

MONSIEUR LE BARON, Darmstadt, ce 10 Juin, 1815.

Je viens de recevoir la dépêche de Votre Excellence du 6 de ce mois, par laquelle vous me mandez que S. E. M. le Feld-Maréchal Duc de Wellington a bien voulu vous prévenir qu'elle était disposée à négocier avec vous un traité des subsides, dès que vous lui auriez communiqué une copie authentique du traité d'accession de S. A. R. le Grand Duc à l'alliance des hautes Puissances du 25 Mars dernier.

Je vous prie d'abord, Monsieur le Baron, de témoigner à S. E. M. le Duc de Wellington que S. A. R. le Grand Duc est très-sensible à cette marque de ses intentions favorables; mais je ne vous dissimule pas en même temps que la demande d'une copie de notre traité d'accession, toute juste qu'elle soit, ne m'ait un peu embarrassé; car Monsieur le Baron de Türckheim, notre ministre au Congrès de Vienne, m'avait annoncé dans une de ses dernières dépêches que tout étant préparé pour la signature du traité convenu et arrêté entre les plénipotentiaires respectifs, M. le Prince de Metternich l'avait assuré qu'il se proposait d'écrire lui-même à M. le Duc de Wellington de lui faire part de l'état exact des choses, et de solliciter sur l'affaire des subsides ses bons offices en notre faveur. Je devais donc présumer que Son Excellence avait déjà reçu connaissance de la conclusion, ainsi que de la teneur du traité d'accession du Grand Duc à l'alliance des hautes Puissances du 25 Mars dernier.

Quoique notre ministre à Vienne ne m'ait pas encore transmis le traité d'accession en question, il ne peut manquer d'être signé dans ce moment-ci. Ce qui est certain du moins c'est que le Baron de Türckheim m'a écrit déjà en date du 23 Mai dernier que ce traité, semblable en tout à celui de Bade, était sur le point d'être échangé. Je l'attends donc d'un jour à l'autre; et comme M. de Türckheim avait reçu l'instruction d'offrir un contingent de 8000 hommes, offre qui a été aussitôt agréée et réalisée, je suis fondé à croire que c'est effectivement le nombre de troupes à fournir par S. A. R. le Grand Duc.

Je vous serais obligé, Monsieur le Baron, si vous vouliez bien communiquer ces circonstances à S. E. M. le Duc de Wellington, et lui faire connaître que notre traité d'accession étant très-sûrement conclu et signé dans ce moment-ci, je m'empresserais de vous en envoyer une copie aussitôt qu'il m'aurait été transmis de Vienne. S. A. R. le Grand Duc se flatte en même temps que, sans s'arrêter à une petite difficulté qui ne tardera pas à être levée dans quelques jours, Son Excellence ne refusera point d'entrer de suite en négociation avec vous sur l'affaire des subsides à raison d'un corps de 8000 hommes; car, comme je vous l'ai déjà dit, notre traité d'accession doit avoir fixé notre contingent à ce nombre de troupes, ce qui n'empêchera cependant pas que S. A. R. le Grand Duc ne puisse s'engager à fournir un contingent plus considérable, comme il l'a déjà fait en partie, si le gouvernement Britannique se montre disposé à lui faire à cet égard des ouvertures convenables.

Je profite de cette occasion pour réitérer à Votre Excellence les assurances de ma haute considération.

LE BARON DE LICHTENBERG.

[Compliments. Tous les traités de subsides que le Duc de Wellington a faits jusqu'à présent ont été basés sur les traités d'accession par les Rois ou Princes avec lesquels il les a conclus; et il est obligé de suspendre de faire aucun traité avec le Grand Duc de Hesse-Darmstadt jusqu'à ce qu'il verra son traité d'adhésion à la Grande Alliance.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 13th June, 1815, 8 o'clock in the morning.

General Zieten writes to me that troops coming from Mézières are marching to Maubeuge by Beaumont. A woman from Quivrain assures that all the troops of the line at and near Valenciennes have also taken the road towards Maubeuge, only leaving the customary piquets; so that it appears without doubt that the whole army is concentrating near Maubeuge.

As I have since three days not the least intelligence from two of my principal emissaries, I am afraid they are arrested.

In case that anything should be done against Maubeuge or Valenciennes, I take the liberty of recommending to his Grace a very intelligent French engineer officer, but who is naturalised in this country, the Chevalier de Cryseul, who knows both places perfectly well, and on whose good intentions and fidelity one can rely.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

A man coming this instant from Quivrain confirms the report of the troops marching from Valenciennes to Maubeuge. He says that about 14,000 men had been reviewed yesterday near Valenciennes, and that Count d'Erlon with about 10,000 had marched at three o'clock in the afternoon for Bavay and vicinity, and that they were this morning to be at Maubeuge at ten o'clock.

DÖRNBERG.

The Grand Duke of Baden to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Carlsruhe, ce 13 Juin, 1815.

Mon aide-de-camp, le Général Baron de Franken, m'a soumis le traité de subsides qu'il a conclu avec Votre Excellence, et je m'empresse de vous en transmettre la ratification par mon Colonel de Wieland, qui aura l'honneur de l'échanger, et de vous remettre en mon nom le Grand Cordon de mon Ordre de la Fidélité et mon portrait, que Votre Excellence voudra bien accepter comme une marque de mon souvenir et un témoignage de l'admiration vouée au héros du siècle.

Le Colonel Wieland aura l'honneur de suivre le quartier-général de Votre Excellence, pour me tenir au courant des succès de la bonne cause, remportés par un de ses plus vaillants défenseurs. Je le recommande à la bienveillance de Votre Excellence, dont il saura se rendre digne.

C'est avec la considération la plus distinguée que je suis,

Monsieur le Duc, de Votre Excellence le très-dévoué,

CHARLES.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 13th June, 1815.

I am going to send back the prisoners this morning with a letter to Count d'Erlon, according to your desire. A person coming from Maubeuge says that the head-quarters had been transferred from Laon to Avesnes, where a division of the Guards was to arrive yesterday, and Napoleon daily expected. Jerome Buonaparte is said to be at Solre le Château, and Soult to have passed through Maubeuge yesterday morning, coming from Laon.

Ever, my dear Duke, yours most truly,

WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 13th June, 1815.

I think it my duty to report to you, for the information of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, some very extraordinary speeches that Colonel H. Dillon has held here.

He says that he discovered about four weeks before Buonaparte left Elba that there was a conspiracy, and that Buonaparte was to come to France; that he (Colonel Dillon) reported it to the Secretary of State, and got a receipt for his letter, and at the same time the defence to mention anything to the French government.

I have not heard this myself from Colonel Dillon, but I have the authority of General Behr, to whom the Colonel has told the above, and who has given me permission to use his name.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

General Behr to the Prince of Orange.

Mons, le 13 Juin, 1815, à 8 heures du soir.

D'après les renseignemens arrivés dans ce moment au Général de Dörnberg il est arrivé dans la nuit dernière à Valenciennes 20,000 hommes de troupes de différentes armes.

Le Général Van Merlen, qui vient des avant postes de Bois Bourdon sur la chaussée de Maubeuge, me mande qu'il y est aussi arrivé beaucoup de troupes dans les environs de Maubeuge.

Jérôme Buonaparte a inspecté hier cinq régiments de Lanciers et trois compagnies d'artillerie à cheval, qui doivent camper dans les environs de Maubeuge; il a aussi dû inspecter aujourd'hui le premier régiment de Dragons, celui de Cuirassiers, et celui de Hussards.

Le Général-Major Commandant Supérieur,

BEHR.

Ordre du Mouvement.

Beaumont, ce 14 Juin, 1815.

Demain, le 15, à 2 heures et demie du matin, la division de cavalerie légère du Général Vandamme montera à cheval, et se portera sur la route de Charleroi; elle enverra des partis dans toutes les directions, pour éclairer le pays, et enlever les postes ennemis; mais chacun de ces partis sera au moins de 50 hommes. Avant de mettre en marche la division, le Général Vandamme s'assurera qu'elle est pourvue de cartouches.

A la même heure le Lieutenant-Général Pajol réunira le 1er corps de cavalerie, et suivra le mouvement de la division du Général Domont, qui sera sous les ordres du Général Pajol. Les divisions du 1er corps de cavalerie ne fourniront point de détachemens; ils seront pris dans la 3e division. Le Général Domont laissera sa batterie d'artillerie, pour marcher après le 1er bataillon du 3e corps d'infanterie. Le Lieutenant-Général Vandamme lui donnera des ordres en conséquence.

Le Lieutenant-Général Vandamme fera battre la diane à 2 heures et demie du matin; à 3 heures il mettra en marche son corps d'armée, et le dirigera sur Charleroi: la totalité de ses bagages et embarras seront parqués en arrière, et ne se mettront en marche qu'après que le 6e corps et la Garde Impériale auront passé; ils seront sous les ordres du Vaguemestre-Général, qui les réunira à ceux du 6e corps de la Garde Impériale et du grand quartier-général, et leur donnera des ordres de mouvement.

Chaque division du 3e corps d'armée aura avec elle sa batterie et ses ambulances; toute autre voiture qui sera dans les rangs sera brûlée.

M. le Comte de Lobau fera battre la diane à 3 heures et demie, et il mettra en marche le 6e corps d'armée à 4 heures, pour suivre le mouvement du Général Vandamme, et l'appuyer; il fera observer le même ordre de marche pour les troupes, l'artillerie, les ambulances, et les bagages, qui est prescrit au 3e corps.

Les bagages du 6e corps seront réunis à ceux du 3e, sous les ordres du Vaguemestre-Général, ainsi qu'il est dit.

La jeune Garde battra la diane à 4 heures et demie, et se mettra en marche à 5 heures; elle suivra le mouvement du 6e corps sur la route de Charleroi.

Les chasseurs à pied de la Garde battront la diane à 5 heures, et se mettront en marche à 5 heures et demie, pour suivre le mouvement de la jeune Garde.

Les grenadiers à pied de la Garde battront la diane à 5 heures et demie et partiront à 6 heures, pour suivre le mouvement des chasseurs à pied. Le même ordre de marche, pour l'artillerie, les ambulances, et les bagages, prescrit pour le 3e corps d'infanterie, sera observé dans la Garde Impériale.

Les bagages de la Garde seront réunis à ceux des 3e et 6e corps d'armée, sous les ordres du Vaguemestre-Général, qui les fera mettre en mouvement.

M. le Maréchal Grouchy fera monter à cheval, à 5 heures et demie du matin, celui des trois autres corps de cavalerie qui sera le plus près de la route, et lui fera suivre le mouvement sur Charleroi. Les deux autres corps partiront successivement à une heure d'intervalle l'un de l'autre; mais M. le Maréchal Grouchy aura soin de faire marcher la cavalerie sur les chemins latéraux de la route principale que la colonne d'infanterie suivra, afin d'éviter l'encombrement; et aussi pour que sa cavalerie observe un meilleur ordre. Il prescrira que la totalité des bagages restent en arrière, parqués et réunis jusqu'au moment où le Vaguemestre-Général leur donnera l'ordre d'avancer.

M. le Comte Reille fera battre la diane à 2 heures et demie du matin, et il mettra en marche le 2e corps à 3 heures; il le dirigera sur Marchiennes au Pont, où il fera en sorte d'être rendu avant 9 heures du matin; il fera garder tous les ponts de la Sambre, afin que personne ne passe. Les postes qu'il laissera seront successivement relevés par le 1er corps; mais il doit tâcher de prévenir l'ennemi à ces ponts pour qu'ils ne soient pas détruits, surtout celui de Marchiennes, par lequel il sera probablement dans le cas de déboucher, et qu'il faudrait faire aussitôt réparer, s'il avait été endommagé.

A Thuin et à Marchiennes, ainsi que dans tous les villages sur sa route, M. le Comte Reille interrogera les habitans, afin d'avoir des nouvelles des positions et forces des armées ennemies; il fera aussi prendre les lettres dans les bureaux de poste, et les dépouillera, pour faire parvenir aussitôt à l'Empereur les renseignemens qu'il aura obtenus.

M. le Comte d'Erlon mettra en marche le 1er corps à 3 heures du matin, et il le dirigera aussi sur Charleroi, en suivant le mouvement du 2e corps, duquel il gagnera la gauche le plutôt possible, pour le soutenir et l'appuyer au besoin. Il tiendra une brigade de cavalerie en arrière, pour se couvrir et pour maintenir, par de petits détachemens, ses communications avec Maubeuge; il enverra des partis en avant de cette place, dans les directions de Mons et de Binch, jusqu'à la frontière, pour avoir des nouvelles des ennemis, et en rendre compte aussitôt. Ces partis auront soin de ne pas se compromettre et de ne point dépasser la frontière.

M. le Comte d'Erlon fera occuper Thuin par une division; et si le pont de cette ville était détruit, il le ferait aussitôt réparer, en même temps qu'il fera tracer et exécuter immédiatement une tête de pont sur la rive gauche. La division qui sera à Thuin gardera aussi le pont de l'abbaye d'Alnes, où M. le Comte d'Erlon fera également construire une tête de pont sur la rive gauche.

Le même ordre de marche prescrit pour le 3e corps, pour l'artillerie, les ambulances, et les bagages, sera observé aux 2e et 1er corps, qui feront réunir leurs bagages, et marcher à la gauche du 1er corps, sous les ordres du vaguemestre le plus ancien.

Le 4e corps (armée de la Moselle) a reçu ordre de prendre aujourd'hui position en avant de Philippeville. Si son mouvement est opéré, et si les divisions qui composent ce corps d'armée sont réunies, M. le Lieutenant-

Général Gérard, les mettra en marche demain, à 3 heures du matin, et les dirigera sur Charleroi :* il aura soin de se tenir à hauteur du 3e corps, avec lequel il communiquera, afin d'arriver à peu près en même temps devant Charleroi. Mais le Général Gérard fera éclairer sa droite et tous les débouchés qui vont sur Namur. Il marchera serré en ordre de bataille, fera laisser à Philippeville tous ses bagages et embarras, afin que son corps d'armée, se trouvant plus léger, soit plus à même de manœuvrer.

Le Général Gérard donnera ordre à la 14e division de cavalerie, qui a dû arriver aujourd'hui à Philippeville, de suivre le mouvement de son corps d'armée sur Charleroi, où cette division joindra le 4e corps de cavalerie.

Les Lieutenans-Généraux Reille, Vandamme, Gérard, et Pajol se mettront en communication par de fréquens partis, et ils régleront leur marche de manière à arriver en masse et ensemble devant Charleroi. Ils mettront autant que possible à l'avant-garde les officiers qui parlent Flamand, pour interroger les habitans et en prendre des renseignemens ; mais ces officiers s'annonceront comme commandans de partis, sans dire que l'armée est en arrière.

Les Lieutenans-Généraux Reille, Vandamme, et Gérard feront marcher tous les sapeurs de leur corps d'armée (ayant avec eux des moyens pour réparer les ponts) après le 1er régiment d'infanterie légère, et ils donneront ordre aux officiers du génie de faire réparer les mauvais passages, ouvrir des communications latérales, et placer des ponts sur les courans d'eau où l'infanterie devrait se mouiller pour les franchir.

Les marins, les sapeurs de la Garde, et les sapeurs de la réserve, marcheront après le 1er régiment du 3e corps ; les Lieutenans-Généraux Rogniat et Haxo seront à leur tête. Ils n'amèneront avec eux que deux ou trois voitures ; le surplus du parc du génie marchera à la gauche du 3e corps. Si on rencontre l'ennemi, ces troupes ne seront point engagées, mais les Généraux Rogniat et Haxo les emploieront aux travaux de passages de rivière, de têtes de pont, de réparations de chemin, et d'ouvertures de communication, &c. La cavalerie de la Garde suivra le mouvement sur Charleroi, et partira à 8 heures.

L'Empereur sera à l'avant-garde sur la route de Charleroi. MM. les Lieutenans-Généraux auront soin d'envoyer à S.M. de fréquens rapports sur leurs mouvemens et les renseignemens qu'ils auront recueillis. Ils sont prévenus que l'intention de S.M. est d'avoir passé la Sambre avant midi, et de porter l'armée à la rive gauche de cette rivière.

L'équipage des ponts sera divisé en deux sections : la première section se subdivisera en trois parties, chacune de cinq pontons et cinq bateaux d'avant garde, pour jeter trois ponts sur la Sambre ; il y aura à chacune de ces subdivisions une compagnie de pontonniers ; la première section marchera à la suite du parc du génie, après le 3e corps.

La deuxième section restera avec le parc de réserve d'artillerie, à la colonne des bagages ; elle aura avec elle la quatrième compagnie de pon-

* Le Général Gérard reçut plus tard un nouvel ordre qui lui prescrivit de passer, avec son corps, la Sambre au Châtelet.

tonniers. Les équipages de l'Empereur et les bagages du grand quartier-général seront réunis, et se mettront en marche à 10 heures. Aussitôt qu'ils seront passés, le Vaguemestre-Général fera partir les équipages de la Garde Impériale, du 3e corps, et du 6e corps ; en même temps il enverra ordre à la colonne d'équipages de la réserve de la cavalerie de se mettre en marche, et de suivre la direction que la cavalerie aura prise. Les ambulances de l'armée suivront le quartier-général, et marcheront à la tête des bagages ; mais, dans aucun cas, ces bagages, ainsi que les parcs de réserve de l'artillerie, et la 2e section de l'équipage de ponts, ne s'approcheront à plus de 3 lieues de l'armée, à moins d'ordre du Major-Général, et ils ne passeront la Sambre aussi que par ordre.

Le Vaguemestre-Général formera des divisions de ces bagages, et il y mettra des officiers pour les commander, afin de pouvoir en détacher ce qui sera ensuite appelé au quartier-général, ou pour le service des officiers.

L'Intendant-Général fera réunir à cette colonne d'équipages la totalité des bagages et transports de l'administration, auxquels il sera assigné un rang dans la colonne. Les voitures qui seront en retard prendront la gauche, et ne pourront sortir du rang qui leur sera donné que par ordre du Vaguemestre-Général.

L'Empereur ordonne que toutes les voitures d'équipages qui seront trouvées dans les colonnes d'infanterie, de cavalerie, ou d'artillerie, soient brûlées, ainsi que les voitures de la colonne des équipages qui quitteront leur rang, et intervertiront leur marche, sans la permission expresse du Vaguemestre-Général.

A cet effet, il sera mis un détachement de 50 gendarmes à la disposition du Vaguemestre-Général, qui est responsable, ainsi que tous les officiers de la gendarmerie et les gendarmes, de l'exécution de ces dispositions, desquelles le succès de la campagne peut dépendre.

Par ordre de l'Empereur,
Le Maréchal d'Empire, Major-Général,
DUC DE DALMATIE.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Braine le Comte, 14th June, 1815, 5 P.M.

I am just now returned from the front, where all is quiet, and where no change has taken place. I received the 'Gazette de France' of the 12th, which I enclose herewith, in which it is said that Buonaparte left Paris to come down to this frontier on the 11th at night.

Ever, my dear Duke, your most sincerely devoted
WILLIAM PRINCE OF ORANGE.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 14th June, 1815, ½ past 9 in the morning.

It appears that the troops have only been concentrated near Maubeuge to be reviewed. They began yesterday again to march in different directions, some to Beaumont, and some to Pont sur Sambre, where it is said a camp will be formed. About 48 pieces of ordnance shall have taken that route.

A regiment of the line, the 51st, coming from Lille, has passed the day before yesterday Valenciennes, and marched in the direction of Avesnes. A great number of waggons have been put in requisition on the frontier to carry provisions, it is said, for eight days.

I enclose the 'Moniteur' of the 10th, but hope to send this afternoon papers of a fresher date.

I have the honour to be, My Lord, your most obedient humble servant,

DÖRNBERG.

Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Hardinge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Namur, 14th June, 1815, 10 P.M.

A report from General Zieten of this day's date, just received, encloses a letter from General Merlen of the Belgian army of this morning, in which he states that the troops collected at Maubeuge are in movement from thence on the road to Beaumont, being provided with eight days' provisions and forage.

At the time General Zieten wrote (presumed to be at twelve or one to-day) he had received no information of any movement of the enemy by their right. The fires of a body of troops, he reports, were seen last night in the direction of Thimmont, near Beaumont, and also in the vicinity of Mirbes. There is nothing further said of the arrival of Buonaparte or of the Guards at Avesnes, which reports were received from the front during last night.

General Gneisenau credits the intelligence he has received from different quarters of the arrival of the two divisions of the 4th corps from the neighbourhood of Thionville at Sédan and Mézières on the 12th.

The corps of General Kleist has been directed upon Arlon. In case of necessity the 3rd corps from the environs of Cinay can be assembled at this point in fourteen hours; and the 4th corps from Liège is prepared to move upon Hanut.

The prevalent opinion here seems to be that Buonaparte intends to commence offensive operations.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

H. HARDINGE.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Foreign Office, 14th June, 1815.

I have the honour to transmit to your Grace by Colonel Coffin, who is on his way to join the head-quarters of the Piedmontese army, the amended convention between His Majesty and the King of Sardinia, bearing date the 2nd day of May last, and with the seal and signature of the Count d'Aglié.

I have the honour to request that your Grace would have the goodness to affix your seal and signature to this instrument, and forward it by Colonel Coffin to the address of the Sardinian Minister for Foreign Affairs, to whom the accompanying despatch from the Count d'Aglié is directed, and which is left open for your Grace's inspection.

The Sardinian government is already aware of this arrangement, and will be prepared to transmit to London His Sardinian Majesty's act of ratification of the amended convention, in order to be duly exchanged against that of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

Your Grace will have the goodness to return by the first conveyance the copy of the amended convention, which is to be deposited in the archives of this office.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect,
My Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
Castlereagh.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

My Lord, Mons, 14th June, 1815, 3 o'clock P.M.

I have just now got the following intelligence, which I copy literally:—

"Le quartier général du 1er. corps d'observation est à route sur Sambre depuis hier. Le Général d'Erlon y étoit attendu. La traitterie de cuisine de Buonaparte était hier à Avesnes à quatre heures et demie, mais il n'y était pas lui même.

"Toutes les troupes se concentrent sur Maubeuge et Beaumont. On suppose l'armée de 80,000 hommes jusqu'à Beaumont, et de 100,000 hommes jusqu'à Philippeville. Chaque division a six ou huit pièces de campagne.

"Les trois régiments de cavalerie appartenant au 1er. corps d'observation qui étaient entre Cambrai et Valenciennes ont passé hier derrière Avesnes, sans entrer dans la ville, se portant aussi sur Maubeuge.

"Toutes les troupes qui étoient dans les environs se dirigent sur ce point.

"Il n'y a que 100 hommes à Bavay."

The cavalry piquets in front of Valenciennes at Quivrain are withdrawn. A man coming from Lille saw the garrison of that place march out, and also that of Dunkerque passing Lille: they shall both have passed Valenciennes, crying "Vive l'Empereur!"

Nothing of his arrival was known till yet.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your most obedient humble servant,
DÖRNBERG.

'Moniteur' has not yet arrived, but your Lordship will have seen in the 'Journal de Paris' that Buonaparte left it in the night from the 11th to the 12th instant.

DÖRNBERG.

Passage of the Sambre by the French Army.

Charleroi, 15 Juin, 9 heures du soir.

L'armée a forcé le passage de la Sambre près Charleroi, et chassé les avant-postes à mi-chemin de Charleroi à Namur, et de Charleroi à Bruxelles. Nous avons fait 1500 prisonniers et pris 6 pièces de canon. L'armée de l'Empereur a peu souffert, mais il a fait une perte sensible par la mort du Général Letort, son aide-de-camp, qui fut tué sur les hauteurs de Fleurus en conduisant une charge de cavalerie. L'enthousiasme des habitans de Charleroi et des autres pays que nous traversons ne saurait se décrire.

Brook Taylor, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Stuttgart, 15th June, 1815.

The arrival here of an English officer from Switzerland (Lieutenant May, of the regiment of Roll), whom I have requested to take charge of my despatches, affords me the earliest opportunity of forwarding with any safety to your Grace the accompanying packet from Major-General Lowe.

The enclosed statement of the French forces between Chambery, Lyon, and the Fort de l'Ecluse, has been transmitted to me by Mr. Canning, who informs me that he has obtained it from a source which he thinks may be relied upon. According to the most credible accounts the enemy continues equally feeble on the side of Basle and Béfort. His principal force in that neighbourhood is posted about a league from Basle: it is said to amount to 5000 or 6000 men.

The Archduke Ferdinand removes his head-quarters this day from Canstadt to Hechingen, about 30 miles nearer the Swiss frontiers; and I am informed that Count Colloredo, who is at present at Pforzheim, has also received orders to move his corps d'armée in the same direction.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect, my Lord,
Your Grace's most faithful humble servant,
BROOK TAYLOR.

[ENCLOSURE.]

A Annecy—500 dragons, bonne troupe bien montée; 300 hommes d'infanterie du 67me. régiment: 4 canons de 6, et 2 obusiers.

Dans les Bolgels—1800 mêlés de troupes de ligne et garde nationale: 2 canons de 4.

Chambery—3000 hommes d'infanterie: 20 canons et 3 obusiers.

Fort Barraux—400 hommes d'infanterie: 15 obusiers de 16.

Grenoble—2000 hommes d'infanterie: 60 canons et quelques obusiers.

Bourgain—300 hommes de gardes nationales.

Lyon—Peu de troupes de ligne: 200 canons, deux de 48.

La garde nationale consiste en 8000 à 9000 hommes, dont une grande partie est Royaliste.

De Lyon à Pont d'Ain les villages sont occupés par des gardes nationales armées de hallebardes ou mauvais fusils.

Pont d'Ain—600 infanterie et garde nationale. On y parle vaguement d'établir un camp de 10,000 à 12,000 hommes.

Bourg—200 infanterie, point d'artillerie.

Lons le Saulnier—600 infanterie; point d'artillerie, sauf quelques pièces qui vont et viennent.

Nantua—200 infanterie, point d'artillerie.

Fort de l'Ecluse—300 hommes: 4 canons; 2 de 6, 2 obusiers.

Brigadier-General Dalrymple to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Milan, 15th June, 1815.

I think it my duty to inform your Grace that, agreeably to orders I have received, I am about to leave these head-quarters for my proper military destination. As there is no other British officer here, I presume your Grace will receive every information respecting the future movements of this army from the Austrian authorities.

The whole of it is at present in motion. The head-quarters will be at Turin on the 20th instant, at which period I apprehend the line between the Valley d'Aoste and Coni will be occupied by nearly 60,000 Austrian troops.

There is not any intelligence from France which is to be depended upon: it appears certain that Marshal Brune is endeavouring to get an army together in the department of the Var, and that Suchet's force in French Savoy has lately decreased. Whether he has any second line of force I cannot make out.

I have the honour to be

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

JOHN DALRYMPLE.

Substance of Colonel Dillon's communications with Bertrand.

Bruxelles, 15th June, 1815.

Colonel Henry Dillon, zealous for the interests of his country, procured the first information through his niece, Countess Bertrand, that Napoleon was about to quit Elba to return to France, and informed the Secretary of State of the Home Department thereof on the 6th of February last, and received an answer of thanks for that communication.

Since the return of Napoleon the Colonel renewed his acquaintance with Count Bertrand to extract from him the further projects of Napoleon; and on the 20th of May the Count persisted that 400,000 men were under arms, not including national guards, free corps, partisans, &c., &c., and that in the case of 100,000 more being completed before the commencement of the campaign, he would answer for the success; that Napoleon was extremely irritated against the Prussians; and, if the English failed in their support, he knew the Belges and Hollanders were disposed for Napoleon; and that probably the first attack would be towards Avesnes.

My niece assured me she would retire to England with her three children in case of Napoleon's failure, and that her husband would follow Napoleon, which it appears will be to America. For this month past a large sum of money was put on board a ship at Havre de Grace.

There are a formidable set of republicans in Paris: I believe Lucien Buonaparte, Fouché, and Carnot to be the leaders. On Napoleon's overthrow the root of the evil will require to be extracted to restore order and insure future tranquillity; the mass of the people are entirely disposed for the King, and many regiments.

Through various conversations with his niece, the Colonel could perceive that hopes are still entertained by Napoleon that Austria might not be so zealous in this cause against him: it will require great exertion on the side of Prussia to stimulate Austria.

Napoleon has very lately been making some overtures with the Turks, but the Colonel could not find out the exact nature of them.

Sir G. H. Berkeley to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY DEAR LORD, Braine le Comte, 15th June, 1815, 2 o'clock P.M.

H.R.H. the Prince of Orange having set out at 5 o'clock this morning for the advanced posts, and not being returned, I forward the enclosed letter from General Dörnberg. General Constans desires I would inform you that the reports just arrived from different quarters state that the Prussians have been attacked upon their line in front of Charleroi; that they have evacuated Binch, and meant to collect first at Gosselies. Everything is quiet upon our front; and the 3rd division of the Netherlands is collected at Fay. He sends you also the copy of a letter from the commandant at Mons.

I remain, my dear Lord, very faithfully yours,

G. H. BERKELEY.

Lieut.-Col. Lord Greenock to Major-Gen. Sir W. Ponsonby, or Officer commanding Second Brigade, Denderhauten.

(Immediate.)

MEMORANDUM.

Ninhove, 15th June, 1815. (Received at 1¾ A.M. 16th June.)

Major-General Sir W. Ponsonby's brigade will assemble with the utmost possible expedition this night at Ninhove, where it will receive further orders.

The regiments had better be formed on the high road leading from Ninhove to Voorde, &c., near the quarters of the Royal Dragoons, between Oultre and Ninhove.

GREENOCK, Lieut.-Col.,
A. Q. M. G.

An orderly officer to be sent to Ninhove.

Major-Gen. Sir W. Dörnberg to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

MY LORD, Mons, 15th June, 1815, ½ past 9 o'clock in the morning.

A picket of French lancers has been placed again at Autreffe, on the Bavay road; but at Quivrain there are only national guards, with a few gendarmes.

A man who was yesterday at Maubeuge says that all the troops march towards Beaumont and Philippeville, and that no other troops but national guards remained at Maubeuge. He thinks that near 40,000 men have passed that place.

I have sent towards Pont sur Sambre, where, I believe, a corps remains.

I just hear the Prussians were attacked.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your most obedient humble servant,
DÖRNBERG.

Baron Behr to the Prince of Orange.

MON PRINCE, Mons, le 15 Juin, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de rendre compte à Votre Altesse Royale du rapport qui vient de m'être adressé par M. le Général-Major van Merle. Il résulte que le Général Steinmetz, commandant à Fontaine l'Evêque, vient de lui envoyer un officier pour l'aviser que la 2e brigade Prussienne a été attaquée ce matin, que les canons d'alarme ont été tirés sur toute la ligne. Il paraît que l'attaque se dirige sur Charleroi, où le feu d'infanterie était très vif.

Sur les avant-postes de M. le Général van Merle tout est tranquille.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec un profond respect,
Le Général-Major Commandant Supérieur,
BARON BEHR.

P.S. Les avant-postes en avant de Mons sont aussi très tranquilles.

General Dumouriez to *

MON RESPECTABLE ET EXCELLENT AMI, Le 15 Juin, 1815.

Voici la 3ème et dernière partie de mon mémoire. C'était la plus difficile. Je vous prie d'engager Lord Castlereagh d'en lire les trois parties, et de les envoyer par le premier courrier à Lord Wellington, pour qu'il n'y ait pas un moment perdu pour le faire parvenir directement de la part de ce grand homme à Louis XVIII., à qui je ne l'envoye pas directement, parce qu'il serait supprimé ou tronqué et dénaturé par son terrible Conseil. Comme ce monarque a infiniment d'esprit, je me fie plus à lui qu'à tous ses entours. Faites aussi passer l'incluse à mon héros.

Nous voilà bientôt au moment des grandes nouvelles.

DUMOURIEZ.

[ENCLOSURE.]

CO-OPÉRATION DE LOUIS XVIII. AVEC LA LIGUE EUROPÉENNE.

Première Partie.

Le 12 Juin, 1815.

En essayant de donner quelques avis, dictés par l'expérience et l'étude, sur les moyens de donner à Louis XVIII. une force réelle, non seulement pour remonter sur son trône, mais pour s'y soutenir seul, après avoir reconquis sa nation avec l'aide des Alliés, je poserai un principe certain, applicable surtout au gouvernement d'une nation aussi nombreuse, aussi volatile, aussi éclairée en bien et en mal que la nation Française:—"Pour qu'un gouvernement quelconque soit fort et stable, il faut en séparer le matériel de la personne du Roi, pour que sa marche soit uniforme et constante."

Le gouvernement Français, depuis la mort des Cardinaux Richelieu et Mazarin, a manqué de fixité et d'unité, parceque les Rois se sont fait une règle de gouverner seuls et par eux-mêmes. Leur caractère, fort ou faible, a rendu leurs règnes, ou les époques de leurs règnes, plus ou moins brillants ou honteux, plus ou moins utiles ou nuisibles.

Louis XIV., plein de confiance dans un jugement droit, dont l'avait doué la nature, s'était fait un système de n'avoir jamais de premier Ministre. Son règne a été brillant et heureux, tant que la vigueur de l'âge a soutenu le poids d'une âme grande, peut-être trop exaltée. Mais ce règne a décliné dans la même proportion que ses forces physiques. Les contemporains de sa gloire ou étaient morts ou ont été écartés par une vieille femme et des prêtres, les grandes places et les armées ont été livrées à des Ministres imberbes, à des courtisans ignorants. Louis XIV., depuis 1800, ne s'est plus ressemblé à lui-même, et a fourni la preuve que tout état monarchique a besoin d'un premier Ministre, au moins à deux époques: 1, pendant la jeunesse du Roi, pour le diriger, l'instruire, et gouverner en son nom; 2, pendant sa vieillesse, pour suppléer à ce que l'âge lui ôte de vigueur, et pour continuer l'unité dans le gouvernement monarchique absolu. Le gouvernement monarchique constitutionnel a pareillement besoin d'un premier Ministre responsable, ne fut ce que pour diminuer les inconvénients de l'égalité et de l'indépendance entre les Secrétaires d'Etat des différens départements, et pour ramener autant que possible à l'unité, qui est le principe de force et d'action de tout gouvernement, quel qu'il soit.

Louis XV., d'après l'exemple de son glorieux prédécesseur, a annoncé à la mort du Cardinal de Fleury, son instituteur et son premier Ministre, qu'il gouvernerait par lui-même. Il a assez bien réussi jusqu'à la paix de 1748, parce qu'il s'est montré brillamment à la tête de ses armées commandées par un héros étranger. Mais depuis cette époque, livré à des maitresses qui l'entouraient, de Ministres corrompus et incapables, les vingt-six années suivantes de son malheureux règne ont prouvé combien un premier Ministre est nécessaire sous un Roi, ou trop jeune ou trop vieux, ou ignorant ou insouciant.

Louis XVI. a suivi l'exemple de Louis XV., après la mort du funeste Comte de Maurepas. Il a pris dans ses mains timides et inexercées les rênes d'un gouvernement que les deux règnes précédents avaient précipité vers sa ruine. Rempli de vertus et de bonnes intentions, mais manquant de confiance en lui-même, d'énergie et de talents, il a régné quinze ans par trente ministres, tous égaux, tous se détestant, se renversant mutuellement, tous incapables de gouverner quand même ils en auraient eu l'autorité. Le malheureux Louis, trouvant les maux de l'état incurables, s'est jeté dans les bras de la nation, qui méprisait ses entours, et ne lui rendait pas justice à lui-même. Il en a été la victime.

Après vingt-cinq ans d'exil, à la suite d'une révolution atroce, qui a changé les mœurs, le caractère, les opinions d'une nation, qu'à peine peut reconnaître un Roi absent depuis si longtems, Louis XVIII. est remonté sur le trône, rappelé par le vœu de sa nation, vœu résultant de l'excès de ses calamités, et de la présence de deux cent mille étrangers triomphants. Il a ramené à sa suite de nombreux émigrés, qui, moins éclairés que lui, ne rapportant en France que leurs préjugés et leurs passions, bien loin d'adopter les idées libérales et paternelles que ce Prince avait mûries dans un dur exil qu'il avait mis à profit, méconnaissant les vues prudentes de ce bon Roi, plein de sagacité, de lumières, de bienfaisance, et de patriotisme ; animés au contraire par l'égoïsme, l'orgueil, et l'esprit de vengeance, l'ont environné de tous les inconvénients d'une Cour ignorante et vicieuse, qui a contrarié toutes ses vues, dénaturé tous ses plans, et a fini par s'attirer la haine d'une nation qui ne connaissait plus que par tradition ces absents trop injustement dépouillés.

Cette Cour, encore plus maladroite que coupable, par sa précipitation à développer des intentions qu'on a cru liberticides, a fait retomber une partie de la haine et des soupçons sur ce sage Roi, digne d'un meilleur tems, et est parvenue à rendre les Français indécis entre l'amour qu'ils lui doivent et le plus criminel enthousiasme pour un tyran que foncièrement ils détestent, et dont l'existence est le fléau de l'univers. Le crime qui veillait au dehors a profité de ces grandes fautes, et il a fallu céder à l'orage sans pouvoir même combattre.

Louis XVIII., comme ses prédécesseurs, avait annoncé qu'il ne prendrait point de premier Ministre. A considérer ses grands talents, son expérience, son génie, il n'en a pas besoin ; mais en examinant la révolution morale qui a changé le caractère de sa nation, celle qu'amenait la Charte constitutionnelle, dont lui-même avait tracé le plan dans sa sagesse, la nécessité de présenter aux deux Chambres une responsabilité absolue dans le pouvoir exécutif, pour ne pas la faire retomber sur lui-même, surtout après d'aussi grandes convulsions, pendant que son autorité n'était pas encore solidement établie, et sa dignité suffisamment connue, il paraît qu'il aurait dû mettre à la tête de son conseil un premier Ministre pour donner de l'unité et de la fixité à la machine du gouvernement.

L'expérience de ce qui s'est passé doit prouver qu'il est nécessaire d'en venir à cette prudente mesure, qu'elle seule peut donner de l'uniformité et de l'activité à ses plans, de la confiance à ses Alliés et à sa propre nation, et à lui-même le soulagement des embarras de détails multipliés et souvent contradictoires.

Pour que Louis XVIII. puisse réellement fournir un contingent effectif, en conséquence du traité qui l'admet comme partie intégrante dans la ligue Européenne contre Buonaparte, il faut que son gouvernement soit assuré sur des bases solides, et qu'il profite du séjour qu'il passe forcément hors de ses états pour l'arranger d'avance, de manière à inspirer autant de confiance aux Français restés en France qu'à ceux qui l'ont suivi en pays étrangers.

Egalement Roi de tous les Français, il doit les juger tous, sans acception et sans exception, lorsqu'il s'agit de choisir les membres de son conseil, et surtout celui qui doit le représenter plus particulièrement, sous le titre de premier Ministre.

Il serait à désirer, vu son âge et ses infirmités, que ce bon Prince se déterminat à déposer sa confiance dans un homme connu par de grands talents, et qui eut donné des preuves d'un véritable attachement. Alors les ordres proposés par ce premier Ministre au Conseil d'Etat, distribués pour les détails aux autres Ministres, sous les yeux du Roi, auraient dans leur exécution la force et la promptitude d'unité et d'ensemble sans laquelle aucun gouvernement ne peut marcher.

Cette première base posée, nous allons examiner dans la seconde partie de ce mémoire de quelle espèce sont ses moyens militaires, puisqu'enfin il est réduit par la férocité de l'armée de ligne Française et par l'aveuglement de ses sujets égarés à employer la force pour abréger et diminuer les calamités d'une guerre étrangère, et pour les contraindre à être heureux. Considérons quand comment où il peut se donner une force réelle pour reconquérir son trône, et s'y maintenir, sans avoir de nouveau recours au dangereux appui des Puissances Etrangères.

Seconde Partie.

On ne peut pas se dissimuler que rien n'est plus difficile que de lever une armée Royale, soit en France, soit hors de France, à l'époque où toute la nation, enflammée par un enthousiasme mal raisonné pour un guerrier célèbre par de nombreuses victoires, ou entraînée par un amour propre national plus ardent encore et plus fondé qu'en 1792, ou forcée par l'exemple, les menaces, les vexations de l'armée de ligne, se porte aux frontières pour défendre la patrie attaquée sur tous les points par la ligne de l'Est, entre la Manche au Nord et la Méditerranée au Sud.

On ne peut avoir d'espoir pour cette formation que sur quelques désertions peu nombreuses en ce moment, et sur la défection partielle ou l'inaction de quelques bataillons de Gardes Nationales, à mesure que les armées alliées, après avoir forcé les obstacles que Buonaparte leur aura opposés sur l'extrême frontière, pénétreront au delà des places fortes dans l'intérieur du pays ; on ne peut rien calculer d'avance sur cette ressource, qui s'étendra ou se resserrera après les premières opérations militaires, selon leur succès heureux ou défavorable.

La formation de l'armée Royaliste, se faisant nécessairement au milieu des coups de fusil, ne peut être composée que d'une manière précaire et irrégulière, qu'il faudra refondre en entier quand cette guerre sera terminée pour tirer de cette confusion une armée régulière, constitutionnelle, Royaliste et nationale en même tems, qui ne surcharge pas l'Etat par sa dépense, et qui n'épuise pas la population par son recrutement ; en un mot, proportionnée aux besoins absolus de la France, pour assurer sa tranquillité au dedans et sa dignité au dehors.

Il est à souhaiter que dès à présent le Roi ait arrêté un plan fixé, qu'on suivra autant que cela sera possible, pour faciliter la refonte totale dès que le Roi sera remonté sur son trône, et pour éviter de nouveaux mécontentements et de nouvelles subversions.

Toute l'armée de ligne de Buonaparte doit nécessairement être dissoute, surtout la Garde Impériale: presque tous les chefs qui la commandent, depuis les Maréchaux jusqu'aux Lieutenant-Colonels, de toutes les armes, ayant secondé la perfidie de leur chef, y ayant ajouté la violation de leurs serments, doivent être cassés sans miséricorde; les plus coupables doivent être jugés par des tribunaux militaires, punis de mort ou déportés.

Tous les corps qui la composent doivent être refondus, et en changeant de drapeaux doivent aussi changer de nom. Cette nouveauté ne choquera pas la nation, car dans ce moment-ci les anciennes provinces en donnent l'exemple en se confédérant sous leurs anciens noms, tels que Fédération de Bretagne, Normandie, Picardie, Dauphiné, etc. Ainsi le Roi peut rétablir toute son infanterie de ligne en trente régiments de quatre bataillons, à sept cent cinquante hommes chacun, ou trois mille hommes, sous les noms les plus célèbres de nos provinces, comme Picardie, Champagne, Auvergne, etc. Ces noms consacrés dans nos fastes militaires rappelleront à ces corps des souvenirs glorieux, et le choix des officiers et des soldats tirés de la ligne actuelle en formera dès leur création des corps de vétérans. Ce qui donnera au Roi 90,000 hommes d'une infanterie de ligne respectable.

On composera sous les mêmes noms des provinces trente bataillons d'infanterie légère de pareil nombre, sous la dénomination de chasseurs, voltigeurs, tirailleurs, etc., ce qui formera un corps de 22,000 hommes d'infanterie légère, qui prendront pareillement l'esprit national de la province dont ils porteront le nom, dans laquelle on les recrutera le plus qu'on pourra, en adoptant à cet égard en partie le système Prussien, ou Suédois, tant en officiers qu'en soldats, pour y enraciner l'esprit de corps.

On fera la même opération à peu près pour la cavalerie, de quelque espèce qu'elle soit, pour l'artillerie à pied et à cheval, et pour tous les autres corps de l'armée. Quant aux deux Gardes Impériales, comme elles seront fort diminuées par leur résistance, leur réforme sera d'autant plus facile qu'ils seront plus odieux quand on ne les craindra plus. On en tirera de très bons hommes, tant officiers que soldats, pour former deux régiments de Gardes Françaises, de quatre bataillons chacun, ce qui joint à quatre bataillons de Gardes Suisses, et à deux bataillons d'infanterie légère, donnera un corps bien choisi, bien épuré, de 10,500 hommes de gardes à pied.

On aura soin, surtout, dans cette recomposition générale de l'armée, de ne donner les commandements ni comme généraux ni comme chefs de corps à des émigrés trop vieux, ni à des nobles trop jeunes, ayant égard dans les promotions le plus qu'on pourra à l'ancienneté, sans distinction de caste ou de faveur. Pour que le Roi et ses Ministres ne soyent pas surpris par l'intrigue et la protection, Sa Majesté établira dans chaque division de l'armée, pour chaque arme, un tribunal militaire chargé de l'examen des droits, des titres, des réclamations de chaque officier, et l'avis de ce tribunal décidera des promotions. Ainsi le sort de chaque militaire, depuis le Maréchal de France jusqu'au simple soldat, sera soumis à l'égalité de droit qui convient à une armée constitutionnelle.

Il y a peu de changements à faire aux invalides et aux écoles militaires, ainsi qu'à toutes les institutions relatives aux armées. La gendarmerie doit être remise à tous égards sur le même pied qu'avant la Révolution. Le système des Gardes Nationales doit être maintenu et perfectionné pour servir de contrepoids à l'armée de ligne, et la suppléer en cas de besoin.

Je donne cet aperçu rapide uniquement pour indiquer les nuances graduelles par lesquelles le Roi, rétabli sur son trône, peut opérer les changements nécessaires dans la constitution de l'armée. Tout ce travail, qu'il faut simplifier pour diminuer l'ébranlement et ne pas nuire à l'énergie de cette armée, dont on ne doit qu'épurer le caractère, ne regarde que l'avenir à une époque indéterminée. Cependant il faut se servir de ce que l'on a, en gémissant sur l'irrégularité, l'insuffisance, et les dangers des faibles moyens qui restent à la juste cause de la Royauté.

L'unique force militaire, apparente, du Roi est la cavalerie de sa maison. Ce corps, tant jalousé et vu de si mauvais œil, ne peut être utile que pour maintenir l'éclat du trône, mais ne présente aucune sûreté, aucun appui dans un tems de révolution. Il n'a pas pu sauver l'infortuné Louis XVI. il y a vingt-cinq ans; il a été totalement inutile à Louis XVIII. dans la dernière insurrection de l'armée de ligne, avec laquelle il n'a aucun rapport.

Sa constitution est vicieuse et anti-militaire, parce que le genre de son service, sa composition, son esprit ne peuvent admettre aucun amalgame avec les autres corps de l'armée. Ses officiers supérieurs sont tirés du sein de la Cour, et nommés par la faveur. Ses soldats sont tous nobles, ou réputés tels, tous officiers!

En 1761 j'ai servi en Westphalie avec 600 hommes de cette maison du Roi. Ils ne savaient ni se camper, ni se nourrir, ni se garder. Les généraux craignaient leur présence, parce qu'au lieu de services, ils n'apportaient que des prétentions et des murmures. J'ai trouvé en 1770 le même désordre dans la Pospolite Polonaise.

Ce corps, supprimé pendant vingt-cinq ans, recréé et augmenté précipitamment en 1814, ne présente en officiers et en soldats qu'une masse de nobles, ou trop vieux ou trop jeunes, trop inégaux de taille et de forces physiques, ayant oublié le métier des armes, ou l'ignorant, insubordonnés, raisonneurs comme l'arrière-ban si sagement abandonné, dont ils ne diffèrent que par le luxe de leur tenue et la cherté de leur entretien.

Il existe cependant, il représente seul la partie militaire des fidèles sujets de Sa Majesté, et certainement dans une bataille il reproduirait des actes héroïques semblables à ceux qui l'ont illustré sous Louis XIV. et à la bataille de Fontenoi. Mais comme vingt-cinq ans de guerre et d'égalité ont entièrement changé, élevé, et endurci le caractère du soldat Français, si la Garde Impériale était opposée à la maison du Roi, ce corps superbe et privilégié serait la victime de son courage et de son dévouement, et serait anéanti par ces vétérans disciplinés, féroces, et jaloux.

Tel qu'il est, il fait le fonds de l'armée Royale qui se rassemble en Belgique, et c'est autour de son oriflamme que doivent se rassembler, sans espoir, cependant, d'y être incorporés, tous les corps, ou les individus, que le repentir ou l'honneur rappelleront vers leur bon Roi. C'est bien certainement ce corps qui doit ramener le Roi dans son palais. On doit le réserver pour cette destination, qui seule lui convient; et il est à souhaiter que sa maison militaire ne montre pas dans sa capitale des épées teintes du sang de ses sujets.

Mais pour donner une apparence plus majestueuse et une consistance plus guerrière, il paraît nécessaire qu'à cette cavalerie noble soit jointe une infanterie de vétérans; qu'on rétablisse la Garde Française et Suisse; qu'on y joigne des corps d'artillerie légère, grenadiers à cheval, hussards, lanciers, et infanterie légère, pour former de la maison une division militaire complète, propre à garder le Roi et à le servir à la guerre, en y réunissant toutes les armes comme dans la Garde Impériale.

Quant au régiment des Gardes Suisses, il ne paraît pas y avoir rien à changer dans son ancienne constitution, à quelques innovations près convenables à la tactique moderne. L'extrême fidélité de cette respectable nation, son attachement constant à la monarchie Française, sa discipline, sa régularité, lui donnent au dessus de toutes les autres troupes étrangères le droit de pouvoir, sans aucun danger, fournir à notre armée nationale une division d'infanterie de douze bataillons, indépendamment du régiment des Gardes Suisses. C'est la seule troupe étrangère qu'un Roi constitutionnel puisse attacher au service de l'Etat sans inconvénient, la seule que la nation verra sans soupçon et sans jalousie.

Je ne doute pas que le Roi n'ait négocié depuis longtems avec la Diète Helvétique, ou séparement avec les cantons, qui autrefois fournissaient à la France cette excellente infanterie. Il est d autant plus pressant d'en recréer le plutôt possible seize bataillons, y compris ceux de la Garde, et de leur faire joindre le point de rassemblement de la maison du Roi, que cette cavalerie ne peut pas entrer en campagne sans un infanterie appartenante au Roi par sa capitulation et sa solde, et indépendante de toute Puissance étrangère.

Si la négociation pour l'acquisition de cette infanterie Suisse a déja été faite d'avance, et ses capitulations convenues, on tardera d'autant moins à les rassembler, et les joindre à l'armée Royale en Belgique, sous les ordres de leur Colonel-Général, qu'en ce moment toute la Suisse est en armes.

La seconde ressource pour la formation de l'armée Royale en Belgique est la quantité de déserteurs et d'émigrés de tous les grades et de toutes les armes, dont le nombre augmentera encore quand les hostilités seront commencées, et auront mis en contact les armées Françaises avec celles des Alliés. Certainement les généraux étrangers seront trop prudents pour permettre que ces transfuges restent à la suite des différentes armées, et leur assigneront au loin, en arrière de la ligne des opérations, des dépôts de rassemblement. Indépendamment de la sûreté générale, cette disposition est nécessaire pour débrouiller le chaos que produira leur mélange.

C'est dans ces dépôts assignés d'avance que Sa Majesté fera trouver des généraux, des colonels, et des officiers de tous grades et de toute arme, pour recevoir, examiner, et choisir ces transfuges, en composer des corps d'infanterie Française avec les noms de provinces, comme il a été dit ci-dessus, pour arriver insensiblement à la formation de l'armée de ligne telle qu'on la désire.

Par exemple, dans les dépôts du Brabant on leverait neuf régiments portant les noms des sept provinces les plus rapprochées de la frontière du Nord, outre le régiment du Roi et celui de la Couronne, ce qui produirait neuf régiments de ligne de quatre bataillons chacun, et neuf bataillons de chasseurs ou infanterie légère sous les noms suivants :—1, du Roi ; 2, de la Couronne ; 3, Normandie ; 4, Picardie ; 5, Artois ; 6, Flandres ; 7, Hainault ; 8, Champagne ; 9, Ile de France.

Dans les dépôts derrière l'armée alliée du Centre on formerait cinq régiments et cinq bataillons de chasseurs :—1, Maréchal Turenne ; 2, les Evêchés ; 3, Alsace ; 4, Bourgogne ; 5, Franche Comté.

Dans les dépôts derrière les armées alliées du Sud-Est et du Sud, cinq régiments et cinq bataillons:—1, La Marine ; 2, Auvergne ; 3, Lyonnais ; 4, Dauphiné ; 5, Provence.

Les provinces de l'Ouest, depuis le Languedoc jusqu'à la Bretagne inclusivement, et les provinces centrales, formeraient onze régiments et onze bataillons d'infanterie légère, qui compléteraient le nombre de trente, dont un porterait le nom d'Henri IV., l'autre celui de la Duchesse d'Angoulême, pour éterniser la mémoire de son héroïsme à Bordeaux. On choisirait pour les neuf autres les noms de provinces les plus célèbres dans notre histoire militaire. Ces onze régiments seraient :—1, Henri IV. ; 2, Duchesse d'Angoulême ; 3, Languedoc ; 4, Royal Roussillon ; 5, Berri ; 6, Limousin ; 7, Navarre ; 8, Guyenne ; 9, Saintonge ; 10, Poitou ; 11, Bretagne.

L'infanterie de ligne formée dans les dépôts des deux armées alliées du Nord-Est et du Centre, montant lorsqu'elle pourrait être complète à 14 régiments et 14 bataillons d'infanterie légère, produirait 70 bataillons. Ce corps de 52,000 hommes, joint à l'artillerie et à la cavalerie proportionnés et à la maison du Roi, tant à cheval qu'à pied, et aux douze bataillons Suisses, formerait une armée Royale de 70,000 à 80,000 hommes, destinée à ramener le Roi et sa Cour à Paris, où elle aurait été précédée par les armées alliées, ce qui sauverait au Roi l'odieux reproche de s'être présenté en personne à la tête des étrangers pour porter le fer et le feu dans sa patrie.

A mesure qu'un bataillon d'un des quatorze régiments ou des chasseurs serait formé dans les dépôts susdits, il serait envoyé au rendezvous général de l'armée, où il serait sur le champ armé et équipé. On en ferait autant pour l'artillerie et la cavalerie. Si un corps de l'armée des rebelles passait en entier, on ne changerait rien à son organisation que la désignation nominale.

Si des places fortes se rendaient de bonne volonté, le Roi ne ferait qu'en changer les garnisons sur les représentations des habitans fidèles; si ces places étaient importantes, ou considérables, le Roi y enverrait un des Princes de son sang pour en assurer la fidélité, et pouvoir dater le plutôt possible les actes du gouvernement du territoire Français, pour y convoquer les deux Chambres, et sanctionner par leur présence la reprise de ses fonctions royales, qui, datées des pays étrangers, quoique aussi réelles, n'ont pas la même valeur d'opinion sur une nation, ou égarée par les illusions de fanatisme, ou comprimée par la tyrannie d'une armée coupable et parjure, aveuglément dépendante d'un monstre qu'il faut écraser.

Il est impossible de calculer l'époque où on réussira à former l'armée Royale en Belgique; mais en y travaillant méthodiquement et constamment on est sûr d'y parvenir, et en très peu de tems on en distinguera les cadres, parceque toutes les circonstances sont favorables à ce plan.

Je suppose que le Roi a sauvé quelques débris de son naufrage, ou qu'en cas qu'il n'ait pas assez de fonds, les Alliés, qui ont le même intérêt que lui à son rétablissement solide, lui avanceront le supplément dont il aura besoin pour cette dépense. Il faut que la solde soit régulière, et bien assurée au taux où elle devra être continuée après la paix. Il faut que les généraux et les officiers supérieurs ne soient pas choisis exclusivement parmi les courtisans, ou nommés par la faveur, et qu'ils écrasent les officiers de fortune, c'est-à-dire, de mérite du même grade. Tous les autres officiers inférieurs, depuis le grade de capitaine inclusivement, doivent être nommés à l'ancienneté, ou désignés par l'opinion publique. C'est l'ambition trompée des plébéïens sur l'avancement aux grades supérieurs qui a porté l'armée à la révolte, quand elle a vu ces grades envahis par des hommes qu'ils n'avaient jamais vu dans leurs rangs, qui ne connaissent ni la tactique actuelle ni la langue militaire, ni le caractère de la nation. Il faut qu'on soit bien persuadé que la porte des dignités est ouverte au mérite. C'est là la véritable égalité qui doit exister dans l'armée Royale. Il faut faire aimer au soldat son état et le Souverain qui lui en assure l'honneur et tous les autres avantages. Surtout il ne faut pas surcharger les corps d'officiers inutiles. Enfin, il faut punir et récompenser avec la plus stricte justice. On peut parvenir ainsi sans secousse à identifier le Roi avec l'armée.

Dans la troisième partie je passe à l'examen de la formation des autres armées Royales dans la France même, non pas précairement sur le besoin temporaire qu'on en a, mais sur une constitution fixée et permanente.

Troisième Partie.

Il reste à examiner l'état des Royalistes en France, qui, soit par impatience des vexations qu'ils ont éprouvées des Buonapartistes, soit par imprudence naturelle, se sont jetés dans les horreurs de la guerre civile, sans attendre que l'entrée des Alliés en campagne, en occupant toutes les forces de l'usurpateur, leur donnât les facilités pour se mettre en état de défense avant de secouer le joug.

Il semble que pour mettre de l'ordre dans l'insurrection de la France, dans la formation et la disposition militaire des armées que le Roi doit y tenir sur pied pour aider ses nobles Alliés, et pour anéantir les rebelles, en leur coupant les ressources des provinces qui ne sont pas le théâtre de la guerre étrangère, il est nécessaire de partager le royaume en trois grandes Lieutenances-Générales, confiées à trois Princes de la maison Royale, pour le tems de cette guerre seulement: celle du Nord-Ouest, celle du Sud-Ouest, et celle du Sud.

Lieutenance-Générale du Nord-Ouest.

L'histoire de l'ancienne guerre de la Vendée fait frémir. Elle a enfante dans les deux partis des excès et des crimes qui font horreur. La haine, la soif de la vengeance, toutes les passions hideuses n'ont fait que couver sourdement pendant des années, au lieu de s'éteindre par la bienfaisante révolution qui rendait à la France un déscendant de St. Louis, qui par ses vertus personnelles paraissait devoir ramener les cœurs des Français aux doux sentiments qui pouvaient faire cesser tous les maux dont ils étaient affligés depuis 25 ans.

Les terribles dénominations de "Vendéens" et de "Chouans" n'ont point été effacées par la bienveillance, la douceur, le pardon des injures, dont un Roi juste et bon donnait l'exemple à ses sujets. Ces terribles dénominations sont de nouveau le cri de guerre des malheureux départements de l'ancien Poitou, de la Saintonge, et de la Bretagne.

Louis XVIII. doit dès à présent prendre toutes les mesures possibles pour faire oublier ces malheureuses dénominations, en refondant tous les intérêts particuliers de la rage, du fanatisme, de la vengeance, et de la jalousie, dans l'intérêt légitime et général du Royalisme. Puisque la guerre civile est déjà commencée avec tous les caractères de la fureur la plus implacable, puisqu'elle est même devenue nécessaire pour aider les Alliés à renverser du trône de France le fléau du monde, pour y replacer la vertueuse maison de Bourbon, c'est le devoir du Roi d'en changer le hideux caractère, de la sanctifier même, en lui donnant une conduite régulière et uniforme dans toutes les parties de la France.

Il ne doit plus y avoir de "Vendéens" ni de "Chouans;" tous les fidèles sujets du Roi, armés pour sa cause sacrée, et pour éteindre la rebellion des Buonapartistes et des Jacobins, doivent être uniquement Royalistes. Pour dissiper les factions locales et faire oublier les sobriquets honteux qui dénaturent cette guerre nationale, le moyen le plus prompt et le plus efficace est de former promptement trois divisions portant les noms des trois provinces de Bretagne, Poitou, et Saintonge, composées chacune d'un régiment de quatre bataillons d'infanterie de ligne, un bataillon d'infanterie légère, six escadrons de cavalerie tant pesante que légère, et deux brigades d'artillerie tant à pied qu'à cheval. C'est autour des drapeaux de chacune de ces trois divisions que doivent se ranger les Royalistes des départements de ces trois provinces, dont le nombre excédera beaucoup ces trois divisions, quand elles seront complètes. Ces volontaires n'entrant point dans la composition de cette armée de ligne seront agrégés sous le titre de Bataillons de Gardes Nationales et de Compagnies Franches aux trois divisions provinciales des départements qui les fourniront, commandés par les chefs qui ont leur confiance, sous les ordres des généraux nommés par le Roi pour commander ces divisions, que le Prince du sang, général en chef, dirigera selon le besoin et l'occasion, ou pour opérer seules, ou pour se réunir en corps d'armée.

C'est l'unique moyen de régulariser cette guerre, et de la rendre plus courte, moins cruelle, et moins dévastatrice. Dans la manière dont elle a été conduite autrefois, et jusqu'à présent, ce n'est qu'une lutte locale, sans but pour les départemens voisins, qui ne peut que perpétuer la rage et l'esprit d'une vengeance inextinguible de canton à canton, de famille à famille, des départemens qu'elle dévore, sans utilité et au détriment même de la cause sacrée que prétendent servir ces Français fidèles, mais égarés par leurs passions fougueuses.

Lorsque d'après des opérations bien concertées avec le plan général de l'insurrection des autres parties de la France, les trois divisions de l'armée de ligne du Nord-ouest, en se secourant mutuellement, seront parvenues à délivrer leurs départemens du joug des rebelles, cette armée, laissant la garde de ces départemens aux bataillons des gardes nationales respectives, parcequ'ils puissent reprendre sans interruption les travaux de la campagne, se rassemblera, renforcée de toutes les compagnies franches qui la suivront ou la joindront à mesure qu'elle avancera, et se portera sur la direction prescrite d'après le plan général par le Prince du sang nommé par le Roi pour le représenter dans le Nord-ouest, qui aura encore à ses ordres une quatrième division formée sous le nom provincial de Limousin.

Dans l'état présent de cette guerre on ne peut projeter aucun plan régulier sur ses détails. C'est une loterie de carnage et de dévastation, où tout est fortuit, imprévu, et sans résultats utiles. Son caractère est odieux, et finirait par rendre odieuse elle-même la cause sacrée du Royalisme, si Sa Majesté ne se hâtait pas d'en changer le principe et la conduite. Tout ce qu'on peut conseiller en général et vaguement (car les détails échappent à l'homme qui n'est pas sur les lieux), c'est de tâcher de s'emparer de quelques points fixes sur la côté, comme Noirmoustier, les Sables d'Olonne, &c., "et de quelques places sur les rivières, comme Saumur, Angers, &c.," pour assurer et étendre ses communications et ses développements.

A cette lieutenance-générale du Nord-ouest se rattachent les insurrections partielles de la Normandie, dont le Prince doit chercher à régulariser les mouvements le mieux qu'il pourra, en les autorisant au nom du Roi, sous le titre de Gardes Nationales, et de compagnies franches, patentées au nom du Roi, leur envoyant un général-en-chef et d'autres officiers généraux, pour veiller sur leur formation et leur armement, et diriger leurs mouvemens, seul moyen de les garantir de l'anarchie et des excès d'une levée en masse, exécutée sans plan fixe et sans direction précise.

Lorsque cette insurrection, si elle a lieu, et si elle est conduite avec prudence, aura pris une forte consistance, ce qui doit arriver très vite dans une province aussi peuplée, aussi riche, et aussi universellement loyale envers le Roi, Sa Majesté détachera de son armée de la Belgique les deux divisions de ligne de Normandie et de Picardie, pour y former une petite armée régulière sous la direction du Prince Lieutenant-General du Nord-ouest, qui l'employera selon sa volonté et ses besoins, d'après le plan général, dont le Roi se réservera la direction. S'il est déjà entré en France, il enverra ces deux divisions par terre au travers de la Picardie; s'il est encore en Belgique, il les fera embarquer pour arriver par mer au point où le Prince le requerra.

Peut-être même les circonstances feront-elles trouver au Roi de s'y portre lui-même avec la plus grande partie de son armée et sa maison, pour assurer par sa présence la soumission complète de deux provinces aussi importantes avant d'entrer dans sa capitale.

Lieutenance-Générale du Sud-ouest.

Comme cette lieutenance-générale est la plus importante, et comprend des provinces très importantes par leur population et leur richesse, c'est dans son arrondissement que doivent se former les huit divisions militaires de ligne qui doivent composer son armée : savoir,—1, la division d'Henri IV. ; 2, celle de la Duchesse d'Angoulême ; 3, celle de Guyenne ; 4, celle d'Auvergne ; 5, celle de Royal Roussillon ; 6, Navarre ; 7, Languedoc ; 8, Bourbonnais.

Bordeaux doit être le premier centre de son rassemblement, soit que le parti du Roi y soit renforcé par un secours, ou Portugais ou Espagnol, ou sans secours étranger. Il faut commencer par assurer et fortifier les cantonnemens et les places fortes ou fermées, qu'on occupera le long de la Dordogne et de la Garonne. La gauche de ce premier cantonnement s'étendra de Blaye, sur la rive droite de la Dordogne, par Bourg, St. André, Libourne, Bergerac, centre de cette ligne, d'où elle se repliera par Poudenas, Castries, pour se terminer au bassin d'Arcachon.

C'est dans ce fort cantonnement que l'armée Royale doit se former, s'organiser, se renforcer. On a la fatale expérience de la disgrace qu'a essuyée le Duc d'Angoulême pour avoir trop écouté son héroïque dévouement et sa bonne foi chevaleresque, qui malgré son désastre l'ont couvert de gloire, et ont laissé dans les départemens qu'il a parcourus un sentiment profond d'estime et d'attachement qui est de bon augure pour la seconde expédition qu'il y conduira à la tête d'une armée Royale suffisante pour assurer son succès.

Mais il ne doit sortir de son cantonnement méthodique que lorsque les Alliés auront pénétré par le Nord et l'Est, et occuperont toute l'attention et toutes les forces de Buonaparte, lorsque les Autrichiens seront entrés en Provence, et lorsque les Espagnols auront passé les Pyrénées pour entrer en Roussillon ou en Béarn. Si la diversion Espagnole est retardée, ou manque tout-à-fait, la menace toujours de subsistances sur ces deux provinces inquiétera toujours les rebelles, et les empêchera de se dégarnir sur cette frontière pour venir attaquer les cantonnemens de l'armée du Sud-ouest.

Ce Prince pourra même en ce cas confier la garde de Bordeaux et des places qui le couvrent à deux divisions de troupes de ligne et à la garde nationale de la Guyenne, et déboucher avec les six autres divisions et les compagnies franches, par Bergerac, sur les provinces de l'intérieur, ou par Bazas, sur le Languedoc, en s'appuyant des trois divisions de ligne de l'armée du Sud, qui, n'ayant rien à faire à la rive gauche du Rhône, dès que l'armée Autrichienne d'Italie occupera le Dauphiné et la Provence, se portera à la rive droite pour joindre l'armée du Sud-ouest, où et quand le Duc d'Angoulême en aura absolument besoin. Dans tous les cas ce Prince sera le maître de marcher par les provinces intérieures sur Paris avec une armée de huit ou neuf divisions de troupes de ligne, au moins quarante mille hommes, en se faisant joindre à époques et rendez-vous donnés par l'armée du Sud, ou celle du Nord-ouest.

Lieutenance-Général du Sud.

Son armée consistera dans les quatre divisions de ligne : 1, Berri ; 2, Lyonnais ; 3, Dauphiné ; 4, Provence, et un régiment de quatre bataillons de la marine sans chasseurs et sans cavalerie, destiné à tenir garnison dans Toulon, Marseille, et Antibes, après que le Prince chargé de cette lieutenance-général les aura soumises, à moins qu'il fût appelé ailleurs par un besoin plus pressant, ce qu'il faut éviter avant qu'il ait soumis Toulon et Marseille, dont il est particulièrement chargé.

La formation de ces quatre divisions de ligne doit se faire dans des dépôts en arrière à l'armée Autrichienne d'Italie : son point de rassemblement doit être à Toulon ou Arles, pour se porter sur Marseille et Toulon, dont le siége peut être extrêmement facilité et abrégé si le Prince est renforcé par un corps Autrichien, et surtout s'il est joint par un renfort Anglo-Sicilien, qui peut facilement débarquer à Fréjus ou St. Tropez pour seconder les opérations du Prince. Les quatre bataillons de la marine doivent à la paix passer au département de la Marine.

Si après la réduction de la Provence ce Prince n'est pas immédiatement appelé par le Duc d'Angoulême, il placera deux ou trois divisions de son armée dans les garnisons nécessaires pour assurer la tranquillité des Départements du Sud, et avec le reste de son armée il remontera par la rive gauche de la Saône, pour achever de soumettre dans l'intérieur le peu de rebelles qui pourraient dans leur désespoir vouloir tenter de nouveaux rassemblemens et troubler la paix.

En suivant avec fermeté et méthode ce plan général le Roi se trouvera à la paix avoir formé pendant la guerre même une armée de trente divisions, sans déranger les gardes nationales, qui auront aidé très volontairement cette armée de ligne à anéantir cette armée de brigands qui fait trembler toute la nation. Les plus coupables, surtout les officiers, seront punis par la mort ou la transportation. Les bons soldats, égarés par l'illusion de Buonaparte, le voyant disparaître, ainsi que sa honteuse famille, d'une manière irrévocable, quelque soit le genre de punition que la Providence lui prépare, étant admis chacun dans son arme dans les trente divisions de l'armée Royale, y prendront l'esprit et les sentimens d'un véritable honneur, sans rien perdre de leur énergie. L'armée, qui était le plus grand obstacle à l'autorité du Roi et la marche de la Constitution, deviendra le plus ferme appui du trône et de la loi.

Cette réforme, qui doit précéder toutes les autres, les amenera toutes; et notre excellent Roi sera récompensé de ses soins, de ses sollicitudes, de ses souffrances, par l'amour et la vénération de ses heureux sujets.

DUMOURIEZ.

Napoléon au Maréchal Ney.

MON COUSIN, Charleroi, le 16 Juin, 1815.

Je vous envoie mon aide-de-camp, le Général Flahaut, qui vous porte la présente lettre. Le Major-Général a dû vous donner des ordres; mais vous recevrez les miens plus tôt, parce que c'est de la plus haute importance. Je porte le Maréchal Grouchy avec les troisième et quatrième corps d'infanterie sur Sombref. Je porte ma Garde à Fleurus, et j'y serai en personne avant midi. J'y attaquerai l'ennemi si je le rencontre, et j'éclairerai la route jusqu'à Gembloux. Là, d'après ce qui se passera, je prendrai mon parti, peut-être à 3 heures après midi, peut-être ce soir. Mon intention est que, immédiatement après que j'aurai pris mon parti, vous soyez prêt à marcher sur Bruxelles. Je vous appuyerai avec la Garde, qui sera à Fleurus ou à Sombref, et je désirerais arriver à Bruxelles demain matin. Vous vous mettriez en marche ce soir même si je prends mon parti d'assez bonne heure pour que vous puissiez en être informé de jour et faire ce soir trois ou quatre lieues, et être demain à 7 heures du matin à Bruxelles. Vous pouvez donc disposer vos troupes de la manière suivante :—Première division à deux lieues en avant des Quatre-Chemins, s'il n'y a pas d'inconvénient. Les divisions d'infanterie autour des Quatre-Chemins et une division à Marbais, afin que je puisse l'attirer à moi à Sombref, si j'en avais besoin. Elle ne retarderait d'ailleurs pas votre marche. Le corps du Comte de Valmy, qui a 3000 Cuirassiers d'élite, à l'interception du chemin des Romains et de celui de Bruxelles, afin que je puisse l'attirer à moi si j'en avais besoin. Aussitôt que mon parti sera pris, vous lui enverrez l'ordre de venir vous rejoindre. Je désirerais avoir avec moi la division de la Garde que commande le Général Lefebvre-Desnouettes, et je vous envoie les deux divisions du Comte de Valmy, de manière à le rappeler si j'en avais besoin, et ne point faire faire de fausses marches au Général Lefebvre-Desnouettes, puisqu'il est probable que je me déciderai ce soir à marcher sur Bruxelles avec la Garde. Cependant, couvrez la division Lefebvre par les deux divisions de cavalerie d'Erlon et de Reille, afin de ménager la Garde; s'il y avait quelque échauffourée avec les Anglais, il est préférable que ce soit sur la ligne que sur la Garde. J'ai adopté comme principe général, pendant cette campagne, de diviser mon armée en deux ailes et une réserve. Votre aile sera composée des quatre divisions du premier corps, des quatre divisions du deuxième corps, de deux divisions de cavalerie légère, et de deux divisions du corps de Valmy. Cela ne doit pas être loin de 45,000 à 50,000 hommes.

Le Maréchal Grouchy aura à peu près la même force, et commandera l'aile droite. La Garde formera la réserve, et je me porterai sur l'une ou sur l'autre aile, selon les circonstances. Le Major-Général donnera les ordres les plus précis pour qu'il n'y ait aucune difficulté sur l'obéissance à vos ordres lorsque vous serez détaché. Les commandants de corps devront prendre mes ordres directement quand je me trouve présent. Selon les circonstances, j'affaiblirai l'une ou l'autre aile en augmentant ma réserve. Vous sentez assez l'importance attachée à la prise de Bruxelles. Cela pourra d'ailleurs donner lieu à des accidens, car un mouvement aussi prompt et aussi brusque isolera l'armée Anglaise de Mons, Ostende, etc. Je désire que vos dispositions soient bien faites pour qu'au premier ordre vos huit divisions puissent marcher rapidement et sans obstacles sur Bruxelles.

NAPOLÉON.

Le Duc de Dalmatie à M. le Maréchal Prince de la Moskowa.

MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL, Charleroi, le 16 Juin, 1815.

L'Empereur ordonne que vous mettiez en marche les deuxième et premier corps d'armée, ainsi que le troisième corps de cavalerie, qui a été mis à votre disposition, pour les diriger sur l'interjection des chemins dits les Trois-Bras (route de Bruxelles), où vous leur ferez prendre position, et vous porterez en même temps des reconnaissances, aussi avant que possible, sur la route de Bruxelles et sur Nivelles, d'où probablement l'ennemi s'est retiré.

Sa Majesté désire que, s'il n'y a pas d'inconvénient, vous établissiez une division, avec de la cavalerie, à Genappe, et elle ordonne que vous portiez une autre division du côté de Marbais, pour couvrir l'espace entre Sombref et les Trois-Bras. Vous placerez, près de ces divisions, la division de cavalerie de la Garde Impériale, commandée par le Général Lefebvre-Desnouettes, ainsi que le premier régiment de Hussards, qui a été détaché hier vers Gosselies.

Le corps qui sera à Marbais aura aussi pour objet d'appuyer les mouvements de M. le Maréchal Grouchy sur Sombref, et de vous soutenir à la position des Quatre-Bras, si cela devenait nécessaire. Vous recommanderez au Général qui sera à Marbais de bien s'éclairer sur toutes les directions, particulièrement sur celles de Gembloux et de Wavres.

Si cependant la division du Général Lefebvre-Desnouettes était trop engagée sur la route de Bruxelles, vous la laisseriez et vous la remplaceriez au corps qui sera à Marbais par le troisième corps de cavalerie aux ordres de M. le Comte de Valmy, et par le premier régiment de Hussards.

J'ai l'honneur de vous prévenir que l'Empereur va se porter sur Sombref, où, d'après les ordres de Sa Majesté, M. le Maréchal Grouchy doit se diriger avec les troisième et quatrième corps d'infanterie, et les premier, deuxième, et quatrième corps de cavalerie. M. le Maréchal Grouchy fera occuper Gembloux.

Je vous prie de me mettre de suite à même de rendre compte à l'Empereur de vos dispositions pour exécuter l'ordre que je vous envoie, ainsi que de tout ce que vous aurez appris sur l'ennemi.

Sa Majesté me charge de vous recommander de prescrire aux généraux commandant les corps d'armée de faire réunir leur monde, et rentrer les hommes isolés, de maintenir l'ordre le plus parfait dans la troupe, et de rallier toutes les voitures d'artillerie et les ambulances qui auraient pu se trouver engagées en arrière.

Le Maréchal d'Empire, Major-Général,
DUC DE DALMATIE.

Le Duc de Dalmatie à M. le Maréchal Prince de la Moskowa.

MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL, En avant de Fleurus, le 16 Juin, à 2 heures.

L'Empereur me charge de vous prévenir que l'ennemi a réuni un corps de troupes entre Sombref et Bry, et qu'à deux heures et demie M. le Maréchal Grouchy, avec les troisième et quatrième corps, l'attaquera; l'intention de Sa Majesté est que vous attaquiez aussi ce qui est devant vous, et qu'après l'avoir vigoureusement repoussé, vous rabattiez sur nous pour concourir à envelopper le corps dont je viens de vous parler.

Si ce corps était enfoncé auparavant, alors Sa Majesté ferait manœuvrer dans votre direction, pour hâter également vos opérations.

Instruisez de suite l'Empereur de vos dispositions et de ce qui se passe sur votre front.

Le Maréchal d'Empire, Major-Général,
DUC DE DALMATIE.

Le Major-Général avait écrit au Maréchal Ney en ces termes :—

"En avant de Fleurus, le 16 Juin, 1815,
"M. LE MARÉCHAL, à 3 heures et un quart.

"Je vous ai écrit, il y a une heure, que l'Empereur ferait attaquer l'ennemi à deux heures et demie dans la position qu'il a prise entre le village de

Saint Amand et de Bry. En ce moment l'engagement est très prononcé. Sa Majesté me charge de vous dire que vous devez manœuvrer sur-le-champ de manière à envelopper la droite de l'ennemi, et tomber à bras raccourcis sur ses derrières. Cette armée est perdue si vous agissez vigoureusement. Le sort de la France est entre vos mains. Ainsi, n'hésitez pas un instant pour faire le mouvement que l'Empereur vous ordonne, et dirigez-vous sur les hauteurs de Bry et de Saint Amand, pour concourir à une victoire peut-être décisive. L'ennemi est pris en flagrant délit au moment où il cherche à se réunir aux Anglais.

"Le Major-Général,

"DUC DE DALMATIE."

"Derrière Ligny, le 16 Juin, à 8 heures du soir.

"L'Empereur vient de remporter une victoire complète sur les armées Prussienne et Anglaise, réunies sous les ordres du Duc de Wellington et du Maréchal Blücher. L'armée débouche en ce moment par le village de Ligny, en face de Fleurus, à la poursuite de l'ennemi."

(Signed) DE LACY EVANS.

Rapports de S.A.R. le Prince d'Orange à S.M. le Roi des Pays-Bas.

Quartier-Général de Nivelles, 17 Juin, 1815, à 2 heures du matin.

Le 15, de grand matin, l'armée Prussienne a été attaquée dans sa position. Par suite de cette attaque elle s'est retirée par Charleroi et Gosselies jusque dans les environs de Fleurus. Aussitôt que je fus instruit de la marche de l'ennemi, j'ordonnai les dispositions nécessaires au corps d'armée sous mes ordres. Ce qui s'était passé à l'armée Prussienne fut cause que le 15, à 5 heures du soir, le bataillon d'Orange Nassau, qui occupait le village de Frasne avec une batterie d'artillerie volante, y fut attaqué. Ces troupes restèrent dans leur position sur les hauteurs de ce village, non loin du chemin croisé des Quatre Bras. A 8 heures l'escarmouche cessa sur ce point.

Aussitôt que je reçus le rapport de cette action, je donnai ordre à la 3e division, ainsi qu'à la cavalerie, et à 2 divisions Anglaises, de marcher sur

Nivelles. Je chargeai la 2e division de conserver la position de Quatre Bras. Il n'y eut qu'une partie de la 2e division qui put s'y rendre sur le champ, la brigade commandée par le Général-Major Van Byland ne pouvant s'éloigner de Nivelles que lorsqu'on se fut assuré de l'arrivée des autres divisions dans cette ville.

Le feu des tirailleurs commença sur ce point hier à 5 heures du matin, et la fusillade continua des deux côtés jusqu'à midi, sans aucun résultat. Environ sur les 2 heures l'attaque devint plus sérieuse, principalement de la part de la cavalerie et de l'artillerie. La brigade de cavalerie légère, sous les ordres du Général-Major Van Merle, ne pouvant arriver que vers 4 heures, je n'eus jusqu'à ce moment aucune cavalerie à opposer à l'ennemi. Convaincu de la haute importance dont était la conservation de la position sur les hauteurs devant le carrefour de la chaussée dite les Quatre Bras, j'eus le bonheur de m'y maintenir contre un ennemi qui était, sous tous les rapports, et sans aucune comparaison, très supérieur en nombre.

Ayant été attaqué par les deux corps d'armée des Généraux d'Erlon et Reille, et ayant réussi à les tenir en échec, le Duc de Wellington eut assez de temps pour réunir une force suffisante pour déjouer les projets de l'ennemi. Cette attaque a eu pour résultat, après un combat vigoureux, qui dura jusqu'à 9 heures du soir, non seulement l'avantage d'arrêter l'ennemi, mais encore celui de le repousser jusqu'à une certaine distance.

L'armée Prussienne, qui fut également attaquée hier, a conservée sa principale position ; et il est hors de doute que Napoléon, avec des forces considérables, n'ait dirigé l'attaque sur toute la ligne. Nos troupes ont bivaqué sur le champ de bataille, où je vais me rendre de suite ; car il est très apparent que Napoléon cherchera de nouveau à exécuter les desseins qu'il avait formés hier. Le Duc de Wellington a fait rassembler sur ce point toutes les troupes disponibles. C'est avec la plus grande satisfaction que je puis assurer V.M. que ses troupes ont combattu avec beaucoup de bravoure, particulièrement l'infanterie et l'artillerie.

Les circonstances n'ont point encore permis que l'état des différens corps qui constate les pertes que nous avons éprouvées me soit parvenu. J'aurai l'honneur de le mettre sous les yeux de V.M. aussitôt qu'il sera possible.

GUILLAUME, PRINCE D'ORANGE.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 17th June, 1815.

I forward by this opportunity several extracts of letters brought me by a courier from Switzerland.

I likewise add a copy of a despatch which accompanied the full powers authorising me to sign the convention with the ministers of Louis XVIII. for the purpose of ensuring the supply of the armies. Nothing material was known at Ghent last night.

4000 national guards, of the department of the Aube, have entered Dunkirk, and a force of the same description has been sent to Calais.

Faithfully yours,

CHARLES STUART.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Zurich, 31st May, 1815.

The negotiation respecting the Swiss regiments is but little advanced.

The result of the conference of the 29th far from satisfactory: an application to the Cantonal governments declared to be indispensable. The Presidents gave as a reason that the regiments demanded by Louis were indispensable to Switzerland. Letters, however, are to be sent to head-quarters to-night, and the Diet may then recommend the restoration of the regiments.

A month will be required to raise 3000 men: 6000 are beyond all expectation.

II.

Viscount Castlereagh to Sir Charles Stuart.

SIR, Foreign Office, 14th June, 1815.

In order that no misconception may exist on so important a point, I am to acquaint you that the British government will consider it necessary, on exchanging the ratifications of any convention of the nature referred to in your despatch (No. 93), to declare that nothing therein contained is to be considered as altering or invalidating the declaration with which the ratification of the treaty signed at Vienna on the 25th of March was accompanied.

They also will feel it incumbent on them, unless Louis XVIII. shall have previously entered into an express stipulation, or authorised an official assurance to be given conformable to the spirit of the instructions forwarded to your Excellency in my despatch (No. 9) on the subject of the slave-trade, further to declare that the said convention, recognising the King's authority in the provinces recovered by the Allied arms, is ratified in the full assurance and confidence that His Majesty's authority, when restored to the throne, will not be exercised in such a manner as shall again suffer a trade in slaves to be carried on by the subjects or in the possessions of France.

I am, &c.,

CASTLEREAGH.

P.S. You will also use your influence with the ministers of the other Powers to induce them to give in a simultaneous declaration to the same effect.

The Emperor of Russia to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Heidelberg, le 5 (17) Juin, 1815.

Le Ministère Anglois, en me fesant annoncer son consentement à fournir à la Russie un subside additionnel proportionné à ses efforts, m'a témoigné le désir, Monsieur le Duc, qu'un corps tiré de mes réserves fut réuni à votre armée. Cette destination est trop conforme à mes vœux pour que je n'aie cru devoir acquiescer sur-le-champ à l'arrangement proposé par votre gouvernement. Il sera honorable pour mes troupes de servir sous vos ordres, et de combattre à côté de ces mêmes soldats Anglois qui ont acquis une gloire immortelle en Espagne.

Je vous envoye, Monsieur le Duc, l'état de ce corps, qui est commandé par le Prince Eugène de Wurtemberg, l'un des généraux les plus distingués de mon armée. Je ne doute pas que lui et sa troupe ne rivalisent d'efforts et de valeur pour mériter votre suffrage.

Recevez en l'assurance ainsi que celle de tout mon estime.

ALEXANDRE.

To Lady Frances W. Webster.

[888.

Waterloo, Sunday morning, 3 o'clock,
18th June, 1815.

MY DEAR LADY FRANCES,

As I am sending a messenger to Bruxelles, I write to you one line to tell you that I think you ought to make your preparations, as should Lord Mountnorris, to remove from Bruxelles to Antwerp in case such a measure should be necessary.

We fought a desperate battle on Friday, in which I was successful, though I had but very few troops. The Prussians were very roughly handled, and retired in the night, which obliged me to do the same to this place yesterday. The course of the operations may oblige me to uncover Bruxelles for a moment, and may expose that town to the enemy; for which reason I recommend that you and your family should be prepared to move to Antwerp at a moment's notice.

I will give you the earliest intimation of any danger that may come to my knowledge: at present I know of none.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

Present my best compliments to Lord and Lady Mountnorris.

Le Duc de Dalmatie à M. le Maréchal Prince de la Moskowa.

Au Quartier-Général Impérial, 18 Juin, 1815.

L'Empereur ordonne que l'armée soit disposée à attaquer l'ennemi à neuf heures du matin. MM. les commandans des corps d'armée rallieront leurs troupes; feront mettre les armes en état, et permettront que les soldats fassent la soupe; ils feront aussi manger les soldats, afin qu'à neuf heures précises chacun soit prêt et puisse être en bataille avec son artillerie et ambulances, à la position de bataille que l'Empereur a indiquée par son ordre d'hier soir.

MM. les Lieutenants-Généraux commandant les corps d'armées d'infanterie et de cavalerie enverront sur-le-champ des officiers au Major-Général, pour faire connaître leur position et porter des ordres.

Le Maréchal d'Empire, Major-Général,

DUC DE DALMATIE.

Rapport des Opérations de l'Armée Prussienne du Bas-Rhin.

C'est le 15 de ce mois que Napoléon, après avoir réuni, le 14, 5 corps de son armée et plusieurs corps de sa Garde entre Maubeuge et Beaumont, a commencé les hostilités. Les points de concentration des 4 corps Prussiens étaient Fleurus, Namur, Ciney, et Hannut, ce qui permettait d'unir l'armée sur l'un de ces points en 24 heures.

Le 15, Napoléon s'avança par Thuin sur les deux rives de la Sambre contre Charleroi. Le Général Zieten avait réuni le 1er corps près Fleurus, et eut ce jour une action très vive avec l'ennemi, qui, après avoir pris Charleroi, marchait sur Fleurus. Le Général Zieten se maintint dans sa position près cette ville.

Le Feld Maréchal Blücher ayant l'intention de donner une grande bataille à l'ennemi aussitôt qu'il lui serait possible, dirigea les trois autres corps de l'armée Prussienne sur Sombref, à une lieue et demie de Fleurus. Les 2e et 3e corps sont arrivés le 15; le 4e corps n'y parvint que le 16.

Lord Wellington rassembla son armée entre Ath et Nivelles, ce qui le mettait en état d'appuyer le Feld Maréchal Blücher, dans le cas où la bataille aurait lieu le 15.

Bataille de Ligny.

Le 16 Juin.

L'armée Prussienne était postée sur les hauteurs entre Bry et Sombref; et autour de cette dernière place elle occupait en grande force les villages de Saint Amand et Ligny, situés sur son front. A ce moment il n'y avait encore que 3 corps de l'armee réunis. Le 4e, qui était stationné entre Liège et Hannut, avait été retardé dans sa marche par plusieurs circonstances, et n'avait pu rejoindre. Néanmoins, le Feld Maréchal Blücher résolut de donner bataille, Lord Wellington ayant déjà mis en mouvement, pour le soutenir, une forte colonne de son armée, ainsi que toute sa réserve stationnée dans les environs de Bruxelles, et le 4e corps Prussien étant sur le point d'arriver.

La bataille commença à 3 heures après midi. L'ennemi déploya 130,000 hommes. L'armée Prussienne était forte de 80,000 hommes. Le village de Saint Amand fut le point qu'attaqua d'abord l'ennemi, qui s'en empara après une vigoureuse résistance. Il dirigea ensuite tous ses efforts contre Ligny. C'est un grand village, solidement bâti, et situé sur un ruisseau du même nom. Là commença un combat qui peut être considéré comme un des plus acharnés dont l'histoire fasse mention. Des villages ont été pris et repris plusieurs fois; mais là, la bataille se donna pendant 5 heures dans le village même, et les mouvemens au dessus et au dessous eurent lieu sur un très petit espace de terrain.

De chaque côté des troupes fraîches arrivaient continuellement. Chaque armée avait, derrière la partie du village qu'elle occupait, de grandes masses d'infanterie qui entretenaient le combat, et étaient continuellement renouvelées par des renforts qu'elles recevaient de leurs derrières et des hauteurs de droite et de gauche. Environ 200 bouches à feu tiraient de chaque côté sur le village, où le feu se manifesta plusieurs fois en différens endroits. De temps en temps l'engagement s'étendait à toute la ligne, l'ennemi ayant engagé des troupes avec le 3e corps, mais le fort du combat avait toujours lieu à Ligny. Les affaires semblaient prendre une tournure favorable pour les troupes Prussiennes, une partie du village de Saint Amand ayant été reprise par un bataillon que commandait le Feld Maréchal en personne, avantage qui avait permis de reprendre la hauteur abandonnée après la perte de Saint Amand. Cependant le combat continuait à Ligny avec la même furie. L'issue semblait dépendre de l'arrivée des troupes Anglaises ou de celles du 4e corps Prussien. En effet, l'arrivée de cette division aurait donné au Feld Maréchal les moyens de faire immédiatement avec son aile droite une attaque dont on devait attendre un grand succès. Mais on apprit que la division Anglaise destinée à nous appuyer était violemment attaquée par un corps de l'armée Française, et qu'elle ne se maintenait qu'avec une extrême difficulté dans sa position à Quatre Bras. Le 4e corps Prussien n'avait pas paru ; en sorte que nous fûmes forcés de soutenir seuls l'engagement avec un ennemi très supérieur en nombre.

La soirée était déjà très avancée, que le combat continuait à Ligny avec la même fureur, et des succès également balancés. Nous demandâmes, mais en vain, les secours qui nous étaient nécessaires. Le danger devenait d'heure en heure plus urgent ; toutes les divisions étaient engagées ou l'avaient été, et il n'y avait aucun corps qui pût nous appuyer. Tout à coup une division d'infanterie ennemie, qui, à la faveur de la nuit, avait tourné le village sans être remarquée, et quelques régimens de Cuirassiers, qui avaient forcé le passage sur l'autre côté, prirent à revers le corps principal de nos troupes, qui était posté derrière les maisons. Cette surprise de la part de l'ennemi fut décisive, spécialement au moment où notre cavalerie, postée aussi derrière les maisons, avait été repoussée par celle de l'ennemi dans plusieurs attaques répétées.

Notre infanterie, qui était derrière Ligny, ne se laissa pas décourager quoiqu'elle fût surprise dans les ténèbres, circonstance qui accroît l'idée du danger dans l'esprit des hommes, et quoiqu'elle eût l'idée qu'elle était entourée de tous côtés. Elle se forma en masse, repoussa chaudement toutes les attaques de la cavalerie, et se retira en bon ordre sur les hauteurs, d'où elle continua son mouvement rétrograde sur Tilly. L'irruption subite de la cavalerie ennemie obligeant notre artillerie à se retirer précipitamment, plusieurs pièces prirent des directions qui les conduisirent à des défilés, où il y eut du désordre, et 15 tombèrent entre les mains de l'ennemi.

L'armée se reforma à la distance d'un quart de lieue du champ de bataille. L'ennemi ne se hasarda point à la poursuivre. Le village de Bry resta en notre pouvoir pendant toute la nuit, aussi bien que Sombref, où le Général Thielmann avait combattu avec le 3e corps, et où il s'était retiré lentement à la chute du jour par Gembloux. Le 4e corps, commandé par le Général Bülow, y arriva enfin pendant la nuit. Le 1er et le 2e corps se mirent en marche le matin, derrière le défilé de Mont Saint Guibert. Notre perte en tués et blessés a été grande ; mais l'ennemi ne nous fit point d'autres prisonniers que les blessés.

La bataille a été perdue, mais non notre honneur. Nos soldats ont combattu avec une bravoure qui a surpassé tout ce qu'on pouvait attendre. Leur courage demeura inébranlable, parce que chacun mit sa confiance dans sa propre force. Le Feld Maréchal courut dans la journée de grands dangers. Une charge de cavalerie qu'il conduisait ne réussit point, et la cavalerie ennemie le poursuivait vigoureusement. Son cheval ayant été frappé d'un coup de mousquet, l'animal, au lieu de s'arrêter, irrité de sa blessure, se mit au galop, et courut en furieux jusqu'à ce qu'il tombât mort. Le Feld Maréchal, étourdi de la chute, resta engagé sous le corps de son cheval. Les Cuirassiers ennemis, poursuivant leur avantage, avançaient; notre dernier cavalier avait déjà passé le Feld Maréchal, et il ne restait avec lui qu'un adjudant qui venait de mettre pied à terre, résolu de partager son sort. Le danger était grand, mais la Providence veillait sur nous. L'ennemi, continuant sa charge, passa rapidement près du Feld Maréchal sans le voir. Un moment après une seconde charge de cavalerie repoussa l'ennemi, qui passa avec la même rapidité, sans remarquer davantage le Feld Maréchal que la première fois. Mais ce ne fut pas sans difficulté qu'on le retira de dessous son cheval mort. Il s'éloigna sur le cheval d'un dragon.

Le 17, dans la soirée, l'armée Prussienne se concentra dans les environs de Wavres. Napoléon se mit en mouvement contre Wellington sur la grande route de Charleroi à Bruxelles. Une division Anglaise soutint, le même jour, un combat très vif près de Quatre Bras. Lord Wellington prit position sur la route qui conduit à Bruxelles, ayant son aile droite dans la bruyère de la Leu, son centre près de Mont Saint Jean, et son aile gauche appuyée à la Haye Sainte. Lord Wellington écrivit au Feld Maréchal qu'il était résolu à accepter bataille dans cette position, si le Feld Maréchal pouvait l'appuyer avec deux corps d'armée. Celui-ci offrit de faire marcher toute son armée, et proposa même, dans le cas où Napoléon n'attaquerait pas, que les Alliés allassent l'attaquer le lendemain avec toutes leurs forces. Cela peut servir à prouver combien peu la bataille du 16 avait désorganisé l'armée Prussienne, ou abattu son moral.

Ainsi fut terminée la journée du 17.

Au point du jour l'armée Prussienne commença à se mettre en mouvement. Le 4e et le 2e corps marchèrent par Saint Lambert, où ils devaient prendre une position couverte par le forêt de Frischermont, afin de prendre l'ennemi sur les derrières, quand le moment paraîtrait favorable. Le 1er corps devait agir par Ohain, sur le flanc droit de l'ennemi. Le 3e corps devait suivre lentement, pour porter des secours en cas de besoin. La bataille commença vers 10 heures du matin. L'armée Anglaise occupait les hauteurs de Mont Saint Jean; celle des Français était sur les hauteurs devant Planchenoit. La première était de 80,000 hommes, l'ennemi en avait plus de 130,000. En peu de temps la bataille devint générale tout le long de la ligne. Il paraît que Napoléon avait le dessein de pousser l'aile gauche sur le centre, et par là d'effectuer la séparation de l'armée Anglaise de celle de Prusse, qu'il croyait devoir se retirer sur Maestricht. Dans ce dessein, il avait placé la plus grande partie de sa réserve dans le centre, contre son aile droite; et c'est sur ce point qu'il attaqua avec fureur. L'armée Anglaise combattit avec un courage qu'il est impossible de surpasser. Les charges répétées de la Vieille Garde furent repoussées par l'intrépidité des régimens Ecossais; et à chaque charge la cavalerie Française était renversée par la cavalerie Anglaise; mais la supériorité en nombre de l'ennemi était trop grande. Napoléon ramenait continuellement des masses considérables; et quelque fermeté que les troupes Anglaises misent pour se maintenir dans leurs positions, il n'était pas possible que tant d'efforts héroïques n'eussent un terme.

Il était 4 heures et demie. La difficulté extrême du passage par le défilé de Saint Lambert avait considérablement retardé la marche des troupes Prussiennes ; de sorte qu'il n'y avait que 2 brigades du 4e corps qui fussent arrivées à la position couverte qui leur avait été assignée. Le moment décisif était arrivé ; il n'y avait pas un instant à perdre, les Généraux ne le laissèrent pas échapper. Ils résolurent de commencer l'attaque sur le champ avec les troupes qu'ils avaient sous la main. En conséquence le Général Bülow, avec 2 brigades et un corps de cavalerie, s'avança rapidement sur le derrière de l'aile droite de l'ennemi. L'ennemi ne perdit pas sa présence d'esprit ; il tourna dans l'instant sa réserve contre nous, et de ce côté commença un combat meurtrier. Le succès de ce combat demeura longtemps douteux, pendant que la bataille avec l'armée Anglaise continuait avec la même violence.

Vers les 6 heures du soir nous reçûmes la nouvelle que le Général Thielmann, avec le 3e corps, était attaqué près de Wavres par un corps très considérable de l'ennemi, et que déjà l'on se disputait la possession de la ville. Le Feld Maréchal, cependant, ne fut pas beaucoup inquiet de cette nouvelle. C'était sur le lieu où il était, et non pas ailleurs, que l'affaire devait se décider. On ne pouvait obtenir la victoire que par un combat soutenu continuellement avec la même opiniâtreté, et par de nouvelles troupes ; et si on pouvait l'emporter sur le lieu où l'on était, tout revers du côté de Wavres était de peu de conséquence. C'est pourquoi les colonnes continuèrent leur mouvement. Il était 7 heures et demie, et l'issue de la bataille était encore incertaine. Tout le 4e corps, et une partie du 2e, sous le Général Pirch, avaient été successivement engagés. Les troupes Françaises combattaient avec toute la fureur du désespoir. Cependant, on pouvait apercevoir quelqu'incertitude dans leurs mouvemens, et on observa que quelques pièces de canon se retiraient. Dans ce moment les premières colonnes du corps du Général Zieten arrivèrent sur les points d'attaque, près du village de Smouhen, sur le flanc gauche d'ennemi. Elles chargèrent sur le champ. Ce moment décida la défaite de l'ennemi. Son aile droite fut rompue en trois endroits, et il abandonna ses positions. Nos troupes se précipitèrent alors au pas de charge, et attaquèrent l'ennemi de tous les côtés, pendant que toute la ligne Anglaise s'avançait.

Les circonstances étaient extrêmement favorables à l'attaque par l'armée Prussienne ; le terrain s'élevait en amphithéâtre, de manière que notre artillerie pouvait ouvrir librement son feu du sommet de plusieurs hauteurs qui s'élevaient graduellement l'une au dessus de l'autre, et entre lesquelles les troupes descendues dans les plaines se formaient en brigades, et dans le plus grand ordre, tandis que de nouvelles troupes se développaient continuellement au sortir de la forêt, sur les hauteurs de derrière. L'ennemi, cependant, conservait encore des moyens de retraite jusqu'à ce qu'on eût emporté, après plusieurs attaques sanglantes, le village de Planchenoit, qui était sur ses derrières, défendu par la Garde. Dès ce moment là la retraite devint une déroute, qui s'étendit bientôt à toute l'armée Française.

Il était 9 heures et demie. Le Feld Maréchal assembla tous les officiers supérieurs, et donna ordre d'envoyer à la poursuite de l'ennemi jusqu'au dernier cavalier. L'avant-garde de l'armée accéléra sa marche. L'armée Française, poursuivie sans relâche, était entièrement désorganisée. La chaussée présentait l'image d'une immense quantité de canons, de caissons, de chariots, de bagages, d'armes, et de débris de toute espèce. Ceux de l'ennemi qui voulaient se reposer, ne s'attendant pas à être poursuivis si vivement, furent poussés successivement de plus de neuf bivouacs. Dans quelques villages ils cherchèrent à tenir; mais aussitôt qu'ils entendaient le son du tambour ou des trompettes, ils lâchaient pied, ou se jetaient dans les maisons, et là ils étaient taillés en pièces ou faits prisonniers. Le clair de lune favorisait beaucoup la poursuite de l'ennemi, qui n'était qu'une chasse continuelle, soit dans les champs, soit dans les maisons.

L'ennemi s'était retranché à Genappe, avec du canon et des chariots renversés. Nous fûmes exposés en y entrant à un feu très vif de mousqueterie, auquel nous répondîmes par quelques coups de canon suivis d'un houra, et bientôt après la ville fut à nous. Ce fut là qu'entre autres équipages on prit la voiture de Napoléon. Il venait de la quitter pour monter à cheval, et avec tant de précipitation qu'il y avait oublié son épée et son chapeau. Les affaires continuèrent ainsi jusqu'à la pointe du jour. Environ 40,000 hommes dans le plus grand désordre furent tout ce que l'ennemi put sauver dans sa retraite par Charleroi. Vingt-sept pièces de canon furent tout ce qu'il emmena de sa nombreuse artillerie.

L'ennemi a dépassé dans sa fuite ses places fortes, seule défense de ses frontières, qui maintenant sont franchies par nos armées.

A 3 heures Napoléon avait expédié du champ de bataille un courrier pour Paris, portant la nouvelle que la victoire n'était plus douteuse; quelques heures après il n'avait plus d'armée. On n'a pas encore une exacte connaissance de la perte de l'ennemi: il suffit de savoir que les deux tiers de cette armée sont tués, blessés, ou prisonniers; au nombre de ces derniers sont les Généraux Mouton, Duhesme, Cambronne. Jusqu'à ce moment, environ 300 canons, et au delà de 500 caissons, sont en notre pouvoir.

Peu de victoires ont été aussi complètes; et certainement il n'y a point d'exemple qu'une armée, deux jours après une bataille perdue, ait engagé un tel combat, et l'ait si glorieusement soutenu. Honneur aux troupes capables de tant de constance et de valeur! Au milieu de la position occupée par l'armée Française, et absolument sur la hauteur, est située une ferme nommée la Belle Alliance. La marche de toutes les colonnes Prussiennes était dirigée sur cette ferme, qu'on pouvait apercevoir de tous côtés. C'est là que Napoléon se trouvait pendant la bataille; c'est là qu'il donnait ses ordres, qu'il se flattait de la victoire, et c'est là que sa perte fut décidée. C'est là aussi que se rencontrèrent, dans l'obscurité, et par un heureux hasard, le Feld Maréchal Blücher et Lord Wellington, et qu'ils se saluèrent mutuellement comme vainqueurs.

En commémoration de l'alliance qui existe aujourd'hui entre les nations Anglaise et Prussienne, de la réunion des deux armées, et de leur confiance réciproque, le Feld Maréchal a demandé que cette bataille portât le nom de la Belle Alliance.

Par ordre du Feld Maréchal Blücher,

LE GÉNÉRAL GNEISENAU.

[The following documents, relating specially to the Battle of Waterloo, are taken out of their chronological order to give a connected view of the transactions to which they refer.]

Cambrai, 13th April, 1816. [889.]

The Duke of Wellington presents his compliments to Sir John Sinclair, and is much obliged to him for the account of the defence of Hougoumont. The battle of Waterloo is undoubtedly one of the most interesting events of modern times, but the Duke entertains no hopes of ever seeing an account of all its details which shall be true. The detail even of the defence of Hougoumont is not exactly true; and the Duke begs leave to suggest to Sir John Sinclair that the publication of details of this kind which are not exact cannot be attended with any utility.

WELLINGTON.

To Sir J. Sinclair, Bart. [890.]

SIR, Bruxelles, 28th April, 1816.

I have received your letter of the 20th. The people of England may be entitled to a detailed and accurate account of the battle of Waterloo, and I have no objection to their having it; but I do object to their being misinformed and misled by those novels called "Relations," "Impartial Accounts," &c. &c., of that transaction, containing the stories which curious travellers have picked up from peasants, private soldiers, individual officers, &c. &c, and have published to the world as the truth. Hougoumont was no more fortified than La Haye Sainte; and the latter was not lost for want of fortifications, but by one of those accidents from which human affairs are never entirely exempt.

I am really disgusted with and ashamed of all that I have seen of the battle of Waterloo. The number of writings upon it would lead the world to suppose that the British army had never fought a battle before; and there is not one which contains a true representation, or even an idea, of the transaction; and this is because the writers have referred as above quoted instead of to the official sources and reports.

It is not true that the British army was unprepared. The story of the Greek is equally unfounded as that of Vandamme having 46,000 men, upon which last point I refer you to Marshal Ney's report, who upon that point must be the best authority.

I have, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

[891.]

To W. Mudford, Esq.

SIR, Cambrai, 2nd May, 1816.

Upon my return here on the 29th April I received your letter of the 13th April, and the first part of the work which you propose to dedicate to me, and I beg leave to make you my best acknowledgments for this intention. I have long, however, felt myself under the necessity of declining to give my consent that any work should be dedicated to me, with the contents of which I am not previously acquainted; and you will readily believe that I feel this necessity in a stronger degree in regard to a history of the battle of Waterloo than I should do upon any other subject. More accounts have been published of that transaction than of any other that for many years has attracted the public attention; and those who have written them have thought they possessed all the necessary information for the purpose when they have conversed with a peasant of the country, or with an officer or soldier engaged in the battle. Such accounts cannot be true; and I advert to them only to warn you against considering them as any guide to the work which you are about to publish.

I have, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

[892.]

To W. Mudford, Esq.

SIR, Paris, 8th June, 1816.

I have received your letter of the 21st May. I have already explained to you my reasons for declining to give a formal permission that any work with the contents of which I should not be acquainted should be dedicated to me, with which you appear to be satisfied; and I applied those reasons particularly to a work on the battle of Waterloo, because that notwithstanding so much had been published on that event by so many people, there was but little truth. You now desire that I should point out to you where you could receive information on this event, on the truth of which you could rely. In answer to this desire, I can refer you only to my own despatches published in the "London Gazette." General Alava's report is the nearest to the truth of the other official reports published, but even that report contains some statements not exactly correct. The others that I have seen cannot be relied upon. To some of these may be attributed the source of the falsehoods since circulated through the medium of the unofficial publications with which the press has abounded. Of these a remarkable instance is to be found in the report of a meeting between Marshal Blücher and me at La Belle Alliance; and some have gone so far as to have seen the chair on which I sat down in that farm-house. It happens that the meeting took place after ten at night, at the village of Genappe; and any body who attempts to describe with truth the operations of the different armies will see that it could not be otherwise. The other part is not so material; but, in truth, I was not off my horse till I returned to Waterloo between eleven and twelve at night.

I have, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

GENERAL MÜFFLING ON QUATRE BRAS.

"On the 15th June, when General Zieten was attacked, he sent an officer to me, who reached Bruxelles at 3 P.M. The Duke, to whom I communicated immediately my intelligence, had received no report from his outposts at Mons. I put to him the question, 'Whether he would assemble his army, and where? as Marshal Blücher would certainly concentrate at Ligny, or had already done so.' The Duke answered me, 'If all is as General Zieten supposes, I shall concentrate on my left wing the Prince of Orange, and shall so be à portée to fight in co-operation with the Prussian army. If, however, a portion of the enemy should advance by Mons, I must then concentrate more to my centre. For this reason I must wait for my advices from Mons before I fix on my rendezvous. Nevertheless, as the breaking up from cantonments is certain, and only the point of assembly doubtful, I shall order all to be in readiness, and shall move the Brunswick corps, now in reserve, and a light cavalry brigade, to Quatre Bras forthwith.'

"The orders for this were issued between 6 and 7 P.M.

"A second report reached me later from Charleroi viâ Namur. General Blücher informed me in this of his concentration at Sombref, and desired me to inform him of the concentration of the English army.

"I reported this to the Duke, who quite approved of General Blücher's course. He could not, however, decide to fix his own concentration before receiving his accounts from Mons. He promised me instant intelligence on receipt, and kept his aides-de-camp and secretary at his office. I went to my quarters towards 10, drew up my report, leaving a place for the name of the rendezvous, and kept a courier's carriage ready at my door.

"Towards midnight the Duke called and told me, 'I have a report from General Dörnberg at Mons that Napoleon has moved on Charleroi with all his force, and that he, General Dörnberg, has nothing in his front. I have therefore sent orders for the concentration of my people on Nivelles and Quatre Bras.

"'The numerous friends of Napoleon here will be on tiptoe; the well-intentioned must be pacified: let us therefore go to the Duchess of Richmond's ball, and start for Quatre Bras at 5 A.M.'

"We did accordingly. We reached Quatre Bras towards 11 of the 16th, where the enemy had placed his outposts in front of General Perponcher's division. As the enemy kept very quiet, and we had accounts of the assemblage of the Prussian army at Ligny, we thought it best to ride there for a personal interview with Marshal Blücher. The Duke said to me on the way, 'If, as it now seems, the force of the enemy at Frasne is trifling, and only intended to mask the English army, I shall be able to apply my whole force to the assistance of your people, and shall willingly do so.' I was thoroughly convinced of the Duke's full determination in this matter; but I knew Gneisenau's mistrust of the Duke, and was uneasy for the possible effect of this on our conference.

"In my position as intermediary I had to assist in the discussion of all joint operations of the two armies. They all fell of themselves under the two heads of an offensive, i. e. a march on Paris, and a defensive, the defence of the Netherlands. For the offensive it had been laid down in writing that the English army should move on the line of Antwerp by Bruxelles and Mons; the Prussian from Liège, Huy, and Namur, to Marchiennes on the Sambre, and thence by parallel roads to the advance of the English. Provision was made at Antwerp and Wesel for the siege of two fortresses, one by each army. The month of July was fixed upon as the time for the advance. If Napoleon should not be able to take the offensive before July, it was to be expected that the two Allied armies would considerably exceed him in numerical strength, or else that the army opposed to them would be in great measure composed of raw and bad materials.

"An attack by the valley of the Meuse was not to be apprehended. The unfertile extent of forest, the want of communications, and the waste of time required for an operation in this country, left Napoleon no choice. He was compelled to make the rich plains of Belgium his theatre, and the issue turned upon whether he could bring each of the Allied armies separately to action.

"To avoid this, and to bring about the union of the two armies for a defensive action, to be converted into an offensive, was palpably the main object to be sought.

"If the English army were placed near Gosselies with their line of retreat open by Bruxelles and Antwerp, the Prussian near Ligny, with the Roman road to the Meuse behind them for communication and retreat, they would be rendered unassailable in their front by the Sambre. North of the chaussée from Sombref to Quatre Bras, and therefore in rear of this place of assembly, runs the Dyle, through a country for some leagues, as far as Wavre, impracticable for masses and artillery, adding strength therefore to the strategic advantages of the position. These circumstances indicated the two points of assemblage, between Sombref and Charleroi for Prussia, between Gosselies and Marchiennes for England in the last instance.

"The principal road from Paris to Bruxelles runs through Mons. It was necessary therefore so to dispose the cantonments of the English army as to enable it to concentrate between Bruxelles and Mons, with a facility for uniting by its left with the Prussian. The Duke had therefore placed light cavalry on the frontier near Mons, his corps de bataille half-way to Bruxelles, his reserve in Bruxelles itself and the neighbourhood. The head-quarters were at the seat of government, the capital. The Duke has been accused of a defective arrangement of his cantonments. This accusation is destitute of all foundation.

"The Duke found Marshal Blücher at the windmill of Bry. His army had just marched into its positions, and officers were observing the advance of Napoleon from the Tombe de Ligny.

"On our return to Quatre Bras we found Marshal Ney in full attack, directed on the farm of Germioncourt. He developed, with his two corps, such a superiority of force, that it was clear that without some extraordinary occurrence Quatre Bras could not be maintained. The occupation, however, by the enemy of the buildings at the cross-roads would have cut off our communication not only with the Prussians, but with the gross of the English army now on its march from Braine le Comte, while the reserve was approaching from Genappe. Perponcher would have then had no line of retreat but on the reserve. The Duke endeavoured to impose on the enemy, and succeeded in gaining time enough to allow Picton to arrive.

"The Duke was still meanwhile only half as strong as Ney, and could for the moment expect no further support than that of the Brunswick corps, some 8000 strong.

"The Duke at this critical moment took a resolution worthy of a great commander. He attacked the village of Pernimont, which had been carried by the enemy, with his left wing, and advanced with his whole force at hand against Ney.

"The latter, with his right on Pernimont, his centre at Frasne, and his left on the wood, was pressing forward in three deep and close-packed columns, tambours battans.

"The weakness of the English force was concealed by the high corn. Two 9-pounder batteries played heavily on his right wing. Its disorder produced a pause, reinforcements came up on both sides, and complete victory remained with the Duke.

"My first despatch to Bry could leave no doubt on General Blücher's mind that we could not come to his aid there, but that we could assist him by giving employment to 30,000 of the enemy, just the number by which he exceeded the Prussian army. I continued to send accounts of all that passed, both written and personally, by my aides-de-camp.

"Towards dusk it was reported to me in the Duke's presence that a Prussian officer had been on his way to us on the Sombref chaussée just as a detachment of French infantry was outflanking our position. The officer, it was said, had been shot from his horse, had been found by some Nassau soldiers, and told them he had a message for me. This transaction was somewhat confused, and never cleared up; and I only mention it because I found reason later to believe that he had been charged to communicate General Blücher's retreat, of which I knew nothing.

"No report reached me during the night. I inferred that the enemy had made the chaussée insecure. At daybreak I desired my staff to endeavour to communicate with the Prussians by a side road.

"The question was whether General Blücher could assume the offensive, which the Duke, having all his people together, was in condition to do.

"The Quartermaster-General * of the English had ridden out on the same errand as my aides-de-camp, and returned with the account that the Prussians had retired from the field of battle. This was beyond doubt, as Colonel De Lancey had spoken with General Zieten. The Duke and myself were both surprised at this intelligence. The Duke looked at me as if to ask whether I had known this, and for some reason suppressed it. When, however, I naturally exclaimed 'This must have been the message of the officer who was shot,' he returned at once to his usual manner, and discussed with me what was to be done.

"We knew only that Blücher had retired on Wavre, that Bülow had not been engaged, and that Napoleon had not pursued. I argued that the affair could not be so bad; that the Duke must retire to some point on a level with Wavre, and guide his further measures by his reports of Blücher's condition. This was the Duke's view. He had selected the position of Mont St. Jean. The question arose whether we should move instantly, or give the people time to cook. The Duke wished the latter, but apprehended the being involved in hot affairs of rear-guard. I could not share in this anxiety. The enemy had only reached his bivouac late in the evening of the 16th, and in such cases in Germany he had always cooked in the morning, and not moved before 10 o'clock. The English cavalry must at all events feed, and might then with the horse artillery form the rear-guard, for which the ground was favourable. The Duke ordered the troops to cook, at the risk of a rear-guard action. At 9 o'clock, as I was sitting on the ground by the Duke, an officer arrived from Wavre with oral messages. I knew that this officer could speak French. I made a sign to him to address his report to the Duke as well as me. The Duke put several questions, which were answered with intelligence and to his satisfaction, and induced him to declare to me that he was determined to accept a battle at Mont St. Jean."

MEMORANDUM UPON THE PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO, WRITTEN IN OCTOBER, 1836. [893.]

I have looked over the plan of the ground of the battle of Waterloo, which appears to me to be accurately drawn.

It is very difficult for me to judge of the particular position of each body of the troops under my command, much less of the Prussian army, at any particular hour.

I was informed that the smoke of the fire of cannon was seen occasionally from our line behind Hougoumont at a distance, in front of our left, about an hour before the British army advanced to the attack of the enemy's line.

That attack was ordered possibly at about half-past seven, when I saw the confusion in their position upon the repulse of the last attack of their infantry, and when I rallied and brought up again into the first line the Brunswick infantry.

The whole of the British and Allied cavalry of our army was then in the rear of our infantry. I desired that it might be collected in rear of our centre; that is, between Hougoumont and La Haye Sainte.

The infantry was advanced in line. I halted them for a moment in the bottom, that they might be in order to attack some battalions of the enemy still on the heights.

The cavalry halted likewise. The whole moved forward again in very few moments. The enemy did not stand the attack. Some had fled before we halted. The whole abandoned their position.

The cavalry were then ordered to charge, and moved round the flanks of the battalions of infantry.

The infantry was formed into columns, and moved in pursuit in columns of battalions.

WELLINGTON.

MEMORANDUM ON THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO. [894.]

24th Sept., 1842.*

In discussing the Battle of Waterloo, and the military movements previous thereto, it is necessary to advert to the state of

* Written by the Duke of Wellington after reading the statements of General Clausewitz.

Europe at the moment, and the military position of the Allies on the one hand, and of Buonaparte and France on the other.

The Powers of Europe had, in 1814, made peace with France, governed by Louis XVIII. A Congress was assembled at Vienna, composed of ministers from the principal Powers engaged in the previous war, and from His Most Christian Majesty, to regulate and settle various points left unsettled by the treaties of peace, not only as between France and the Powers engaged in the war, but questions affecting the relative interests of all, arising out of the long and extensive warfare, the consequence of the French Revolution.

Buonaparte having abdicated his power, and having retired to the island of Elba under the sanction of a treaty, returned to France early in March, 1815, with a detachment of his Guard which had attended him to the island of Elba, arrived at Paris on the 20th of March, and overturned the government of King Louis XVIII., who fled to Lille, and subsequently to Ghent, in the Netherlands; when Buonaparte usurped the government of France.

Whatever we may think of the settlement of the government of France, of the state of possession of the different parts of Europe and of the world, as fixed by the treaties of peace, and by the subsequent diplomatic transactions at Vienna, at that moment completed, they constituted at that time the public law of Europe, and the state of possession of the several Powers, under authority thereof. This must never be lost sight of in the consideration of this subject.

From the moment at which Buonaparte drove Louis XVIII. from Paris and usurped his throne, it was obvious that the war would be renewed; and the first thing that was done by the ministers of the Allies at Vienna, upon learning the invasion of France by Buonaparte, his march upon Paris, and his usurpation of the government, was to renew, and to render applicable to the circumstances of the moment, their former treaty of alliance, concluded at Chaumont in the month of March, 1814.

Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington being the plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty at the Congress at Vienna at that period, having concluded and signed the treaty of alliance on the 25th of March, and all the arrangements connected with that instrument, and having been appointed to command the Allied army assembled in the Netherlands, set out from Vienna and reached Bruxelles in the first days of April.

The treaty of peace of 1814 had rendered necessary the occupation of the provinces, commonly called the Belgian provinces, by an army composed of British, Hanoverian, and Dutch troops, under the command of His Royal Highness the Hereditary Prince of Orange; the German provinces on the left bank of the Rhine, extending from the province of Loraine to the junction of the Rhine with the Meuse, by Prussian troops; the Italian provinces, forming what had been called the Kingdom of Italy, by the Austrian army (indeed this Austrian army was at about this time engaged in the active operations of war with Murat, King of Naples); the provinces in Poland, forming the kingdom of Saxon Poland, by the Russian army.

Thus then the armies of the Allies were distributed over Europe, while the greater part of that of England had been detached to North America; and notwithstanding that the treaty of peace had been concluded at Ghent, on the 24th of December, 1814, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, sufficient time had not elapsed to enable His Britannic Majesty's ministers to bring back the troops to Europe.

On the other hand, Buonaparte found an army in France completely organized, consisting of not less than 250,000 men, with cannon, and all that was required to render them efficient for the field. There were besides many old soldiers available for the service, who had been prisoners of war in England, in Russia, and elsewhere, besides the men discharged from the corps of the Imperial Guard.

It is obvious that the first measures of the Generals commanding the armies of the Allies must have been defensive. Those in the Belgian provinces, and those on the left bank of the Rhine, must have been strictly and cautiously formed upon these principles. Their forces were weak in comparison with the French force opposed to, or which might be brought against them. The latter enjoyed other advantages in the nature and strength of their frontier.

These Allied troops were at the outpost. They were destined to protect the march of the other armies of the Allies to the countries which were intended to be the basis of the operations to be carried on against the enemy, for which the treaty of the 25th March had made provision.

The army in the Belgian provinces, under the command of the Duke of Wellington, from the first days of April, had particular interests to attend to, as each of the other armies had, each in the districts under its charge, besides the general operations of the war. That army, composed of British, Dutch, and Hanoverian troops, had to preserve the communications with England, Holland, and Germany. It was connected with the Prussian army by its left, the communication of which with Germany was absolutely necessary.

The Prince Sovereign, afterwards King of the Netherlands, to whose government the Belgian provinces had been ceded by the Congress of Vienna, had fixed its seat at Bruxelles; and the King, Louis XVIII., having found himself under the necessity of withdrawing from France altogether, had determined to reside at Ghent.

Buonaparte had great advantages, whether for an offensive operation on the positions of the Allies, or for the defence of his own, in the number, the position, and the strength of the fortresses on the north-east frontier of France. He might fix and organize his armies within these, out of sight, and almost without the knowledge, of the Allied Generals, even to the last moment previous to an attack; and it was impossible for the Allies to attempt to carry on an offensive operation against the French position which should not include the means of carrying on one or more sieges, possibly at the same moment.

The inconveniences, difficulties, and disadvantages of this defensive system were aggravated by the uncertainty of the length of time which it might last: that is to say, till the Austrian armies, having terminated their operations in Italy against Murat, should have reached the Upper Rhine, and there formed a junction with the armies of Bavaria and Wurtemberg, and the Russian armies should have retrograded from Poland, should have crossed Germany, and have formed upon the Rhine, the Maine, and the Moselle.

It is complained of by the Prussian historian Clausewitz that he had never been able to obtain the sight of a return of the army under the command of the Duke of Wellington made up in the form of what is called "a line of battle." This at best is the complaint of a want of a return made up in a particular form; and it would not have been noticed here if it were not desirable to draw the attention of the reader to the general temper and tone of this History.

The reputation of its army, and above all of the Generals commanding the same, is an object of the greatest importance to any nation; and we find the historians of all nations, not excepting, as we see, those of the British, too ready to criticise the acts and operations not only of their own Generals and armies, but likewise of those of the best friends and allies of their nation, and even of those acting in co-operation with its armies. This observation must be borne in mind throughout the perusal of Clausewitz's History.

In respect to the return mentioned, it is forgotten by General Clausewitz that the army under the command of the Duke of Wellington was not, like that under the command of Marshal Prince Blücher, composed of the troops of all arms, and establishments of and belonging to one nation, but they belonged to several, the infantry, cavalry, and artillery in some cases belonging each to different nations; that the several corps of troops composing the Allied army in question were not of uniform strength of numbers, whether considered by nations, by battalions, by brigades, or by divisions; that the discipline and military qualities of the several corps of troops, and, above all, their efficiency and military experience in the field, were very various. The greatest part of some of the corps composing the army was composed of men lately recruited. The whole of the Hanoverian army was of militia, excepting some battalions of the Hanoverian Legion, which properly belonged to the British army, and had served under the command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington in Spain.

It was necessary to organize these troops in brigades, divisions, and corps d'armée with those better disciplined and more accustomed to war, in order to derive from their numbers as much advantage as possible. But these arrangements in allied armies, formed as this one was, are not matters of course. The same national feeling respecting its armies, even in the least powerful nation, which has been already adverted to as having an influence over the critical morality of the historian, is not without its influence in the formation of such arrangements of organization. No troops can be employed in an allied army excepting each corps and detachment is under the immediate command of its own national officer.

The organization and formation of corps to serve together, and under the command and superior direction of what officer, become therefore, and became in this case, a matter which required great attention and labour, and of great difficulty. To these considerations was to be added, that some of the troops were fit only for garrison duties; while, on the other hand, the importance of the fortresses was so urgent as to require for their garrisons a proportion at least of the very best troops.

This statement will serve to show that the formation of a return of the army under the command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, as "a line of battle," was not very easy.

The two Allied armies, the one in the Netherlands, the other in the provinces on the left bank of the Rhine, were, as has been already shown, necessarily on the defensive. They were waiting for the junction of other large armies to attain by their co-operation a common object. But their defensive position and immediate objects did not necessarily preclude all idea or plan of attack upon the enemy. The enemy might have so placed his army as to render the attack thereof advisable, or even necessary.

In that case the Allied Generals ought, and in all probability would, have taken the initiative. But in the case existing in 1815 the enemy did not take such a position as is thus supposed. On the contrary, he took a position in which his numbers could be concealed, his movements protected, and his designs supported by his formidable fortresses on the frontier, up to the last moment.

The Allies could not attack this position without being prepared to attack a superior army so posted: they could not therefore have the initiative of the operations in the way of attack.

They had the option of taking the initiative in the way of defensive movement. But such defensive movement, or alteration of the well-considered original position taken up by each of the Allied armies, must have been founded on a conviction that such positions were faulty, and might be improved, or upon an hypothesis of the intended movements of attack by the enemy. There was no reason to believe that the first was the case; and it must never be lost sight of, that to found upon an hypothesis which might, and probably would, prove erroneous, considering what the advantages were of the position of the enemy on the frontier, the alteration of the position of the Allied armies might have occasioned what is commonly called a false movement; and it must be observed, that whatever may be thought of Buonaparte as a leader of troops in other respects, there certainly never existed a man in that situation, in any times, in whose presence it was so little safe to make what is called a false movement.

The initiative then rested with the enemy; and the course to be pursued by the Allied Generals respectively was to be prepared to move in all directions, to wait till it should be seen in what direction the attack should be made, and then to assemble the armies as quickly as possible to resist the attack, or to attack the enemy with the largest force that could be collected.

There is a good deal of discussion in the History of General Clausewitz upon the expediency of the maintenance of the defensive position taken up by the Allied armies, particularly by that under the command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington; and that even for the attainment of the objects in view for the position of the last mentioned, it would have been best to occupy a position in the country having for its sole object the early junction of the two Allied armies, with a view to fight a great battle with the enemy under the command of Buonaparte.

It is not difficult to criticise the particular positions occupied by any army, which positions were never, as in this case, the object of actual attack. It is not so easy a task, first to define precisely a particular object for the operations of a defensive nature for any army, taking into consideration not only political objects and views, but likewise those of a merely technical and military nature: such as, in this case, the preservation of the communications of the army with England, with Holland, and with Germany; and next, to define the positions to be occupied by two armies in order to carry on such operations.

Bruxelles, Ghent, the communications with Holland and Germany, according to the view of the historian, ought to have been given up, and the armies united, or prepared to unite, in order to fight a general battle with the enemy, as the best mode of securing all the objects of their respective defensive positions. But it is not stated, or even hinted, where each was to be posted, where they were to unite, nor where was to be the great battle on which the contest was to be decided. It is obvious that the historian could not indicate such positions: he was too wise to make the attempt.

He could not but be aware that when the Allies should have abandoned their defensive positions in the Netherlands, and should have left in the power of the enemy to occupy, with his hussars and light troops, Bruxelles and Ghent, the communications with England and Holland through Antwerp, and with England through the towns on the Lys and Ostend, they would not have been nearer the attainment of the object of fighting a general battle than while in the positions having for their objects to maintain and secure these advantages.

The initiative for such general battle must still have been in the hands of Buonaparte. He might have avoided it by merely remaining with his main body within the French frontier; while with his hussars and light troops he would have possessed Bruxelles and Ghent and the communications with England and Holland, and with Germany through Holland.

The historian shows in more than one passage of his History that he is not insensible of the military and political value of good moral impressions resulting from military operations. He is sensible of the advantage derived by the enemy from such impressions. He is aware of the object of Buonaparte to create throughout Europe, and even in England, a moral impression against the war, and to shake the power of the then existing administration in England. He is sensible of and can contemplate the effect of the moral impression upon the other armies of Europe, and upon the governments in whose service they were, resulting from the defeat or even want of success of the Allied armies under the command of the Duke of Wellington and Prince Blücher. But he is not sensible of, and cannot calculate upon, or even consider the effect of, the moral impression resulting from the loss of Bruxelles and Ghent, the flight of the King of the Netherlands, and of the King Louis XVIII., the creatures of the treaties of peace, and of the acts of the Congress of Vienna; and this with the loss of the communications of the army under the Duke of Wellington with England, Holland, and Germany, without making the smallest effort to save any of these objects.

If this historian had, however, inquired, in England or elsewhere, he would have found that the feeling upon such events would have been as strong as he admits it would have been in case of the want of success of the operations of the Allied armies whose operations are under discussion. In England in particular these supposed events would have been severely felt. But let us consider whether the abandonment of all the objects which the Allies had in view in maintaining any position in the Netherlands would have enabled the Generals of the Allied armies the better to fight a great battle with the enemy.

The enemy would have had the option whether to fight the battle or not, and the initiative of the movements preparatory to it, after having had all the advantages placed in his hands, and the Allied Generals having thus given up those objects the possession of which alone, in a political or even a military point of view, could justify their fighting a battle at all, at least till they should be in a state of co-operation with the other armies of Europe.

The enemy having the initiative would have moved across the communications of the army under the command of the Duke of Wellington. In the possession of the great towns, of all the roads, and of the resources of the Belgian provinces, he would have had to decide whether he would, or not, force the two Allied armies to retire from the Meuse. But in the hypothesis that the enemy would fight a battle for such an object, why should the Allies? The Duke of Wellington would have lost all for which as the commander of an army he ought to desire to contend; and neither his position, nor that of the army under Prince Blücher, could have been improved by a great battle, even under the hypothesis that the result would have been a great victory.

Such a one would not have restored to the Duke of Wellington the advantages which he enjoyed in the state of preparation of the army under his command for the advance into France, in co-operation with the other Allied armies when they should have taken their stations, and should have been prepared to advance.

The restoration of the communications with England, Holland, and Germany, which would have been the result of such successful battle, would not have immediately restored and replaced his magazines not located in fortresses, and which would have fallen into the enemy's hands by the supposed change of position with a view to fight this great battle. After all, the initiative of this battle must have rested with the enemy; and there could be no military reason for fighting it, or political reason, excepting the moral impression throughout the world of its successful result.

It is useless to speculate upon supposed military movements which were never made, and operations which never took place, or the objects of the several chiefs or Generals opposed to each other.

But although it was not desirable that the Duke of Wellington should break up his defensive position in the Belgian provinces with a view to take one with the army under his command having solely in view the object of fighting a great battle in cooperation or in conjunction with the Prussian army, it was still desirable that he should occupy this defensive position in such manner, and take such precautionary measures, as would enable him to assemble at the latest period of time the largest disposable force at his disposition, after providing for the defence and security of his military communications with England, Holland, and Germany, and of the objects entrusted to his care and protection under the treaty of peace and acts of the Congress, and by the Allied ministers in conference at Vienna. He accordingly from the moment at which he arrived in the Netherlands in the beginning of April turned his attention to the strengthening the posts on the frontier; and works were constructed at Ostend, Nieuport, Ypres, Menin, Courtray, Oudenarde, Tournay, Ath, Mons, Charleroi, and Namur. It is true there were field works, generally on the site of the ancient works, by which these towns were defended; the defence of which was aided by the ancient ditches and means of inundation. His orders at that time to the Quartermaster-General and the General officers show what his instructions were in the various hypothetical cases therein stated.

There are several great roads leading from the northern departments of France, and the great fortresses therein situated, by each of which these provinces might have been invaded, and which it was necessary at least to observe:—

One from Lisle: upon Menin, Courtray, and Ghent.

One from Lisle: upon Tournay and Ghent, or upon Ath and Bruxelles.

One from Condé: upon Tournay, Ath, Enghien, and Bruxelles.

One from Condé and Valenciennes: upon Mons and Bruxelles.

Each of these was a great paved road, upon which there was no obstacle of a defensive nature, excepting the field works of which it appears the Duke of Wellington ordered the construction.

The historian Clausewitz has detailed the positions of the Prussian army, the distances of each part from the other, and the length of time which would elapse for the completion of the assembly of the whole. It cannot be stated that the Allied army under the Duke of Wellington could have been assembled in an equally short period of time; but if it is considered that the objects for the protection of the army under the command of the Duke of Wellington were extended over a tract of country of greater length than were those protected by the Allied army under the command of Prince Blücher, it will be found that this part of the country, contiguous in its whole extent to the French frontier, and traversed in all parts by excellent paved roads leading from some one or other of the French fortresses, required for its protection a system of occupation quite different from that adopted by the Prussian army under Prince Blücher.

But what follows will show that notwithstanding the extension of the Allied army under the command of the Duke of Wellington, such was the celerity of communication with all parts of it, that in point of fact his orders reached all parts of the army in six hours after he had issued them; and that he was in line in person with a sufficient force to resist and keep in check the enemy's corps which first attacked the Prussian corps under General Zieten at daylight on the 15th of June; having received the intelligence of that attack only at three o'clock in the afternoon of the 15th, he was at Quatre Bras before the same hour on the morning of the 16th, with a sufficient force to engage the left of the French army.

It was certainly true that he had known for some days of the augmentation of the enemy's force on the frontier, and even of the arrival of Buonaparte at the army; but he did not deem it expedient to make any movement, excepting for the assembly of the troops at their several alarm posts, till he should hear of the decided movement of the enemy.

The first account received by the Duke of Wellington was from the Prince of Orange, who had come in from the out-posts of the army of the Netherlands to dine with the Duke at three o'clock in the afternoon. He reported that the enemy had attacked the Prussians at Thuin; that they had taken possession of, but had afterwards abandoned, Binch; that they had not yet touched the positions of the army of the Netherlands. While the Prince was with the Duke, the staff officer employed by Prince Blücher at the Duke's head-quarters, General Müffling, came to the Duke to inform him that he had just received intelligence of the movement of the French army and their attack upon the Prussian troops at Thuin.

It appears by the statement of the historian that the posts of the Prussian corps of General Zieten were attacked at Thuin at four o'clock on the morning of the 15th; and that General Zieten himself, with a part of his corps, retreated and was at Charleroi at about ten o'clock on that day; yet the report thereof was not received at Bruxelles till three o'clock in the afternoon. The Prussian cavalry of the corps of Zieten was at Gosselies and Fleurus on the evening and night of the 15th.

Orders were forthwith sent for the march of the whole army to its left.

The whole moved on that evening and in the night, each division and portion separately, but unmolested; the whole protected on the march by the defensive works constructed at the different points referred to, and by their garrisons.

The reserve, which had been encamped in the neighbourhood, and cantoned in the town and in the neighbourhood, of Bruxelles, were ordered to assemble in and in the neighbourhood of the park at Bruxelles, which they did on that evening; and they marched in the morning of the 16th upon Quatre Bras, towards which post the march of all the troops consisting of the left and centre of the army, and of the cavalry in particular, was directed.

The Duke went in person at daylight in the morning of the 16th to Quatre Bras, where he found some Netherland troops, cavalry, infantry, and artillery, which had been engaged with the enemy, but lightly; and he went on from thence to the Prussian army,* which was in sight, formed on the heights behind Ligny and St. Amand. He there communicated personally with Marshal Prince Blücher and the head quarters of the Prussian army.

In the mean time the reserve of the Allied army under the command of the Duke of Wellington arrived at Quatre Bras. The historian asserts that the Duke of Wellington had ordered these troops to halt at the point at which they quitted the Forêt de Soignies. He can have no proof of this fact, of which there is no evidence; and in point of fact the two armies were united about mid-day of the 16th of June, on the left of the position of the Allied army under the command of the Duke of Wellington. These troops, forming the reserve, and having arrived from Bruxelles, were now joined by those of the 1st division of infantry, and the cavalry:† and notwithstanding the criticism of the Prussian historian on the positions occupied by the army under the command of the Duke of Wellington, and on the march of the troops to join with the Prussian army, it is a fact, appearing upon the face of the History, that the Allied British and Netherland army was in line at Quatre Bras, not only twenty-four hours sooner than one whole corps of the Prussian army under General Bülow the absence of which is attributed by the historian to an accidental mistake, but likewise before the whole of the corps under General Zieten which had been the first attacked on the 15th, had taken its position in the line of the army assembled on the heights behind Ligny, and having their left at Sombref.

It was perfectly true that the Duke of Wellington did not at first give credit to the reports of the intention of the enemy to attack by the valleys of the Sambre and the Meuse.

The enemy had destroyed the roads leading through those valleys, and he considered that Buonaparte might have made his attack upon the Allied armies in the Netherlands and in the provinces on the left of the Rhine by other lines with more advantage. But it is obvious that, when the attack was made, he was not unprepared to assist in resisting it; and, in point of fact, did, on the afternoon and in the evening of the 16th June,

* About 1 o'clock, at the Windmill of Bussy, between Ligny and Brie: so Hardinge told me.—J. G.

† The Duke of Wellington was at Quatre Bras about 3 o'clock, on his return from Ligny.

repulse the attack of Marshal Ney upon his position at Quatre Bras, which had been commenced by the aid of another corps d'armée under General Reille. These were the troops which had attacked on the 15th, at daylight, the Prussian corps under General Zieten, which corps the Allied troops, under the Duke of Wellington, relieved in resistance to the enemy.

The Prussian army, after a contest of some hours' duration upon the heights behind Ligny, having been under the necessity of retiring, that part of the Allied army under the command of the Duke of Wellington which was engaged at Quatre Bras maintained its ground at Quatre Bras, and even gained ground upon the enemy.

The fields of battle were in sight of each other, and a report was received. But although the exact result of the battle was not known, it was judged that it had not been successful to the Prussian army. Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington was informed of some of the details at night; but still he considered that, his own position being untouched, and the continued march of the troops under his command giving him an increase of strength at every moment, he felt the utmost confidence in the final result of the operations in progress.

The Prussian army retreated towards Wavre.

It must be observed in the historian's account of these battles that the corps of Reille, at the commencement of the battle of Quatre Bras, joined with the corps of Ney. In point of fact, it was seen in the field. That corps was, during the battle, ordered, and did march, to its right, towards the main body of the French army. It was then halted, and countermarched towards its original destination. The reasons for these eccentric movements are not known. Certain it is that the corps of Reille did not fire a shot after the commencement of the battle of Quatre Bras. That which it is reasonable to suppose is that Marshal Ney had required that the corps of Reille should be sent back to him upon finding that he could make no impression upon the position of the Duke of Wellington at Quatre Bras, whose army was at every moment receiving reinforcements of cavalry, infantry, and artillery from Nivelles and other places on its right.

Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington's aide-de-camp Colonel the Hon. Alexander Gordon, with two squadrons of hussars, shortly after daylight on the morning of the 17th, drove in the enemy's videttes upon the ground of the Prussian contest on the afternoon of the 16th June. These retired into the villages of Ligny and St. Amand, &c., on the stream.

Colonel Gordon communicated with General Zieten at Sombref, and ascertained exactly the line of retreat of the army under Marshal Prince Blücher upon Wavre. As soon as the exact position of the Prussian army was ascertained, and the intentions of its General were known to the Duke of Wellington, he broke up from the position of Quatre Bras shortly before midday, in presence of the whole army of the enemy, without interruption or molestation, and ordered the march of the infantry of the army under his command to the ground in front of Waterloo, with the exception of the light troops at the outposts, with which and the cavalry the Duke remained on the ground at Quatre Bras.

The Duke saw throughout the day of the 17th the movements of the Prussian army upon the field of battle of the preceding day. No pursuit was made of the Prussian army or movement of any kind made by the French army till a late hour on the afternoon of the 17th; and indeed the account given by Marshal Grouchy, in a pamphlet in his own defence, published in the United States, shows that the account given in the History is, as nearly as possible, an accurate representation of what passed on the 17th according to the reports in the Allied army under the Duke of Wellington. Would it not have been a fair conclusion for the historian to draw, that the position occupied by the Allied army under the Duke of Wellington at Quatre Bras, and the successful resistance of that army in the battle of the preceding day, might have had some effect in producing the unusual tranquillity of the French army throughout the day of the 17th, the morrow of a successful attack upon the position of an enemy's army which had retired?

The enemy did not move till between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, at which hour large masses of troops appeared on the Prussian field of battle. One body marched in the direction of Namur, another in the direction of Wavre, which last is supposed to have been the corps under the command of Marshal Grouchy. The largest body and the great mass of the cavalry moved down the high road leading from Sombref to Quatre Bras, towards the left of the British troops of the army of the Duke of Wellington, which still remained on that ground. These were put in motion as soon as their outposts were touched by those of the enemy, and joined the main body of the army posted in front of Waterloo. Here were all the troops composing the army under the Duke of Wellington, excepting a small corps de réserve still remaining at Hal, on the high road from Bruxelles to Mons. All the remainder, whether engaged at Quatre Bras on the 16th, or who had joined on the evening of the 16th, or who had been turned off from Nivelles to Waterloo, and the troops falling back from the position at Quatre Bras, were on the position at Waterloo on the 17th, in the evening.

The whole of the Prussian army was, at the same time, in the position at Wavre.

The two Allied armies communicated with each other throughout the night of the 17th June, and the cavalry of General Bülow's Prussian corps of Marshal Prince Blücher's army was on the ground, in front of Ohain, through the defile between the positions of the two armies, at daylight on the morning of the 18th.

Thus, then, it appears, by the report of this historian, that, after the affairs at Ligny and Quatre Bras, the two Allied armies were collected, each on its own ground, in presence of the enemy, having a short and not difficult communication between them; each of them in presence of the enemy, and between the enemy and Bruxelles; all their communications with England, Holland, and Germany, and all the important political interests committed to their charge, being secure.

It has been stated and believed that the cavalry of Bülow's corps was seen on the heights in front of Ohain, between the Allied army under the command of the Duke of Wellington and the defile leading to Wavre, at an early hour on the morning of the 18th.

It is a curious fact in elucidation of the movements of the Allied army under Marshal Prince Blücher, that Marshal Grouchy has published in his Defence, printed in the United States of America, a letter from Marshal Soult, addressed to him, dated the 18th June, at 1 o'clock P.M., in which Marshal Soult states "Nous apercevons la cavalerie Prussienne," which was the very cavalry seen by the Duke of Wellington, as stated, shortly after daylight in the morning of that day.

It is a curious circumstance that this cavalry should not have been observed in the French army at an earlier hour than one o'clock in the afternoon. It must be concluded that at that hour no knowledge existed in the French head-quarters that other troops had passed the defile, or had been engaged on the left of the army under the command of the Duke of Wellington.

The first heard of the operations of Marshal Prince Blücher's army was a report, brought from the right of the army under the command of the Duke of Wellington, at about 6 o'clock in the evening, that at that moment the smoke of the fire of artillery could be perceived at a great distance beyond the right of the enemy's army, which firing was supposed at that time to be at Planchenoit.

The report of the battle made at the time by the Duke of Wellington to the British and the Allied governments of Europe has long been before the public. In that report he does full justice to the exertions made by his colleague the Prussian Commander-in-Chief and by the General officers and troops to aid and support him, and to the effectual aid which they gave him. He states no detail, excepting that the battle was terminated by an attack which he determined to make upon the enemy's position, in which he does not report that any Prussian troops joined, because, in fact, none were on that part of the field of battle. He states, however, that the enemy's troops retired from the last attack upon his position "in great confusion, and that the march of General Bülow's corps by Frischermont upon Planchenoit and La Belle Alliance had begun to take effect; and as he could perceive the fire of his cannon, and as Marshal Prince Blücher had joined in person with a corps of his army to the left of our line by Ohain, he determined upon the attack, which succeeded in every point." He added that he "continued the pursuit until long after dark, and then discontinued it only on account of the fatigue of the troops, who had been engaged during twelve hours, and because he found himself on the same road with Marshal Blücher, who assured him of his intention to follow the enemy throughout the night." He then adds, "I should not do justice to my own feelings, or to Marsh Blücher and the Prussian army, if I did not attribute the successful result of this arduous day to the cordial and timely assistance I received from them. The operation of General Bülow upon the enemy's flank was a most decisive one; and even if I had not found myself in a situation to make the attack which produced the final result, it would have forced the enemy to retire if his attacks should have failed, and would have prevented him from taking advantage of them if they should unfortunately have succeeded."

When the two Field Marshals met on the same road, it is well known that they embraced in the presence of their troops, and were cordial friends up to the day of the death of Prince Blücher. Surely the details of the battle might have been left in the original official reports.

Historians and commentators were not necessary.

The battle, possibly the most important single military event in modern times, was attended by advantages sufficient for the glory of many such armies as the two great Allied armies engaged.

The enemy never rallied; Buonaparte lost his empire for ever; not a shot was fired afterwards; and the peace of Europe and of the world was settled on the basis on which it rests at this moment.

It is impossible to close this paper without observing that Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington's letters, published by Colonel Gurwood, afford proofs that he was convinced that the enemy ought to have attacked by other lines rather than by the valleys of the Sambre and the Meuse; and that even up to the last moment previous to the attack of his position at Waterloo, he conceived that they would endeavour to turn it by a march upon Hal. He states this in letters to the Duc de Feltre on the 15th, and to the Duc de Berri and King Louis XVIII. dated at 3½ A.M. 18th June; and there are orders to his patrols of cavalry, on the nights of the 16th and 17th June, to observe particularly the enemy's movements towards Nivelles.

It might be a nice question for military discussion whether Buonaparte was right in endeavouring to force the position at Waterloo, or the Duke of Wellington right in thinking that, from the evening of the 16th, Buonaparte would have taken a wiser course if he had moved to his left, have reached the high road leading from Mons to Bruxelles, and have turned the right of the position of the Allies by Hal.

It is obvious that the Duke was prepared to resist such a movement.

WELLINGTON.

To Lady Frances W. Webster. [895.]

Bruxelles, 19th June, 1815,
½ past 8 in the morning.

MY DEAR LADY FRANCES,

Lord Mountnorris may remain in Bruxelles in perfect security. I yesterday, after a most severe and bloody contest, gained a complete victory, and pursued the French till after dark. They are in complete confusion; and I have, I believe, 150 pieces of cannon; and Blücher, who continued the pursuit all night, my soldiers being tired to death, sent me word this morning that he had got 60 more.

My loss is immense. Lord Uxbridge, Lord FitzRoy Somerset, General Cooke, General Barnes, and Colonel Berkeley are wounded: Colonel De Lancey, Canning, Gordon, General Picton killed. The finger of Providence was upon me, and I escaped unhurt.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

To the Duke of York. [896.]

SIR, Bruxelles, 19th June, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose to your Royal Highness the copy of my despatch of this date to the Secretary of State, reporting the military operations to this day.*

I have, &c.,

To Earl Bathurst. [897.]

MY DEAR LORD, Bruxelles, 19th June, 1815.

I am come in to arrange some matters, and start immediately. Can you reinforce us in good British infantry particularly, and cavalry? You'll see how we are reduced. Some of the battalions have not 100 men.

We must have Lord Combermere also, if he will come.

Believe me, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

Extract from a Letter written by the Emperor Napoleon.

"Je resterai à Laon jusqu'à ce que le reste de l'armée soit réuni. J'ai donné l'ordre de diriger sur Laon et sur Reims tous les militaires isolés. La gendarmerie et la Garde Nationale vont battre la campagne, et ramasser les traîneurs; les bons soldats se rallieront d'eux-mêmes. Nous aurons dans 24 heures un noyau de 10,000 à 12,000 hommes. Avec cette petite armée je contiendrai l'ennemi, et je donnerai le temps à Grouchy d'arriver, et à la nation de se retourner."

Prince Bernard de Saxe-Weimar à son Père.

CHER PÈRE, Au bivouac près Waterloo, ce 19 Juin, 1815.

Remerciez Dieu! Je suis encore vivant, et suis sorti sain et sauf de deux sanglantes batailles. La première eut lieu le 16, et la seconde hier. Je vous prie, quand vous lirez la présente, de prendre la carte de Ferrary. Depuis quatre semaines j'étais en cantonnement à Genappe, avec le régiment d'Orange Nassau, dont je suis Colonel. Le 15 je fus nommé brigadier de la 2e brigade de la division Perponcher. Mon prédécesseur avait eu le malheur de se casser la jambe. En outre de mes 2 bataillons d'Orange Nassau, je me trouvai par là avoir sous mon commandement trois bataillons du Duché de Nassau. Alors ma brigade était de 4000 hommes; aujourd'hui il ne m'en reste pas 1200!

Le 15 les Français tombèrent sur l'armée Prussienne, et la pressèrent bien vivement. Ma brigade prolongeait l'aile gauche de l'armée Hollandaise, dont le quartier-général était à Braine le Comte; celui de ma division était à Nivelles. Un bataillon de Nassau, avec une batterie d'artillerie à cheval Hollandaise, étaient à Frasnes.' Lorsque les Prussiens se retirèrent sur Fleurus le poste de Frasnes fut attaqué et enlevé. L'infanterie se jeta dans un bois sur la droite, et l'artillerie se retira, en combattant, aux Quatre Bras. Je réunis ma brigade à cette importante position, et canonnai l'ennemi, que je parvins à empêcher d'avancer. J'ai conservé cette position pendant toute la nuit. Vers le matin du 16 je fus renforcé par un bataillon de Chasseurs Hollandais et un bataillon de milice. Bientôt après mon Général de Division et le Prince d'Orange arrivèrent. J'allais aux avant-postes avec le dernier, et j'entrepris, par son ordre, une reconnaissance avec un bataillon et deux canons. Vers midi l'ennemi fit voir de fortes colonnes, et commença à nous canonner. On dit que dans ce jour il a engagé trois corps de son armée contre nous. Nous avions seulement cinq bataillons à lui opposer, et les débouchés d'un bois à défendre jusqu'à la dernière extrémité.

Le Duc de Wellington était présent au commencement de l'action. Quoique je n'eusse que deux canons pour me protéger, je conservais longtemps mon terrain contre un ennemi trois fois supérieur en nombre. Il parvint à s'emparer d'un bois vis à vis de moi, et incommodait mon flanc gauche. Sans perdre de temps, je pris avec moi quelques volontaires et un bataillon de milice, et repris mon bois à la pointe de la baïonnette. J'étais à la tête des assaillans, et j'eus l'honneur d'être un des premiers dans le bois. En coupant quelques branches je me suis blessé légèrement avec mon sabre, mais je ne quittai pas un moment le combat. Cette blessure ne mérite pas d'être mentionnée. Je vous l'écris seulement, afin que vous, ainsi que ma bonne mère, ne puissiez pas être alarmés par les rapports exagérés. Tandis que je défendais mon bois, l'ennemi chassa notre aile gauche jusqu'aux Quatre Bras. Ce fut dans ce moment que le brave Duc de Brunswick fut tué par une balle qui lui perça la poitrine. De fortes colonnes tournaient mon flanc droit; je demandai des ordres pour savoir comment je devais agir; mais je n'en reçus aucun. Quand je me vis entouré de tous côtés, et que mes gens eurent épuisé toutes leur munitions, je me retirai en bon ordre à travers le bois, dans le voisinage de Hautaine le Val. La division Hanovrienne du Général d'Alten me soutint, et reprit le bois, mais le perdit de nouveau. A la fin, les Anglais le forcèrent après avoir perdu beaucoup de monde, et s'y maintinrent toute la nuit. J'y bivouaquai. Les Prussiens se retirèrent ce jour-là à Wavres, et, sur la nouvelle de cette retraite, nous fûmes obligés de nous retirer à la position près de Mont Saint Jean, entre Genappe et Bruxelles. Cela eut lieu le 17. Nous fûmes obligés de bivouaquer la nuit sur un terrain bien bourbeux, et avec une horrible pluie.

Hier, sur les 10 heures, commença la bataille décisive, qui fut complètement gagnée, vers le soir, par Wellington, sur Napoléon en personne. (160 canons sont le fruit de cette sanglante victoire.) Je commandais à l'aile gauche, et j'étais chargé de conserver un village et une position. J'y réussis, mais avec une grande perte d'hommes. La victoire était encore douteuse, quand, sur les 4 heures, les Prussiens, sous les Généraux Bülow et Zieten, arrivèrent sur notre flanc gauche, et décidèrent la bataille. Malheureusement les Prussiens, qui devaient me soutenir dans mon village, prirent pour des Français mes Nassaus, qui ont encore l'uniforme Français, quoique leurs cœurs soient bien Allemands, et firent un terrible feu contre eux. Ils furent chassés de leur position, et je les ralliai à un quart de lieue du champ de bataille. Mon Général de Division, dont la 1e brigade a été totalement détruite, est à présent avec moi.

Il me faut finir, parce que je viens de recevoir des ordres de marcher à Nivelles, à la poursuite de l'ennemi. Adieu, cher père. Saluez ma mère, ma belle-sœur, mon frère, et tous mes amis, et soyez assuré que je ferai tout pour être digne de vous.

Le Colonel et Brigadier,

BERNARD DE SAXE-WEIMAR.

Lieut.-Gen. C. Alten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, 19th June, 1815.

The very severe loss which the 3rd Division sustained in the action of yesterday would be most painful to me, had I not the full conviction that every regiment composing it did their duty; and it is in justice to their conduct that I do myself the honour of submitting the following report for your Grace's perusal.

In compliance with your Grace's orders, and those of His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, to form the division for the attack in two lines of contiguous columns, I placed them in columns of two battalions together at quarter distance, the right regiment on its left company, the left on its right company, so as to deploy right and left into line, or to form squares as necessary; the columns composing the 1st and 2nd lines chequered.

The attack towards the centre commenced by a heavy cannonade with Major Lloyd's and Captain Clewes's brigades of guns on the enemy's columns, who were advancing to the wood on the right of the 3rd Division. The enemy soon after advanced a strong column of infantry, covered by a heavy fire of artillery, on the high road from Genappe, who, after being kept for a considerable time in check by the 2nd light battalion occupying a house in front of our position, had nearly gained it, when by the spirited advance, in line, of the 1st light battalion and 8th line battalion King's German Legion, they were repulsed. The French cavalry, who had gained the position on the left of their infantry, and had failed in the charge they made on the square of the Grübenhagen and Osnabrück field battalion, got for a short time amongst the 1st light and particularly the 8th line battalion, until the advance of our cavalry sent them back.

The cannonade by this time, on the part of the enemy, which was no longer checked by our guns, was very destructive to our infantry squares; yet none even showed a disposition to give way, but filled up the space over the bodies of their brave comrades as they fell. The enemy's cavalry now appeared in crowds on the position, charged the square of the 30th and 73rd British, the one of the Grübenhagen and Osnabrück, and that of the Bremen and Verden field battalion five or six times, but were as often repulsed by the coolness of our troops, who reserved their fire until they approached within twenty paces.

In this position the hostile armies continued for several hours, the enemy bringing up his infantry, and latterly approaching his numerous artillery to within grape shot. During this time a very spirited charge was made by the 5th line battalion, headed by Colonel Ompteda, who afterwards fell in the action, but at this time was seen many yards in front of that battalion, and with the remains of the 1st light battalion drove down with the bayonet a division of French infantry who were again trying to gain the position by the high road. The squares by this time had been so much reduced in number by the continued fire of cannon, musketry, and ultimately grape shot of the enemy, that they had hardly men enough left to remain in squares, and therefore were withdrawn from the position by Count Kielmansegge; and the remains of the Legion and Hanoverian brigades, and part of the British brigade, reformed on the high road in rear of the village of Mont St. Jean.

It now only remains for me to assure your Grace that nothing could exceed the bravery, perseverance, and coolness of the troops, which was particularly commendable in such young troops as the Hanoverians. I cannot sufficiently appreciate the judgment displayed by Major-General Sir Colin Halkett, who maintained his ground in every exposed situation during that trying day with the greatest gallantry. Major-General Count Kielmansegge also set a noble example to his brigade by coolness and intrepidity. In the death of Colonel Ompteda, the country has to regret the loss of a gallant officer of superior talents. I have every reason to be satisfied with the services of the Hanoverian head quarters' staff, the divisional and my personal staff, and feel particularly indebted to Colonel Berger, Chief of the Hanoverian staff, for his advice and able assistance. Brevet Major Heise, of the 2nd light battalion, military secretary to the Hanoverians, was with me during the whole action, and very useful to me. The services of Captain Shaw, Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-General, who was senior of the department, in absence of Major Jessop from a wound at the commencement of the action on the 16th, were indispensable to me, particularly in executing the first disposition of the troops for the attack.

All the commanding officers distinguished themselves in the charge entrusted to them, more particularly Lieutenant-Colonel Wurmb, of the Grübenhagen field battalion, who fell in the latter part of the action, and Major Baring, commanding the 2nd light battalion, in the gallant defence of the house until he was forced to abandon it from want of ammunition, even for the few men he had latterly left.

Major Lloyd's and Captain Clewes's brigades of artillery were well served, although severely exposed to the more numerous artillery of the enemy; those of Captain Clewes were particularly useful in checking the advance of the enemy's columns to the wood on the right of the 3rd division. It is but justice to the exertions of Dr. Denecke, physician to the forces, and attached as staff surgeon to the 3rd division, to notice his superior arrangements respecting the wounded men during the action.

I beg to conclude my report by mentioning to your Grace that during the action of the 16th instant also the battalions of the 3rd Division which were engaged showed great steadiness; and Lieutenant-Colonel Klencke, with the Lüneburg field battalion under his command, particularly distinguished themselves on that day, by several times repulsing the enemy into the wood, and maintaining the position on the left of the line.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and humble servant,

CHARLES ALTEN.

Major-Gen. Sir James Kempt to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

REPORT.

Bivouac near Genappe, 19th June, 1815.

In consequence of the lamented fall of Lieutenant-General Sir Thomas Picton (who was unfortunately killed early in the battle of yesterday, at a very critical moment, while nobly animating the troops), the command of the 5th Division and the troops that had been placed under his orders devolved upon me, and it is quite impossible for me to convey by words to your Grace the feelings of admiration with which I beheld the invincible spirit displayed by the British troops in repulsing every attack that was made upon the position where I had the honour to command. The troops were formed in two lines, supported by Major-General the Honourable Sir W. Ponsonby's brigade of cavalry. The 1st line was composed of Dutch and Belgian troops, with the 1st battalion of the 95th regiment under Colonel Sir Andrew Barnard posted on a knoll on the right. The 2nd line was composed of the 8th and 9th brigades of infantry under Major-General Sir Denis Pack and myself, and the 4th and 5th Hanoverian brigades of militia commanded by Colonels Vincke and Best. The enemy having concealed his attack to the last moment, advanced rapidly in three immense columns of infantry, covered by 30 pieces of artillery, directing their heads on the right, centre, and left of the position to the left of the Chaussée. Our first line, acting as light troops, gave way as the columns approached; but the 8th and 9th brigades of infantry instantly advanced, and charged the heads of the columns just as they had gained the crest of the position: a struggle for a few moments ensued, but the invincible spirit and determination of the British troops were such, that these immense masses directed with the greatest fury were absolutely put to flight by two British brigades, weakened as they had been most materially by the severe action which they had fought two days before. Major-General the Honourable Sir W. Ponsonby instantly availed himself of this, and charged in the most gallant manner at the head of his brigade: many prisoners were taken, and three eagles. Shortly after this, Major-General Sir J. Lambert arrived with his brigade to support the 5th Division; and the enemy having formed fresh columns, renewed the attack with the same impetuosity: they were met and repulsed in a similar manner; part of Sir J. Lambert's brigade charged on this occasion, and behaved nobly.

After the failure of these attacks the enemy's efforts were principally directed to the right of the Chaussée; and having gained possession of a large farmhouse (La Haye Sainte), and also the adjoining ridge of equal height with the one which we occupied, I requested Sir J. Lambert to cross the great road with the 27th regiment and retake it: but at this period it was found to be impracticable, all the infantry in this part of the position being formed in squares, and the enemy's cavalry around them. A fresh attack was now made by the enemy along the great road, and under cover of the farmhouse which they occupied: the evident intention was to keep down the advance of our line by a superior fire from the farmhouse and ridge, and under cover of it to push on the mass of infantry in its rear along the Chaussée. A desperate struggle and fire now took place. I directed all the broken ground that afforded the least cover to be completely lined with troops; but in addition to this I found it absolutely necessary to increase our fire by moving up the greatest part of the 27th regiment, which Major-General Lambert posted in as good a situation as circumstances would admit; but it was unavoidably much exposed. The regiment behaved nobly, and suffered exceedingly. The 95th and 32nd were also near this point, and suffered also great loss. The struggle at this point continued for some hours, but every effort of the enemy proved ineffectual, and he never for one moment gained a footing on the position to the left of the great road.

Major-General Sir J. Lambert's arrival to the support was most fortunate, and he conducted the movements of his brigade in the most able manner. He has requested me to transmit the enclosed letter, and to recommend the officers therein mentioned to your Grace's notice, which I have great pleasure in doing. Major-General Sir D. Pack displayed his usual judgment and gallantry in the command of the 9th British brigade, and I am much indebted to him for his advice and assistance after the command devolved on me. Colonel Sir P. Belson succeeded to the command of my brigade, and I have every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which he led it. Colonels Vincke and Best also deserve to be particularly mentioned to your Grace: their brigades, the 4th and 5th Hanoverian, though composed of young militia soldiers, displayed much steadiness, and moved correctly to support various parts that were most threatened, forming squares on several occasions. The two brigades of artillery of the Diet (the British under Major Rogers, and the Hanoverian under Captain Bauer) were ably served and judiciously placed. I lost in my Brigade-Major, who was killed (Captain Eeles, 95th), a most valuable officer; and my aide-de-camp, Captain the Honourable Charles Gore, has served me for several years on continued service, and proved himself on every occasion to be a most active and gallant soldier.

I shall take the liberty of bringing under your Grace's notice the particular claims and merits of the officers commanding regiments in a separate report; but I cannot close this one without mentioning that Colonel Sir A. Barnard, and the next in command, Colonel Cameron of the 95th, were both wounded, and also Colonel Nixon of the 28th, while in the command of it.

Captain Tyler, aide-de-camp to Sir Thomas Picton, joined me immediately on his fall, and I found him particularly intelligent and useful. Captain Tyler was first aide-de-camp to the General, and had served with him for five campaigns: he goes with the body to England.

JAMES KEMPT.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Major-Gen. Sir John Lambert to Major-Gen. Sir James Kempt.

SIR, 19th June, 1815.

The 10th brigade infantry having been ordered up in support of the 5th Division, and to place itself under the orders of Sir Thomas Picton, I beg leave to report to you, as second in command, that I was perfectly satisfied with the conduct of every individual of the brigade in the action of yesterday. I must particularly mention the steady and gallant conduct of the 27th regiment under Major Hare, unavoidably exposed for several hours to a galling fire (well known to you), and was much to be praised; and I should be obliged to you to name him to the Commanding Officer of the Forces particularly. On the death of Major Heyland, of the 40th, Major Browne took the command and continued in it. Major Smith, Brigade-Major, afforded me great assistance by his zeal and abilities. Should the Commander of the Forces think proper to recommend these officers for a Brevet step, I consider them as well meriting it, and should hope it would meet with your approbation my so doing.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient humble servant,

JOHN LAMBERT.

P.S. I am anxious also to mention for the same object Captain Ellis of the 40th, who, though wounded, continued exerting himself to the end of the day in command of the light companies of the brigade, after Captain Holmes of the 27th was killed.

[898.] INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE ARMY, 20TH JUNE, 1815.

The troops to march at 5 in the morning.

The British cavalry will march to the villages of Strepy, Thieu, Boussoit sur Haine and Ville sur Haine, and canton. These villages are between Rœulx and Mons.

Baron Estorff's brigade of Hanoverian cavalry will canton in Givray and Croix, and furnish outposts towards Maubeuge.

The British cavalry will furnish a light brigade to do the outpost duties upon the Sambre, and the brigade will canton in Merbe St. Marie, Bienne le Hapart, and Mont.

WELLINGTON.

[899.] G. O. Nivelles, 20th June, 1815.

2. The Field Marshal takes this opportunity of returning to the army his thanks for their conduct in the glorious action fought on the 18th instant, and he will not fail to report his sense of their conduct in the terms which it deserves to their several Sovereigns.

3. The Field Marshal has observed that several soldiers, and even officers, have quitted their ranks without leave, and have gone to Bruxelles, and even some to Antwerp, where, and in the country through which they have passed, they have spread a false alarm, in a manner highly unmilitary, and derogatory to the character of soldiers.

4. The Field Marshal requests the General officers commanding divisions in the British army, and the General officers commanding the corps of each nation of which the army is composed, to report to him in writing what officers and men (the former by name) are now or have been absent without leave since the 16th instant.

5. The Field Marshal desires that the 14th article of the 14th section of the Articles of War may be inserted in every orderly book of the British army, in order to remind officers and soldiers of the punishment affixed by law to the crime of creating false alarms.

6. As the army is about to enter the French territory, the Field Marshal desires it may be understood by the troops of the several nations composing the army which he has the honour to command, that their Sovereigns are in alliance with the King of France, and that France therefore must be considered as a friendly country.

7. No article is to be taken from any individual by any officer or soldier without payment for the same. The Commissaries of the army will supply the troops with all that they require in the usual manner, and no requisition is to be made direct on the country or its magistrates by any officer or soldier.

8. The Commissaries will receive directions, either from the Field Marshal or from the Generals commanding the troops of the several nations (if these troops should not be supplied with provisions by the British Commissariat), to make such requisitions as may be necessary for the supply of the troops, for which they will give the usual voucher and receipt; and they will understand that they will be responsible to issue and account for what they will thus receive from the country in France, in the same manner as they would if they purchased supplies for the troops in their own country respectively.

9. With a view to preserve order, and to provide for attendance on the hospitals at Bruxelles, the Commander of the Forces desires that one officer, one non-commissioned officer, and three private men, for 100 men sent to the hospital, wounded in the late actions of the 16th and 18th instant, may be sent from the several regiments to Bruxelles to-morrow, and place themselves under the orders of the Commandant there.

10. No regiment need send officers and men for more than 100 men; and in case any regiment has not sent more than 50 men to the hospital, such regiment will send only one non-commissioned officer and two men to take charge of them.

11. This non-commissioned officer and two men must be under the charge and direction of the officer who will go from one of the other regiments of the brigade, which officer the officer commanding the brigade will fix upon.

12. As soon as the officers, non-commissioned officers, and private men will arrive at Bruxelles, they will send to the Commandant a nominal list of the officers and men of their several regiments who are there in hospitals, or on the duty of attending the hospitals.

13. The Commandant at Bruxelles is hereby positively forbidden to allow a billet, or the issue of rations, to any officer or soldier who will be at Bruxelles, whose name is not in the list above mentioned, or who does not proceed thither by route from the Quartermaster-General, or by order from the Field Marshal.

WELLINGTON.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, La Haye, ce 20 Juin, 1815.

L'attente de l'Europe est remplie. Rien ne manque plus à votre gloire. La victoire complète remportée sur Buonaparte vous proclame le plus grand capitaine de votre siècle, et va le priver aux yeux de son parti et de son armée du prestige par lequel il avait su les fasciner. Voilà donc les trophées de la Belgique qui vont se joindre pour vous à ceux de l'Espagne, du Portugal, et de la France. Les malheurs incalculables prévenus par votre victoire, les suites qu'elle présage, non seulement pour mon Royaume, mais pour toute la cause commune, me font anticiper sur les témoignages de reconnaissance par lesquels votre patrie et les Hauts Alliés se plaisaient à anticiper à leur tour sur ceux de la postérité. Je vous exprime mes sentimens avec la plus vive effusion de cœur. Veuillez remercier en mon nom votre brave armée. La mienne sera fière de vos éloges. Je regrette le sang qui a coulé ; celui de mon fils ne pouvait pas être répandu pour une plus belle cause.

Je suis, avec une très haute considération, votre affectionné,

GUILLAUME.

Rapport du Maréchal Grouchy à l'Empereur.

SIRE, Dinant, ce 20 Juin, 1815.

Ce n'est qu'à près de 7 heures du soir, le 18 Juin, que j'ai reçu la lettre du Duc de Dalmatie, qui me prescrivait de marcher sur Saint Lambert, et d'attaquer le Général Bülow. J'avais rencontré l'ennemi en me portant sur Wavres, à hauteur de la Baraque. Sur le champ il avait été abordé, poussé jusque dans Wavres, et le corps Vandamme attaquait cette ville, et était fortement engagé. La portion de Wavres sur la droite de la Dyle était emportée, mais on éprouvait de grandes difficultés à déboucher de l'autre côté. Le Général Gérard essayait d'enlever le moulin de Bielge, et d'y passer la rivière. Il ne pouvait y réussir. Il y avait été blessé d'une balle dans la poitrine, blessure qui heureusement n'est pas mortelle. Le Lieutenant-Général Alix avait été tué à l'attaque de Wavres. Dans cet état de choses, impatient de pouvoir déboucher sur le Mont Saint Lambert, et coopérer aux succès des armes de V.M. dans cette journée si importante, je dirigeai sur Limale la cavalerie de Pajol, la division Teste, et deux des divisions du Général Gérard, afin de forcer le passage de la Dyle, et de marcher contre le Général Bülow. Le corps du Général Vandamme entretint l'attaque de Wavres et du moulin de Bielge, d'où l'ennemi faisait mine de vouloir déboucher; ce que je jugeai qu'il ne pourrait effectuer, la position et le courage de nos troupes répondant qu'il n'y parviendrait pas. Mon mouvement sur Limale prit du temps, à raison de la distance; cependant j'arrivai, j'effectuai le passage, et les hauteurs furent enlevées par la division Vichery et la cavalerie. La nuit ne permet pas d'aller loin, et je n'entendais plus le canon du côté où V.M. se battait.

Dans cette position j'attendis le jour. Wavres et Bielge étaient occupés par les Prussiens. Le 19, à 3 heures du matin, ils attaquèrent à leur tour, voulant profiter de la mauvaise position où j'étais, et prétendant me rejeter dans le défilé, enlever l'artillerie qui avait débouché, et me faire repasser la Dyle. Leurs efforts furent inutiles; l'intrépidité des troupes me mit à même de repousser toutes les attaques, de culbuter les Prussiens, et de faire enlever par la division Teste le village de Bielge. Le brave Général Penne y fut tué.

Le Général Vandamme faisant alors passer par Bielge une de ses divisions, enleva sans peine les hauteurs de Wavres, et sur toute ma ligne le succès fut complet. J'étais en avant de Rozierne, me disposant à marcher sur Bruxelles, lorsque j'ai reçu la douloureuse nouvelle de la perte de la bataille de Waterloo. L'officier qui me l'apporta me dit que V.M. se retirait sur la Sambre, sans pouvoir préciser sur quel point il entrait dans ses vues que je me dirigeasse. Engagé sur toute ma ligne, je cessai de poursuivre, et préparai mon mouvement rétrograde. L'ennemi en retraite ne songea pas à me suivre. Je marchai jusqu'à Temploux et Gembloux, ayant ma cavalerie légère à Mari de Saint Denis, et mes dragons sur Namur. Apprenant que l'ennemi avait déjà passé la Sambre, et se trouvait sur mon flanc; n'étant pas assez fort pour opérer une diversion utile pour l'armée de V.M. sans compromettre celle que je commandais, je marchai sur Namur; le 4e corps par la route de Namur à Charleroi, et le 3e par celle directe qui y conduit de Temploux. Dans ce moment les queues des deux colonnes furent attaquées; celle de droite ayant fait son mouvement rétrograde plus tôt qu'on ne s'y attendait, compromit un instant la retraite de celle de gauche. De bonnes dispositions réparèrent tout; deux pièces qui avaient été prises furent reprises par le brave 20e de Dragons, sous les ordres du Colonel Briqueville, qui enleva en outre un obusier à l'ennemi. Les faibles carrés du —— régiment, chargés par une cavalerie nombreuse, l'attendirent à bout portant, lui firent essuyer une perte énorme, et prouvèrent ce que peuvent de bonnes dispositions, jointes à une attitude calme et un feu bien dirigé. La cavalerie ennemie, chargée à son tour par le 1er de Hussards, aux ordres du Maréchal de Camp Clari, laissa en nos mains nombre de prisonniers. Tout rentra donc sans perte dans Namur. Le long défilé qui règne depuis cette place jusqu'à Dinant, défilé où l'on ne peut marcher que sur une seule colonne, et les embarras résultant des nombreux transports de blessés que je conduisais avec moi, rendaient nécessaire de tenir longtemps la ville, où je ne trouvai pas les moyens de faire sauter le pont. Je chargeai de la défense de Namur le Général Vandamme, qui, avec son intrépidité ordinaire, s'y maintint jusqu'à 8 heures du soir, de sorte que rien ne resta en arrière, et que j'occupai Dinant.

L'ennemi a perdu des milliers d'hommes à l'attaque de Namur : on s'est battu avec un acharnement rare, et les troupes ont fait leur devoir d'une manière bien digne d'éloge.

LE MARÉCHAL COMTE DE GROUCHY.

The Prince d'Eckmühl to Marshal Grouchy.

MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL,

Je viens d'apprendre, par une lettre du Général Bonnemain au Général Dumonceau, que vous étiez à Dinant et à Namur avec votre cavalerie, et les 3e et 4e corps des Généraux Gérard et Vandamme. C'est un événement d'une très grande importance pour notre patrie ; car, après les événemens malheureux des 1er, 2e, et 6e corps et de la Garde près de Jemappes, on était dans les plus vives inquiétudes : la certitude que votre corps est conservé est d'un avantage incalculable dans les circonstances actuelles. J'ignore les ordres que le Duc de Dalmatie a pu vous donner, mais voici ceux auxquels vous devez vous attacher maintenant.

Il faut vous porter avec les 3e et 4e corps, cavalerie et artillerie, sur Laon, en passant par Mézières.

Si vous appreniez d'une manière positive que l'ennemi fut entre vous et Laon, avec des forces majeures, vous vous porteriez sur Reims, et de là sur Soissons. Vous me donnerez fréquemment de vos nouvelles. Prenez toutes les dispositions pour bien maintenir l'ordre dans vos troupes. Vous leur donnerez connaissance des derniers événemens de Paris. L'Empereur vient d'abdiquer, voulant ôter tout prétexte aux Puissances étrangères de continuer la guerre contre nous, puisque, par toutes leurs déclarations, elles ont annoncé que ce n'était qu'à lui qu'elles faisaient la guerre.

Les Chambres viennent de nommer un gouvernement provisoire. Des Commissaires vont être envoyés à toutes les Puissances Alliées pour annoncer cet événement, qui doit ôter tout prétexte à la guerre.

Si les Puissances Alliées, comme on doit l'espérer, ont été de bonne foi dans leurs déclarations, dans peu de jours la paix sera rendue au monde.

Vous sentez, Monsieur le Maréchal, que dans l'hypothèse où cette déclaration ne serait qu'un leurre, il importe, pour le salut de notre patrie, de prendre toutes les mesures pour empêcher les malveillants de mettre de la désorganisation et la désertion dans les troupes.

Vous pouvez et vous devez même envoyer connaissance de ces événemens aux Généraux alliés dans votre voisinage, en les invitant à suspendre toute hostilité jusqu'à ce qu'ils aient reçu des ordres de leurs Souverains.

Ecrivez à tous les préfets et à tous les généraux commandans de place pour leur annoncer ces événemens; invitez-les à prendre des mesures énergiques pour arrêter les déserteurs, faire rejoindre ceux qui auraient abandonné leur poste, soit soldats de ligne, soit Gardes Nationales.

Faites connaître ces événemens à tous les généraux, et conjurez-les, au nom de la patrie, de prendre toutes les mesures pour maintenir dans l'ordre toutes les troupes, et leur rappeler tous les devoirs du soldat Français.

La France compte sur vous, sur le Général Vandamme, et sur le Général Gérard, et sur tous les généraux et officiers, dans cette circonstance importante.

Je vous le répète, l'arrivée de vos corps a fait la plus grande impression à Paris.

Recevez, Monsieur le Maréchal, l'assurance de ma plus haute considération.

PRINCE D'ECKMÜHL.

Lieut.-Gen. C. Alten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, 20th June, 1815.

In consideration of the very severe loss the 3rd Division sustained in the battle of the 18th instant, and the very favourable report on the conduct of every regiment composing it during that trying day, which I considered it my duty to submit to your Grace yesterday, I take the liberty to ask whether your Grace will be pleased to attend to the recommendation of the senior officer of each regiment of the British and Legion Brigade under the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel for a step of brevet rank, which I should be most happy to submit to your Grace. In the mean time I trust your Grace will permit me to recommend the following officers for such promotion:

Major Hans Bussche, of the 1st light battalion King's German Legion, an officer of long tried and distinguished merit, who remained with the battalion of detachments in the Peninsula in 1809, and until the return of the British army from France last year, and was present in most of the Peninsula actions: he lost his arm in the battle of the 18th, and I particularly wish this distinction for him, as his constitution, which is much broke on service, will, if even he recovers, hereafter render him unfit to continue serving.

Major Baring, 2nd light battalion King's German Legion, for his distinguished conduct on the 18th instant in command of the regiment, as noticed in my report of yesterday.

Brevet Major Heise, of the 2nd light battalion King's German Legion, who was with me during the whole of the action of the 18th, and of much assistance, whom His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange has been pleased to assure that he intended recommending him to your Grace for the brevet for the action; who has been for several years Assistant Adjutant-General to the 2nd Division in the Peninsula, and has, since my holding the command of the Hanoverians, been very useful to me as Military Secretary to that corps.

Captain Andrew Clewes, of the Royal German Artillery, who commanded a brigade of artillery with great distinction in the battle of Albuera, in several other actions in the Peninsula, and on the 16th and 18th inst.

Captain Shaw of the 43rd regiment, Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-General, whose services previous to and during the action were most important to me, and is an officer who should be brought forward in order to be placed in situations where his military talents can be best employed.

The above recommendations, which I have taken the liberty to make, I have confined to officers who were present in both the actions of the 16th and 18th, and what fell under my immediate notice. I have written to Major-General Sir Colin Halkett to know whether he has any officers of his brigade he wishes particularly to recommend.

Should your Grace be inclined to attend, either immediately or at some future opportunity, to recommendations of distinguished officers who were wounded on the 16th instant, I beg to draw your Grace's notice to Major Parkinson of the 33rd regiment; Brevet Major Jessop of the 44th regiment, Assistant Quartermaster-General of the 3rd Division, a very useful Staff officer; and my aide-de-camp, Licutenant Havelock of the 43rd regiment.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and humble servant,

CHARLES ALTEN.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Nivelles, 20th June, 1815, 8 A.M.

Although your Grace witnessed the conduct of that part of the troops under my command which had the good fortune to be employed in the action of the 18th instant, still I think it my duty to transmit the accompanying report from Lieutenant-General Sir H. Clinton, commanding the 2nd Division, and beg leave to express my entire concurrence with the Lieutenant-General's sentiments respecting the gallant conduct of the troops on this occasion.

I have also the satisfaction of reporting to your Grace the good conduct of Lieutenant-Colonel Webber Smith's troop of horse artillery, which acted with my corps during the day.

I have also to mention the steady conduct of the 3rd Division of the troops of the Netherlands, under the command of Major-General Chassé, which was moved up in support of Major-General Adam's brigade, to repulse the attack of the Imperial Guard.

The brigade of Belgian artillery also deserve my best thanks for their steady conduct and well directed fire during the last mentioned attack.

I particularly remarked the firm manner with which two battalions of Brunswick infantry, commanded by Major Proestler and Major Holstein (formed in squares in support of the artillery), received the repeated attacks of the enemy's cavalry.

I cannot conclude this report without expressing my particular thanks to Lieutenant-Colonel Sir C. Broke, and to Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Noel Hill, to Major Egerton, Major Churchill, and my personal staff, as well as to Captains Lord C. FitzRoy and Hillier, and their respective departments.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most humble servant,

HILL.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Lieut.-Gen. Sir H. Clinton to Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill.

MY LORD, Nivelles, 19th June, 1815.

I have the honour to report to your Lordship that the conduct of the 2nd Division during the action of yesterday was such as to entitle it to the approbation of your Lordship and to that of the Commander of the Forces. The steadiness with which the young Hanoverian brigade, under Colonel Halkett, sustained the effect of a lasting cannonade during the several hours in which that brigade continued to be in reserve would have been laudable in veteran troops.

From the moment at which the 2nd Division was called upon to take a more active part in the action, by relieving some of the corps in the first line, the good conduct of the whole could hardly be surpassed. The brigade of Colonel du Plat was the first employed in this manner, and it was not long before its valuable commander received a dangerous wound, which will long deprive the army of the benefit of his services. It then fell to Major-General Adam's brigade to take its share of the same honourable service: the manner in which the several regiments—the 52nd, under Colonel Sir J. Colborne; the 71st, under Colonel Rennell; and the 2nd and 9th, under Lieutenant-Colonels Norcott and Ross—discharged their duty, was witnessed and admired by the whole army. It was later in the day when I brought forward the brigade under the command of Colonel Halkett. The alacrity with which this move was performed by every battalion of the brigade, the regularity of its movements, and the correctness of its formations under a destructive cannonade, were very praiseworthy in these young troops. The Salzgitter Battalion, under Major Hammerstein, I employed in reinforcing the post of Hougoumont, at that time vigorously attacked; and the Osnabrück Battalion, under Major Count Münster, advanced with the first line; whilst the Battalions of Bremervorde and Quackinbrück, under Lieutenant-Colonel Count Schulenburg and Major Baron Busch, continued in reserve as a support to the right of the line.

When the handsome repulse of the enemy's last attack afforded the opportunity to become ourselves the attacking body, so judiciously taken advantage of by Major-General Adam's brigade, under your Lordship's immediate direction, I directed Colonel Halkett to reinforce the attacking line with the Osnabrück Battalion, under Lieutenant-Colonel Count Münster; and I added to it the brigade of the German Legion, the command of which had now devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Wissel. The 23rd regiment, under the command of Major Dalmer, in consequence of Lieutenant-Colonel Sir B. W. Ellis being wounded, advanced as a support to the right of the attack. The gallantry with which this service was performed by every corps which had the good fortune to be employed in it, I am sure attracted your Lordship's notice; and I think, without claiming too large a share of merit for these several corps, I may say that the result of their noble efforts greatly contributed to the complete success of this glorious day, though the whole of the artillery and numerous trophies taken from the enemy may belong in common to every corps engaged, as the effect of their exertions. I must report that the enemy was driven from four pieces of cannon which he was attempting to carry off upon the right of the Genappe road by the Osnabrück Battalion, which also, during its advance, got possession of two pair of colours.

Major Simpher's troop of horse artillery, and Captain Bolton's brigade, conducted themselves entirely to my satisfaction. The service has lost an excellent artillery officer in Captain Bolton, who was killed near the close of the day, after usefully exerting himself during the whole of it. Major Simpher's troop followed in support of the cavalry, until darkness put an end to the pursuit of the enemy.

The brigade of the 4th Division commanded by Colonel Mitchell having been placed for the moment under my orders, I am happy in having to make the same favourable report of the conduct of every corps composing this brigade; the 51st Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Rice, having been most usefully employed during the whole of the day, with one squadron of the 15th Hussars, in keeping in check a considerable body of the enemy's cavalry, supported by infantry, which menaced our right; and the 14th Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Tidy, having acted as a support to the 51st, and latterly as a support to the right to the post of Hougoumont. I have also to acknowledge the assistance which I received from Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Jeremiah Dickson, the Assistant Quartermaster-General, and from Captain Bentinck, acting as Assistant Adjutant-General, as well as from the officers of my personal staff. I beg too that your Lordship, in making your report to the Commander of the Forces, will have the enclosed letter from Major-General Adam laid before his Grace.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

H. CLINTON.

Colonel Vanden Bergh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Ath, le 20 Juin, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de vous faire rapport que j'ai déclaré la ville d'Ath en état de siége, et donné l'ordre aux propriétaires des bois, barrières, et haies qui sont dans un rayon de 200 toises ou 500 pas autour de la place, de les abattre : de même je ferai abattre les maisons et autres objets qui me paraissent de pouvoir favoriser l'ennemi, et faire tort pour la défense de la place.

Agréez, Monseigneur, l'assurance du profond respect avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

VANDEN BERGH.

G. A. WOOD.

General Walterstorff to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, 20th June, 1815.

I beg leave to offer to your Grace my most heartfelt congratulation on the glorious success which has crowned your plans, and the unparalleled bravery and firmness of the admirable army under your command. I shall ever regret my not having been by your Grace's side on the memorable 18th June. It was not in my power to join your head-quarters, having only two horses, one for me and one for my son: I expect momently four horses from Denmark. It was impossible to foresee that the campaign would open with a battle that should last four days; and on the 17th it was the general opinion that your Grace would remove your army to Louvain, and there accept a battle. Thank God that this opinion was unfounded.

I intend to purchase some horses to-day and to-morrow, and to set out, with your Grace's permission, for your head-quarters the day after to-morrow. I shall leave my son here until the return of my courier, who no doubt will be here at latest on Sunday.

Permit me, my Lord, to submit to your Grace's consideration, whether the most expeditious manner of bringing our troops to the scene of action would not be that your Grace did send transports to take them on board at Gluckstadt on the Elbe, at the least the infantry and artillery, and to land them at Ostend. I am convinced that any arrangement which Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Admiral Viscount Exmouth.

My Lord, Imperial Head Quarters, Heidelberg, 21st June, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose your Lordship the extract of a despatch received from Lord Bathurst, in consequence of which instruction I had immediate communication with Field Marshal Prince Schwarzenberg relative to the proposed conjoint expedition by a landing at Marseilles, or such other point in the South of France as might be mutually agreed upon between the military authorities of the Emperor of Austria and the naval and military commanders of His Britannic Majesty; and I cannot better put your Lordship in possession of the ideas that have been exposed on the part of Prince Schwarzenberg, as well as what I have conceived myself authorised to state on this subject, than by sending you copies of the correspondence which has taken place between me and the Field Marshal, and which has ended in the determination of sending directions to Italy for this service to be undertaken.

It would be very presuming on my part to make any suggestions to your Lordship on the preparations and means to be employed of the naval part of the expedition; but, in conversing with the Field Marshal, I have ventured to state my persuasion that such means of transport for horses for the artillery and General officers, &c., would be afforded as may be compatible with the means in your Lordship's possession. I have also held myself responsible that the British ships of war would watch over the fate of the disembarkation, so as to secure, in case of reverse, the return of the troops.

It has occurred to me that as the Austrian troops are by no means in the habit of being embarked, and may consequently suffer much from sickness and during the voyage, an immediate offensive on their landing might be disadvantageous: how far therefore landing at Nice might be preferable, and moving from thence to Marseilles, on which a combined attack by land and sea might be made, your Lordship and the military commanders on the spot can best determine.

I am ignorant what the Spaniards are doing with their army of Aragon: if they were in much force and forward, perhaps Cette might be considered as a better point of debarkation.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and respect, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

Stewart.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Lieut.-Gen. Count Nugent.

Sir, Imperial Head Quarters, Heidelberg, 21st June, 1815.

As I think the Austrian courier, who is the bearer of these despatches, will sooner reach you than either Lieutenant-General M'Farlane or Sir Hudson Lowe, and as I know your zeal will induce you to forward to Admiral Lord Exmouth, as well as the above General officers, the determination which the present communications convey with the least possible delay, I think it most judicious to send you, under flying seal, my despatch and enclosures to Lord Exmouth. These, with the instructions sent from Lord Bathurst to General M'Farlane and Sir Hudson Lowe, which I also annex, together with such orders as may be transmitted from Field Marshal Prince Schwarzenberg by the present opportunity to General Frimont and yourself, leaves me nothing to add but my anxious wish for the success of your expedition, which I am sure will be conducted with that zeal and ability which distinguish you and my friend Sir Hudson.

I would have wished the force destined for this undertaking had been greater, and my instructions from home mention 15,000 men, Austrians; but the Field Marshal has assured me that 10,000 men shall, by the completion of the battalions, be appropriated for this service; and with the means which General M'Farlane will give, and the spirit that you will find in the country, I trust a very fortunate result even with diminished numbers may be expected.

I have not opened Lord Bathurst's instructions to our General officers: they may call their attention to more points than I am aware of; but I have a firm reliance that the same spirit which has prevailed in all operations in the south of Italy will equally be exerted in overcoming all little difficulties that may possibly arise in carrying the detail of this service into effect.

I shall esteem it as a favour if you will communicate this letter to Generals M'Farlane and Lowe, who will have the goodness in the hurry of the departure of the courier to consider it equally addressed to them.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest truth and respect, Sir,
Your most obedient, humble servant,

STEWART.

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, 21st June, 1815.

It has become impossible for me to enter into any detailed account of the operations of the corps under my command in the actions of the 16th and 18th instant in consequence of the wound I received on the latter day.

I cannot, however, omit to mention to your Grace how extremely satisfied I am with the conduct of the General officers and troops under my command on that occasion.

Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Alten, commanding the 3rd British Division, and Lieutenant-General Cooke, commanding the 1st Division, merit my thanks; as do Major-Generals Maitland and Byng, commanding brigades of Guards; Major-General Sir Colin Halkett, Count Kielmansegge, and Colonel Ompteda, commanding brigades of the 3rd Division: the latter was unfortunately killed while leading his brigade to the charge.

Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Saltoun, 1st Guards, and Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonell, Coldstream Guards, to whom was entrusted the command of the house of Hougoumont, particularly distinguished themselves.

Colonel Wurmb, commanding the Hanoverian battalion of Grtibenhagen, who, I am sorry to state, is killed, and Brigade-Major Heise, aide-de-camp to Lieutenant-General Sir C. Alten, were conspicuous for their gallantry and conduct. To Colonel the Hon. Alexander Abercrombie, Assistant Quartermaster-General, for the zeal, activity, and intelligence he has uniformly displayed, every praise is due.

I am also much indebted to Lieutenant-Colonel Sir George Berkeley, Assistant Adjutant-General, who was unfortunately wounded early in the day, and to the officers of my personal staff.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE.

Marshal Prince Schwarzenberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Heidelberg, ce 21 Juin, 1815.

Recevez, M. le Duc, les complimens les plus sincères des brillantes victoires que vous venez d'avoir si glorieusement remportées. Il est permis à tout militaire d'éprouver des regrets de ne pas avoir assisté à des exploits aussi mémorables; mais croyez, Milord, ce que je vous dis du fond de mon cœur, qu'on ne saurait être plus digne de tant de gloire que vous.

Je tâcherai de presser mes marches le plus que possible, pour faire la besogne que vous voudrez peut-être nous laisser.

Veuillez, M. le Duc, agréer les assurances de ma haute considération, et de ma plus parfaite amitié.

SCHWARZENBERG.

General Earl Cathcart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, The Imperial Head-quarters, Heidelberg, 21st June, 1815.

I seize the opportunity of Lord Stewart's messenger to assure your Grace that while I contemplate the most arduous victory you have gained, and the important service you have rendered to all Europe, with the admiration and enthusiasm which the Allied Sovereigns and all manner of persons here have already expressed by every demonstration of gratitude and joy, there is no individual who rejoices more sincerely that you have added this wreath to your laurels, and that it has again been your good fortune to lead the British army to action in a manner that does equal honour to their valour and to your talent.

Accept then, my dear Lord, my most sincere congratulations, and Believe me, with every sentiment of regard and attachment,

Most faithfully yours,

CATHCART.

The Duc de Feltre to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Gand, le 21 Juin, 1815.

Je viens de recevoir la lettre de Votre Excellence, datée de Nivelles le 20 Juin, au sujet du mouvement qu'elle pense que le Roi doit faire. J'ai pris, sur-le-champ, les ordres de Sa Majesté, dont la première pensée était de se rendre à Mons aujourd'hui même ; mais pour faciliter le voyage des personnes de sa suite, et pour donner le tems à ses troupes d'arriver à Mons presque au même moment qu'elle le Roi s'est déterminé à partir demain de bonne heure pour Grammont, Sa Majesté partira le lendemain pour se rendre ce jour-là même à Mons, où le corps de Monseigneur le Duc de Berri arrivera le lendemain.

Le Roi remercie Votre Excellence, et particulièrement pour l'envoi du Colonel Torrens, auquel j'ai fait part des dispositions arrêtées par Sa Majesté.

J'ai l'honneur d'être avec une haute considération, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE DUC DE FELTRE.

Lieut.-Gen. F. Decken to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, 21st June, 1815.

Having received an order from His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge to transmit the command of the Hanoverian corps of reserve to Lieutenant-General Charles Baron Alten, and to proceed to Hanover without loss of time, with my Staff, I have made the necessary arrangements to that effect, and intend to leave Bruxelles very soon, if your Grace should have no further commands for me.

I feel myself very unhappy that all my endeavours to obtain leave to serve in the army under your Grace's command have been unsuccessful.

I am, my Lord Duke, with the greatest respect,

Your Grace's most obedient and very humble servant,

FRED. DECKEN.

The Prince Regent to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR WELLINGTON, Carlton House, 22nd June, 1815.

I lose not a moment in communicating to you the fulness of my joy and admiration at the unparalleled triumph of your last and greatest achievement. Greatest, my dear Lord, not only in military glory, but in political importance ; and not only in this proof of what all believed, that even the consummate skill of the Corsican could not withstand the superior genius of our own hero, but in the now nearly realised expectation, resulting from this victory, that England, under the auspices of her transcendent General, is again destined to rescue the world from tyranny and oppression.

Receive the fullest tribute of my gratitude, as the representative of the Sovereign of this favoured land, whose happiness has no alloy but in the grief we must feel for the loss of the brave who have fallen.

I have now, my dearest Lord, only to add my thanks to the Almighty for having, in His mercy, preserved your life in this most dreadful and sanguinary conflict; and my prayers for His constant protection of your person, and His fullest blessings in the glorious exertions which may yet remain for you to make in the final deliverance of Europe.

I remain, my dear Lord, your most sincere friend,

GEORGE, P. R.

The Duke of York to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 22nd June, 1815.

My official acknowledgment of your despatch will be conveyed to you by the return of Lieutenant-Colonel Percy; but I cannot allow the mail of this evening to go without privately expressing my hearty congratulations upon your brilliant and most important achievement. The victory of the 18th is an event which in itself and its probable consequences assumes an importance equal to, if not beyond, anything in European history; and though the firmness of the troops is beyond all praise, yet the success must ever in justice be acknowledged to proceed from your own personal conduct and presence of mind.

Such a triumph could not be gained without loss; and great as ours is, it could not have been otherwise, considering the nature and severity of the conflict.

We have hitherto suspended the issue of any of the 3rd class of the Order of the Bath until some such an occasion as the present should occur for its introduction; and I beg that you will recommend such officers, not lower than the rank of Major, whom you may think deserving of having the distinction of Companion of the Bath conferred upon them.

It has been judged expedient not to allow any more officers under the rank of Major-General to be introduced into the class of Commanders of the Bath; and I am desirous of receiving your Grace's opinion as to the General officers serving under you who should succeed to the vacant ribbons of the 2nd class, occasioned by the late battle.

Your Grace may be assured that I shall use every exertion towards your reinforcement, and I am in hopes that the government here and in Ireland will consent to 6000 or 7000 infantry being drawn from that country, even before the militia can be assembled. In the mean time I have ordered three regiments from hence to embark, exclusive of the 38th, which sailed on the 19th; and three regiments of cavalry, in addition to all that the depôts will afford, will be forwarded for immediate embarkation, as also the 2nd battalion of the 12th, and the 64th regiment, which is just reported as arrived at Portsmouth from Nova Scotia.

According to the wish expressed in your private letter to Lord Bathurst, I have ordered Lord Combermere to go to you immediately, and I am obliged to appoint Lord George Beresford to go out with the heavy regiments now under orders.

I shall communicate with you to-morrow by Lieutenant-Colonel Percy relative to General officers to repair your losses, and I beg that you will let me know if there are any individuals of that rank whom you may want.

I am, my dear Lord Duke, ever yours most sincerely,

FREDERICK.

I have the pleasure to acquaint you that Major Percy has received the brevet of Lieutenant-Colonel.

The Queen of Wurtemberg to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Louisbourg, 22nd June, 1815.

After the glorious news which the King has received from General de Hügel of the victory your Lordship has obtained over the French, all Europe owes you thanks for having, through the mercy of Providence, been the saviour of the Continent.

I feel most grateful to the Almighty for having crowned the Allied armies with success, and, as a true English woman, am proud that the commanding General should be a Briton. I congratulate your Lordship on this great victory, trusting that you have not only crushed the spirit of the enemies by their defeat, but that you will soon destroy all their plans and conquer that peace which Europe stands in need of.

I am happy, my Lord Duke, to have this opportunity to assure your Lordship of the high esteem and regard with which I remain, my Lord Duke,

Your friend

CHARLOTTE.

ON THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

Bruxelles, ce 22 Juin, 1815.

Après la bataille du 16, dont j'ai eu l'honneur de faire mon rapport le 17, à 2 heures du matin, de mon quartier-général à Nivelles, le Duc de Wellington, pour rester en ligne avec l'armée Prussienne, fit, le matin du même jour, un mouvement par suite duquel l'armée se trouva en position, à 6 heures du soir, sur les hauteurs en avant de Waterloo, et y bivaqua. La cavalerie ennemie, suivant les mouvemens de l'armée, fut repoussée plusieurs fois avec grande perte par celle des Anglais. Le 18, au point du jour, nous découvrîmes l'ennemi en face de nous, et à 10 heures ses dispositions pour l'attaque commencèrent.

L'armée de Buonaparte était composée des 1er, 2e, 3e, 4e, et 6e corps, de la Garde Impériale, et de presque toute la cavalerie, et d'une artillerie composée de plusieurs centaines de pièces de canon.

Vers les 11 heures l'ennemi démasqua une batterie de quelques canons, sous le feu de laquelle ses tirailleurs s'avancèrent contre notre aile droite, et immédiatement après son attaque fut dirigée contre une ferme entourée de bois, qui était située à peu de distance en avant de cette aile, et à gauche de la route de Nivelles. L'ennemi fit les plus vives attaques pour se rendre maître de cette ferme ; mais toutes ses tentatives furent vaines. A midi la canonnade devint forte, et avant midi et demi le combat fut général sur toute la ligne. L'ennemi attaqua plusieurs fois les deux ailes ; mais, comme son but principal était de faire une trouée sur la droite de notre centre, il tenta tout pour y réussir. Les colonnes de cavalerie ennemie furent conduites avec beaucoup de résolution ; mais, nonobstant qu'elles réitérassent avec la plus grande opiniâtreté leurs attaques depuis 3 heures et demie jusqu'à la fin de la bataille, rien ne put cependant forcer notre ligne à la retraite. L'ennemi fut toujours repoussé, tant par le feu des carrés que par les charges de cavalerie. Il est impossible de décrire à V.M. l'acharnement avec lequel on combattit, surtout pendant les 6 dernières heures.

Je n'ai pu jouir du bonheur de voir la fin de cette bataille, aussi glorieuse qu'importante, ayant reçu, une demi-heure avant la déroute de l'ennemi, un coup de feu à l'épaule gauche, qui me força de quitter le champ de bataille.

Je m'estime on ne peut plus heureux de pouvoir annoncer à V.M. que ses troupes de toutes armes ont combattu avec beaucoup de bravoure. Dans les charges de la cavalerie la brigade des Carabiniers s'est particulièrement distinguée.

La division du Lieutenant-Général Chassé est arrivée tard au feu ; et, comme je ne pouvais m'éloigner de ma personne du centre, je l'avais mise, pour ce jour-là, sous les ordres de Lord Hill, commandant le 2e corps d'armée ; et j'ai reçu avis que cette division a combattu vaillamment, et que le Lieutenant-Général Chassé, ainsi que les deux commandans des brigades, se sont très bien acquittés de leur devoir.

Il ne m'est pas encore possible de faire connaître à V.M. la perte que nous avons essuyée, n'ayant pas encore reçu les rapports. En attendant, je suis obligé, néanmoins, avec le plus profond chagrin, de dire qu'elle est très grande. Les généraux de division sont chargés de me faire connaître ceux qui se sont particulièrement distingués, et je dois me borner à nommer à V.M. ceux qui se sont distingués sous mes yeux, savoir :—

Les Lieutenans-Généraux Collaert et de Perponcher. Le premier est blessé.

Le Général Van Merle, habile et brave officier, est mort de ses blessures sur le champ de bataille. Je saisis cette occasion pour recommander sa veuve et ses enfans à la tendre considération de V.M.

Le Général Tripp s'est particulièrement distingué, tant par ses talens que par son courage.

Le Général-Major Grigny, et les commandans des 3 régimens de Carabiniers : savoir :—Le Lieutenant-Colonel Conegrave, mort de ses blessures ; le Colonel de Bruine, et le Lieutenant-Colonel Lechleitner, blessés. Le Lieutenant-Colonel Westenberg, du 5e bataillon de la milice nationale, est un très bon officier, et a conduit avec beaucoup de discernement son bataillon, qui a montré beaucoup de bravoure dans la bataille du 16.

Le Major Eyman, du 3e bataillon, blessé.

Les Majors Meriex et Bryas, du 2e régiment de Carabiniers. Le dernier blessé.

Le Major de l'Artillerie de Lassaraz.

Le Quartiermaître-Général, le Général-Major de Constant Rebecque, s'est très bien conduit, et m'a été d'un grand service.

Enfin, je me crois encore obligé de témoigner a V.M. mon contentement à l'égard de la conduite de mes adjudans. Le Major de Linbourg Stirme a déjà été blessé dans la bataille du 16; et dans celle du 18, le Colonel du Caylar et le Major Ampt ont eu chacun un cheval tué sous eux; et le Lieutenant-Colonel de Krokenburgh en a eu deux.

J'ai chargé le Major Van Hooff, mon adjudant, de remettre ce rapport à V.M. Je prends la liberté de recommander cet officier à votre favorable considération.

GUILLAUME, PRINCE D'ORANGE.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 22nd June, 1815.

I have the honour, by direction of the Commander-in-Chief, to acquaint your Grace that the undermentioned troops have been ordered to proceed to Flanders as a reinforcement to the army under your command:— 2nd Dragoon Guards, 5th do., and 3rd Dragoons, three squadrons each (these troops go out under the charge of Lord George Beresford, who is accordingly placed upon the staff of the force in Flanders; but it is left to your Grace to continue them as a brigade or not, as you may consider expedient); 12th Foot, 2nd battalion; 64th; 44th, 2nd battalion (detachment), 500; 1st Foot Guards (do.), 200; Coldstream do. (do.), 200; 3rd do. (do.), 200.

I am further to acquaint your Grace that the regiments stated in the margin * have been held in readiness for immediate embarkation in Ireland, upon the government deciding on the expediency of their being spared; but in the meanwhile I have ordered Sir George Hewitt to select three of them, the most contiguous to Cork, and to embark them accordingly for Ostend.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's faithful and very obedient servant,

H. TORRENS.

* 11th Foot, 1st battalion; 21st, 1st battalion; 34th, 2nd battalion; 36th; 45th; 50th; 62nd, 2nd battalion; 74th; 83rd, 2nd battalion; 84th, 2nd battalion.

Lieut.-Gen. Baron Vincent to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, le 22 Juin, 1815, à dix heures du matin.

Le Major Baron de Scheel, aide-de-camp du Prince de Schwarzenberg, vient de m'arriver, et les dépêches dont il est porteur m'intiment de porter à la connaissance de Votre Excellence les changemens arrivés dans la disposition générale d'après le retard de l'arrivée des troupes Russes, et quelques idées particulières de l'Empereur Alexandre, dont cependant on est venu à bout de le faire revenir.

La pièce ci-jointe vous mettra au fait, My Lord, de ce qui a été convenu en dernier lieu entre les chefs des différentes armées: votre signalée victoire du 18 facilitera sans doute beaucoup le système des opérations.

Le Prince de Schwarzenberg a été instruit le 18 de la nouvelle du commencement des hostilités à l'armée du Maréchal Blücher: on le sera, sans doute, à cette heure de l'événement glorieux que l'on doit à Votre Excellence.

Si Votre Excellence a quelque chose à mander au Prince de Schwarzenberg, je la prie de me donner ses directions par le Major Baron de Scheel: je les transmettrai sans délai au quartier-général du Prince de Schwarzenberg.

Recevez, My Lord, l'hommage de ma haute considération.

VINCENT.

[ENCLOSURE.]

PROTOCOLE de la Conférence du 15 Juin, 1815.

Présens.

S.A. le Maréchal Prince de Schwarzenberg.
S.E. le Maréchal Comte Barclay de Tolly.
S.A. le Prince Volkonsky.
S.E. le Lieut.-Général Comte Radetzky.
S.E. le Lieut.-Général de Knesebeck.
S.E. le Lieut.-Général de Diebitsch.
Le Général-Major de Langenau.

Après avoir délibéré sur les opérations des armées du Haut Rhin, ainsi que de celle de S.E.M. le Maréchal Barclay, et sur l'époque où l'on commencerait les opérations, il a été décidé d'un commun accord qu'on agirait de la manière suivante.

L'armée Russe aura effectuée le passage du Rhin entre Mannheim et Mayence du 21 au 29 de ce mois, et se concentrera sans délai près de Kaiserslautern.

Elle se dirigera de ce point sur Nancy ou sur Luneville, d'après les circonstances.

L'armée Bavaroise et le 3me. corps seront détachés de l'armée du Haut Rhin pour marcher à la tête de l'armée Russe, et pour couvrir son flanc gauche:

Dans le cas que le Général Rapp restât dans sa position actuelle il sera attaqué le 25 de ce mois par le Maréchal Wrede et par le 3me. corps.

Cette attaque sera soutenue par les corps Russes qui seront disponibles.

Après cette attaque l'armée Bavaroise et le 3me. corps suivront l'ennemi d'après les chances qu'il leur offre.

Le gros de l'armée du Haut Rhin, savoir: le 1er., le 2nd. corps, et le corps de réserve, débouchcront le 27 Juin par Bâle sur la route de Langres.

A fur et mesure que le gros de cette armée s'avancera, l'armée Bavaroise et le 3me. corps se dirigeront par leur gauche, pour rejoindre aussitôt que possible l'armée du Haut Rhin.

Le 3me. corps tâchera même de se diriger par la vallée du Rhin, pour faciliter le blocus des forteresses de Strasbourg, Brisac, et Schlestadt.

L'armée du Haut Rhin tout en prenant la direction de Langres, et l'armée Russe en se dirigeant sur Nancy, auront pour objet principal leur jonction entre les points nommés.

Lieut.-Gen. Baron Vincent to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Bruxelles, le 22 Juin, 1815.

Je veux profiter de l'occasion du courrier que j'expédie à Votre Excellence pour lui témoigner le regret que j'éprouve de n'avoir pu assister jusqu'à la fin à la journée mémorable du 18, journée dont on ne peut attribuer le succès qu'aux vertus militaires que Votre Excellence réunit dans un si éminent degré. Je la prie de recevoir mes sincères félicitations à l'occasion de sa victoire.

Le Prince de Talleyrand est arrivé hier ici : il part aujourd'hui pour Gand : il est venu chez moi, et nous avons eu un long entretien. Il désire vivement pouvoir conférer avec Votre Excellence sur le moment actuel, afin de faire valoir des idées justes et morales. Je lui ai dit ce qui me paraissait le plus naturel, de vous demander, My Lord, un rendez-vous dans le voisinage de votre armée. Si Votre Excellence approuvait cette idée, elle pourrait peut-être lui écrire quelques mots par le retour de mon courrier, si elle ne préférait que ce fut directement.

Je me flatte, My Lord, de ne pas rester long-tems loin de vous : dès que ma main sera délivrée du seul corps ennemi que Votre Excellence ait laissé en Belgique, j'espère me rendre près d'elle.

Agréez, My Lord, l'hommage de mon attachement et l'assurance de ma haute considération.

Vincent.

Lieut.-Gen. C. Alten to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord Duke, Bruxelles, 22nd June, 1815.

It is with the utmost concern that I have been informed by Major-General Count Kielmansegge that an unintentional error in my report to your Grace respecting the action of the 18th instant has been productive of incurring your Grace's displeasure on that General officer.

Towards the close of the action, and immediately previous to my being wounded, I found one of the squares of Count Kielmansegge's brigade, on which the fire of grape was so tremendous that the four faces of the square are marked by the bodies on the field of battle, give way a little. As I found myself at that time with another square, which was equally critically situated, I remained with it, and directed the Count to stop the square which was giving way, and bring it up again; which the General immediately complied with with that zeal he always shows to comply with the orders of his superiors, to the best of his power. I was immediately after wounded and obliged to quit the field; and it was from the circumstance which was mentioned to me that the remainder of the division had been collected in rear of the village of Mont St. Jean without my being able to learn the positive reason how they left the position, and having witnessed the gallantry of every individual regiment of the division during the whole of the day under the most severe fire and trying circumstances, I concluded they had not quitted the position without order, but under the sanction of the General officer commanding by higher authority. The expression, however, "withdrawn from the position by Count Kielmansegge," which I used in my report, was not the proper one; and I have to appeal to your Grace's indulgence to make an allowance for the hurry in which the report was dictated by me, and at a time when I was suffering under the effects of a wound. I have doubly to regret the circumstance, as, independent of my giving your Grace the trouble to peruse this letter, it has for a time implicated the military character of an officer who, on the day of the 18th in particular, has given proofs of the greatest intrepidity, and is indeed the last man I know of who would abandon his post if he could help it without orders.

After this explanation on my part, who gave the unintentional cause of its becoming necessary, may I be allowed to ask it as a particular favour that your Grace will be pleased to have the Count's conduct so far publicly cleared as to order an inquiry of the Commanding officers whether the Count gave such an order; and, in justice to the troops who fought with such bravery on that day, whether the squares were not so far reduced in number as no longer to allow of that formation, which I understand to be the case, but, as I was no longer an eye-witness, cannot vouch for, although inclined to believe from what I witnessed as long as I was with them. If I could still further hope to meet with an indulgent ear, I venture to express a wish that in case your Grace has not already superseded the Count in command of the 3rd Division, you will be pleased to allow him to retain it for a short period, in order to do away the appearance of his being superseded on account of the above unfortunate circumstance.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and most humble servant,

CHARLES ALTEN.

General Walterstorff to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Bruxelles, ce 22 Juin, 1815.

Connaissant l'intérêt que vous prenez aux événemens qui peuvent être considérés comme agréable au Roi mon maître, je m'empresse d'avoir l'honneur de prévenir Votre Excellence que je viens de recevoir, par M. le Prince de Talleyrand, une lettre de M. le Comte de Bernstorff, de Vienne, en date du 7 de ce mois, par laquelle ce ministre m'apprend qu'il vient conjointement avec son frère de signer avec les plénipotentiaires du Roi de Prusse une traité d'échange, par lequel le Roi mon maître cède à S.M.

Prussienne ses droits et titres sur la Pomeranie Suédoise et l'île de Rügen. La Prusse cède au Dannemark le Duché de Lauenbourg, et procure de la part de la Suède une renonciation formelle et complète à ses prétentions formées sur des événemens postérieurs au Traité de Kiel.

Voilà du moins un terme à nos longues et fâcheuses contestations avec la Suède.

Je suis avec la plus haute considération et avec un attachement respectueux, My Lord Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

WALTERSTORFF.

P.S. I have not been able as yet to find a horse that would suit me, but hope to be more successful in the course of this day or to-morrow.

Count Einsiedel to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Dresde, le 22 Juin, 1815.

Le Roi, mon auguste maître, vous avait exprimé en date de Laxenbourg, le 21 Mai dernier, son désir de faire joindre ses troupes à l'armée de Sa Majesté Britannique, et de leur procurer l'avantage de servir sous les ordres de Votre Excellence.

La direction donnée depuis au corps Saxon par le Général en chef Prussien, en l'éloignant de l'armée Britannique, met le Roi dans le cas de renoncer, quoiqu'avec regret, à cette première disposition, et Sa Majesté vient de charger en conséquence son ministre au grand quartier-général de demander la réunion de ses troupes à l'armée commandée par le Prince de Schwarzenberg.

En informant Votre Excellence de cette démarche je dois au nom de Sa Majesté appeler son intention bienveillante sur un objet qui est de la plus haute importance pour la Saxe. Les troupes Saxonnes ont partagé pendant la dernière guerre les travaux des armées Alliées; elles vont les partager de nouveau; et rien ne sera négligé par le gouvernement Saxon pour seconder leurs efforts par tous les moyens en son pouvoir. Mais ceux-ci n'étant que très bornés après les malheurs dont le pays a été accablé, il paraît conforme à l'intérêt même de la cause commune de faire participer la Saxe dans une juste proportion aux secours accordés par la Grande Bretagne aux Puissances coalisées. Les troupes Saxonnes ne seront pas indignes de fixer l'intérêt du gouvernement Britannique, et c'est à cet effet, Monsieur le Duc, que le Roi réclame avec instance votre intervention officielle.

M. le Lieutenant-Général de Funk, qui aura l'honneur de vous remettre cette lettre, est chargé de vous présenter les notions que vous pourriez désirer sur l'état du corps Saxon, et de vous entretenir particulièrement sur l'objet des subsides. Sa Majesté se flatte que Votre Excellence lui fera un accueil favorable.

Je prie Votre Excellence d'agréer les assurances de la très haute considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE COMTE DERLEV EINSIEDEL.

The Emperor of Russia to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Heidelberg, ¼ Juin, 1815.

Je m'empresse, M. le Duc, de vous féliciter de la brillante victoire que vous venez de remporter. Vous connaissez trop mes sentimens pour ne pas être persuadé combien je prends part à la nouvelle gloire que vous avez acquise dans cette immortelle journée.

Je vous prie d'accepter de ma part une épée militaire, garnie de lauriers, comme un gage de mon admiration et de l'estime particulière que je vous ai vouée.

Mes armées sont arrivées sur le Rhin, et elles vont suivre immédiatement la direction qui peut les mettre à même de co-opérer avec celles de la Belgique.

Recevez, M. le Duc, l'assurance de mon sincère attachement.

ALEXANDRE.

The Marquess Wellesley to Earl Bathurst.

MY DEAR BATHURST, Apsley House, 23rd June, 1815, Friday night.

I received your kind note this day on my return to town, and I request you to be assured that I am truly grateful for your early congratulations on my brother's transcendent increase of glory. I was not apprised (and could not be) that the motions on this interesting subject would be proposed this day in the House of Lords; I should otherwise have attended, and probably expressed my sentiments. I sincerely hope that this victory will accelerate the conclusion of the war, and I shall be most anxious to observe its consequences in that view.

Yours most sincerely,

WELLESLEY.

The Earl of Aberdeen to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Argyll House, 23rd June, 1815.

I cannot refrain from obtruding on your Grace for a few moments in the midst of your important occupations, in order to express the feelings with which I received your note of the 19th.*

That my brother should live in your recollection is by far the most sensible consolation I can possibly receive for his loss. His attachment and devotion to your person were well known to me; and though I had fondly hoped that under your auspices and protection he would one day have acquired a distinguished name and have rendered important services to his country, yet the manner in which you speak of him proves to me that even now he cannot be said to have lived in vain. You may meet with many, superior perhaps in other respects, but in the zeal and devotion with which his whole heart was employed in your service it would be difficult to find his equal. In the blaze of glory which accompanies your career, and which I doubt not will attend you to its close, that you should condescend sometimes to remember my brother with a sigh, is the idea on which I dwell with the greatest satisfaction, as indeed it will be infinitely the most valuable tribute which can ever be paid to his memory.

I have now only to express my grateful thanks for your kind consideration, and to assure you that I remain, my dear Lord,

Your Grace's most sincere and faithful servant,

ABERDEEN.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 23rd June, 1815.

Major Percy will return to-morrow, and be the bearer of the official despatches conveying to you the sense which the Regent and everybody entertains of your unexampled exertions and success. But I cannot allow the mail to go out without writing a private letter to congratulate you most heartily on a victory which is not only splendid beyond all comparison, but is most fortunately timed, and will, I trust, hasten the conclusion of our contest. I will let you know to-morrow more particularly than I can now do what reinforcements can be sent out both in cavalry and infantry. You may rest assured we will do our best both in numbers and promptitude, orders having been given already wherever orders could have been given.

Pray take more care of your person. The day of the 18th might possibly have made it necessary for you to commit yourself frequently; but no such necessity can possibly exist in future: and however promising our prospects now are, your fall, or even temporary incapacity of active command, would at once, I am confident, change the whole scene and disappoint our just expectations.

Yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

I enclose a letter from Lord Lynedoch to you, which I opened by mistake.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Mons, 23rd June, 1815.

I think it necessary to communicate to your Lordship the copy of a private letter I have this day addressed to Lord Castlereagh, which explains the events I have witnessed during the last four-and-twenty hours. I must add that M. de Vaublanc has taken advantage of these circumstances to submit to the King's consideration a proclamation which he thinks it will be expedient to publish upon crossing the frontier.

This paper, announcing the absolute dissolution of the army and the reform of the officers in every rank, promises the convocation of the Chambers whenever the state of affairs shall permit it, and states that under the 14th Article of the Constitution the King will adopt such measures, and take such precautions under his own authority, as the welfare of the country shall appear to require.

M. de Blacas had already caused several of the expressions in this act to be modified, when I suggested that the signature should be delayed until His Majesty has seen your Lordship. He will therefore bring it to Câteau Cambrésis to-morrow, where I doubt not your Lordship's opinion will prevent the adoption of any measure which may be prejudicial to their interests.

I remain, my dear Lord, most truly yours,

CHARLES STUART.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Sir Charles Stuart to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Grammont, 22nd June, 1815.

I think it necessary to acquaint your Lordship in confidence that M. L'Aisné, President of the Chamber of Deputies in France, lately arrived at Ghent under a feigned name, and, after staying three days in that town, during which time he had repeated opportunities of communicating with the King and his ministers, he returned to France.

I understand that arrangements for the convocation of the Chambers, and the establishment of an executive government guided by a responsible administration, were settled by His Majesty in several interviews with this gentleman.

From information received, as I believe, through the channel of Monsieur L'Aisné, it is known that those individuals who were implicated in the death of Louis XVI. have been lately much occupied by the consideration of the measures it will be most expedient to adopt in case military events should destroy the power of Buonaparte; and Fouché, together with Carnot, who are now in some measure reconciled, have been active in their support of a party who are disposed to bring forward the Duc d'Orléans.

The truth of this statement has been corroborated by circumstances which afford a tolerable idea of the state of parties at Paris.

Fouché and Carnot, in communicating their views respecting the Duc d'Orléans to M. Lanjuinais, who is just now the President of the Chamber, requested to know how far they might rely upon his concurrence. He replied that his mode of thinking would, under the contingency of Buonaparte's removal, admit of no alternative but a republican form of government; and he immediately sought and obtained the means of conveying what had passed to the knowledge of the Court of Ghent, and declared his intention to omit no opportunity of advancing the King's interests which the situation he now holds may afford.

The King, in acknowledging this message, expressed his wish to reward the services M. Lanjuinais may render, and has directed him to communicate with the six persons to whom his authority was delegated on the day the successful issue of the battle of Waterloo was known upon every subject connected with his interests.

At this period M. de Talleyrand may be daily expected to join the Court. The persons, however, who have been most active in their animosity to M. de Blacas, and in their endeavours to place the direction of affairs in the hands of the former Minister, have not been pleased with the language of his late communications with the King; and in adverting with acrimony to the tone of these letters, declare their intention to separate their cause from that of M. de Talleyrand in case an attempt to conciliate M. de Blacas should be (as it probably will be) the first act of that Minister after his arrival.

I have made no answer to these observations, but I had a conversation with M. de Blacas, which proves their uneasiness to be ill-founded.

Calling upon that Minister on the night of our arrival at Grammont, I found him extremely agitated; and during a discourse on different subjects, it was easy to perceive that he was combating a very strong emotion.

He stopped me when I was about to take my leave, saying that the number of years we had been acquainted, and the friendship he was pleased to observe I had manifested towards him, not less than the confidence Louis XVIII. had reposed in me, had determined him to impart to me a resolution he had just adopted. He said that the circumstances of the war permitted His Majesty to re-enter France immediately; that the outcry which had been equally raised against him by the regicides in France, and the persons who intrigue for office in the Court of Ghent, render it impossible for him to continue to serve His Majesty with advantage; that the course of the important political events we may expect almost daily to take place will compel the King to adopt strong measures, which will be odious if appearing to emanate from his counsels, and that he will therefore sacrifice his own feelings and advantage to the public good, and quit the King immediately.

He added that he had not hitherto confided his intention to any human being, and that he was undetermined whether to go after we arrive at Mons or at the first station within the frontier; that he knew not where to retire to, or what he should do. Had the war continued in Flanders, he would have accepted the offer I was authorised to make, for him to accompany the Duke of Wellington's head quarters, but that in France he conceives it may defeat the principal object of his separation from the King.

It is, indeed, impossible to say whether this resolution arises solely from his own conviction that the measure is necessary, or from a determination of the King to part with a person to whom he is attached, and who has hitherto served him with an assiduity, and in my opinion with a disinterestedness, which in France is very unusual.

It is certain that the King has told M. Pozzo di Borgo and myself at various times, that, painful as it must be, he has resolved to make this sacrifice of his own feelings if he thinks the state of affairs requires it, whenever he shall commence the formation of his new administration.

Under these circumstances I think the King will as nearly act up to the opinion expressed in your Lordship's letter of the 18th as in the present circumstances we can reasonably expect. I own I always more fear want of adhesion to any fixed principle of action on the part of M. de Talleyrand than any lurking disposition of the King to favour the Emigrants.

I am, &c.,

CHARLES STUART.

Mons.

P.S.—Since the arrival of the Court in this town, M. de Blacas has determined to take leave of His Majesty on quitting the Belgic territory to-morrow morning. He has requested a passport to proceed to England.

Prince Talleyrand arrived at Mons this evening: he has not, however, yet seen the King.

C. S.

General Dumouriez to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MON CHER HÉROS, Le 23 Juin, 1815.

Nous sommes ici tous ivres de joie, et moi encore plus que personne, parceque je sens que votre gloire me rattache à la vie, et exalte la tendre amitié que vous m'avez inspirée. Votre caractère ainsi que votre mérite ont reversé sur vous toute l'ambition que j'avais autrefois pour moi-même, et m'identifient avec vous.

Je connais le théâtre de votre victoire, et j'ai suivi sur la carte votre relation modeste, simple, et très précise. Votre résistance héroïque du 16 a si fort étonné le fougueux Buonaparte qu'elle a suspendu son activité naturelle pendant tout le 17, et a donné au brave Blücher le tems de sortir pendant la nuit du 16 de sa position très hasardée de Sombref, et d'atteindre celle de Wavres, où il a été à portée de vous.

Votre retraite le 17 en plein jour, votre position en avant de Waterloo, entre Braine et Ohain, tiennent au genre le plus sublime de l'art, et sont un coup de maître. La jonction de Blücher sur Ohain pendant la bataille, et la manœuvre menaçante de Bülow, prouvent ce dont vous aviez donné tant d'exemples en Espagne, que votre esprit de conciliation et la confiance en votre génie vous donnent sur vos collègues et sur les différentes nations qui coopèrent avec vous un ascendant qui vous rend invincible.

Comme vous annoncez votre marche en avant pour le 19, je m'attends que les suites de votre victoire seront décisives, et que Buonaparte ne ramenera pas grand monde à Avesnes, d'où il est parti le 14 avec tant de jactance. Sa relation mensongère de sa prétendue victoire du 16 se perdra dans l'esprit des Parisiens; et l'opinion devient pour vous un allié bien puissant pour achever de l'anéantir. Je vous ai prédit depuis long-tems que vous étiez destiné pour débarasser l'Europe de ce fléau.

Parmi toutes les félicitations et les vœux que vous recevez de partout je vous prie de distinguer ceux de votre vieux et fidèle serviteur,

DUMOURIEZ.

P.S. Voici le moment où je désire que Louis XVIII. ait mon mémoire sur la "Coopération avec les Alliés," car il n'a pas de tems à perdre pour organiser une armée, qui puisse remplacer celle que vous allez achever de détruire.

The Duke de Feltre to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Mons, le 23 Juin, 1815, à 11 heures du soir.

J'ai reçu ce soir vers neuf heures la lettre que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire le 22 à 5 heures de l'après-midi. Je l'ai sur-le-champ soumise au Roi. Votre Excellence a raison de dire qu'elle n'a pas perdre de tems. Un officier qui de Mézières est venu joindre le Roi dit que Buonaparte a passé dans cette ville dans la nuit du Lundi au Mardi, et qu'il a ordonné qu'on n'y retint pas les soldats de son armée qui y passent après avoir abandonné leurs corps, et qu'on les dirigeât sur Reims pendant que ceux qui ont pris la route de Laon doivent s'y rassembler. Il faut en France bien peu de tems pour réorganiser une armée éparse : cela tient à l'intelligence des officiers et des soldats. On ne peut donc poursuivre trop vivement Buonaparte.

Le Roi s'est déterminé à répondre sur-le-champ à l'invitation de Votre Excellence. Sa Majesté partira demain matin à huit jours pour Bavay et le Câteau, où elle espère arriver demain dans l'après-midi. Pour répondre à l'effet que Votre Excellence attend de la présence du Roi dans le voisinage de Cambrai, le Roi se fait accompagner et suivre par les troupes qui sont sous les ordres de Monseigneur le Duc de Berri. Le Roi a regretté que Votre Excellence n'en eut pas parlé dans sa lettre, et a pensé que son silence ne pouvait être interprété autrement. Quant à ce qui regarde les places bloquées, le Roi se concertera avec Votre Excellence dès demain pour cet objet.

Je remercie bien sincèrement Votre Excellence des détails qu'elle me donne. Ils ont causé au Roi une grande satisfaction. Monsieur devancera le Roi de quelques heures. L'infanterie de Monseigneur le Duc de Berri ne pourra guères aller que jusqu'à mi-chemin entre Bavay et le Câteau.

J'ai l'honneur d'être avec la plus haute considération, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE DUC DE FELTRE.

P.S. Mille excuses pour ma rature.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Colville to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Faubourg de N. Dame de Cambrai,
23rd June, 1815, ½ past 9 P.M.

MY LORD,

Your Grace's letter to the Governor of Cambrai* was carried in by Lieutenant-Colonel Woodford ; but he refused to receive it, and shortly after commenced a fire of small arms as well as of artillery upon us from the town as well as the citadel.

As soon as I could do so in sufficient shelter from the setting in of the evening, I opened the two howitzers upon the citadel and a couple of guns upon a gate of the town ; but as after ten shells from each of the cannons the fire of the enemy continued, I have, according to your Grace's orders, just sent orders for the infantry and artillery to move from the advanced posts they had occupied, and shall canton them in Estaunnelles. The cavalry had extended to the river on each side, and I shall request Sir C. Grant to patrol across it at daybreak.

I have a French officer with me (an aide-de-camp), who made his escape from a detachment which left the town this morning for Péronne, and having the equipage of Comte d'Erlon with them. He as well as another officer, inhabitant of a neighbouring village, and all the country people, agree in the smallness of the garrison, and which was equally evident to ourselves ; but the commandant has professed his intention to hold out, and threatened the inhabitants to fire upon the town should they make any movement in our favour.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 498 ; letter dated 23rd June.

The knowledge we have gained of the ground will enable us to advance again without exposure, should such be your Grace's intention; but the engineer and artillery officers are of opinion we could do little or nothing against the citadel with our 9-pounders, and the ramparts are too high for escalade, the ditches being besides palisaded. The Valenciennes gate is well covered, but the Paris one seems to admit of an attack by field pieces, should it be your Grace's wish to make a trial of the town, but which, on account of the inhabitants, I have hitherto desisted from.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

C. COLVILLE.

½ past 10.

P.S. The enemy have not more than thirty artillerymen, made bad practice, and I hear of only one slightly wounded man.

2nd P.S. I stopped closing my letter on hearing a very loud shouting in the town of "Vive le Roi!" and which lasted a considerable time; but those of our nearest posts who moved on to come in communication with the town were fired at. There were also some shots fired in the town, and I plainly heard the drawbridge of the citadel let down and a gun run over it, most probably for the purpose of intimidating the people.

C. C.

Colonel Clifton to Colonel Hervey.

SIR, Croix, 23rd June, 1815.

In consequence of the lamented fall of my senior officer, and the command of the 2nd brigade of cavalry devolving on me, I feel it a duty, which I owe both to that brigade and to the service, to report to you, for the information of Field Marshal his Grace the Duke of Wellington, the distinguished gallantry and good conduct which it displayed in the arduous services of the great battle of the 18th instant.

The charge made by the brigade early in the day I venture to hope will have met with his Grace's approbation.

The fruits of it were of the most brilliant nature. The enemy, at this point previously successful, were at once completely routed; two eagles fell into our hands, one taken by the Royal Dragoons, the other by the Scots Greys; columns of the enemy, consisting of at least 10,000 men, were sabred or dispersed; and during the latter part of the day the remains of this brigade sustained for some hours with the utmost steadiness and discipline, and in the presence of a superior infantry and cavalry, a most galling and destructive fire.

Major-General Sir William Ponsonby and Colonel Hamilton, 2nd Dragoons, fell gloriously while leading on the troops. Colonel Martin, Enniskillen Dragoons, was wounded; and the loss sustained was unavoidably great.

I have particularly to mention my entire satisfaction with the conduct of Brigade Lieutenant-Colonel Domville, who succeeded to the command of the Royal Dragoons, as well as Brigade Major Radclyffe and Captain Clark of that regiment, the latter of whom contributed in a great degree in capturing the eagle. I have also to add the names of Brigade Lieutenant-Colonel Clarke and Brigade Major Cheney of the Scots Greys: the former was wounded early in the action, when the command of that regiment devolved upon Major Cheney.

I cannot close my report without expressing to you my sense of the gallant and admirable conduct of Major Evans, aide-de-camp to the late much lamented Major-General Sir William Ponsonby.

The above-mentioned officers I beg leave to recommend to his Grace's favourable notice for promotion; and trusting that the nature of those services will excuse the detail which I have presumed to enter into,

I have the honour to be, Sir, your very obedient servant,

ARTHUR CLIFTON.

Intelligence from Lieut.-Col. Colquhoun Grant.

Le Câteau, 23rd June, 1815.

A voiturier of Le Câteau who followed the French army to Genappe, and was one of fifty waggons returning from thence on the 18th with wounded, lost, as well as all the others, the waggon-horses, taken by the fugitives to aid them in their escape. He left Avesnes on the 21st, at noon. He says the rest of the enemy's army collected there, about 30,000, left Avesnes on the 21st, in the direction of Laon.

By many similar accounts it appears that the enemy's army continues hourly to diminish. The soldiers, having no longer hope of victory, individually seek their homes and safety.

Two inhabitants of Cambrai, who left it yesterday morning at five, report the national guard of Cambrai to be in a similar state to that of Maubeuge. The substitutes have availed themselves of opportunities of escaping. Those of the national guard that remained have been placed in the citadel. The bourgeois do the duty in the town.

COLQUHOUN GRANT.

Major-Gen. Trip to Baron Constant.

Gommegnies, ce 23 Juin, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de vous rapporter que les deux officiers que d'après vos ordres j'avais envoyé en reconnaissance sur Avesnes et Landrecy sont rentrés, et m'ont rendu compte: le premier que d'ici à Avesnes il n'avait rencontré aucune troupe, si non quelques soldats Prussiens isolés, qui s'accordaient tous à lui dire qu'ils étaient informés qu'Avesnes se serait rendu. Les habitans des environs avouant également ce bruit, cet officier a voulu s'en convaincre par lui-même, et a marché jusques sous la ville, où il fut reconnu par les factionnaires Prussiens. Ceux-ci lui ayant indiqué que la ville s'était rendue, l'officier a voulu entrer avec sa patrouille. Les Prussiens l'ayant arrêté, elle a resté sur le pont, et l'officier lui-même est entré en ville, où il ne trouvait que des Prussiens, qui lui ont marqué qu'une bombe ayant éclaté au magasin de poudre, une incendie a été causée, et que les Français l'avaient évacués vers midi le 22. L'officier n'a pu parler au commandant Prussien, qui était absent dans le moment même.

Le second officier, qui a été sur Landrecy, m'a fait rapport que la ville était réellement cernée par les troupes Prussiennes, et l'officier s'en est convaincu par lui-même.

Le Général Major Commandant la Cavalerie de l'Armée Mobile,

A. D. TRIP.

[901.*] INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE ARMY, 24TH JUNE, 1815.

The 2nd and 4th divisions will be in readiness to move to-morrow morning.

The cavalry will be assembled in their camps and in readiness also to move.

Major-General Sir J. Byng will move the troops camped near Gommegnies, viz. the 1st and 3rd British divisions, the divisions of Netherland infantry attached to the 1st corps, the Nassau corps, and the cavalry with the Netherland divisions (excepting the light brigade detached under the orders of H. R. H. Prince Frederick), to-morrow morning to Le Câteau.

The troops at and camped about Bavay, viz. the 5th and 6th British divisions, the Brunswick corps, and the reserve artillery, will move to-morrow morning to Engle-fontaine, and are to canton and camp in and about the villages of Engle-fontaine, Rancour, Hoog, and Preu au Bois.

WELLINGTON.

The King of Prussia to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MON COUSIN, Louisbourg, ce 24 Juin, 1815.

La victoire que vous venez de remporter est d'une si grande importance pour les Puissances Alliées, pour le bonheur de l'Europe entière, que je ne puis m'empêcher de vous en témoigner mon admiration, et de vous en faire mes plus sincères félicitations. Vous aviez déjà recueilli dans les guerres précédentes d'immortels lauriers, mais vous avez mérité à présent la reconnaissance de l'humanité, que vous avez délivrée d'un fléau qui menaçait de peser de nouveau sur elle.

Recevez ici l'expression de ma sincère gratitude, et des sentimens d'estime et d'amitié que je vous ai voués. Sur ce que je prie Dieu qu'il vous prenne, mon Cousin, en sa sainte et digne garde.

FRÉDÉRIC GUILLAUME.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, La Haye, ce 24 Juin, 1815.

J'ai reçu votre lettre du 19 Juin. Celle que je me suis fait un plaisir de vous écrire aussitôt que je fus instruit de l'éclatante victoire que vous veniez de remporter vous aura prouvé combien je sentais la haute importance de ces nouveaux succès, qui ne laisseront rien à désirer à votre gloire et promettent des résultats si décisifs. Vous n'avez pas besoin de vous excuser du retard de votre rapport. Votre apologie se trouve dans ce que vous faites. Continuez, my Lord Duc, à remporter des victoires; la renommée devance vos détails.

Je vous remercie de votre attention à me rassurer sur la situation de mon fils; vos éloges accéléreront sa convalescence.

Je m'empresserai à reconnaître les services du Lieutenant Webster, aide-de-camp du Prince d'Orange.

Mon Ministre de la Guerre a été chargé de prendre, sans délai, les mesures propres à faciliter la marche des troupes Saxonnes.

Je suis, avec une très haute considération, votre affectionné,

GUILLAUME.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, War Department, London, 24th June, 1815.

I do myself the honour to inform your Grace of the following arrangements which have been made for reinforcing the British army under your command, and for supplying the place of those who have fallen in the glorious battle of the 18th instant.

The 7th, 29th, and 43rd regiments of foot will have joined your Grace since the action. The 64th regiment (which had just arrived from Nova Scotia) have been ordered to Ostend without disembarking. A draft of 600 men from the Foot Guards are on the point of leaving London. The 2nd battalion of the 12th regiment is under orders for immediate embarkation at Plymouth; and 500 men, drafted from the 1st battalion 44th regiment, to complete the 2nd battalion serving under your command, will embark without delay at Cork. There will also be sent from Cork, with the utmost expedition, three regiments of old infantry, estimated at about 2000 men. I calculate that the infantry which I have here enumerated will form a reinforcement of about 6900 rank and file; and I hope that they may be followed in a short time by the strong regiments of foot expected from Canada.

In regard to cavalry, I have to acquaint your Grace that detachments and drafts, to the amount of 800 men and 1600 horses, will be prepared for embarkation without the least delay; and to these will be added a brigade composed of three squadrons from each of the following regiments: viz. 2nd and 5th Dragoon Guards and the 3rd Dragoons. Each squadron will consist, at the lowest, of 120 rank and file.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
BATHURST.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 24th June, 1815.

I hope you will be satisfied with the account I have given you of the reinforcements we are preparing for you. I trust I shall be able to get three more regiments from Ireland when we can spare any militia to send there from hence, which I think will be in about a month, unless from the number of prisoners you may send us we shall have a greater call for our militia here than we expect. I take it for granted that we must make up our mind to receive and pay for all the prisoners taken under your command, without charging the King of the Netherlands or the King of Hanover with what may have been taken by them. But may you not insist on Blücher taking care of his own prisoners, or at least enable us to deduct for their keep (if we must keep them) out of the subsidy? Our monthly charge the last year of the war, for prisoners, was not less than 100,000*l*. You see, therefore, it is a serious concern.

I am, my dear Duke, yours very sincerely,
BATHURST.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 24th June, 1815.

It is impossible not to feel most anxious respecting the situation of difficulty in which you must be placed by the loss amongst your Generals and Staff.

I am desirous of doing what may most meet your own wishes, and at the same time to meet the wants of the service, without the delay of awaiting a reference to you. In regard to Generals, it is proposed to send out Sir Edward Paget to replace poor Picton; and if you can give Sir Edward the command of a corps, you will have the goodness to say whether you want more Lieutenant-Generals. If you should, I think Lord Dalhousie would gladly join you.

With regard to Major-Generals, it is with an assurance that you will like the appointments that the Duke has named Major-Generals Keane, Bradford, and O'Callaghan to join you without delay; and as poor Cooke cannot reassume the command of the division of Guards for the campaign, His Royal Highness has decided upon sending out Howard for that purpose. He would be quite content to leave them with Byng, but there are so many senior claimants for such a command as to render it impossible.

As Broke appears to be safe, I presume you will call him to headquarters to take the direction of the Quartermaster-General's department. What assistance do you require in this department? You have, I believe, all the officers mentioned in your original list, except Major Bainbrigge, and he shall go out.

The Adjutant-General's department appears to have suffered so much that I do not know who you can have to take the duties of it. Many, of course, seeing these casualties, are urging and teasing me hourly for employment; but I have put off every person by saying that it was impossible, under present circumstances, to decide upon new appointments. The man most anxious to be employed on the Staff, or in any other manner on service, is Colonel Macdonald, whom you may remember with Lord Niddry in the Peninsula. He is certainly a very clever, zealous fellow; but I would not wish to force him upon you, unless privately assured that he would be acceptable. He has had great experience in the Adjutant-General's department.

Ever, my dear Lord Duke, your faithful and obedient servant,

H. TORRENS.

I very much lament poor Gordon's death and Lord FitzRoy's wound, who, I trust, will do well.

The Right Hon. Sir Henry Wellesley to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR ARTHUR, Madrid, 24th June, 1815.

I do not know whether you have heard that the Portuguese government have refused to send an expedition to Bordeaux, upon the plea that they cannot take such a measure upon themselves without express authority from the Prince Regent of Portugal. I am convinced, however, that the two Peninsular Powers are acting upon a fixed system, which is to leave as much as possible the war in Europe to their Allies, and to turn all their efforts to the prosecution of the contest with the insurgents of America. In addition to the force which has already been sent to America, this Court is preparing a second expedition, to consist of 25,000 men; and General Abadia is now here in order to make the necessary arrangements for its equipment, &c. Spain cannot possibly provide for the expenses of so extensive an armament and for those of the war in Europe at the same time. The Spanish government has objected to both the plans of employing the Portuguese troops in Flanders and at Bordeaux. The Prince Regent of Portugal has desired that troops may be sent to the Brazils, and

I am assured by Souza that he has promised to assist the Spaniards in their expedition against Buenos Ayres. All this convinces me that no serious effort will be made by these two Courts in concert with their Allies in Europe, and this is very much to be lamented, as the presence of an armed force in the southern provinces of France would no doubt be attended with most important advantages.

This leads me to mention a suggestion which the Prussian Minister informs me he means to make to his Court of sending 20,000 Prussians to Bordeaux, which of course, if they are sent, must be conveyed in British transports. He begged that I would write to you upon the subject, to which I consented, observing, however, that I could not answer for your approving the plan. I believe the Russian Minister will write upon the same subject to the Emperor.

The state of these Peninsular Powers is really deplorable. But after the Conde de Palmella had signed the treaty of the 25th of March, and had agreed that Portugal should bring into the field 20,000 men, I cannot think that the Portuguese government is justified in declining the proposals which have been made to them. With regard to Spain, the treatment of the Duke d'Angoulême, of the French loyalists, their state of preparation, &c., afford little hope of any serious effort being made from hence.

Ever, my dear Arthur, most affectionately yours,

H. WELLESLEY.

Sir Robert Kennedy, who has been here and is gone to Lisbon, has been refused permission by our government to wear the Cross of Charles III., upon the plea of his not having been actively employed in the field. He is much annoyed at this, and I think with reason, for he is certainly more entitled to it than many who have got it. I have not asked for it for anybody. Kennedy has written home to remonstrate, and I told him I would mention the subject to you.

Prince Metternich to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Mannheim, ce 24 Juin, 1815.

Je m'empresse de vous féliciter, Monsieur le Duc, sur le brillant début de la campagne. La sagesse de vos dispositions a couronné d'un plein succès une entreprise qui pouvait mal tourner. Je regarde la victoire du 18 comme un de ces coups du Ciel qu'il ne frappe que par ses élus.

Ici tout est bien. Si les mouvements de l'armée du centre ont été lents, ce fait ne vient que de la nécessité de faire placer les armées Russes en ligne, ce dont elles n'avaient guère envie, et puis de laisser les armées Autrichiennes du Haut-Rhin gagner la hauteur nécessaire pour opérer conjointement et de front avec la grande armée du centre. Vous êtes sans doute exactement au fait des dispositions du Prince de Schwarzenberg, et je me dispense par conséquent de vous les retracer.

On s'est battu en Savoye. Les Piémontais se sont montrés à merveille. Pas un homme n'a passé à l'ennemi, et les officiers ont dit qu'ils sauraient prouver qu'ils rivalisent avec les autres armées de zèle pour la cause générale et d'inimitié pour Buonaparte. Genève se conduit également d'une manière exemplaire, et qui ne doit pas nous faire regretter le temps que nous avons mis à lui former un petit état.

Je me flatte que vous serez content de ma proclamation aux Français. J'ai engagé l'Empereur Alexandre à en faire publier une également pour Barclay. J'ai vu la pièce : elle est faible comme style, mais très-prononcée comme pensée et comme principe.

Agréez, Monsieur le Duc, l'assurance de mon attachement et de ma haute considération.

METTERNICH.

Prince Metternich to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Heidelberg, le 24 Juin, 1815.

J'expédie le présent courrier pour porter à M. de Vincent des instructions sur l'objet des Commissaires Royaux. Il s'empressera de les communiquer à Votre Excellence; et comme je suis entré vis-à-vis de lui dans les plus grands détails, je ne veux pas vous faire perdre, Monsieur le Duc, un temps précieux en vous retraçant ici ce qu'il vous soumettra.

Nous avons tous la conviction que l'amalgame de Commissaires Royaux avec nos intendances ne saurait tourner à bien. Ces Commissaires seraient continuellement aux prises avec nos autorités, ou compromettraient le Roi vis-à-vis de ses sujets. Une guerre qui ne se fait que par réquisition entraine des charges et des malheurs inévitables pour les pays sur lesquels elle pèse; il vaut mieux que le ressentiment porte sur les étrangers que sur le Souverain de ce pays. Nous ne pouvons pas nous faire aimer en France, mais tous nos soins doivent tendre à faire regarder le retour du gouvernement Royal comme une récompense pour le peuple. Telles sont les dispositions ordonnées à nos Généraux et à nos intendants, et Votre Excellence se convaincra par le texte de la proclamation ci-jointe du Prince de Schwarzenberg aux Français que nous nous prononçons dans le sens du gouvernement légitime autant que les considérations qui, sous plusieurs rapports, nous sont étrangères, mais que nous ne devons pas moins respecter, et surtout celles qui se lient à la déclaration additionnelle au Traité d'Alliance du 25 Mars dernier, nous le permettent.

Il me paraît que les intérêts directs du Roi exigeraient qu'il fût tiré une ligne très-prononcée entre les provinces à conquérir par les armées alliées et celles qui se soumettraient d'emblée à l'autorité Royale. Le Roi devrait se transporter sur-le-champ dans ces dernières, et y établir le siége de son gouvernement. C'est également là que se formerait le plus utilement l'armée Royale; elle devra se composer d'éléments Français sur le sol même de la France, et se nourrir de moyens purement nationaux : cette marche seule me paraît, d'après la connaissance que j'ai de la France, pouvoir ôter au Roi et aux Français fidèles le caractère d'émigrés que l'usurpateur et son gouvernement cherchent à leur conserver. Une fois établi en France, entouré d'une représentation nationale, à la tête d'une force armée toute Française, le Roi se trouvera placé vis-à-vis des Puissances dans l'attitude d'un allié, et cette attitude même lui sera utile en France, en ce qu'elle le sauve des apparences d'une protection étrangère, que les Français, comme tout peuple, détesteront toujours.

En suivant ce principe, il ne me paraît pas moins essentiel que nul corps d'émigrés ne se forme et ne combatte dans les rangs des armées alliées, et qu'en général le Roi parût le moins activement possible dans nos opérations. Il est impossible de ne pas établir en thèse que la France doit être soumise. Elle le sera sur les points qu'occuperont nos armées par la force étrangère, et ce n'est pas là que doit gouverner le Roi : il en est autrement des provinces qui n'attendent pas l'arrivée de la force étrangère ; ces lieux formant la France véritablement Royale, devront être occupés sur-le-champ par des gouverneurs Royaux, et c'est de ce point que devront partir toutes les opérations de notre allié le Roi Louis XVIII.

Je suis convaincu que Votre Excellence ne peut pas rendre de service plus grand et plus essentiel au Roi qu'en l'engageant à suivre ce système, le seul, à mon avis, qui puisse le replacer bien vis-à-vis de son peuple.

Recevez, Monsieur le Duc, l'assurance de la haute considération avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être

De Votre Excellence

Le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

METTERNICH.

Prince Frederic of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Petit Wargnies, le 24 Juin, 1815.

Dans ce moment je viens de recevoir les pièces ci-jointes par un aide-de-camp du Général Stedman, aux avant-postes duquel une trompette est venue pour remettre ces papiers au nom du commandant de Valenciennes. Le Général Stedman m'a envoyé ces pièces pour savoir mes ordres à cet égard ; mais n'ayant point reçu d'ordres pour de pareils cas de Votre Seigneurie, et ceci me paraissant absolument pas de nature que je ne puisse y faire réponse sans savoir les intentions de Votre Seigneurie, je prends la liberté de vous l'envoyer directement et pour vous demander vos ordres.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec les sentiments de la plus haute considération, My Lord Duc,

De Votre Seigneurie le très-humble serviteur,

FRÉDÉRIC, PRINCE DES PAYS-BAS.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Colville to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Hôtel de Ville de Cambrai, 24th June, 1815, 10 P.M.

I have the honour to inform your Grace of our having succeeded in our attack on this place with but small loss, and this includes, I believe, but one subaltern officer of the 23rd regiment.

Within a few minutes of the hour of six, which I had appointed for the attack, two French officers arrived, one from General Lahure, commanding the Department du Nord, the other bringing the letter (No. 2) and enclosure (No. 3) from the Commandant of this place and citadel. To the former I gave the answer, of which a copy is annexed to the letter (No. 1), and to the other I sent verbally, that it was proposed, in the summons which he had yesterday refused to read, that the citadel should surrender for the future use of His Majesty Louis XVIII.; and that if he did not choose to accede to this, I could not attend to a proposal of armistice on any other ground. I also sent him in a summons, and gave him an hour to answer it; but as at the expiration of that time the tricolour flag was still flying, I ordered the fire to commence. A building in the town, of no consequence (being a straw-magazine), was burnt by it.

I mean to keep but the 23rd and 91st regiments, two 9-pounders, and a troop of hussars in town, and hope to be able to give your Grace to-morrow a satisfactory account of the discipline of the troops in the town, as well as of their gallantry in the possessing themselves of it.

My aide-de-camp, Captain Jackson, will have the honour of delivering this to your Grace, and will be able to give you the details, which I am unwilling to detain him by entering into.

The town seems to be most loyally disposed, and the municipality request me to say how proud and happy the hope of seeing His Majesty and your Grace in their town has made them.

I have the honour to be with the highest respect, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

C. COLVILLE.

P.S. The trumpeter who accompanied the officer from General Lahuré says, what I can hardly believe, but shall guard against, that they have at Douai 3500 men, intended to reinforce this place, and that this very morning that neighbourhood had been inundated.

Major-Gen. Lord E. Somerset to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, La Forêt, 24th June, 1815.

The Household Brigade of Cavalry having been conspicuously engaged in the late severe battle on the 18th inst., I trust I may be permitted (in the absence of Lieutenant-General the Earl of Uxbridge, whose wound has unfortunately deprived the army of his services) to report to your Grace the high opinion I entertain of the good conduct of the troops under my command on that memorable day.

On the first advance of the enemy's cuirassiers to the position occupied by the British infantry on the right of the high road, the brigade instantly attacked and defeated them with great loss, forcing them to retire in the utmost confusion. The brigade, pursuing its advantage, came up with and routed a strong body of infantry posted on the opposite hill; on which occasion a private of the Blues seized and carried off an eagle, having first cut down the officer who bore it; but his horse being soon afterwards killed, he was obliged to relinquish it. The regiments in this attack made many prisoners, but they themselves suffered a considerable loss, particularly the 2nd Life Guards and the King's Dragoon Guards. Having rallied and formed on their original ground, they continued to support the infantry on the position, until an opportunity offered of making a fresh attack on a strong column of the cuirassiers, which was executed with great gallantry, and effectually checked their further advance. The brigade, although by this time exceedingly reduced in numbers, was soon afterwards moved to the support of the troops on the right, where it made a charge on a body of the enemy's infantry, supported by cavalry.

I beg leave further to assure your Grace that throughout the whole course of this arduous contest the regiments under my command were not more remarkable for the gallantry they displayed in the attack than for the steadiness they evinced under a most galling and destructive fire.

In enumerating the officers who particularly distinguished themselves on this occasion I should fail in my duty were I to omit the names of Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Robert Hill, commanding the Royal Horse Guards; Lieutenant-Colonel Clement Hill and Major Packe of the same regiment, the latter of whom, after having most gallantly cut down the officer at the head of the enemy's column, was himself unfortunately killed in front of his squadron in the second charge of the French cuirassiers; Lieutenant-Colonel Ferrior and Captain Kelly of the 1st Life Guards, the former killed by a grape-shot in the latter part of the day, and the other severely wounded; and likewise Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. E. P. Lygon and Captain Kenyon of the 2nd Life Guards. I must also beg to add that Colonel Fuller and Major Graham, of the King's Dragoon Guards, led on their regiment to the first attack in the most gallant style, but were both either killed or taken prisoners by the enemy.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

R. EDWARD H. SOMERSET.

Major-Gen. Barnes to Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, 24th June, 1815.

My Lord Erskine having requested me to bear testimony to your Grace of the conduct of his son, Captain Erskine, in the actions of the 16th and 18th instant, I feel the greatest pleasure in stating that nothing could be more conspicuously gallant than it was throughout, particularly in going on with and animating the 15th Hussars, in which regiment he formerly had a troop. The loss of one arm and a severe wound in the other will naturally give claims to your Grace's attention, and from the circumstance of his being senior Deputy-Assistant in my department, will probably afford an opportunity of rewarding his merits, and of recompensing him for the severe wounds he has received.

I have the honour to be, with the highest respect,

My Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and very humble servant,

E. BARNES.

[Put down Captain Erskine's name for brevet promotion.

WELLINGTON.]

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE ARMY, 25TH JUNE, 1815. [902.]

Lord Hill will be so good as to march the two brigades of the 4th division now at Le Câteau, on the receipt of the order, towards Cambrai, where they will join the other brigade of the division. His Lordship is requested to order a brigade of 9 pounders (one of those attached to the 2nd division) to move with the two brigades of the 4th division.

Major-General Sir J. Byng will halt the troops marching from the camp near Gommegnies, at Forest, upon the road to Le Câteau, and then camp them between the village of Croix and Bousies.

The cavalry will remain at Le Câteau in readiness to move.

Major-General Sir J. O. Vandeleur will continue to keep the outposts upon, and to patrol, the roads towards St. Quentin and towards Le Castelet and Honnecourt, and the right joining with the patrols of the cavalry sent towards Cambrai under Sir C. Colville.

WELLINGTON.

G. O. Joncourt, 25th June, 1815. [903.]

6. The Commander of the Forces has observed the greatest irregularity among the baggage. Private baggage and women are put upon the carts destined to carry tents and hospital stores, and the consequence is that they cannot get on, and delay everything else. If the Commander of the Forces should observe such a practice again, he will order the private baggage to be burnt, and will bring the officer to whom it belongs to a Court-Martial for disobedience of orders.

7. The women must not be allowed to get upon the public carts.

8. The Commander of the Forces begs that the divisions will start from their ground at the hour ordered, particularly the cavalry, and that they will march in the order fixed in the route. The baggage must be kept well closed up in the rear of each division or corps, according to the order given upon the subject through the Quartermaster-General.

WELLINGTON.

MINISTÈRE DE LA GUERRE.

The Prince d'Eckmühl to Marshal Grouchy.

MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL, Paris, le 25 Juin, 1815, à minuit.

Je reçois à l'instant votre lettre du 24, et je m'empresse d'en communiquer le contenu à la Commission de gouvernement, qui sans doute sera l'interprète de toute la France, en proclamant que vous, les généraux, et les troupes ont bien mérité de la patrie. Les témoignages de reconnaissance de la nation, j'aime à le croire, ne peuvent être mieux décernés que dans cette circonstance.

Vous allez vous trouver avec des troupes qui, malheureusement, ont été dans ce grand revers du 18, et qui, selon tous les rapports, s'en ressentent encore. Prenez toutes les mesures nécessaires pour empêcher que la contagion ne gagne votre belle armée. Il faut la faire appuyer sur votre gauche, la mettre du côté de Compiègne, et lui faire occuper, y compris Pontoise, tous les ponts sur l'Oise, en y faisant faire des ouvrages de circonstance, et établir des batteries derrière. Il y a à Compiègne une manutention qui servirait à cette armée. Jusqu'à ce que vos services soient bien organisés, tirez vos subsistances de Reims.

Un grand désordre régne dans les 1er, 2e, et 6e corps. Prenez, ainsi que je vous l'ai mandé hier au soir, de fortes mesures, et faites écrire circulairement dans toutes les communes pour que l'on arrête tous les maraudeurs, et qu'on les conduise à votre quartier-général. J'ai l'expérience qu'un exemple fait à propos suffit pour ramener l'ordre.

Veuillez, Monsieur le Maréchal, m'envoyer la relation détaillée de vos affaires, pour que toute la France puisse la connaître, et désignez-moi les officiers et soldats pour lesquels vous demandez des récompenses.

J'ai fait un ordre du jour pour faire rejoindre les généraux, officiers, et soldats qui avaient abandonné leur poste.

Cherchez à communiquer avec la garnison de Laon pour remonter son moral. Vous enverrez des détachements de cavalerie commandés par de bons officiers pour communiquer avec La Fère, Ham, et avoir des nouvelles positives des colonnes ennemies qui se trouvent dans cette direction.

Il y a un assez mauvais esprit parmi les habitants de Soissons et du territoire. Prévenez-en les généraux et officiers pour que ce mauvais esprit n'influe pas sur le soldat, et qu'on se mette toujours en garde contre les perfides suggestions de nos ennemis intérieurs.

Mettez des gendarmes en sauvegarde chez les maîtres de poste.

Recevez, mon cher Maréchal, l'assurance de mon estime et de ma haute considération.

Le Maréchal, Ministre de la Guerre,

PRINCE D'ECKMÜHL.

PROCLAMATION DU ROI.

LOUIS, par la grâce de Dieu, Roi de France et de Navarre, à tous nos fidèles sujets, salut.

Dès l'époque où la plus criminelle des entreprises, secondée par la plus inconcevable défection, nous a contraints à quitter momentanément notre Royaume, nous vous avons avertis des dangers qui vous menaçaient si vous ne vous hâtiez de secouer le joug d'un tyran usurpateur. Nous n'avons pas voulu unir nos bras ni ceux de notre famille aux instrumens dont la Providence s'est servie pour punir la trahison; mais aujourd'hui que les puissans efforts de nos alliés ont dissipé les satellites du tyran, nous nous hâtons de rentrer dans nos états pour y rétablir la constitution que nous avions donnée à la France; réparer, par tous les moyens qui sont en notre pouvoir, les maux de la révolte et de la guerre qui en a été la suite nécessaire; récompenser les bons, mettre en exécution les lois existantes contre les coupables; enfin pour appeler autour de notre trône paternel l'immense majorité des Français, dont la fidélité, le courage, et le dévouement ont porté de si douces consolations dans notre cœur.

Donné au Câteau-Cambresis, le vingt-cinquième jour du mois de Juin de l'an de grâce 1815, et de notre règne le vingt-huitième.

Par le Roi,

LOUIS.

Le Ministre Secrétaire d'Etat de la Guerre,

DUC DE FELTRE.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Colville to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Cambrai, 25th June, 1815, 8 A.M.

I have the honour to inform your Grace that early this morning I thought it expedient to open a letter addressed to you by the Baron Noos, Commandant Supérieur, &c., &c., of the citadel, and in consequence acceded, in your Grace's name, to a suspension of hostilities for four-and-twenty hours from five o'clock this morning. I further gave him to understand that I had reason to expect that he would receive a summons from His Majesty Louis XVIII. himself in the course of the day.

The officer who brought out the letter says that parties are violent in the citadel, and that it had even been proposed to turn out of it those who were disposed to surrender; but, perhaps to make his own merits of more consideration, he spoke of his own efforts towards conciliating things in favour of the King's party; and speaking of the Governor as having the same disposition, it was hoped, he said, that the Conseil de défense would determine for a surrender.

He speaks (he is a retired officer of engineers) of the depôts in the citadel being of great importance, and there are also some magazines in the town.

I am sorry to say that I shall have nothing to report to your Grace of the good conduct of the troops in the town, but who I am now engaged in searching for the plunder, which all my endeavours could not prevent, by the Hanoverian troop of hussars as well as by the British infantry.

The people of the town speak of the garrison of the citadel amounting to near 800 men, besides above 100 national guards, and proportion of officers made prisoners in the town.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
C. COLVILLE.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Colville to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Cambrai, 25th June, 1815, 1½ P.M.

The letter I have now the honour to enclose will, I trust, prove productive of such results as will make the assault of the citadel unnecessary; but the observations I have already had the opportunity of making convince me that from this side it would not be a matter of great difficulty.

I have ordered a detachment of cavalry to escort the Governor's mission to the King; and having promised this before receipt of your orders to answer that your Grace would not suspend hostilities for a moment, I trust you will approve of my delaying making the communication to the Governor until the return of the bearer of this.

I have the honour to be, with the highest respect, my Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
C. COLVILLE.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Baron Noos to Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Colville.

MONSIEUR LE GÉNÉRAL, Cambrai, le 25 Juin, 1815.

Lecture faite de la lettre que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire en date de ce jour, annonçant l'arrivée de Sa Majesté le Roi de France au Château, le conseil de défense assemblé, uniquement animé du désir de conserver à la France la place qui lui est confiée, déclare regarder en ce moment comme le premier de ses devoirs, non-seulement de ne point attendre une sommation de Sa Majesté, mais bien encore de céder au vœu de son cœur en sollicitant avec les plus vives instances d'aller faire manifester par un de ses membres à son auguste Souverain le serment de lui rester fidèle.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Général,
Votre très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,
BARON NOOS.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Colville to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Cambrai, 25th June, 1815, 8½ P.M.

I have the satisfaction to inform your Grace that, after a good deal of demur on the part of the Governor in his communications with the Comte d'Audenarde, I determined on giving him as an ultimatum on my part the notice that, as your Grace had originally disapproved of the suspension of hostilities I had accorded him, I should recommence them at this hour, had he not by that time surrendered.

This has had its effect, and the National Guards of the town are now paraded to occupy the citadel upon the marching out of the garrison, who are to be placed in a barrack in the town for the night, one of my Hanoverian battalions being in another.

I have had the honour to receive your Grace's letter of 5 P.M. by Captain Jackson, and shall march for Govy at 4 o'clock.

As Captain Thompson will be the bearer of this, I take this opportunity of saying that I derived every satisfaction from his and Lieutenant Gilbert's assistance in the operations of yesterday and reconnaissance of the citadel this day.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

C. COLVILLE.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Câteau Cambresis, 25th June, 1815.

Accounts having been received that the citadel of Cambrai has surrendered, the King will proceed to that town in the course of the day.

I have received a letter from Talleyrand stating that the reasons contained in your letter by Lord H. Hill have determined him to prepare directly to join the King. I therefore expect to see him, together with the other Ministers, at Cambrai this evening.

The messenger will proceed to Bruxelles to-day.

Ever faithfully yours,

CHARLES STUART.

Baron Bignon to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Paris, le 25 Juin, 1815.

La nouvelle de l'abdication de Napoléon sera parvenue à Votre Excellence. Pour ne laisser aucun doute sur la nature de cette grande démarche, l'Empereur désire lui-même se retirer sans délai aux Etats-Unis d'Amérique. Son départ n'est retardé que par la nécessité d'attendre les sauf-conduits nécessaires pour lui, ses frères et sa suite. Comme Votre Excellence, par sa position plus rapprochée, se trouve en communication suivie avec les autres Puissances alliées, je crois devoir m'adresser à elle afin qu'elle juge elle-même et qu'elle puisse faire connaître aux autres Puissances combien le gouvernement Français a vivement à cœur de faire disparaître tout ce qui pourrait offrir la plus légère ombre de difficulté et mettre le moindre obstacle au prompt rétablissement de la paix.

M. le Comte Otto est parti pour Londres le 24 de ce mois.

Des plénipotentiaires destinés à se rendre au quartier-général des Puissances alliées ont dû arriver ou sont sur le point d'arriver dans les pays occupés par les armées que commande Votre Excellence. Le gouvernement Français espère que leurs efforts pour un prompt armistice ne seront pas rejetées, et, les causes de guerre alléguées par les Puissances n'existant plus, il aime à croire que l'armistice conduira promptement au rétablissement de la paix.

J'ai l'honneur de vous offrir l'hommage de la haute considération avec laquelle je suis,

Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

Le Commissaire chargé du portefeuille des Affaires Etrangères,

LE BARON BIGNON.

Lieut.-Gen. Lecoq to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Osnabrück, ce 25 Juin, 1815.

Par la lettre que Votre Altesse a eu la grâce de m'adresser sous date du 20 de ce mois, et que je viens de recevoir à l'instant même, j'apprends avec un plaisir ineffable qu'elle daigne consentir à ce que le corps Saxon combatte sous ses ordres.

Chacun de nous brûle du désir de se voir arrivé à sa nouvelle destination. Les circonstances trop malheureuses pour la Saxe, et l'état dans lequel celles-ci ont mis l'armée, sont cependant peu favorables à nos ardents souhaits. Que Votre Altesse daigne me permettre de lui donner un aperçu de la situation du corps d'armée sous mes ordres.

Sa Majesté le Roi, mon maître, n'ayant pu obtenir que son armée restât non-divisée pour la durée de cette campagne, ce qui nous aurait valu l'avantage de marcher tout de suite avec un corps supérieurement organisé de 16,000 hommes, a donné son consentement au partage de l'armée qui vient d'être terminé. La rigueur avec laquelle les Prussiens y ont procédés nous réduit non-seulement à un petit nombre d'hommes, mais nous ôte en même temps une grande partie de notre matériel indispensable pour entrer en campagne. On a poussé jusqu'à nous prendre la moitié de nos cartouches d'infanterie; et les provisions n'étant pas très-fortes auparavant, il nous reste peu de choses pour le moment.

Ce qui est, en second lieu, presque aussi désagréable, c'est que le corps n'est pas même réuni encore. La cavalerie qui nous reste ne me rejoindra que dans huit jours: pour l'artillerie, je reçois la nouvelle de son commandant que malgré qu'il a obtempéré à tous les engagements que S. M. le Roi de Saxe s'est imposés par le traité conclu, l'on fait encore des difficultés de faire sortir de Juliers les canons et caissons qui, d'après les ordres de S. A. le Prince Blücher, y ont été déposés avant la ratification du traité de paix sus-mentionné.

Je m'occupe actuellement de l'organisation de l'infanterie avec laquelle je suis entré dans ce pays il y a quelques jours.

Malheureusement j'y trouve près de 500 hommes sans armes, provenant du désarmement du régiment de grenadiers à Liège, et de ce que les Prussiens ne nous ont pas encore rendus la partie des armes à laquelle nous avons des prétentions, et qui nous appartient légitimement.

Je fais partir encore aujourd'hui mon chef de l'état-major pour Dresde, à l'effet d'accélérer le plus qu'il est possible le départ de la Saxe des hommes ainsi que du matériel de tout genre nécessaires au complétement du corps, dont la force se montera à 16,000 hommes. Je prie Votre Altesse d'être persuadé que rien ne sera négligé à cet effet, et que si je ne me rends pas promptement au lieu qu'elle a daigné m'indiquer, ce n'est certainement que l'impossibilité absolue qui me retient.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec un profond respect, Monseigneur,

De Votre Altesse le très-dévoué et soumis serviteur,

DE LECOQ.

Le Comte Barclay de Tolly to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Quartier-Général, Kaiserslautern,
le 25 Juin, 1815.

MONSIEUR LE DUC,

Les déplacements continuels qu'il m'a fallu faire durant ces derniers jours ne m'ont pas permis d'offrir à Votre Excellence plus tôt mes félicitations, aussi franches qu'empressées, sur l'éclatante victoire, sans exemple dans l'histoire des temps modernes, dont il a plû au Tout-Puissant de couronner les efforts de l'armée sous les ordres de Votre Excellence dans la mémorable journée du 18 de ce mois. Veuillez, Monsieur le Duc, les recevoir aujourd'hui. Si, dans cet événement glorieux, la grandeur des résultats surpasse les espérances les plus exagérées, l'étonnement qu'il produit cède à l'admiration qu'on doit aux savantes combinaisons du génie militaire qui, dans cette circonstance si méritoire pour les armes Britanniques, semble avoir forcé d'avance la victoire.

Je profite de l'occasion pour informer Votre Excellence que tous les corps de l'armée confiée à mon commandement s'acheminent avec célérité vers le point de leur concentration, et j'ai un espoir fondé de pouvoir l'établir à Nancy le 6 ou le 7 du mois prochain. En attendant mes troupes légères, formant l'avant-garde sous les ordres du Lieutenant-Général Comte Lambert, ont déjà poussé jusqu'à Pont à Chaussi, sur la route de Metz. Un autre corps de cavalerie, sous les ordres du Lieutenant-Général Tchernisheff, opérera sur ma droite entre Metz et Thionville, dans le double but d'ouvrir mes communications avec le Maréchal Prince Blücher et gêner autant que possible les mouvements de l'ennemi de ce côté. A ma gauche le Maréchal Prince Wrede, ayant passé la Sarre, se trouve déjà assez avancé sur le territoire Français.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec une haute considération, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

LE COMTE BARCLAY DE TOLLY.

The Provisional Government of France to Viscount Castlereagh.

My Lord, Paris, le 25 Juin, 1815.

Le retour de l'Empereur Napoléon en France a été l'occasion du renouvellement de la guerre: en abdiquant il a espéré y mettre un terme. Pour qu'il ne puisse exister aucun doute sur la nature de ses motifs, et pour assurer plus promptement l'effet que la nation Française a droit d'attendre de son abdication, il est prêt à quitter le territoire Français sans le moindre retard: son désir est de se retirer aux Etats-Unis d'Amérique. La Commission de Gouvernement me charge en conséquence, My Lord, de vous demander toutes les sûretés et sauf-conduits nécessaires pour lui, ses frères, sa suite, et ses propriétés.

Des plénipotentiaires sont en route pour se rendre au quartier-général des Puissances alliées. L'objet de leur mission est de demander la conclusion immédiate d'un armistice, et de traiter du rétablissement de la paix. M. le Comte Otto est parti de même hier pour se rendre à Londres dans une intention semblable. La nouvelle démarche que je fais en ce moment auprès de Votre Excellence la convaincra encore qu'en France on n'a rien de plus à cœur que d'arriver sans délai à ce résultat si désiré et si important pour tous les peuples, mais particulièrement pour ceux qui, comme l'Angleterre et la France, ne peuvent que trouver d'immenses avantages dans leur réconciliation.

Prince Talleyrand to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Mons, le 25 Juin, 1815.

L'officier que vous avez bien voulu m'envoyer vient de me remettre votre lettre du 24. Après le regret de n'avoir pas encore pu vous voir depuis ce que votre génie vient de faire et pour l'Europe et pour le Roi, j'ai eu pour première consolation de lire de votre écriture; et je m'empresse de vous informer que je suivrai le conseil que vous me donnez, et que je partirai demain pour joindre le Roi et pour vous voir.

Sans doute les événements de Paris que vous m'annoncez, et que la connaissance que vous aviez de l'effet de vos grandes et belles victoires vous fesait présager, ont affaibli une partie des objections que je crus de mon devoir de faire au Roi hier contre la détermination qu'il avait prise; mais l'objection principale subsiste, et je suis d'autant plus empressé de vous la soumettre que, l'ayant puisée pour ainsi dire dans vos propres principes, je suis sûr d'avance que vous l'appuyerez de toute l'influence que vous donnent sur le Roi la haute estime et l'amitié qu'il a pour vous.

Le Roi en partant de Gand s'est mis dans les mains d'un parti qui a ses propres vues, et qui se trouve en opposition avec nos vrais intérêts nationaux et avec les principes proclamés par les Souverains Alliés. A la tête de ce parti est Monsieur: s'il réussit, le rétablissement de la tranquillité en France ne pourra être assuré, et le but que se proposent les Alliés, et que vous vous proposez vous-même, sera manqué.

Il est indispensable que non-seulement le Roi ne dévie en aucune manière de la ligne constitutionnelle, mais que toutes ses mesures, tous ses actes en donnent la conviction à la France entière. Toute marche qui serait équivoque, et qui ressemblerait, de quelque lieu que ce fût, à celle de Buonaparte, altérerait dans son principe cet élan de retour vers le Roi, de repentir, d'amour et de confiance dont j'ose dire qu'en ce moment l'immense majorité des Français est animée.

Or ni Monsieur, ni M. de Bruyes, ni la plupart des personnes qui sont autour du Roi n'ont donné des gages de leur attachement à la Charte que le Roi promet de maintenir, et qui est la seule base sur laquelle je puisse vouloir établir mon action ministérielle. Voilà ce qui m'avait effarouché hier, et ce que le Roi ne m'a pas donné le temps de lui développer. Rien cependant n'était plus simple : ma proclamation était prête ; je voulais qu'elle fût concertée avec vous et qu'elle ne parût qu'avec votre approbation ; ce n'est pas à vous, My Lord, que j'ai besoin de dire que si nous avons une Charte, le Roi doit établir l'unité et la solidarité dans son ministère. Ces deux choses sont inséparables : sans elle, dans l'état actuel de l'Europe, le principe de légitimité même, sauvé à Vienne tandis qu'on le perdait en France, ne pourrait se maintenir. L'action du ministère doit être non entravée, parce qu'il faut qu'il soit responsable, et ceux-là seuls qui seront responsables doivent composer le conseil du Roi. Or, ni les Princes ni les favoris ne pourront être atteints par la responsabilité, et les circonstances dans lesquelles nous allons trouver la France sont assez graves pour que ceux qui se chargeront de la sauver et de la rendre une seconde fois à l'Europe n'ayent à répondre que de leurs propres fautes. Vous, My Lord, qui êtes parvenu au plus haut degré de gloire auquel un mortel puisse atteindre, vous en qui tout est conséquent, généreux, bienveillant pour l'humanité, vous qui dans ces hautes matières avez acquis une expérience qui nous manque encore, vous ferez pénétrer ces maximes dans l'esprit et dans l'âme du Roi. Vous seconderez mes efforts, et vous trouverez et direz comme moi que sans la certitude de voir adopter la marche dont je viens de parler, mes services seroient inutiles.

Cette lettre est bien longue, puisque demain j'espère être dans votre voisinage. Vous m'avez écrit, vous m'avez donné le conseil de venir, et je pars. Adieu.

Agréez, My Lord, les assurances de mon respect, de mon attachement, de mon admiration, et, si vous étiez moins grand, je dirais de mon amitié.

TALLEYRAND.

Marshal Davoust to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MILORD,

Vos mouvements hostiles continuent, quoique, suivant leurs déclarations, les motifs de la guerre que nous font les Souverains Alliés n'existent plus, puisque l'Empereur Napoléon a abdiqué. Au moment où le sang est de nouveau sur le point de couler, je reçois de M. le Duc d'Albuféra la dépêche télégraphique dont je vous transmets copie. Milord, je garantis sur mon honneur cet armistice. Toutes les raisons que vous auriez de continuer les hostilités sont détruites, puisque vous ne pouvez pas avoir d'autres instructions de votre gouvernement que celles que les généraux Autrichiens tenaient du leur. Je fais à Votre Seigneurie la demande formelle de cesser immédiatement toute espèce d'hostilité, et que l'on s'occupe d'un armistice en attendant la décision du congrès. Je ne puis croire, Milord, que ma demande resterait sans effet: vous prendriez sur vous une grande responsabilité aux yeux de vos compatriotes. Au reste, nul autre motif que celui de faire cesser l'effusion du sang, et l'intérêt de ma patrie, ne m'ont dicté cette lettre. Si je me présente sur le champ de bataille avec l'idée de vos talens, j'y porterai aussi la conviction d'y combattre pour la plus sainte des causes, celle de la défense et de l'indépendance de ma patrie; et, quel qu'en soit le résultat, je mériterai, Milord, votre estime.

Agréez, Milord, l'assurance de ma très haute considération.

PRINCE D'ECKMÜHL.

[904.] To Prince Frederic of the Netherlands.

MONSEIGNEUR, Joncourt, ce 26 Juin, 1815.

V. A. R. aura appris que nous prîmes la ville de Cambrai par assaut avant hier au soir, et que la citadelle s'est rendue hier au soir. Le Roi de France va s'y placer, et vous pouvez compter que la place sera en état de sécurité avec la garnison que S. M. y tiendra. V. A. R. aura la bonté de communiquer avec cette place.

Le Prince Auguste de Prusse avec le 2e corps de l'armée du Maréchal Blücher tint les places de Maubeuge et de Landrecy bloquées, et se prépare à en faire les siéges. Je prie V. A. R. de se tenir en communication avec Son Altesse.

Pour le reste V. A. R. doit considérer comme un but principal la communication de l'armée avec Mons par la route qui passe par Bavay à Câteau en tenant bloquée la place de Quesnoi et observant Valenciennes et les places sur l'Escaut. Je crois que V. A. R. feroit bien d'occuper Bavay par un bataillon, et V. A. R. manœuvrera entre Quesnoi et l'Escaut, de manière à tenir l'ennemi en alarme, et à soutenir les sommations que le Roi de France va faire de chacune des places dans le département du Nord de se soumettre à son autorité.

Une estafette partira tous les jours de Mons pour l'armée, et passera par Bavay et Câteau. Vous pourrez m'écrire par cette occasion. J'écrirai à V. A. R. par la même. Je prie V. A. R. de maintenir la discipline la plus stricte parmi vos troupes: on fait tout ce qu'on peut à Paris pour nationaliser la guerre ; mais si les troupes se conduisent bien, malgré qu'on prend du pays ce qui est nécessaire pour leur subsistance, ils ne réussiront pas. Les troupes doivent se conduire bien si ils sont bien nourries.

Je suis, &c.,

WELLINGTON.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE ARMY, 26TH JUNE, 1815. [905.]

The infantry camped near Nouroir and Magny will assemble across the canal by the side of the road to Vermand, with their baggage, at daybreak.

The cavalry will assemble with its baggage at the same time. The two brigades at Villerets and Bellenglise upon the road to Vermand, in front of the infantry. The remainder of the cavalry will assemble in such situation and be so placed as to follow the infantry as soon as they can be admitted into the column.

This column will move in the following order, and is to commence its march at 5, and camp near Beauvoir and Lanchy :

The brigade of British Life Guards,
The 2nd division,
The Nassau troops,
The remainder of the cavalry.

The baggage of the different corps is to follow the column in the same order in which it is directed to move.

The baggage of the different corps will follow the column in the order of march.

Head quarters will be at Vermand.

The pontoon train is to move to-morrow from Le Câteau to Estrées, and join the army on the road to Vermand.

WELLINGTON.

The King of Prussia to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

M. LE DUC, Hanau, ce 26 Juin, 1815.

Le Maréchal Prince Blücher vient de m'informer de la victoire éclatante et décisive que les armées Anglaise et Prussienne combinées ont remportée le 18 sur l'armée Française à la Belle Alliance.

En vous félicitant, M. le Duc, du nouveau laurier que vous venez de cueillir, je ne puis me refuser la satisfaction de vous donner en même temps une marque publique de ma haute estime, en vous envoyant la décoration de mon grand ordre de l'Aigle Noir. Je désire qu'elle contribue à vous rappeler cette journée, à jamais mémorable, où la valeur des armées combinées, les talents et la bonne intelligence de leurs chefs, ont basé, je me plais à le croire, le retour du bonheur et du repos de l'Europe.

Sur ce, je prie Dieu, M. le Duc, qu'il vous ait dans sa sainte et digne garde.

FRÉDÉRIC GUILLAUME.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 26th June, 1815.

Under the important circumstances to which your astonishing victory has given birth, it has been thought desirable that I should repair to the head quarters of the Allied Sovereigns.

My wish is to reach them by yours, as I should consider a previous communication with you as indispensable. Pray write to me at Bruxelles or at Ostend, and let me know your opinion how I can best manage this.

I earnestly trust nothing that has passed at Paris will induce the Allies to relax their operations. We can only decide wisely when we are in capacity to execute fully, and we must not leave our work imperfect a second time. We owe it to you not to waste what you have done for us.

Ever, my dear Lord, most sincerely yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, London, 26th June, 1815.

Accept my sincere congratulations on the unparalleled results of your first efforts, which have gone far to decide the issue of the contest.

I send an extract of a despatch from Nesselrode to Lieven, with a return annexed of the Russian troops which the Emperor means to propose to you to command. His Imperial Majesty has expressed great satisfaction at our having completed the arrangement for the Dutch loan, and, as you will see, is not less pleased at the aid we propose to afford, viz. of a million towards enabling him to bring forward Beningsen's army, which is already in march. You may be assured his sending this corps to you is de bon cœur; and although it cannot reach you for some weeks, it may enable you to cover more ground when you reach the interior of France. I am inclined to hope the Russians will draw cordially with you, and that this pledge of good will may enable us to manage the Emperor's politics on the main objects. His wish that we should retain the Seven Islands shows that he is not indisposed to us.

I will not detain you longer than to assure you that I am, my dear Lord,

Ever most sincerely yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

I send you this in confidence. The Emperor will probably announce it to you himself. He knows the delicacy you would feel upon any arrangement of this nature which was not spontaneous.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Comte Nesselrode to Prince de Lieven.

Les réponses que vous avez transmises relativement au subside additionnel ne pouvaient également que répondre à la juste attente de Sa Majesté Impériale. Il a saisi avec empressement le moyen que le gouvernement Anglais a jugé utile pour justifier aux yeux du Parlement et de la nation ce nouveau sacrifice pécuniaire. Des ordres ont été expédiés sur-le-champ pour qu'un des corps de l'armée du Comte de Wittgenstein (qui a été déjà mise en marche) se dirige sur celle du Duc de Wellington, et Sa Majesté regarde comme aussi honorable que glorieux pour ses troupes de combattre à côté de la brave armée Anglaise sous un des premiers capitaines du siècle.

Le corps destiné à y être réuni est fort de plus de 40,000 hommes,* et c'est celui commandé par le Prince Eugène de Wurtemberg, officier-général de la plus grande distinction, qui, pendant toutes les campagnes des années 1812 1813, et 1814, n'a cessé de déployer autant de mérite que de valeur.

L'Empereur m'a ordonné de vous transmettre l'état détaillé de ce corps, afin que vous puissiez le communiquer à My Lord Castlereagh. Il lui prouvera que sa force monte au-delà de celle qu'il avait demandée : quant à la composition, vous pouvez lui donner l'assurance que les divisions dont ce corps est formé ne laissent rien à désirer, tant sous le rapport de la tenue que sous celui de la bravoure.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Viscount Castlereagh.

Mannheim, 26th June, 1815.

I am just returned from a dinner at my Emperor's. The other Sovereign was there. "Wellington" was drank with enthusiasm, and nothing can equal the joy that reigns.

In such a moment and with such admirable feelings one ought to say nothing about particular traits; but to you, from whom I conceal nothing, it is impossible not to perceive the regret of a certain great person that his army is not now forward, because he sees he will no longer play the first card. He has expressed himself, however, very decidedly: that we must listen to nothing until Buonaparte's person is given up; that this time we must not mar our own existence again by too much lenity; and, having shown the French what it was to be merciful, we must now make them feel what it is to be just.

He has expressed some surprise Wellington has not sent an aide-de-camp to him, but upon the whole it is impossible to be in better trim or disposition. You will judge, however, that your presence, the sooner you can come, becomes from the tide of successes absolutely necessary, as there will certainly be many difficult points of negotiation to manage; but the esprit is good in every quarter, and it only wants management. Count Hardenberg's business is settled, but his arrival at head quarters has not yet taken place. You will know the Emperor has sent Stackelberg orders to sign the treaty; so this, thank God, will be done.

If you should come immediately, pray apprise me; and if I am to go to meet you, or stay at these head quarters. It appears to me you will join Wellington and the King of France first, and we, with 400,000 men, will arrive, as you did from Dijon last year. It is most likely that the King's arrival at Paris would arrest these armies, but it is impossible not to see all have an eagerness to go there, from the Emperor to the common soldier. However, one ought to save the poor country from the curse of Russian soldiers, if there is a prospect of accommodation.

The King of Prussia is not yet arrived, or Hardenberg, but expected to-morrow, when we march to Spire.

I shall send these despatches by Gracewood, who goes to secure his place direct to London, and duplicates to Lord Wellington to be forwarded from Bruxelles, as I suppose him near Paris, and Gracewood might have a dance to catch him, and I conclude you will be glad to hear from us rapidly.

I enclose a letter from Mr. Canning, just received. Nothing more occurs.

In haste, your most affectionate and devoted

STEWART.

P.S.—Knesebeck has a report from Blücher of his having taken in the pursuit Buonaparte's baggage, in which were concealed his diamonds. Blücher has sent them as a dowry from the army to the Princess Royal, through the King, with a request to wear them on her marriage. This is a fine trait.

I have not thought it necessary to make any communication in particular of Clancarty's non-arrival to the different ministers, as they all knew he had no public order, and that the suggestion was only in a private letter, and not decided on finally. I believe Meerveldt wrote all this. I have told everybody who asked me that I expect you every week.

I think Nancy will be the point where negotiations will begin.

The Emperor of Austria should be invited, if this ends at Paris, by the Prince Regent to London.

Rasoumoffsky is just arrived: all the rest of the treaty rédacteurs still in the rear.

The Emperor has given General Lambert a very sharp reprimand for his consenting to the truce.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 26th June, 1815.

The account of Buonaparte's abdication and the intention of the provisional government established at Paris to make a proposition of peace to the Allies were known last night, and we have this morning determined that Lord Castlereagh shall proceed in the course of a few days to the head quarters of the Allies.

Your Grace will proceed in your military operations in the manner which appears most expedient for the glorious conclusion of a campaign which has begun so triumphantly. Every exertion shall be made to hasten the reinforcements destined for you; and no doubt is entertained that you will use all that influence which you must have over the Allies, after such eminent service done to the common cause, to encourage them to a vigorous prosecution of the war at this most critical period of it.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 26th June, 1815.

Sir Edward Paget is desirous of seeing the result of Buonaparte's abdication before he proceeds to the army, because, anxious as he is to serve under you, he is unwilling to put himself to the heavy charge of equipment if there be a prospect of an early termination of hostilities.

I was made very happy by finding that a communication had taken place between you and the Earl of Uxbridge on the subject of Sir Edward's serving, by which I see you will not dislike this selection.

Yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Prince Metternich to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Mannheim, ce 26 Juin, 1815.

J'adresse aujourd'hui une lettre conjointement avec le Comte de Nesselrode à Votre Excellence. J'avoue que j'ai provoqué cette mesure pour porter l'Empereur Alexandre à se prononcer dans un sens entièrement conforme au nôtre, et je crois en cette occasion comme en toutes que le premier but à atteindre est celui de la plus entière conformité de vues et même d'expressions entre tous les Alliés.

M. de Vincent étant hors d'état de suivre V. E., je vais lui envoyer quelqu'un d'autre.

Le moment est venu où je dois supplier Votre Excellence d'employer tout son crédit près du Roi pour éviter que dans une circonstance aussi décisive on écarte un peu les préjugés, les personnalités, et les formes, quand il s'agit de sauver le fond. Personne n'a plus à dire que vous, Monsieur le Duc; et je vous supplie, au nom de la cause que nous défendons, de n'écouter que vous, et par conséquent la raison.

Recevez les assurances de ma haute considération.

METTERNICH.

Veuillez bien nous tenir très-exactement au courant de ce que vous faites relativement à l'intérieur de la France. On viendra s'adresser beaucoup à nous en la présence des Souverains, et nos soins les plus directs tendront toujours à faire éviter toute divergence entre les deux quartiers-généraux.

Count Pozzo di Borgo to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Câteau, 26 Juin, 1815.

La nécessité de parler raison à M. de Talleyrand m'a retenu à Mons un jour de plus: en attendant vous marchez avec tant de rapidité, entraîné par votre propre victoire, que je ne saurais avoir l'honneur de vous rejoindre sans quitter le Roi. Dans cette circonstance je crois que ma présence auprès de lui n'est pas tout-à-fait inutile à la cause générale et à son service.

La lettre de Sa Majesté l'Empereur contient l'offre de mettre sous vos ordres quarante mille Russes commandés par le Prince Eugène de Wurtemberg, jeune homme qui donne les plus grandes espérances. Si vous avez épargné au monde des nouveaux sacrifices par la victoire de Waterloo, cette offre, My Lord, sera toujours une preuve de la grande confiance que l'Empereur met en vous. Le reste de l'expédition que j'ai reçue était fort satisfaisant.

Je ferai mon possible pour vous rejoindre, afin de consulter votre opinion sur beaucoup de points qui vont maintenant devenir sujet de discussion et de décision pour tous: si les postes ne sont pas impraticables, je me mettrai en route de Cambrai pour votre quartier-général.

M. de Talleyrand se rend à Cambrai ce soir avec tous les autres mi-nistres : c'est un grand scandale d'évité, qui dans le moment aurait été très-nuisible.

Agréez, My Lord, les sentiments de respect et d'attachement les plus sincères

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

POZZO DI BORGO.

Major-Gen. P. Maitland to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Péronne, 26th June, 1815.

I have the honour to send you the terms on which the Governor of Péronne capitulated. We lost about ten men.

I have the honour to be your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

PEREGRINE MAITLAND.

A return of the artillery and stores shall be sent to your Grace to-morrow.

MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL, De mon Quartier-Général, le 26 Juin, 1815.

L'attachement que je porte au Lieutenant-Général Comte de Lobau me fait vivement désirer de savoir s'il est du nombre de ceux que le sort des armes a fait tomber aux mains des troupes sous vos ordres à la bataille du Mont St. Jean.

Assuré à l'avance des égards que le caractère de Votre Excellence garantit aux prisonniers, je croirais lui faire injure en réclamant en sa faveur tous les secours que peut nécessiter sa position. Je me bornerai donc à demander à Votre Excellence des nouvelles du Comte de Lobau, et à vous offrir le renouvellement des sentiments de la haute estime avec laquelle j'ai l'honneur d'être

Votre très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

LE MARÉCHAL COMTE DE GROUCHY.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir H. Clinton to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Estinnes au Val, 26th June, 1815.

When I begged leave to recommend an officer to be appointed Assistant Adjutant-General to the division under my command, the tranquil state of the army made me not at all anxious for your immediate decision; but I now seriously feel the want of an officer of greater experience in the Adjutant-General's duties than Captain Bentinck, in spite of the assiduity with which he endeavours to do every part of his duty. Lieutenant-Colonel Miller, the officer whom I formerly recommended for this appointment, has died of his wound; and I now beg leave to name in his place Lieutenant-Colonel Dawkins, of the Coldstream Guards, of whose zeal and punctuality in the performance of his duty I have a high opinion; and as he discharged the duty of Major of Brigade during the four or five last campaigns in Spain and France, and occasionally that of Assistant Adjutant-General to the 1st division, I have no doubt of his being sufficiently qualified. From the good opinion which I have every reason to entertain of Captain Bentinck, and the desire I have to retain him with me, I hope that if your Grace should find it expedient to comply with my request in favour of Lieutenant-Colonel Dawkins, you will allow Captain Bentinck to hold his present post with this division.

I have the honour to be, my dear Lord,

Your faithful and most obedient servant,

H. CLINTON.

The Duke de Feltre to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Cambrai, ce 26 Juin, 1815.

Dès que le Roi a appris que d'après les ordres que j'avais remis au Maréchal de Camp Comte d'Audenarde, la citadelle de Cambrai avait ouvert ses portes, Sa Majesté se détermina à se porter en avant à Cambrai, conformément à ce qui avait été convenu entre Votre Excellence et moi. Le Roi est parti du Câteau à onze heures du matin, et est arrivé à Cambrai à quatre heures : sur la route tous les habitants n'ont cessé de le suivre en lui témoignant leur joie, et à Cambrai Sa Majesté a reçu toutes les marques possibles d'attachement ; des Anglais en ont été les témoins, et en auront sûrement entretenu Votre Excellence.

A peine arrivé à Cambrai, j'ai appris que le Général Lahure faisait des démarches pour passer sous l'autorité du Roi. Par ordre de Sa Majesté j'envoi demain à Douai le Maréchal de Camp Comte d'Ollonne, neveu du Comte de Vioménil, et j'ordonne au Général Lahure de remettre au Comte d'Ollonne le commandement du département du Nord et la place de Douai. Je fais une semblable démarche pour Bouchain, et j'en charge un officier nommé M. de Brichambeau, qui a été dans le corps du Génie. Du reste nous n'affaiblirons pas la garnison de Cambrai, qui est composée de la presque totalité du corps de Monseigneur le Duc de Berri.

Votre aide-de-camp, Monsieur le Duc, est arrivé à cinq heures et demie : j'ai fait partir avec lui M. le Duc de Mortemar, avec un ordre de moi pour que la place de Péronne soit remise au Roi. Il m'a été impossible d'écrire à Votre Excellence, de peur de retarder M. de Mortemar.

Je prie instamment Votre Excellence de m'envoyer des nouvelles de Paris. Une députation de St. Quentin, qui est ici, m'assure que cette ville a fourni aux Prussiens énormément en vivres : il paraît qu'on lui demande en outre 600,000 en argent. J'en parle confidentiellement à Votre Excellence, et afin qu'elle sache ce qui se passe.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec les sentiments de la plus haute considération,
Monsieur le Duc,
De Votre Excellence le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,
DUC DE FELTRE.

The Commissioners of the Provisional Government to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Laon, le 26 Juin, 1815, à midi.

Les Plénipotentiaires Français soussignés regrettent vivement de n'avoir pas encore de réponse à la note qu'ils ont eu l'honneur d'envoyer hier à Son Excellence Monsieur le Général-en-Chef Duc de Wellington.

Dans l'intervalle, ils croyent user d'une utile précaution en lui adressant les copies qu'ils reçoivent à l'instant même de Paris de lettres que le Ministère des Affaires Etrangères de France a dû faire tenir directement à Son Excellence et à Lord Castlereagh. Ces lettres complètent les communications qu'ils ont faites hier.

Ils saisissent cette occasion de renouveler à Son Excellence l'assurance de leur haute considération.

Dr. J. R. Grant to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Bruxelles, 26th June, 1815.

I have the honour to acquaint your Grace, that having now accommodated the wounded and organised the hospitals, I think it right in the present circumstances of the army to lose no time in proceeding to head quarters, and expect to be able to set off to-morrow morning.

On my arrival I shall have the honour of reporting personally the arrangements I have made. In the mean time, as I find the number of wounded prisoners and of the slighter British wounded who are in billets to have been greater than was calculated when I wrote the Adjutant-General, I beg to enclose a state which your Grace may rely upon as far as regards the number in the hospitals, but is still conjectural with respect to those in billets, not having been able to obtain, either through the Commandant or Mayor, a statement of them.

I have been prevented, by want of transport, sending the wounded prisoners, or indeed any wounded, in the direction of Ghent, Bruges, and Ostend, where I had prepared hospitals and proposed embarking many of the wounded, particularly the prisoners.

I shall leave directions to continue to evacuate the hospitals at Bruxelles upon those of Antwerp, with a view to the embarkation of such as are in a proper state. This will give us also room at Bruxelles to take into hospitals the whole of the slight cases that are in billets, and I have already apprised the Mayor that we are ready to receive 500 of the worst of them. What will then remain are so slight that I expect many of them will be fit to join their regiments in a fortnight.

The conduct of the inhabitants towards the wounded has been excellent, and the exertions of the medical officers great.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

J. R. GRANT.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE ARMY, 27TH JUNE, 1815. [906.]

The infantry camped near the villages of Beauvoir and Lanchy will assemble near the road to Nesle with their baggage at daybreak.

The cavalry will assemble with their baggage at the same time. The two light brigades at Douilly and Ugny l'Equippe, upon the road to Nesle, in front of the infantry.

The remainder of the cavalry and Colonel Estorff's brigade will assemble in such manner and be so placed as to follow the infantry in the column.

The column will move, crossing the Somme at Willecourt, by Nesle upon Roye, in the following order, viz.:

The two light brigades of cavalry,
The 2nd division,
The Nassau troops,
The remainder of the cavalry,
Colonel Estorff's brigade.

The baggage of the different corps will follow in the order of the column.

Lieutenant-General Sir C. Colville will march the 4th division from Gouy through Péronne towards Roye, halting at the village of Puzeaux.

The troops camped near Caulaincourt and Marte Ville will be assembled with their baggage at daybreak on the road to Nesle in the following order, viz.:

The Belgian cavalry with the corps,
The brigade of the 1st division,
The 3rd division,
The Netherland infantry attached to the 1st corps.

These troops are to march at 5, crossing the Somme at Willecourt through Nesle, and camp near the villages of Cressy, Billencourt, and Breuil.

The baggage of the corps will follow in the order of the column.

Major-General Sir J. Byng will be so good as to direct two battalions of the Netherland brigade now at Péronne to occupy that place. The remainder of the brigade of Guards at Péronne are to march at 7 through Nesle to the village of Cressy, and join the 1st corps.

The troops camped near Nouroir and Magny will assemble at daybreak with their baggage near the road leading by Vermand to Ham, in the following order:

The Brunswick cavalry,
The 5th division,
The 6th division,
The Brunswick infantry,
The reserve artillery.

The column will march at 5: the Brunswick cavalry and 5th division with the reserve brigade of howitzers upon Ham; the remainder of the column will camp between the villages of Douilly and Villers.

The baggage of the corps will follow in the order of the column.

The pontoon train will move from Estrées, and follow by Vermand and Beauvoir the head quarters of the army.

Head quarters will be at Nesle.

Troops to draw resources.

The 2nd corps will draw its resources from the villages as follow:

The 2nd division at Roye and St. Medard.
The Nassau troops, Larrepais, Balatre, and Champien.
The cavalry from St. Georges, Dancourt, St. Taurin, Villers, Roye, Goyencourt, and Verpillières.
The 4th division from the neighbourhood of Puzeaux.

The 1st corps will draw its resources:

The 1st division from Retonviller, Marchelourade, and Billencourt.
The Netherland troops from Landevoisin, Quiquery, Breuil, Moyencourt, Buverchy, and Hombleux.
The 3rd division, Cressy, Biarre, and Balatre.

The column moving upon Ham will draw resources:

The 5th division, St. Sulpice, Etouilly, and Pithon.
The 6th division, Sancourt, Villers St. Christophe, and Bray St. Christophe.
The Brunswick corps from Douilly, Herouel, and Oroir.
The reserve artillery from Douchy and Fluquières.

WELLINGTON.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Earl of Liverpool.

DEAR LIVERPOOL, St. James's Square, Sunday night, 12 o'clock.

The papers of the 23rd just arrived.

Buonaparte has abdicated in favour of his son. The Assemblies have accepted the abdication unconditionally. They have nominated a provisional government of five, of which Fouché, Carnot, and Caulaincourt are three, and determined to send Commissioners to the Allies to negotiate.

The Minister of War states in the House of Peers that they have still an army of 60,000 men to cover the North. Ney contradicts this, and says it does not exceed 25,000; and that there is nothing which can prevent the advance of the enemy to Paris. He tells them they have no choice but to negotiate with the Allies.

The French army is admitted to have been entirely dissolved in the battle of the 18th.

Vandamme seems to have got with 12,000 men in the rear of the Allies, and to be thus cut off.

Sir C. Stuart writes from Mons, the 23rd, to which place Louis XVIII. had removed; Wellington at Câteau Cambresis; Blücher at Avesnes. We had parked 172 cannon; the Prussians 62.

I have called a Cabinet for half-past one.

Ever yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

The Duc d'Otrante to Marshal Davoust.

M. LE MARÉCHAL, Paris, le 27 Juin, 1815.

Les circonstances sont telles qu'il est indispensable que Napoléon se décide à partir pour se rendre à l'île d'Aix. S'il ne s'y résout pas à la notification que vous lui ferez faire de l'arrêté ci-joint, vous devrez le faire surveiller à la Malmaison, de manière à ce qu'il ne puisse s'en évader. En conséquence, vous mettrez à la disposition du Général Becker la gendarmerie et les troupes nécessaires pour garder les avenues qui aboutissent de toutes parts vers la Malmaison. Vous donnerez à cet effet des ordres au premier-inspecteur général de la gendarmerie. Ces mesures doivent demeurer secrètes autant qu'il sera possible.

Cette lettre, M. le Maréchal, est pour vous; mais le Général Becker, qui sera chargé de remettre l'arrêté à Napoléon, recevra de Votre Excellence des instructions particulières, et lui fera sentir qu'il a été pris dans l'intérêt de l'Etat et pour la sûreté de sa personne; que sa prompte exécution est indispensable; enfin, que l'intérêt de Napoléon pour son sort futur le commande impérieusement.

LE DUC D'OTRANTE.

MONSEIGNEUR, Malmaison, 29 Juin, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur d'annoncer à la commission de gouvernement que l'Empereur monte en voiture pour se rendre à sa destination, en témoignant ses souhaits pour le rétablissement de la paix et pour la prospérité de la France.

Daignez, Monseigneur, recevoir l'hommage du profond respect avec lequel j'ai l'honneur d'être, &c.,

TERMS OF CAPITULATION OF QUESNOY.

Le Lieutenant-Général commandant du blocus de la ville de Quesnoy et le Lieutenant-Général Commandant Supérieur de la susdite ville étant convenus de traiter sur la reddition de la susdite place pour la remettre à S.M. le Roi de France, Louis XVIII., ont nommé pour leurs plénipotentiaires, de la part du Général Commandant Supérieur Despeaux : MM. le Major du Génie Vinache et le Chef de Bataillon Humblet; et de la part du Lieutenant-Général commandant le blocus du Quesnoy : MM. le Capitaine du Génie Ninaber et le Capitaine Aide-de-Camp Anthing, lesquels plénipotentiaires sont convenus des articles ci-dessous :—

ART. 1.—Le Lieutenant-Général Commandant Supérieur de la place du Quesnoy s'engage à remettre la ville et dépendances de la dite place à M. le Lieutenant-Général commandant le blocus pour être remise à S. M. Louis XVIII.

ART. 2.—Demain 28 Juin, à six heures du soir, M. le Lieutenant-Général commandant le blocus de la place de Quesnoy fera prendre possession par une compagnie d'infanterie et un détachement d'artillerie de la porte Forest, qu'il lui sera remise par M. le Lieutenant Commandant Supérieur de la place.

ART. 3.—Il sera nommé des Commissaires des deux côtés pour faire la remise des magasins et du matériel qui se trouvent dans la ville.

ART. 4.—Le Commandant Supérieur, Officiers, Sous-Officiers, et Soldats de la ligne se rendront auprès du Roi après-demain, 29 Juin, 1815, dans la matinée, et conformément à la lettre de Son Excellence le Duc de Feltre, Ministre de la Guerre de S.M., du 25 Juin, au Câteau Cambresis.

ART. 5.—Les Gardes Nationales de la ville seront tenus d'y faire le service ; les autres Gardes Nationales étrangers au département du Nord seront renvoyés dans leurs foyers, et leur marche sera réglée ultérieurement.

ART. 6.—Le Lieutenant-Général Commandant Supérieur de la place de Quesnoy nommera deux officiers qui, munis de passeports, se rendront à Cambrai pour s'assurer de la présence de S.M. Louis XVIII. dans cette ville, ainsi que l'abdication de Napoléon Buonaparte ; et dans le cas où le contenu du présent Article ne sera pas conforme à l'annonce ci-dessus mentionnée, le présent traité sera regardé comme non-avenu dans tout son contenu.

ART. 7 et dernier.—Les Articles ci-dessus mentionnés seront soumis à la ratification de MM. les Généraux respectifs.

Fait au Quartier-Général de Solimetz, le 27 Juin, 1815.

The Count de Lally Tolendal to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Bruxelles, ce 27 Juin, 1815.

N'y a-t-il donc pas trop d'orgueil à occuper de soi, pendant quelques minutes, le héros, je ne dirai pas du jour, mais des jours et des siècles? Au moins c'est l'orgueil d'une bonne conscience. Vous m'avez honoré de votre estime, quelquefois même de votre confiance. C'est un trésor dont je ne veux pas perdre un grain. J'ai cru, dans de si graves circonstances, vous devoir compte de ma conduite.

Ce compte, My Lord, vous le trouverez tout entier dans la copie ci-jointe de la lettre que j'ai eu l'honneur d'écrire au Roi de France le jour où il a quitté Gand. Accordez-moi de la lire.

Je l'ai montrée au Prince de Talleyrand à son passage ici : elle s'est trouvée dans un accord parfait avec ses sentiments et ses dispositions actuelles.

La réception qui lui a été faite à Mons, et tout ce qui a dû la préparer, n'ont fait que me confirmer de plus en plus dans ma résolution. Les intrigues et les luttes de l'ambition me sont étrangères. Mes faibles services seront toujours aux ordres de qui aura droit de les réclamer ; mais je ne puis sacrifier mon repos qu'à une confiance qui apprécie la pureté de mon zèle, et qui veuille en recueillir le fruit.

Votre approbation, My Lord, voilà le besoin qui me presse dans ce moment.

Agréez avec bonté l'hommage de l'admiration et du respectueux attachement avec lesquels j'ai l'honneur d'être,

My Lord,

De Votre Grâce le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

LALLY TOLENDAL.

The Count de Lally Tolendal to King Louis XVIII.

SIRE, Gand, ce 22 Juin, 1815.

J'étais allé hier à Anvers, où a été transporté mon beau-frère, le Lieutenant-Général Halkett, grièvement blessé dans la journée à jamais mémorable qui rouvre à V. M. les portes de son royaume.

J'y ai su la première lettre du Duc de Wellington à V. M., et me voilà de retour à Gand.

Sire, je n'avais d'ordre à prendre que de mon cœur pour suivre et accompagner V. M. dans son épreuve : je me croirais présomptueux de la suivre dans son triomphe sans en recevoir l'ordre positif de sa part.

V. M., Sire, n'a sûrement pas oublié l'audience particulière qu'elle a daigné m'accorder le jour de la Trinité, et que je n'avais osé solliciter que pour l'entretenir de ce qui me paraissait le bien de son service, le besoin de sa cause, celui de son peuple et de son état.

V. M. me permit ce jour-là de répandre mon cœur tout entier devant elle. Elle me savait dévoué, elle voulut que je fusse vrai. Elle ne pouvait se tromper à mon accent. Elle m'encourageait quand j'hésitais. Dans un moment où je lui exprimais, avec une espèce de tremblement, la crainte et la douleur que j'éprouvais de blesser son cœur, elle me dit : Vous le soulagez. Elle me tendit deux fois sa main royale que je couvris de baisers et de larmes. Enfin, Sire, V. M. connut tout mon dévouement, tous mes principes, toutes mes opinions sur les personnes comme sur les choses, et surtout mon abnégation entière de moi-même.

Depuis cette époque le Conseil n'a plus été qu'un être de raison, un être purement nominal. La gravité des circonstances exige qu'il reprenne aujourd'hui une existence réelle, que rien ne se fasse sans lui, et que la France entière en connaisse les membres et les principes. Les armées font tomber les barrières ; l'opinion seule consolide les triomphes.

J'entends parler de partis croisés, d'ambitions personnelles, d'espérances imprudentes à concevoir et impossibles à réaliser, de sacrifices inévitables qu'on prétend pouvoir éviter, qui paraîtraient généreux s'ils étaient volontaires, qui seraient courts s'ils étaient prompts, et qui, disputés, peuvent être sans terme comme sans mérite.

Sire, je ne suis ni d'Apollon, ni de Paul, ni de Céphas; je suis de Christ et de son Evangile, c'est-à-dire du Roi et de sa Charte; du Roi ayant donné volontairement à ses peuples, qui l'ont acceptée avec transport, cette Charte, le plus beau titre de votre gloire aux yeux de la postérité, et le garant nécessaire de votre règne dans la génération présente. V. M. l'a confirmée solennellement. Tous les Princes de votre auguste maison l'ont jurée au pied de votre trône, sur vos mains, dans vos bras, et à la face des représentans de la nation. Hors de cette Charte il n'y a point de salut, et quiconque entreprendrait d'y porter atteinte serait criminel de lèse-majesté au premier chef, car ce serait conspirer contre le Roi et contre l'Etat.

Si V. M. juge nécessaire de perfectionner quelques points de cette Charte, c'est encore à sa volonté libre qu'il appartient de créer ces améliorations et de les proposer à l'assentiment des deux Chambres. Toute idée de transaction forcée, d'articles proposés, à plus forte raison de conditions imposées par des individus ou des corps en état de rébellion ouverte, répugne également à vos droits et à votre position, à la dignité royale et au vœu national.

Je demande à V. M. la permission de hasarder encore auprès d'elle une opinion (je pourrais dire un axiome) dont je suis incessamment préoccupé. V. M. a déjà garanti, et va être obligée de garantir plus fortement que jamais, toutes les ventes de biens dits nationaux. C'est le sacrifice le plus dur qu'on puisse faire à la plus terrible nécessité. Ce système, aux effets duquel il est plus possible de s'arracher, est si horriblement injuste dans son principe, que je crois qu'en le consacrant définitivement V. M. ne peut se dispenser d'y joindre simultanément la promesse d'engager les Chambres à proposer une indemnité pour les anciens propriétaires. Ce sera même un garant de plus pour les détenteurs actuels.

Il me reste à demander humblement pardon au Roi de la liberté que je viens de prendre en lui exposant, ou plutôt en lui rappelant encore tous mes sentiments. J'ai obéi à ma conscience et à mon zèle. Je répète que je ne demande ni ne désire rien pour moi. Malheur à qui ne perd pas aujourd'hui l'idée de soi-même dans l'idée unique du Roi et de l'Etat! Je vais aller à Bruxelles; j'y resterai aux ordres de V. M., si elle en a à me donner, et je la supplie de daigner me les faire adresser chez son ministre, M. de la Tour du Pin.

Je suis avec un très-profond respect, &c.,

LALLY TOLENDAL.

The Regency of Brunswick to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Brunswick, le 27 Juin, 1815.

Nous venons d'apprendre par les rapports qui nous parviennent de l'armée qu'à la suite du malheureux événement qui nous a enlevé notre bien-aimé maître, et de la blessure du Colonel Olfermann, Commandeur des troupes Brunswickoises, Votre Seigneurie a daigné en confier le commandement au Colonel Herzberg.

Nous vous remercions sincèrement, My Lord, du soin que vous avez bien voulu prendre de ne pas laisser nos troupes sans chef après les cruelles pertes qu'elles ont essuyées.

Cependant nous pensons que cette disposition n'est que provisoire, et qu'aussitôt après la guérison du Colonel Olfermann, que l'on nous dit être assez prochaine, il reprendra le commandement qu'il a toujours eu sous les ordres immédiats de feu notre auguste maître.

Outre la volonté bien prononcée de feu le Duc à cet égard, le Colonel Olfermann a encore le mérite incontestable d'avoir organisé ce corps, de l'avoir discipliné et mis sur le pied où il est maintenant, et enfin de l'avoir, après la mort du Duc, conduit à la victoire avec bravoure et intrépidité dans les brillantes affaires qui viennent de mettre le comble à la gloire de Votre Seigneurie.

Ces puissants motifs, notre entière confiance, celle des troupes et du public de Brunswick décernant au Colonel Olfermann la continuation du commandement qu'il a exercé avec zèle, intelligence, et honneur jusqu'à présent, nous désirons ardemment qu'aussitôt après son rétablissement il rentre dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, au moins jusqu'à ce qu'un choix définitif ait été fait par la Régence qui, d'après les dernières dispositions de notre défunt Souverain, administrera le pays, et à la tête de laquelle sera vraisemblablement Son Altesse Royale le Prince Régent de la Grande Bretagne.

Nous avons cru de notre devoir de vous exposer, My Lord, ce vœu général, et les titres qui militent fortement en faveur du Colonel Olfermann dans cette conjoncture, tout en rendant d'ailleurs parfaitement justice aux mérites que le Colonel Herzberg s'est acquis dans d'autres circonstances. Mais comme Votre Seigneurie est plus à même que personne de juger auquel de ces deux officiers il convient de confier le commandement, nous lui abandonnons d'en décider, nous bornant à la prier de vouloir bien nous faire communiquer la décision qu'elle aura prise.

Nous saisissons avec empressement cette occasion, My Lord, de recommander nos troupes à la continuation de votre bienveillance, et de vous prier de vouloir bien employer votre puissante intervention pour le succès de l'affaire des subsides, affaire de la plus haute importance pour ce pays dans l'état d'épuisement où se trouvent ses finances.

Votre Seigneurie nous obligerait également si elle voulait avoir la bonté de charger le commandeur qu'elle aura trouvé bon de donner à nos troupes de leur témoigner en notre nom et celui du peuple Brunswickois notre entière satisfaction et reconnaissance pour leur bonne conduite, et la bravoure que, d'après les rapports qui nous sont parvenus, elles doivent avoir tenues dans les différentes affaires qui ont eu lieu.

Nous vous prions aussi, My Lord, d'agréer l'expression des sentimens les plus distingués, et de la haute considération avec laquelle nous avons l'honneur d'être,

My Lord,

De Votre Seigneurie les très-humbles et très-obéissants serviteurs,

Les Membres du Conseil Privé du Duché de Brunswick,

J. DE SCHMIDT PHISELDECK.

G. C. DE SCHLEINITZ.

[J'ai eu l'honneur de recevoir votre lettre; et quand le Colonel Olfermann joindra je lui donnerai le commandement du corps de Brunswick.

ANDREW CLEEVES.

CONVENTION comme le Commandant de HAM l'a proposée, accompagnée des Réponses de Son Excellence le Lieutenant-Général Baron de THIELEMANN.

1. Une partie des troupes Prussiennes, aussi nombreuse que la garnison Française, sera reçue au château pour faire la garnison conjointement avec les Français.

2. Le château sera gardé par cette garnison mêlée, et asservie pour le gouvernement futur de la France.

3. La partie des troupes Françaises qui doit quitter le château pour faire place aux Prussiens sera logée dans la ville de Ham et traitée amicalement.

4. Les troupes Prussiennes n'entreront pas avant le 28 du Juin au château, parcequ'on doit préparer leurs logements. L'officier commandant les troupes Prussiennes s'arrangera à cause de cela avec le commandant Français de la place.

Accordé.

5. Le matériel de l'artillerie qui se trouve en cet instant au château ne doit pas en sortir si ce n'est par ordre du nouveau gouvernement Français : on fera le même de l'archive et des autres papiers du Génie.

6. Tout bagage, ameublement, et effets des officiers, soldats, et employés militaires du château, reste à la disposition des propriétaires.

Son Altesse le Feld Maréchal Prince Blücher décidera sur ces points.

7. Le Secrétaire-Archiviste de la place et les différents employés de l'Artillerie et du Corps de Génie garderont leurs places.

Accordé.

8. L'officier Français commande les troupes Françaises, l'officier Prussien les Prussiens. Tous les deux sont sous les ordres du commandant du château.

Accordé.

Lieut.-Col. W. H. de Jongh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSEIGNEUR, Péronne, le 27 Juin, 1815.

D'après les ordres qui me sont transmis aujourd'hui à 3 heures de l'après-midi par un aide-de-camp de Votre Altesse, j'ai l'honneur de vous rendre compte que j'ai opéré à la découverte de l'inondation dont est susceptible cette ville, à ce quoi le tout est mis en règle le plus possible.

Votre Altesse trouvera ci-joint l'état des objets d'artillerie existants dans cette place. A mon arrivée ici, 40,635 cartouches du calibre Français ont été distribuées au 3me bataillon Orange Nassau, en vertu d'ordre de S. E. le Général de Division Baron de Perponcher.

Je viens de faire mettre les dispositions nécessaires en exécution pour l'état de siége de la ville ; j'ai commencé à désarmer provisoirement la Garde Nationale, ayant remarqué que l'esprit pour Napoléon règne pour la majeure partie entre eux. Leurs fusils seront donnés à une partie des soldats du 27e de chasseurs ici en garnison sous mes ordres, lesquels ont été faits prisonniers à l'affaire du 16 du courant, et qui ont été repris à leur corps lors de l'arrivée des Prussiens à Beaumont.

J'ai ensuite l'honneur de porter à la connaissance de Votre Altesse que le Maire m'a déclaré qu'il ne se trouve point ni d'approvisionnements tant en vivres qu'en fourrages.

Versant dans l'espérance d'avoir satisfait aux intentions de Votre Altesse, et en attendant d'ordres ultérieurs, j'ai l'honneur d'être,

Monseigneur,

De Votre Altesse le très-humble et très-obéissant serviteur,

W. H. DE JONGH.

The Duc d'Otrante to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Paris, le 27 Juin, 1815.

Vous venez d'agrandir votre réputation par de nouvelles victoires remportées sur les Français. C'est donc par vous surtout que les Français sont connus et appréciés. Vous voterez pour leurs droits au milieu des Puissances de l'Europe.

Dans ce Conseil de Souverains votre crédit et votre influence ne peuvent pas être moindres que votre gloire.

Les vœux des nations, qui ne calomnient ni ne flattent, ont fait connaître votre caractère. Dans toutes vos conquêtes votre droit des gens a été la justice, et votre politique la voix de la conscience.

Vous trouverez les demandes que nous vous faisons par nos plénipotentiaires conformes à la justice la plus rigoureuse.

La nation Française veut vivre sous un monarque ; elle veut aussi que le monarque règne sous l'empire des lois.

La République nous a fait connaître tout ce qu'ont de funeste les excès de la liberté, l'Empire tout ce qu'a de funeste l'excès du pouvoir. Notre vœu, et il est immuable, est de trouver à égale distance de ces excès l'indépendance, l'ordre, et la paix de l'Europe.

Tous les regards en France sont fixés sur la Constitution de l'Angleterre : nous ne prétendons pas être plus libres qu'elle ; nous ne consentirons pas à l'être moins.

Les Représentants du peuple Français travaillent à son pacte social. Les pouvoirs seront séparés, mais non divisés ; c'est de leur séparation même qu'on veut faire naître leur harmonie.

Dès que ce traité aura reçu la signature du Souverain qui sera appelé à gouverner la France, ce Souverain recevra le sceptre et la couronne des mains de la nation.

Dans l'état actuel des lumières de l'Europe, un des plus grands malheurs du genre humain ce sont les divisions de la France et de l'Angleterre. Unissons-nous pour le bonheur du monde.

C'est l'opinion du gouvernement Français, My Lord, que nul homme, en ce moment, ne peut aussi puissamment que vous concourir à mettre l'humanité toute entière sous un meilleur génie et dans une meilleure condition.

Je prie Votre Seigneurie d'agréer l'assurance de ma plus haute considération.

Le Président du Gouvernement,

Le Duc d'Otrante.

Sir C. Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My dear Lord, Cambrai, 27th June, 1815.

I have sent the messenger Vick with a bag of letters to your direction, which I have just received from England.

The King was well received at Cambrai, and appears highly satisfied with the conduct of the inhabitants.

I understand that some indirect proposals have been transmitted to the Duke de Feltre for the submission of the whole Département du Nord to the authority of Louis XVIII. He expects to hear further on the subject in the course of the day or to-morrow. He has sent an officer to summon Douai, and another to Bouchain, in the King's name.

I have just heard that Talleyrand is arrived.

Bapaume has surrendered to the King.

I hope you will let Vick return this way when he has received your letters from England.

I remain, my dear Lord, yours very faithfully,

CHARLES STUART.

General Lauriston has joined the King.

Sir C. Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Cambrai, 27th June, 1815.

Lord George Lennox has brought me your letter of the 27th June.*

I have stated your wishes to the Duke de Feltre, who has been directed by the King to tell me that orders will be sent immediately to recall the Duke de Mortemar, and the town of Péronne will remain in our possession. I must not, however, conceal from your Lordship that His Majesty expressed some regret in making this arrangement, from the idea that it may create an unfavourable impression on the public mind.

The Council are now sitting, and the projet of the Address to the French nation, which was drawn up by Talleyrand, corrected by Pozzo di Borgo, is under discussion.

By what Feltre told me when he came out of the room, I have reason to doubt if it will be admitted, or I rather think the King will suspend the publication for some days if it is admitted.

I remain, my dear Lord, yours very faithfully,

CHARLES STUART.

I send the last received despatch.

Marshal Davoust to Fouché

Paris, 27 Juin, 1815.

J'envoie à Votre Excellence la nouvelle que j'ai reçue ce soir sur l'état des choses et des troupes. Il n'y a pas de temps à perdre pour adopter la proposition que j'ai faite hier: nous devons proclamer Louis XVIII.; nous devons le prier de faire son entrée dans la capitale sans les troupes étrangères. Louis XVIII. doit régner avec l'appui de la nation; j'ai vaincu mes préjugés, mes idées; la plus irrésistible nécessité et la plus ntime conviction m'ont déterminé à croire qu'il n'y a pas d'autre moyen de sauver notre patrie.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 513.

Reply of Fouché to Marshal Davoust.

Je suis persuadé comme vous, M. le Maréchal, qu'il n'y a rien de mieux à faire que de traiter promptement d'un armistice ; mais il faut savoir ce que veut l'ennemi. Une conduite mal calculée produirait trois maux : 1. d'avoir reconnu Louis XVIII. avant tout engagement de sa part ; 2. de n'en être pas moins forcé de recevoir l'ennemi dans Paris ; 3. de n'obtenir aucune condition de Louis XVIII. Je prends sur moi de vous autoriser à envoyer aux avant-postes de l'ennemi et de conclure un armistice, en faisant tous les sacrifices qui seront compatibles avec nos devoirs et notre dignité. Il vaudrait mieux céder des places fortes que de sacrifier Paris.

La commission, à qui Fouché soumit cette lettre, y fit expressément ajouter :

"Il est inutile de vous dire, M. le Maréchal, que votre armistice doit être purement militaire, et qu'il ne doit contenir aucune question politique. Il serait convenable que cette demande d'armistice fût portée par un général de la ligne et un maréchal-de-camp de la garde nationale."

Stratford Canning, Esq., to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Zurich, 27th June, 1815.

I have the satisfaction to inform your Lordship that the decisive victory obtained on the 18th instant by his Grace the Duke of Wellington has been received in this country with unbounded demonstrations of joy. It has been announced to the public by discharges of artillery here and at Bern, as well as along the whole line from Basle to Geneva. The Diet and the government of this canton have sent deputations to express to me their admiration of the unrivalled conduct and valour of His Majesty's troops, and the transcendent genius so pre-eminently displayed by their great commander. They seem particularly gratified by my assurance that their expressions should be submitted to his Grace as well as to your Lordship.

The enclosed paper was communicated to me by the deputation of the Diet.

I enclose also a paper published here to-day, containing an account of the passage of the Rhine by the Austrian forces.

Those that have taken the route of the Simplon are not yet known to have passed Geneva. They seem to have stopped, or moved very slowly in the latter part of the passage ; and the inhabitants of the Valais are suffering, I understand, most severely from the immense consumption of provisions occasioned by this delay.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

STRATFORD CANNING.

P.S. I am credibly informed that the Austrian troops passing by Geneva amount to 60,000, exclusive of artillery ; 54,000 by Sion, and 6000 by Great St. Bernard.

S. C.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

A Son Excellence M. le Bourguemaître de Wyss à Zurich.

VOTRE EXCELLENCE, Bâle, le 25 Juin, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer M. le Lieutenant de Cavalerie Gemusous en courrier extraordinaire pour vous donner communication de l'importante lettre que je viens de recevoir du Général Français Le Courbe; dépêche que je communique en même temps à S. E. le Général en Chef Bachmann.

L'armée Alliée sous les ordres de S. A. R. l'Archiduc Ferdinand, arrivée ce matin à Lörrach, effectue demain au point du jour le passage du Rhin avec 120,000 à 130,000 hommes, divisés en trois colonnes; l'une passant par Rheinfelden, les deux autres sur les deux ponts de bateaux entre Grentzach et Wyle.

Cependant un détachement de 4000 hommes passera le pont de Bâle à 11 heures de la nuit: ces troupes sont destinées à contribuer à défendre Bâle, s'il était insulté, pendant le mouvement; mais il est à présumer que l'ennemi évacuera ses positions sans les défendre.

Pendant tout ce mouvement la 3me. division de la Confédération sera sous les armes, en ordre de bataille, et se conformera, aux ordres que j'ai reçues, en les appliquant, le plus avantageusement possible, aux circonstances qui pourraient se présenter.

J'ai l'honneur d'être avec le respect le plus profond, &c.,

D'AFFRY.

Le Général en Chef Le Courbe, commandant le Corps d'Observation du Jura, à M. le Général commandant les Troupes de la Diète Helvétique à Bâle.

M. LE GÉNÉRAL, Au Quartier-Général à . . . . le 25 Juin, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de vous prévenir que l'Empereur Napoléon a abdiqué le souverain pouvoir. Des commissaires, nommés par les Chambres, se rendent auprès des Puissances alliées pour rendre la paix au monde. Je vous invite à convenir entre nous qu'il ne sera commis aucun acte hostile jusqu'à ce qu'il ait été pris une décision par les Puissances et nos commissaires.

Veuillez donner connoissance, M. le Général, de cette communication à MM. les Généraux commandans dans nos environs et à M. le Président de la Diète.

J'ai l'honneur de vous saluer avec une parfaite considération.

WELLINGTON.

Sir C. Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Cambrai, 28th June, 1815, 10 o'clock P.M.

I have received your message by Hervey, which I propose to communicate to the King when I have an opportunity of speaking to him.

After a discussion of two days, Talleyrand has carried his point in the Council against the opinion of the Princes and the Duke de Feltre, and has persuaded the King to sign the accompanying Address to the French.

It has produced a good effect by laying the foundation of an Administration upon the principle which Lord Castlereagh has so frequently recommended.

La Quesnoy surrendered last night.

I remain, my dear Lord, very faithfully yours,

CHARLES STUART.

PROCLAMATION DU ROI.

Le Roi aux Français.

J'apprends qu'une porte de mon royaume est ouverte, et j'accours pour ramener mes sujets égarés, pour adoucir les maux que j'ai voulu prévenir, pour me placer une seconde fois entre les armées alliées et les Français, dans l'espoir que les égards dont je peux être l'objet tourneront à leur salut: c'est la seule manière dont j'ai voulu prendre part à la guerre. Je n'ai pas permis qu'aucun Prince de ma famille parût dans les rangs des étrangers; et j'ai enchaîné le courage de ceux de mes serviteurs qui avaient pu se ranger autour de moi.

Revenu sur le sol de ma patrie, je me plais à parler avec confiance à mes peuples. Lorsque j'ai reparu au milieu d'eux, j'ai trouvé les esprits agités et emportés par des passions contraires. Mes regards ne rencontraient de toutes parts que des difficultés et des obstacles. Mon gouvernement devait faire des fautes; peut-être en a-t-il fait. Il est des tems où les intentions les plus pures ne suffisent pas pour diriger, ou quelquefois mêmes elles égarent.

L'expérience seule pouvait avertir; elle ne sera pas perdue; je veux tout ce qui sauvera la France.

Mes sujets ont appris par de cruelles épreuves que le principe de la légitimité des souverains est l'une des bases fondamentales de l'ordre social, la seule sur laquelle puisse s'établir au milieu d'un grand peuple une liberté sage et ordonnée. Cette doctrine vient d'être proclamée comme celle de l'Europe entière. Je l'avais consacrée d'avance par ma Charte, et je prétends ajouter à cette Charte toutes les garanties qui peuvent en assurer le bienfait.

L'unité du ministère est la plus forte que je puisse offrir. J'entends qu'elle existe, et que la marche franche et assurée de mon conseil garantisse tous les intérêts et calme toutes les inquiétudes.

On a parlé dans les derniers tems du rétablissement de la dîme et des droits féodaux. Cette fable, inventée par l'ennemi commun, n'a pas besoin d'être réfutée. On ne s'attendra pas que le Roi de France s'abaisse jusqu'à repousser des calomnies et des mensonges dont les succès ont trop indiqué la source. Si les acquéreurs des domaines nationaux ont conçu des inquiétudes, la Charte aurait dû suffire pour les rassurer. N'ai-je pas moi-même proposé aux Chambres et fait exécuter des ventes de ces biens? Cette preuve de ma sincérité est sans réplique.

J'ai reçu, dans ces derniers tems, de mes sujets de toutes les classes, des preuves égales d'amour et de fidélité. Je veux qu'ils sachent combien j'ai été sensible; et c'est parmi tous les Français que j'aimerai à choisir ceux qui doivent approcher de ma personne et de ma famille. Je ne veux exclure de ma présence que ces hommes dont la renommée est un sujet de douleur pour la France, et l'effroi pour l'Europe. Dans la trame qu'ils ont ourdie, j'aperçois beaucoup de mes sujets égarés et quelques coupables.

Je promets, moi qui n'ai jamais promis en vain (l'Europe entière le sait), de pardonner, à l'égard des Français égarés, tout ce qui s'est passé depuis le jour où j'ai quitté Lille au milieu de tant de larmes, jusqu'à jour où je suis rentré dans Cambrai au milieu de tant d'acclamations.

Cependant le sang de mes sujets a coulé par une annales du monde n'offrent pas d'exemple. Cette l'étranger dans le cœur de la France. Chaque jour me nouveau. Je dois donc, pour la dignité de mon trône mes peuples, pour le repos de l'Europe, excepter du pard et les auteurs de cette trame horrible. Ils seront désig des lois par les deux Chambres, que je me propose d'assem Français, tels sont les sentimens que je rapporte au mili que le tems n'a pu changer, que le malheur n'a pu fatig n'a pu abattre, le Roi dont les pères régnent depuis l vôtres, revient pour consacrer le reste de ses jours à vous consoler.

Donné à Cambrai, ce 28me. jour du mois de Juin, de et de notre règne le vingt et unième.

(Et plus bas) Par le Roi,

Le Ministre Secrétaire d'Etat des Affaires Etrangères,

LE PRINCE DE TALLEY

la terminerai qu'après la réception des nouvelles. Buonaparte et sa famille supprimés de quelque manière que ce soit, il n'y aurait encore rien de fait pour la tranquillité de l'Europe, ni pour la sûreté du règne de Louis XVIII., si on laissait subsister l'armée sous le régime auquel l'avait portée cet homme de sang. Il faut la dénaturer entièrement et en changer toutes les formes, pour déraciner l'esprit d'insubordination, de désordre et de cruauté, qui la rendrait un instrument terrible dans les mains du premier ambitieux, Jacobin, républicain, ou tyran, qui voudrait l'employer contre l'autorité légitime d'abord, et après l'avoir renversée, ce que l'événement a montré être très-facile, s'en servir pour troubler de nouveau le Continent par des guerres incessantes. Je crois donc très-nécessaire que le Roi profite du moment de la terreur et de la désorganisation de l'armée, effet de votre merveilleuse victoire, pour la casser en entier et la recréer sur-le-champ sur le modèle de celle de Louis XIV. et de Louis XV. J'insiste donc que mon mémoire soit mis promptement sous les yeux du Roi, pour être au moins examiné avec la plus grande attention. Si vous approuvez mon opinion, je vous prie de l'appuyer de la vôtre, qui doit avoir beaucoup de poids. Si vous pensez différemment, je ne vous en prie pas moins de la soumettre à l'examen du Roi et de son Conseil.

Je ne crains pas, s'il l'adopte, qu'il essuye la moindre opposition des deux Chambres : 1. parce que ce changement ne regarde point la législation, et ne dépend absolument que du pouvoir exécutif ; 2. parce que toute la nation, qui pendant les 15 ans du règne du tyran, dont vous seul venez de la délivrer, a gémi sous ce joug de fer, n'aspire qu'à en être délivrée, et regardera comme le plus grand acte de bienfaisance du monarque ce résultat de sa fermeté et de sa justice. Que penserait de lui sa nation, si malgré les crimes de cette armée il la laissait subsister sur le même pied, avec le même esprit ? Que penserait l'Europe, quel gage aurait-elle de la durée de la paix, si elle voyait Louis XVIII. se remettre entre les mains de cette armée, après avoir été renversé de son trône par sa perfidie ? A quel degré d'insolence cette faible condescendance n'élèverait-elle pas cette soldatesque insolente et démoralisée par ses excès, par ses victoires et par ses défaites ? Je ne vois donc aucun danger à cette mesure vigoureuse, que je regarde comme indispensable, et dont vos succès ont levé toutes les difficultés et facilité les moyens.

Il me paraît que la terreur et la confusion se sont emparés du gouvernement provisoire établi par l'abdication de Buonaparte. Vous allez recevoir des députés chargés de négocier la paix. Ils ne seront certainement pas écoutés, et ne retarderont pas votre marche. Ces deux Chambres sont une création bâtarde qui ne peut ni représenter la nation, ni instituer un gouvernement provisoire. Les Puissances alliées ne connaissent qu'un gouvernement en France, celui du Roi légitime ; il n'y existe qu'une représentation légale, celle des deux Chambres qui ont concouru avec lui à la confection de la Charte constitutionnelle. La nation n'a donc aucun autre organe que le Roi pour traiter avec les Puissances. Il n'a besoin que de rassembler autour de lui, à son entrée sur le territoire Français, les deux Chambres telles qu'elles étaient au moment funeste de sa sortie ; alors les deux Chambres de Buonaparte, son conseil d'état, le gouvernement provisoire après son abdication, toutes ces productions du désordre se dissipent d'elles-mêmes comme les nuages après la tempête à l'apparition du soleil.

Tous les actes émanés de ce chaos, nommément la Régence au nom de Napoléon II., non-seulement seront nuls, mais ne dureront que jusqu'au jour, très-prochain, où le Roi entrera dans Paris. Alors ces actes ne laisseront que des souvenirs ridicules qui feront rougir la nation, mais qui serviront de boussole au Roi, plein de sagesse et de pénétration, pour connaître ses amis et ses ennemis, et pour savoir récompenser et punir à propos, sans s'écarter de sa marche constitutionnelle, qui lui assurera la confiance et l'amour de la nation.

Votre vieux ami et serviteur,

DUMOURIEZ.

Prince Frédéric des Pays-Bas to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Petit Wargnies, le 28 Juin, 1815.

Avant-hier j'ai eu l'honneur de recevoir votre lettre du 26 de Joncourt, par votre aide-de-camp, le fils de Lord Cathcart, lequel j'ai prié de dire à Votre Seigneurie que le matin il y avait le Maréchal-de-Camp Comte de Rothallier d'arrivé, qui venait sommer la place au nom de Louis XVIII.; il a commencé à parlementer avec le Gouverneur de Quesnoy, le Lieutenant-Général Despeaux, mais cela n'a eu aucun résultat qu'une réponse assez singulière du Gouverneur, qui me parut pourtant indiquer que peut-être on pourrait bien venir à bout de le persuader à capituler, et je résolus d'abord d'envoyer la nuit quelques grenades et boulets dans la ville pour tâcher d'en imposer un peu au Commandant, et de tâcher de mettre par-là les gardes nationales et habitants, qu'on dit être très-bien disposés pour nous, en révolte, en faisant avancer nos tirailleurs jusque sur le glacis, et les inquiéter autour de toute la ville. D'après tous les renseignements pris sur l'état des fortifications, il m'a paru ne pouvoir tâcher de le prendre par escalade, les fossés étant très-larges et pleins d'eau, et hors de cela encore une inondation de faite. A onze heures la nuit je fis commencer à tirer sur la ville avec cinq obusiers et six canons de 6 lb., et commencer le feu des tirailleurs, que j'ai fait continuer jusque vers les trois heures qu'il commençait à faire jour. Le feu a pris un moment à trois endroits différents dans la ville, mais a été très-promptement éteint. Il y a eu quelques hommes tués en ville et plusieurs blessés, et il me paraît que cela a justement fait l'effet que je désirais. Hier au soir le Général Anthing, qui commande la brigade Indienne, a envoyé un officier pour faire des propositions au Commandant, comme je lui avais autorisé de le faire, et de le menacer d'ailleurs d'un bombardement, assaut, etc.; sur cela il est entré en pourparlers, et a fini par signer la capitulation suivante cette nuit, c'est-à-dire qu'il enverrait un officier avec un aide-de-camp du Général Anthing à Cambrai, pour s'assurer de la vérité du séjour du Roi de France dans cette ville, et de l'abdication de Buonaparte en faveur de son fils, et que dès lors il nous ferait occuper ce soir à six heures la porte des Forêts et un bastion par une compagnie et quelque artillerie, et que demain matin la garnison sortirait de la ville, les gardes nationales mettraient bas les armes et retourneraient dans leurs foyers, le Commandant et la partie de la garnison qui n'est pas garde nationale iront demander les ordres du Roi Louis XVIII., au nom duquel nous occuperons la ville. Par un article secret il y est stipulé que la garnison prendra la cocarde blanche. Ces points m'ont parus tels que je puis ratifier cette capitulation, qui aura, j'espère, l'approbation de Votre Seigneurie. Je dois encore vous marquer, My Lord Duc, que cette capitulation a été faite sans connaissance du Général Rothallier, puisque celui-ci ne s'est pas pris à la chose comme il aurait pu et dû le faire, et n'avait point d'instructions, de façon qu'il ne sut que faire; pour cela j'ai cru bien pouvoir prendre sur moi de faire la capitulation, autant qu'il me parut possible de réunir l'intérêt de l'armée et celui du Roi de France. Le Général Rothallier étant désigné par Louis XVIII. pour commandant de Quesnoy, je ne lui mettrai point d'entraves, la citadelle où ils paraissent compter se maintenir la garnison n'étant pas assez forte et en partie pas assez bien disposée pour défendre le tout. Le Général Lauriston était aussi d'opinion que la ville peut-être je pourrai parvenir à l'avoir, mais pas facilement la citadelle. Je cerne actuellement entièrement Valenciennes et observe Condé et Bouchain, et emploie ma cavalerie à battre le pays dans toutes les directions. J'ai engagé le Général Behr, Commandant de Mons, de détacher aussi quelque chose de sa garnison vers Condé pour arrêter les excursions continuelles qu'ils en font. Suivant les ordres de Votre Seigneurie j'ai occupé Bavay, et y ai nommé un commandant de place pour soigner autant que possible tous les transports, blessés, traîneurs, etc., qui vont rejoindre l'armée. J'ai mis des détachements de cavalerie à Solesme et Englefontaine pour me tenir toujours en communication et relation avec la garnison de Cambrai et avec le Prince Auguste de Prusse. J'espère que ces dispositions que j'ai prises sont conformes à vos intentions et auront votre approbation; je me réglerai selon les circonstances, et attendrai d'ailleurs les ordres de Votre Seigneurie.

J'ai envoyé l'ordre il y a trois jours aux gouverneurs d'Anvers, Ostende, et Nieuport, de lever l'état de siége de ces places comme vous me l'avez ordonné.

J'avais mis bas la plume ici pour un moment et suis allé jusque près de Valenciennes: il me paraît que le Gouverneur est décidé de s'y tenir, et qu'il a une garnison sur laquelle il croit pouvoir compter en partie; il a fortement tiré sur nos troupes, et j'ai perdu deux officiers morts et un blessé.

Demain au soir je compte commencer cette sorte de bombardement, et tâcherai surtout de détruire leurs magasins.

Le Major de Waldkirch, mon aide-de-camp, que je prends la liberté d'envoyer à Votre Seigneurie avec ces dépêches, sera en état de vous faire rapport de bouche de la position des choses.

J'ai pris, suivant des ordres que le Général Van der Wyck m'a apportés de Votre Seigneurie, encore le même jour le commandement de toutes les troupes des Pays-Bas, et justement le surlendemain j'ai reçu le même ordre du Roi pour le faire si voudriez l'accorder.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec la considération la plus distinguée,

My Lord Duc,

Votre très-humble serviteur,

FRÉDÉRIC, PRINCE DES PAYS-BAS.

F. Marshall, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Paris, 28th June, 1815, 11 o'clock P.M.

With this your Lordship will receive a despatch written by the express desire of the Duke d'Otrante, and which will be delivered to your Grace by Mr. Macirone.

I have now to request your Grace to pay particular attention to the note I sent off this evening, in which I informed you that the Canal of St. Denis was not finished; that the inundations were not completed, and incapable of impeding the march of an army; that the road from St. Denis to Paris was in many places sheltered from the cannon of Montmartre (false attack); that the road by the water side (towing-path) was completely free from danger; the road through the wood from St. Germain, by which Malmaison was evaded, was safe; that passing the bridge of Neuilly, and marching to the Barrière de l'Etoile and Barrière des Bons Hommes, and over the Pont de Jena to the Ecole Militaire, would give the command of Paris without endangering a man, and that there is nothing to fear in that quarter.

This afternoon ten pieces of artillery, with their ammunition-waggons and about 200 of the Old Guard, entered Paris.

There may be from 2000 to 3000 troops of the line in Paris. All those who returned from the battle have been sent off to Soissons. There are about 25,000, or at most 30,000, of the National Guards: they are with the present government, and for Louis. D'Otrante is with them. Your Grace may most fully depend upon him: he only requires that you should be explicit, and there is nothing that he can do which your Grace may point out which he is not ready to undertake.

He hopes that the march of the British troops may be accelerated, and that they may arrive as speedily as possible. Your Grace will have the goodness to write explicitly by the bearer, who may be depended upon.

Paris is now (11 o'clock P.M.) quiet and tranquil. Many country people have come in with their goods and cattle, &c. Some symptoms of disturbance have appeared in the Faubourg St. Antoine this afternoon, but all is now quiet. Buonaparte is at Malmaison, where he says he intends to stay till his future destination is fixed. Jerome Buonaparte is in Paris, at the hôtel of Cardinal Fesch, his uncle. Joseph is also in Paris. Lucien, it is said, is gone to Neuilly with his daughter.

I enclose the 'Moniteur' of to-day.

I have the honour to remain your Grace's most obedient servant,

F. MARSHALL.

F. Marshall, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Paris, 28th June, 1815, ½ past 11 P.M.

I am authorised by the Duke d'Otrante to address the present despatch to your Grace, and to express the very high sentiments he entertains for your Lordship, in which he trusts you will place the most implicit reliance.

He requests to know why the Allied Powers still continue hostilities now that Buonaparte has abdicated the throne, and has no longer a voice in any act of government? What object they propose to themselves to attain by this; and what can be their intention in continuing the war?

To these questions a frank and ingenuous answer is requested. Every possible concession that a free nation can make will be granted; and the Duke d'Otrante, in the name of the French government, pledges himself to deliver up Buonaparte in any way that may be most suitable to the views of the British government.

I am further authorised to say that your Grace's early answer will be esteemed a favour of the greatest importance; and that, as an Englishman, your word will be considered as a sufficient guarantee for any proposition you may be pleased to make.

I have the honour to remain, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

F. MARSHALL.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE CAVALRY, 29TH JUNE, 1815.

[908.]

The British cavalry will move from their respective bivouacs upon Pont St. Maxence in the following order:

Major-General Sir H. Vivian's brigade will move from Antheuil and Monchy at 3 A.M., and enter the high road by the most convenient route in the direction of Estrées St. Denis.

The 7th brigade will move from La Taulle at 3½ A.M., and will, if possible, find a road to enter the chaussée to Pont St. Maxence in front of Gournay, and will follow Major-General Sir H. Vivian's brigade: these two brigades will form the advance guard under the command of the senior officer.

The 3rd brigade will assemble at Gournay so as to be in readiness to march at 5, and follow the 7th brigade.

Major-General Sir C. Grant's brigade and the 4th brigade will march from Ressons and Ricquebourg at 3½, and enter the high road to Pont St. Maxence at Gournay, and will follow the 3rd brigade.

The heavy cavalry will move from Cuvilly precisely at 5, and will proceed on the high road to Pont St. Maxence, following the 4th brigade.

The 4 troops of horse artillery will move from Mortemer at 4½, so as to be able to close up to and move with the heavy cavalry as above.

The baggage will follow in rear of their respective brigades to Pont St. Maxence, when further orders will be given.

Head quarters of the army to be at Le Plessis Longueau.

WELLINGTON.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill to Colonel Hervey.

SIR, Clermont, 29th June, 1815.

Herewith I have the honour to send a letter, with an enclosure from Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Clinton, recommending British and Hanoverian officers of the 2nd Division of Infantry for promotion, in consequence of distinguished merit at the battle of Waterloo. I also beg to annex to this the names of other officers of my corps who distinguished themselves on that memorable occasion, and I have to request you will submit the same to the favourable consideration of the Duke of Wellington, in order that his Grace may, should he think proper, recommend them for promotion.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

HILL.

Captain Napier, who commanded the Brigade of Artillery after the death of Captain Bolton.
Major Sympher commanded troop of Horse Artillery.

General Staff.

Captain Lord Charles FitzRoy, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Personal Staff.

Major Egerton.
Major Churchill.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Lieut.-Gen. Sir H. Clinton to Lieut.-Gen. Lord Hill.

MY LORD, Lanchy, 26th June, 1815.

I have the honour to enclose a list of the officers who commanded battalions or flank companies on the 18th instant, and of those who during the action succeeded to such commands in consequence of others being disabled; and I beg leave to add the names of other officers, which, from the favourable reports made of them by the officers commanding brigades, it is my duty to request you will lay before the Commander of the Forces, in the hope that his Grace will recommend them for promotion. The names of these officers are :—

Brevet-Major Blair, 91st foot.

Lieutenant Campbell, 7th foot, aide-de-camp to Major-General Adam.

Lieutenant Kantzau, 4th battalion King's German Legion, who acted as aide-de-camp to the late Colonel du Plat, and is now doing the duty of Major of Brigade.

Captain Saffe, 1st line battalion King's German Legion, Major of Brigade to Colonel Halkett's Brigade.

Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Bowen, Brevet-Major Chalmers, and Lieutenant and Adjutant Winterbottom, 52nd regiment.

Captain Reed, Lieutenant Bunallier, and Lieutenant and Adjutant Anderson, 71st regiment.

Captain Logan, Lieutenant Humbly, and Lieutenant and Adjutant Smith, 2nd battalion 95th regiment.

Captain Eeles and Lieutenant Hope, 3rd battalion 95th regiment.

Captain Geeben, 1st battalion King's German Legion; Captain Rettberg, ditto.

Captain Purgold, 2nd battalion King's German Legion; Captain Bürmann, ditto, who succeeded to the command of the flank companies after Captain Heisse was wounded.

Lieutenant Delmman, 3rd battalion King's German Legion.

Captain Heisse, Lieutenant Freudenthal, 4th battalion King's German Legion.

Major Count Münster, Captain Gotthand, Lieutenant Winkler, Osnabrück battalion.

Major Baron Hammerstein, Captain Baron Hammerstein, and Ensign Müll, Salzgitter battalion.

Major Rudorff, Captain of the 1st light battalion King's German Legion, doing duty with the Salzgitter battalion.

Captain Appuhn, 3rd battalion, and Lieutenant Düring, 1st battalion King's German Legion, doing duty with the Osnabrück battalion.

I beg also to recommend Captain Bentinck, of the Coldstream regiment of Guards, who has been doing duty as Assistant Adjutant-General to the 2nd Division from its first formation, and who is a zealous and active officer.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

H. CLINTON.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 29th June, 1815.

I am sorry you have been so worried with part of your Staff. The arrival of Dixon will, I trust, set you a little more at ease.

You will have seen by my private letter that your conduct in deciding to proceed, and disregard the propositions for a suspension of arms, falls in completely with our policy. We have refused to receive Otto. There is a very strong feeling in this country of the necessity of having security against a recurrence of this attempt to disturb Europe, especially if Buonaparte survives. Lord Castlereagh will follow this letter so closely that it is unnecessary to enter more into this subject, except to show you that we are anxious that the Allies should be placed in such a military position, whenever a suspension of arms takes place, as will enable us to conclude a very satisfactory peace.

I am yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Sir C. Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Cambrai, 29th June, 1815.

I received yours of the 28th June. I was already apprised of the nature of Monsieur de Trommelin's mission, both by Galliard, who was sent here on the part of Fouché, and by Archambaud Perigord, who came from Davoust to make known to the King the measures this latter had recommended in the Chamber of Peers, with a view to induce that body to recall the Royal family.

The desire to obtain some future security expressed through these channels by Fouché and Davoust has been answered by a reference to the appeal the King addressed yesterday to the nation.

Monsieur de Talleyrand assures me his brother and Galliard have severally declared that this paper is drawn up exactly in the sense which different parties at Paris expect: it appears, therefore, to have been disapproved by no one except the Princes and the party of emigrants by whom they are surrounded, who strenuously endeavoured to oppose the publication of it from the moment the late letters were received from Metternich, declaring the intention of the Allies to support the King's cause.

The conduct of the Princes upon this occasion has rendered Talleyrand very anxious to induce the King to come to a determination respecting the formation of his ministry. He mentioned the subject to me, and said he counted on your support. I believe the arrangements for that purpose are to be taken into consideration by the Council to-morrow or next day.

The determination of the commandants of Lille, Valenciennes, Bouchain, Douai, and Arras, not to surrender to the King until the fate of Paris shall be decided, caused Talleyrand to express a wish this evening to move the Court farther into the interior; and he has particularly requested me to mention to you that his instances to this effect are founded on the conversation with the King. As he professes, however, not to recommend the measure without your concurrence, he is desirous to know how soon you think it will be expedient for him to move to Compiègne, where he thinks a temporary residence may produce an effect beneficial to the King's interests. The repeated questions of the King upon this subject induced me to tell him that I had mentioned his wishes to you in my letter this morning.

Though there can be no doubt of their desire to put Buonaparte out of the way, it is impossible for the Court to express any other opinion but the most decided approbation of the discussion which has passed between Marshal Blücher and your Grace respecting that person; and Talleyrand, in adverting to the subject, assures me that your determinations hereafter will guide those of the King, if his fate should come under consideration in the Council.

I have not heard anything from the ministers here respecting the affair of Ham and that of St. Quentin, but the Duc de Feltre assures me he will take the King's orders respecting the capitulation of the former to-morrow, recommending that the garrison of Ham be composed exclusively of French or Prussians, but that the mixture of the two nations shall, under every contingency, be avoided.

The complaints respecting the levy of a contribution at St. Quentin will be referred to the Prussian minister.

I am, my dear Lord, with great truth, yours very sincerely,

CHARLES STUART.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Cambrai, 29th June, 1815.

I send a messenger to head quarters for the purpose of returning your letter to the French Commissioners, which appears to have been forwarded here by mistake. Uncertain what to do with it, I opened this letter, and the nature of its contents convinces me that it was not intended to come here.

Since the arrival of Mr. Archambaud Perigord, who states that when he left Paris yesterday evening the Chamber of Peers had determined to invite the King to return, the Court have expressed some anxiety to move forward.

Talleyrand does not participate in this feeling. He has, however, requested me to mention the King's hope that military arrangements will not prevent your arrival at Paris as soon as Blücher.

I remain, my dear Lord, very faithfully yours,

CHARLES STUART.

Prince Frédéric des Pays-Bas to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Curgies, le 29 Juin, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur d'annoncer à Votre Seigneurie que ce matin à 7 heures j'ai pris possession de la forteresse de Quesnoy, comme j'eus l'honneur de vous écrire hier. Les officiers envoyés d'après le dernier article de la capitulation par le Gouverneur de la place et du Général Anthing à Cambrai n'étant revenus que hier au soir à 8 heures, nous n'avons pu occuper la porte des Forêts que ce matin à 3 heures, et à 7 nous sommes entrés dans toute la ville. Le Général Rothallier, auquel j'ai fait donner connaissance hier de la capitulation, était très-content et satisfait, et nous nous sommes arrangés à merveille. Le Roi de France, qui a admis à son audience ces officiers envoyés du Quesnoy, les a parfaitement bien reçus, et était très-charmé de la manière dont la capitulation s'est faite; le Duc de Feltre également en était très-content, et m'a même écrit une lettre à ce sujet.

Je me flatte donc que Votre Seigneurie ne trouvera rien à redire à tout ce que j'ai fait, et que cela aura votre haute approbation.

J'ai l'honneur d'envoyer ici à Votre Seigneurie une copie de la capitulation, ainsi qu'une liste de ce qu'on y a trouvé en pièces de différent calibre. N'ayant pas encore reçu l'inventaire des autres objets qu'on y a trouvés, je ne puis encore vous en rendre compte. La garnison est sortie forte de deux mille huit cents hommes; les gardes nationales ont mis bas les armes à la maison-de-ville, et le reste de la garnison se rend à Cambrai demander les ordres du Roi Louis XVIII. J'y ai été pendant quelques heures pour voir la place et prendre quelques arrangements, et j'ai remarqué avec étonnement le bon état dans lequel elle se trouve, à l'exception d'un seul point qui ne pourrait tenir contre un siége, mais est pourtant, par la hauteur du mur et le palissadement, à l'abri d'un coup-de-main. Le Général Comte Rothallier devait entrer en ville à midi et prendre le commandement supérieur; j'y ai laissé un bataillon de 700 hommes, dont le Commandant agira de concert et selon le désir du Général Rothallier. Quoique j'ai pris possession de la forteresse au nom de Louis XVIII., j'ai pourtant cru en pouvoir tirer toutes les utilités que je puis pour l'armée; j'ai donc fait amener tant de pièces de gros calibre que je puis vers Valenciennes pour en pouvoir faire usage contre cette place-là, au cas qu'elle ne voudrait se rendre sur la sommation du Roi de France, dont le Général Lauriston a été chargé aujourd'hui, mais qui a été refusée nette par le Général Rey; ainsi que deux autres que le Général Stedman a faites, le Gouverneur ayant donné l'ordre aux officiers qui commandent aux portes de ne recevoir aucune lettre. Le Général Stedman a jeté quelques grenades en ville, qui ont d'abord causé une assez forte incendie, et l'on croyait que c'était un magasin à foin. Si les pièces de Quesnoy arrivent encore à temps ce soir, je commencerai dès cette nuit à tirer sur Valenciennes et surtout sur dutout pour cela, mais laisserai un bataillon en garnison là, dont le Commandant se mettra en rapport avec le Général Rothallier sur tout ce qui regarde le service de la forteresse.

Demain j'espère avoir l'honneur de faire mon rapport à Votre Seigneurie sur toute l'affaire et mes projets ultérieurs.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec les sentiments de la plus haute considération,

My Lord Duc,

Votre très-humble et obéissant serviteur,

FRÉDÉRIC, PRINCE DES PAYS-BAS.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Downing Street, 29th June, 1815.

Referring to my despatch, No. 23, respecting the supply of arms, &c., which the Prussian government are desirous of obtaining from this country, I regret to acquaint your Grace that the quantities of cavalry arms at present in store are so limited, that very few, if any, could be sent out at the present moment without much inconvenience to His Majesty's service. The two transports,* with 10,000 stand, alluded to in my letter, sailed for Ostend on the 5th instant; and 10,000 more are shipping, and will be forwarded without delay.

I have the honour to be

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

[910.*] INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE ARMY, 30TH JUNE, 1815.

Lord Hill will be so good as to move Baron Estorff's cavalry by Creil and Chantilly to Luzarches; the infantry of the 2nd corps are to move to Chantilly.

Order of march for the 2nd corps:

Baron Estorff's cavalry.
The 2nd division.
The Nassau troops.
The 4th division.
The baggage of the corps in the order of the column.
These troops are to assemble at daybreak, and to march at 5.

The British cavalry will move from its camps near Pont St. Maxence to Louvres, and camp in the plain about that place. The cavalry should march at 5.

* Minerva, Harper.

The 1st corps will move from its camps near St. Martin Longueau and move by Pont St. Maxence: the head of this column will be carried as far as La Chapelle, the rear will rest upon Senlis.

Order of march for the 1st corps:

Netherland cavalry.
1st division.
3rd division.
Netherland infantry.
Baggage of the corps in the order of the column.
These troops will assemble at daybreak, and march at 5.

The troops camped near Gournay will move and cross the river Oise at Pont St. Maxence; the head of the column will be carried as far as Fleurines, on the road to Senlis; the rear will rest upon Pont St. Maxence.

Order of march for the troops camped near Gournay:

The Brunswick cavalry.
The 5th division.
The 6th division.
The Brunswick infantry.
The reserve artillery.
Baggage of the corps in the order of the column.
These troops will assemble at daybreak, and march at 5.

The pontoon train and hawser bridges will move to Senlis.

The reserve ammunition to Pont St. Maxence; the civil departments, Pont St. Maxence.

Head quarters will be at Louvres.

The British cavalry will draw resources from the villages of Vauderlan, Goussainville, Le Thillay, Louvres, Epiais, and Chenevières.

WELLINGTON.

The Duke of York to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 30th June, 1815.

The family of the late Major Howard, of the 10th Hussars, have urged so earnestly that every possible measure should be adopted for finding the body of that officer, as to induce me to desire that the officer commanding at Bruxelles should be written to upon the subject. I understand that two serjeants of his regiment were employed to bury him; and if you will give orders that one of them should be sent back to Bruxelles to give any information on the subject, the family will feel that both your Grace and myself have done all that is practicable to effect their wishes.

I remain, my dear Lord Duke, yours sincerely,

FREDERICK.

[Let inquiry be made upon this subject at the regiment for the two serjeants mentioned.

WELLINGTON.]

The Earl of Liverpool to Viscount Castlereagh.

MEMORANDUM.

30th June, 1815.

In considering the course of policy which it may be expedient for the Allies to adopt under the present circumstances, there are obviously three alternatives which present themselves to our view.

First, Louis XVIII. may be restored, Buonaparte being dead or a prisoner in the hands of the Allies.

Secondly, Louis XVIII. may be restored, Buonaparte being still alive and having escaped to America or elsewhere.

Thirdly, The difficulties in the way of the restoration of Louis XVIII. may have rendered that event, however desirable, impracticable; and it may become, therefore, necessary to treat with some other government as representing the French nation.

Upon the first alternative it will be necessary to consider whether the previous declarations and engagements of the Allies compel them to consider the integrity of France as settled by the Treaty of Paris, as a question concluded by what has already passed; or whether it will admit of any modifications which it may be judged expedient to adopt after the experience of the last twelve months for the general security and permanent tranquillity of Europe.

Upon this point it does not appear possible to give any precise or positive instructions until we are more particularly informed of the sentiments of the Allies in consequence of recent events.

In the second alternative it is to be hoped that there would be no difference of opinion. We must all be sensible that if Buonaparte is alive and at large, we can have no security that he will not again make his appearance in France in the course of a few months, and we may, therefore, be again involved in a war as critical and burthensome as the present, without many advantages which have attended the renewal of the contest at this time. We shall have a clear right, therefore, under such circumstances, to require some additional securities; and although Louis XVIII. should be restored to the throne of France, we should be entitled to provide for the future security of Europe by insisting upon taking from France some of her frontier fortresses, including Lille; and the only modification which should be admitted of this principle is that it might perhaps be provided that, instead of being actually ceded in sovereignty by France to the Allies, they should be retained by the Allies during the life of Buonaparte or for a given number of years, and then revert again to France.

With respect to the third alternative, it would leave the discretion of the Allies entirely unfettered; and if they cannot have the security for peace arising out of the character of the government with which it is concluded, they would be fully justified in attempting to obtain it by a reduction of the power and territory of the enemy. As this alternative, however, is not likely under present circumstances to occur, it does not appear to be necessary to say more upon it. The principle as above laid down cannot possibly be disputed; the expediency of acting upon it to a certain degree will hardly be denied; but the extent to which we may carry it must depend upon contingencies of which at this time we cannot have the means of forming any judgment.

It appears to be quite indispensable that in the event of the restoration of Louis XVIII. a severe example should be made of those commanding officers of garrisons or corps who deserted the King and went over to Buonaparte. Such a proceeding is not only become necessary with a view to the continuance of the power of the House of Bourbon, but likewise for the security of the object for which the Allies have been contending, a safe and lasting peace.

The true principle, taken in its full rigour, would be to consider all the officers commanding garrisons or corps as subject to the penalties of high treason who had gone over to Buonaparte previous to the King leaving the French territory; but it might be as well to modify this principle by confining it to those who took that step before the King was known to have quitted Paris.

Considering the elements for conspiracies and rebellion which must exist in France for some years, there can be no chance of stopping them but by an exemplary punishment on the present occasion of those who were forward to join the standard of Buonaparte.

With respect to the conspirators who were not military, it might be proper, likewise, to make an example of those who are most dangerous, subjecting the most criminal to the pains of high treason, and those who were less so to that of banishment.

Whilst measures of just severity are adopted with regard to the authors or abettors of the late revolution, it is of the utmost importance that the King should take the most public measures for allaying the fears of the purchasers of national property. The apprehensions of this class of the King's subjects were productive last year of the very worst effects; and it will be in vain for the King to think that he can consolidate his authority unless by the security of property as it now exists, without reference to the title by which it was acquired.

LIVERPOOL.

Major-Gen. Sir H. Torrens to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 30th June, 1815.

I find by your letter to Lord Bathurst that the fears expressed in mine of the 24th respecting your want of staff are but too well founded.

My anxious and most earnest desire is to meet and anticipate your wants and wishes; but after what has already occurred in regard to your embarrassments as arising in appointments from hence, I could not submit to the Commander-in-Chief that any fresh ones should take place until we heard from you, notwithstanding your recent losses.

An answer to my letter may now be received in a day or two, and therefore no object can be gained in acting upon the general representation which I understand you have made to Lord Bathurst until I specifically hear from you.

Ever, my dear Lord Duke, most faithfully and sincerely yours,

H. TORRENS.

I have the honour to be, My Lord Duke,

Your Grace's faithful and very obedient servant,

H. TORRENS.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Cambrai, 30th June, 1815.

I have delivered the letter brought by Colonel Hare to Prince Talleyrand, and, immediately after he had received it, accompanied that minister to the King. The opposition on the part of Monsieur to the sentiments contained in the proclamation of the 28th created so much irritation among the King's ministers that my recommendations to suspend the measure for a few days were unattended to, and the paper was actually printed and published before your letter reached me.

Under these circumstances Talleyrand is of opinion that the objects recommended in your discussions with the deputies will be best obtained by advising the King to address himself on different occasions to his people as he advances into France, and particularly from Roye, where he will arrive to-night, and where he will probably be able to learn the effect the first proclamation has produced in Paris.

The desire to save Paris from pillage renders the King extremely pleased with your Grace's suggestions, and willing to accede to all the conditions of the armistice which have been proposed.

He conceives, however, the mission of the deputies to be merely an attempt at a composition on the part of a body of which he cannot recognise the legality, for which reason he would have preferred that the magistracy of Paris had brought the same proposition in the name of the town, because in speaking of the Chambers in the proclamations he means to be understood to refer to the Chambers as they existed at the time of his departure, and, as they have never been legally dissolved, under the idea that they will not discontinue to exercise their functions.

Talleyrand therefore will wait at Roye for your reply to the letter of which Colonel Hare is the bearer before any further measure is adopted.

Believe me, my dear Lord, very faithfully yours,

CHARLES STUART.

Colonel Jenkinson to the Earl of Liverpool.

Two leagues north of Strasbourg, Veidenheim,
30th June, 1815.

MY DEAR LORD LIVERPOOL,

You will long ere this reaches you have learnt that I had joined the corps of His Royal Highness the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg, that his corps passed the frontiers of France on the morning of the 24th inst., and that His Royal Highness continued his march without opposition until he reached the enemy's advanced posts covering the celebrated lines of Weissembourg, where his cavalry had a sharp skirmish with that of General Rapp, and had evidently greatly the advantage over them. His Royal Highness did not push them farther, however, than was necessary to enable him to reconnoitre the enemy's position, with the view of attacking it the next morning, should they not retire during the night.

One division of the Prince Royal's corps moved upon Lauterbourg, and Prince Wrede had been directed to detach a division from his corps to march upon the road to Saverne, in order that all the great roads of the valley between the Vosges and the Rhine might be observed.

Prince Wrede neglected to perform his part, and moved his whole corps upon Nancy, without establishing any communication between it and that of the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg.

On the morning of the 25th it was discovered that the enemy had quitted Weissembourg, and the pursuit was interrupted until His Royal Highness's corps reached Sultz, when His Royal Highness learnt that General Rapp occupied the forest of Haguenau (which is three leagues long and ten broad) in front of his march, and that of Count Walmoden moving from Lauterbourg on Fort Louis. The forest of Haguenau is covered by a small rivulet having no other passage for cavalry and artillery than the bridges on the chaussées, and is concealed by a height extending along the left bank of that rivulet, which the enemy seemed anxious to retain possession of in order to conceal their movements.

His Royal Highness waited until his infantry came up, and then made a vigorous attack upon the village of Lurbourg, which, if taken, would make the heights untenable. It fell to the lot of the Austrian cavalry, infantry, and artillery to do this, and most rapidly and gallantly did they perform it. His Royal Highness then paused, not having his corps sufficiently concentrated to venture on the attack of the forest.

The enemy made also a good stand against Count Walmoden on the Lauterbourg road, and endeavoured to retake the village of Seltzbourg, of which he had dispossessed them. In this attempt they totally failed, but not without killing and wounding about 500 men of his division.

During the night the enemy retired from the forest and village of Haguenau. His Royal Highness's corps followed in the morning, and was unopposed until two squadrons of cavalry, which were leading, moved out of Haguenau, when they were charged by a French regiment of hussars. This charge they did not receive; but, though so inferior, gallantly attacked the enemy, and completely routed and dispersed them, killing and wounding many and taking many prisoners. The enemy were so appalled by this, that little was seen of them until they reached a position which General Rapp took up to prevent His Royal Highness from investing Strasbourg.

From this position His Royal Highness was determined to drive the enemy the moment he saw it, for whilst they occupied it no measures could be taken in furtherance of the object in view; and contemplating the possibility of a formidable resistance on the part of the enemy, His Royal Highness had directed that his corps should be concentrated the preceding evening, and proceeded to reconnoitre their position on the morning of the 28th.

I will not detail the nature of the position, nor the particulars of the action, because Lord Stewart informs me that he has sent my report of it to England; and as you will doubtless see it, therefore it would be useless to repeat it.

It is, I assure you, a pleasure to act with this corps, for the Prince Royal moves it with an ability, a rapidity, and a decision which prove him to be one of the best generals these extraordinary times have produced, and his coolness shows a confidence in himself and in his troops which is a sure presage of success.

General Rapp did certainly intend to retire towards Epinal, but, though he has now 25,000 men at his disposal, he seems afraid to venture out of the fortress.

Prince Wrede reached Nancy the 27th. Count Colloredo with 80,000 men was at Geneva the 24th, and Bubna at Chambery the 23rd, and I therefore think I may congratulate you on the successful termination of the war.

With best regards to Lady Liverpool,

Believe me most sincerely yours,

GEORGE JENKINSON.

The King of the Netherlands to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, La Haye, le 30 Juin, 1815.

Il serait superflu de vous exprimer la satisfaction que j'éprouve en apprenant presque journellement les progrès de votre brave armée. Je dois cependant vous remercier du rapport que vous m'avez adressé de Joncourt le 25 du courant. La reddition de Cambrai et l'établissement de S.M. Très Chrétienne dans une ville Française sont des événements bien importans, qui, joints à vos autres mesures, ne laissent plus guère de doute sur le triomphe de la bonne cause. Néanmoins il m'a paru utile de réparer sans délai les pertes qu'ont fait plusieurs corps de mon armée à l'ouverture de la campagne, et de compléter ainsi, pour autant que cela dépend de moi, les troupes destinées pour les opérations actives. C'est dans ces vues que j'ai mobilisé une partie des bourgeoisies armées qui arrivées dans les places frontières pourront rendre disponibles plusieurs corps qui en forment actuellement les garnisons. Je fais aussi marcher les volontaires à pied et à cheval qui se sont armés, équipés, et disciplinés depuis l'instant de la dernière usurpation de Buonaparte, et qui ont complété leur organisation. Ils rejoindront directement les régimens de cavalerie et les bataillons auxquels chaque compagnie est assignée ; et comme le zèle et le dévouement qu'ils ont déjà montrés garantissent l'exactitude avec laquelle ils rempliront leurs devoirs, je n'hésite point à demander plus spécialement pour eux votre bienveillance et votre protection.

Je saisis toujours avec un nouveau plaisir l'occasion de vous assurer, my Lord Duc, de ma haute estime et des sentimens distingués avec lesquels je suis,

My Lord Duc, votre affectionné,

GUILLAUME.

Lieut.-Gen. M'Farlane to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Naples, 30th June, 1815.

Having directed a courier, charged with my despatches to His Majesty's government, to deliver this with the annexed letter from the French Minister at this Court to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of His Most Christian Majesty, may I request your Grace to direct the letter to be delivered into the hands of the Count de Jaucourt, if at Ghent; and should he have left that place, to have it forwarded to him by a safe opportunity.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and humble servant,

ROBERT M'FARLANE.

[911.*] INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOVEMENT OF THE ARMY, 1ST JULY, 1815.

Lord Hill will be so good as to assemble the 2nd corps and to move it upon the great road towards Pierrefitte.

The 2nd corps is to relieve General Bülow's Prussian corps in the position which that corps now occupies, having its right upon the great road about Pierrefitte, and its left to the great road of Senlis.

The 2nd corps will relieve the Prussian corps at Aubervilliers. Lord Hill will be so good as to send on before his corps to General Bülow to concert with him the relief of the Prussian troops and ascertain the position they occupy. The 2nd corps is to assemble at daybreak, and march at 5.

Order of march of the 2nd corps:

Baron Estorff's cavalry.
2nd division.
Nassau troops.
4th division.
Baggage of the corps in order of the column.

The cavalry will be camped and cantoned about the villages of Le Thillay, Goussainville, Vauderlan, and Roissy.

Major-General Sir J. Byng will be so good as to move the 1st corps by Louvres past Gonesse on the great road. The 1st corps is to relieve the Prussian corps now occupying a position having its right upon the great road behind Le Bourget, and its left upon the Forest of Bondy. The 1st corps is to relieve the Prussian post at Le Bourget.

Sir J. Byng will send on before the 1st corps to the General commanding the Prussian troops on the above position, in order to concert with the Prussian General the relief of the Prussian troops, and to ascertain the position they occupy.

The 1st corps will be assembled at daybreak, and will move at 5.

Order of march of the 1st corps:

The Netherland cavalry.
The 1st division.
The Netherland infantry.
The 3rd division.
Baggage of the corps in order of the column.

The corps camped between Pont St. Maxence and Fleurines will move by Senlis and Louvres, and camp between Louvres and Vauderlan.

Order of march of the above corps:

Brunswick cavalry.
5th division.

6th division.
Brunswick infantry.
Reserve artillery.
Baggage of the corps in order of the column.
These troops will assemble at daybreak, and march at 5.

The pontoon train and hawser bridges will move from Senlis at daybreak, and proceed by Louvres to Sarcelles on the road by Chantilly to Paris.

Colonel Nicolay is requested to send forward an officer to examine the best road from Louvres to Sarcelles, who should be back in time to turn off and to conduct the train on its arrival at Louvres to Sarcelles.

Reserve ammunition to move to Louvres.

Civil departments to move to Senlis.

Head quarters will be at Gonesse, but the heavy baggage belonging to it will remain at Louvres.

WELLINGTON.

Viscount Castlereagh to Earl Bathurst.

DEAR LORD B., Paris, July, 1815.

If the Prince Regent feels desirous of giving his Military Order to Blücher, I do not think the objections to it are such as would justify any further representation on the part of his ministers. In this case I should wish to suggest whether His Royal Highness might not, considering the magnitude of the exertion made by all the Powers, and the glorious result, give this distinction to the Allied Field Marshals commanding in chief the forces of each Power. This principle will include Blücher, Schwarzenberg, Barclay de Tolly, Wrede, and the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg. The rule hitherto has been to give the British Orders only to Sovereigns. In comprehending chiefs of armies, the relaxation cannot lead to an indefinite pretension to this distinction. I should wish you to submit this idea for the Prince's consideration, being a little afraid that neither the Austrians nor the Russians will like an exclusive mark of attention to the Prussians; and there is the less reason for it as they are certainly conducting themselves very odiously at present as an army, and from what I have heard rather assume more than their fair share of credit for the battle of Waterloo. If you comprehend the five, the Prince of Orange having it already, I rather think as a measure it will do good upon the Continent, as it is not to be told what value they attach to an English honour.

I am, dear Lord B., yours very faithfully, &c.,

CASTLEREAGH.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Haguenau, 1st July, 1815.

In the event of the officers who have the French commissioners in charge to conduct them back to Paris arriving at your head-quarters before a courier which I shall despatch to-night shall reach you, I think it wise to send you by this conveyance the communication that has been made by the three Allied Sovereigns present to the above commissioners. We consider no negotiation of any kind to have been entered into with them.

I have the honour to be yours in haste,

STEWART.

I should add that the Generals Knesebeck and Walmoden, and Count Capo d'Istria, carried this paper to those gentlemen that were deputed here; and they leave this immediately on their route to Paris by the way they came.

[ENCLOSURES.]

I.

Prince Metternich and Count Nesselrode to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Au Quartier Impérial de Mannheim, le 26 Juin, 1815.

Vous avez sans doute reçu un message conforme à celui que le Général Rapp a transmis à nos avant-postes devant Weissembourg.

Leurs Majestés Impériales se sont entendues sur-le-champ sur cet objet, et elles ont pris les déterminations suivantes.

Convaincues que la démarche annoncée n'est que le résultat de la défaite et probablement de la désorganisation de l'armée Française, et qu'elle n'est qu'un essai du parti Jacobin de sauver sa funeste influence après que le parti militaire a perdu sa force, et décidées à consulter avant tout la raison militaire dans un moment où le succès définitif de la cause que nous défendons exige la poursuite la plus vigoureuse des opérations militaires, leurs Majestés n'arrêteront donc dans nulle supposition les mouvemens de leurs armées.

Si les commissaires annoncés devaient se présenter, on ne les admettra pas au delà de notre ligne. On se bornera à autoriser les généraux commandans l'avant-garde à recevoir les dépêches desquelles ils pourraient vouloir les charger. Nous croyons utile de prendre connaissance de pareille communication, pour pouvoir juger de la position réelle des choses en France, et surtout à Paris.

Dès que ces dépêches nous seront parvenues on les prendra en considération, et on arrêtera d'après leur contenu et d'un commun accord s'il faut y répondre et quelle devra être cette réponse.

Les points de vue desquels partent les Souverains sont :—

1. Que l'on ne peut admettre la validité de l'abdication de Buonaparte et les droits qu'il pourrait vouloir établir en faveur d'un tiers par son abdication, parceque ce fait même consacrerait le principe de la reconnaissance d'un pouvoir que nous lui contestons.

2. Que les Puissances peuvent tout aussi peu regarder un vœu prononcé par les deux Chambres actuelles comme étant celui de la France entière.

Ni la convocation de ces Chambres faite par un pouvoir illégal ni leur composition n'autorisent à admettre le principe contraire, et cela surtout dans une circonstance où ces Chambres se permettent en moins de quinze jours de séance de sanctionner deux changemens dans le gouvernement. Le principe de la paix, inséparable de celui de la stabilité, but premier de l'alliance, se trouverait sans doute plus compromis par une condéscendance qui établirait aux Chambres le droit de sanctionner des bouleversemens journaliers que par la reconnaissance même de Buonaparte.

Leurs Majestés sont donc décidées à laisser le cours aux événemens, et surtout à ne rien changer à la marche des opérations, et elles comptent sur la plus parfaite réciprocité des vues de Votre Excellence. Il nous paraît certain que le pouvoir de Buonaparte est brisé ; mais ce n'est qu'avec une extrême circonspection qu'il sera possible de distinguer le vrai de fausses apparences. Peu de temps, peu de jours peut-être, pourront amener des événemens plus décisifs ; et nous devons nous borner à les attendre sans dévier des principes que nous avons mis en avant jusqu'ici.

Recevez, Monsieur le Duc, l'assurance de la haute considération avec laquelle nous avons l'honneur d'être

De Votre Excellence les très humbles et très obéissans serviteurs,

METTERNICH.
NESSELRODE.

II.

Les traités d'alliance portant que l'une des parties ne négociera jamais séparément, et ne fera ni paix ni trève que d'un commun accord, les trois Cours présentes ici ne peuvent pas entrer en négociation.

Les cabinets vont se réunir dans le plus bref délai possible.

Les trois Souverains regardent comme condition préalable et essentielle de toute paix et d'une véritable état de repos que Napoléon Buonaparte soit mis hors d'état de troubler dorénavant la tranquillité de la France et de l'Europe. Après ce que s'est passé en Mars dernier les Puissances doivent exiger qu'il soit confié à leur garde.

The Duke of Cambridge to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Montbrillant, 1st July, 1815.

I have ordered my aide-de-camp Major de Marschalk, who was on General Decken's staff, to repair to your Grace's head-quarters, being anxious that you should receive the earliest information of the steps I have taken for filling up the vacancies which occurred in the Hanoverian corps on the glorious battle of the 18th June. The lists only reached me yesterday morning, and I have given the order this day for completing all the vacancies ; so that by the end of this month I trust the regiments will be complete.

I seize with the greatest pleasure this opportunity of congratulating your Grace on the brilliant victory you have gained, which, I have no doubt, will be more important in its consequences than any of the glorious battles in which you have been conqueror. It has been a great satisfaction to me to find by your report to the Prince Regent, as well as by that of Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Alten to me, that the Hanoverian troops have done their duty, and I trust that on every future occasion they will prove themselves worthy of their great commander.

I have now to request that your Grace will allow Major Marschalk to remain at your head-quarters, as I am very anxious to have a regular account of the operations of the army, which, from the situation General Alten holds, where he is so often detached, it is impossible for him to give.

I remain, my Lord Duke, yours very sincerely,

ADOLPHUS FREDERICK.

The Duc d' Otrante to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Paris, ce 1 Juillet, 1815.

Indépendamment du cours de nos négociations je me fais un devoir d'écrire personnellement à Votre Seigneurie au sujet d'un armistice dont le refus, je l'avoue, me semble inexplicable. Nos plénipotentiaires sont au quartier-général depuis le 28 Juin, et nous sommes encore sans une réponse positive.

La paix existe déjà, puisque la guerre n'a plus d'objet. Nos droits à l'indépendance, l'engagement pris par les Souverains de les respecter, n'en subsisteraient pas moins après la prise de Paris. Il serait donc inhumain, il serait atroce, de livrer des batailles sanglantes qui ne changeraient en rien les questions qui sont à décider.

Je dois parler franchement à Votre Seigneurie. Notre état de possession, notre état légal, qui a la double sanction du peuple et des deux Chambres, est celui d'un gouvernement où le petit fils de l'Empereur d'Autriche est le Chef de l'Etat. Nous ne pourrions songer à changer cet état de choses que dans le cas où la nation aurait acquis la certitude que les Puissances révoquent leurs promesses, et que leur vœu commun s'oppose à la conservation de notre gouvernement actuel.

Ainsi, quoi de plus juste que de conclure un armistice? Y a-t-il un autre moyen de laisser aux Puissances le tems de s'expliquer, et à la France le tems de connaître le vœu des Puissances?

Il n'échappera point à Votre Seigneurie que déjà une grande Puissance trouve dans notre état de possession un droit personnel d'intervenir pour ses propres intérêts dans nos affaires intérieures aussi long-tems que cet état ne sera pas changé. Il en résulte une obligation de plus pour les deux Chambres de ne pouvoir consentir aujourd'hui à aucune mesure capable d'altérer notre possession.

La marche la plus naturelle à suivre n'est-elle pas celle que l'on vient d'adopter sur nos frontières de l'Est? On ne s'est pas borné à un armistice entre le Maréchal Bubna et le Maréchal Suchet: il a été stipulé que nous rentrerions dans nos limites du traité de Paris, parce qu'en effet la guerre doit être regardée comme terminée par le seul fait de l'abdication de Napoléon.

Le Feld-Maréchal Frimont, de son côté, a consenti à l'armistice pour venir, a-t-il dit, par des arrangemens préliminaires, au devant de ceux qui peuvent avoir lieu entre les Alliés.

Nous ne savons même pas si l'Angleterre et la Prusse ont changé de volonté au sujet de notre indépendance ; car la marche des armées ne peut pas être un indice certain de la volonté des cabinets. La volonté de deux Puissances ne pourrait pas même nous suffire; c'est leur accord que nous avons besoin de connaître. Voudriez-vous, My Lord, devancer cet accord? Voudriez-vous y mettre obstacle, et faire naître une nouvelle tempête politique d'un état de choses qui est si voisin de la paix?

Je ne crains pas moi d'aller au devant de toutes les objections. On s'imagine peut-être que l'occupation de Paris par deux des armées Alliées seconderait les vues que vous pouvez avoir de rétablir Louis XVIII. sur le trône. Mais, comment l'augmentation des maux de la guerre, qu'on ne pourrait plus attribuer qu'à ce motif, serait-elle un moyen de réconciliation?

Je dois déclarer à Votre Seigneurie que toute tentative détournée pour nous imposer un gouvernement avant que les Puissances se soient expliquées, forcerait aussitôt les Chambres à des mesures qui ne laisseraient dans aucun cas la possibilité d'aucun rapprochement. L'intérêt même du Roi est que tout reste en suspens. La force peut le replacer sur le trône, mais ne l'y maintiendra pas. Ce n'est ni par la force, ni par des surprises, ni par les vœux d'un parti, que la volonté nationale pourrait être ramenée à changer son gouvernement. C'est même en vain que dans le moment actuel on nous offrirait des conditions pour nous rendre un nouveau gouvernement plus supportable. Il n'y a point de conditions à examiner tant que la nécessité de plier sous le joug, et de renoncer à notre indépendance, ne nous sera pas démontrée. Or, My Lord, cette nécessité ne peut pas même être soupçonnée avant que les Puissances soient d'accord. Aucun de leurs engagemens n'a été révoqué ; notre indépendance est sous leur garde ; c'est nous qui entrons dans leurs vues et dans le sens de leurs déclarations ; ce sont les armées assiégeantes qui s'en écartent.

D'après ces mêmes déclarations, et il n'y en eut jamais de plus solennelles, tout emploi de la force en faveur du Roi par ces mêmes armées, sur la partie de notre territoire où elles seules dominent, serait regardé par la France comme l'aveu du dessein formel de nous imposer un gouvernement malgré notre volonté. Il nous est permis de demander à Votre Seigneurie si elle-même a reçu un tel pouvoir. D'ailleurs, ce n'est pas la force qui pacifie. Une résistance morale repousse le dernier gouvernement qu'on avait fait adopter au Roi. Plus on userait envers la nation de violence, plus on rendrait cette résistance invincible. L'intention des généraux des armées assiégeantes ne peut être de compromettre leur propre gouvernement, et de révoquer par le fait la loi que les Puissances se sont imposées à elles-mêmes.

My Lord, la question est toute entière dans ce peu de mots :

Napoléon a abdiqué comme le désiraient les Puissances. La paix est donc rétablie. On ne devrait pas même mettre en question quel est le Prince qui recueillera le fruit de cette abdication.

Notre état de possession serait-il changé par la force? Les Puissances n'atteindraient plus leur but, outre qu'elles violeraient leurs promesses ; des promesses faites à la face du monde entier.

Le changement viendrait-il de la volonté nationale? Alors il faudrait pour que cette volonté fût dans le cas de se prononcer, que les Puissances eussent d'abord fait connaître leur refus formel de laisser subsister notre gouvernement actuel. Un armistice est donc indispensable.

Voilà, My Lord, des considérations dont il est impossible de ne pas sentir toute la force. Dans Paris même, si l'issue d'une bataille vous en ouvrait les portes, je tiendrais encore à Votre Seigneurie le même langage : c'est celui que tient toute la France. On aurait donc fait couler sans motif des flots de sang : les prétentions qui en seraient la cause en seraient-elles mieux assurées et moins odieuses?

J'espère avoir bientôt avec Votre Seigneurie des rapprochemens qui nous conduiront les uns et les autres à l'œuvre de la paix par des moyens plus conformes à la raison et à la justice. L'armistice nous permettra de traiter dans Paris ; et il nous sera facile de nous entendre sur le grand principe que le repos de la France est une condition inséparable du repos de l'Europe. Ce n'est qu'en voyant de près la nation et l'armée que vous pourrez juger à quoi tient ce repos et la stabilité de notre avenir.

Je prie Votre Seigneurie de recevoir l'assurance de ma plus haute considération.

LE DUC D'OTRANTE.

Lieut.-Gen. M'Farlane to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Naples, 1st July, 1815.

As no courier whom I am to despatch this day for London will pass through Bruxelles, I have thought it right to convey to your Grace the views of His Majesty's government respecting the movements which are now in progress for operations on the enemy's coast by a division of British troops under Major-General Sir Hudson Lowe.

It is intended to seize if possible some important point on the coast from whence support may be given to the Royalists in the south of France. As not more than between 4000 and 5000 men can be spared for this service, of whom 3000 are Italians, I have recommended to Lord Exmouth and Sir H. Lowe by no means to undertake a disembarkation on the coast till the presence of preponderating armies within the French territory shall have shown the true state of public opinion in that country. General Count Frimont is now marching with about 45,000 men (said to be 60,000) on Geneva by the Simplon. General Bianchi, who is now here, and who will not be in Piedmont before the 15th of July, will have under his command not more than 35,000 men. Your Grace is no doubt made acquainted with the line of operations for Frimont's corps. Bianchi is destined to march by Mont Cenis and the other practicable roads from Turin and Coni direct on Lyons, his left covered by a small corps under Nugent, who will advance by the Riviera and Nice. It is with this last corps that Lowe and Lord Exmouth should combine their movements ; and until it is well forward nothing towards Marseilles should be attempted on our part. They, however, seem inclined to an immediate movement ; and as orders have arrived from government to give every facility to this object, I leave this to-morrow for Genoa, of which place I am ordered to take the command, and I look to all the force now in Naples arriving at Genoa by the 6th or 7th of July. Your Grace will see in the margin what I shall have at Genoa, and what can be spared for the French coast.*

The Mediterranean army was dissolved on the 24th of last month, and Malta and the Ionian Islands are provided with such garrisons as could be spared under the present reduced state of our means in this part of the world.

Sicily will be evacuated as soon as tonnage shall be disposable. All our transports have been employed in carrying the Austrians from Naples to the North of Italy.

Ten thousand Austrians under General Mohr remain in the kingdom of Naples. Gaeta holds out, and the Austrians have been obliged to break ground before it. I have placed at the disposition of Captain Fahie, who commands the blockading force by sea, 30 gun and mortar boats of the army-flotilla under Colonel Robinson, and they have afforded most effectual co-operation.

Both at Naples and in the provinces everything is perfectly tranquil.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient and most humble servant,

ROBERT M'FARLANE.

The Intendant of the Department of the Scheldt to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

EXCELLENCE, Gand, ce 1 Juillet, 1815.

L'ennemi du repos de l'Europe, jaloux de la prospérité de nos provinces et de leur indépendance, avait juré leur invasion et leur pillage: elles n'avaient rien à redouter; elles étaient confiées à votre défense.

Un des moyens que Votre Excellence a adopté pour écarter de nous les fléaux de la guerre est la fortification des villes de Gand et Audenarde, et leur mise en état de siége.

Les fortifications de ces villes ont amené les inondations au moins partiaires de nos belles prairies.

L'état de siége nous a conduit au gouvernement militaire.

Tant que les circonstances nécessiteraient ces mesures, loin d'en murmurer nous avons applaudi à la prévoyance de celui qui les a ordonné.

Mais aujourd'hui que, grâces au génie de Votre Excellence, grâces à la valeur héroïque des armées qu'elle conduisait à la victoire, ces dangers sont loin de nous, que l'ennemi qui voulait nous écraser dans nos foyers est humilié aux portes de la capitale de la France, je pense que ces mesures de défense deviennent inutiles, que les inondations des prairies peuvent cesser, et que les habitans des villes en état de siége peuvent être rendues à l'administration paternelle de leurs autorités civiles.

* To proceed with Sir H. Lowe: Brunswick Hussars, Royal Artillery, 14th Foot, three regiments of Italians; in all about 4300 men. To remain at Genoa: Brunswick Hussars, Royal Artillery, 31st Foot, 6th Battalion Germans, 7th ditto; in all under 3000 men.

J'énonce avec franchise ma pensée, parce que je suis persuadé qu'elle est aussi celle de Votre Excellence; mais qu'absorbée par l'idée de réconcilier la France avec son Souverain légitime, elle aura pour un instant perdue de vue la position malheureuse de ces villes et du département de l'Escaut, duquel cependant les habitans rivalisent pour donner des preuves de leur respectueux dévouement envers le Souverain qui nous a été donné par ceux qui ne veulent que la prospérité et la félicité des peuples.

Je sollicite de Votre Excellence avec cette confiance que ses vertus et sa valeur doivent m'inspirer la levée de l'état de siége des villes de Gand et Audenarde, et la cessation des inondations des prairies qui l'environnent.

Daignez, Monseigneur, agréer l'hommage de mon très profond respect.

D'HANE DE THONHUPE.

To Prince Frederick of the Netherlands.

MONSEIGNEUR,

Je prie V.A.R. de donner les ordres pour que l'état de siége soit rappelé dans les villes des Pays-Bas, et qu'excepté à Mons et Tournay, Ypres et Nieuport, les inondations soient contremandées.

WELLINGTON.

The Prince d'Eckmühl to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Au Quartier-Général, ce 1 Juillet, 1815.

En lisant la dépêche que Votre Excellence m'a fait l'honneur de m'adresser aujourd'hui j'ai remarqué la dernière phrase, dans laquelle elle témoigne son désir d'arrêter l'effusion du sang des braves troupes qu'elle commande, pourvu que ce soit sur des conditions qui assurent le rétablissement et la stabilité de la paix générale.

Animé du même désir que Votre Excellence, il ne me manque que de savoir quelles seraient les conditions auxquelles la paix pourrait avoir lieu; et je la prie de vouloir bien me les faire connaître.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec considération, Monsieur le Maréchal,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

MARÉCHAL PRINCE D'ECKMÜHL.

Lieut.-Gen. Comte Maison to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Roye, ce 1 Juillet, 1815.

J'envoye au quartier-général de Votre Grâce le Lieutenant-Colonel Fleury, mon aide-de-camp, pour qu'il soit à portée de soigner des intérêts majeurs que j'ai à Paris. Il sollicitera des sauves-gardes pour plusieurs maisons de cette capitale au moment où les armées Alliées y entreront. Je serai très reconnaissant à Votre Grâce si elle veut bien lui en accorder de la brave armée Anglaise.

Je prie Votre Grâce d'agréer l'assurance des sentimens d'admiration et de très haute considération avec lesquels j'ai l'honneur d'être, Monsieur le Duc,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

LE LIEUT.-GÉN. COMTE MAISON.

The French Commissioners to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Louvres, ce 1 Juillet, 1815.

Nous recevons à l'instant la lettre que Votre Grâce nous a fait l'honneur de nous écrire.* Nous nous empressons de la remercier, et de lui annoncer que nous serons prêts au premier signal qu'elle voudra bien nous donner après avoir reçu la réponse de S.E. M. le Maréchal Prince Blücher.

Nous écrivons à Paris pour rendre compte de la conférence que nous avons eu l'honneur d'avoir ce matin avec Votre Seigneurie. Nous prenons la liberté de la prier de vouloir bien donner des ordres pour que le postillon chargé de cette lettre puisse passer les avant-postes.

Veuillez agréer, My Lord, l'assurance de la très haute considération avec laquelle nous avons l'honneur d'être

De Votre Excellence les très humbles et très obéissans serviteurs,

LA BERNARDIÈRE. COMTE ANDREOSSY.
VALENCE. P. FLAUGERGUES.
LE COMTE BOISSY D'ANGLAS.

[912.] G. O. Gonesse, 2nd July, 1815.

The Field Marshal has great pleasure in publishing in General Orders the following letters from the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State, expressing the approbation of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent of the conduct of the army in the late actions with the enemy.

WELLINGTON.

MY LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 21st June, 1815.

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your Grace's despatch of the 19th instant, conveying a report of the military operations up to that date.

Marked and distinguished as these operations have been by the glorious and important victory gained over the French army on the 18th instant, I have infinite pleasure in communicating to your Grace the high feeling of satisfaction and approbation with which the Prince Regent has viewed the conduct of the troops upon this memorable occasion. No language can do justice to the sense His Royal Highness entertains of that distinguished merit, which has even surpassed all former instances of their characteristic firmness and discipline. Allow me to desire that your Grace will also accept yourself, and convey in my name to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and troops under your command, the thanks of His Royal Highness for the great and important services which they have rendered their grateful country.

* See Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 525.

From my partiality to, and well-known opinion of, the Prussian nation and their troops, your Grace will readily believe that I also concur in those expressions of admiration and thanks which have emanated from the Prince Regent for the important services rendered to the common cause by Prince Blücher and the brave army under his command.

The triumph of success cannot lessen the regret which must be felt by all for the loss of the many valuable lives which has unavoidably attended the accomplishment of this great achievement, and I particularly deplore the fall of Lieutenant-General Sir T. Picton and Major-General Sir W. Ponsonby.

FREDERICK, Commander-in-Chief.

MY LORD, War Department, London, 24th June, 1815.

Your Grace will be pleased to convey to General His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange the satisfaction the Prince Regent has experienced in observing that in the actions of the 16th and 18th instant His Royal Highness has given an early promise of those military talents for which his ancestors have been so renowned; and that by freely shedding his blood in the defence of the Netherlands, he has cemented an union of the people with the House of Orange which, it is to be hoped, will thereby become indissoluble.

The Prince Regent is fully sensible of the meritorious services performed by the Earl of Uxbridge, who had the command of the cavalry in the battle of the 18th, and commands me to desire you will communicate to his Lordship His Royal Highness's most gracious acceptance of them.

The judicious conduct and determined courage displayed by General Lord Hill, and by the other General officers in command of His Majesty's forces upon this glorious occasion, have obtained the high approbation of the Prince Regent. Your Grace will be pleased to communicate to the General officers this gracious approval of their exertions; and your Grace will also be pleased to make known to the army at large the high approbation with which the Prince Regent has viewed the excellent conduct and invincible valour manifested by all ranks and descriptions of the troops serving under your Grace's command.

His Royal Highness commands me on no account to omit expressing his deep regret on receiving so long a list of officers and men who have either fallen or been severely wounded in the actions of the 16th and 18th instant; and the Prince Regent particularly laments the loss of such highly distinguished officers as Lieutenant-General Sir T. Picton and Major-General Sir W. Ponsonby.

It cannot be expected that such desperate conflicts should be encountered, and so transcendent a victory be obtained, without considerable loss.

The chance of war must at times expose armies under the ablest commanders to great casualties, without any adequate advantage to be derived in return. But whoever contemplates the immediate effects and the probable results of the battles fought upon the 16th and 18th instant cannot but think that although on the lists of killed and wounded several of His Majesty's most approved officers are unfortunately inscribed, many endeared to your Grace, and whose names have become familiar to the country by their distinguished services in the Peninsula, the loss, however severe and however to be lamented, bears but a small proportion to the magnitude of the victory which has been achieved, and which has exalted the military glory of the country, has protected from invasion and spoil the territory of His Majesty's ally the King of the Netherlands, and has opened the fairest prospect of placing on a lasting foundation the peace and liberties of Europe.

BATHURST.

Sir Charles Stuart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Roye, 2nd July, 1815.

M. de Talleyrand has this day communicated to me General Pozzo di Borgo's letter, detailing the events which had taken place at Paris during the last three days, and explaining that, by the arrival of Monsieur, he considers his presence at head-quarters may perhaps be more useful to the interests of the King than his return to this place.

Under these circumstances, the King and M. de Talleyrand, who feel extreme anxiety for further intelligence, have determined neither to move from hence, nor to take any official step whatever, until they receive the answer to the letters of which Mr. Hare was the bearer.

Marshal Marmont arrived last night, and, it is reported, is to have the portefeuille of the War Department.

You are probably informed that the great treaty has been signed by all the plenipotentiaries except those of Russia and Spain.

Lord Stewart informs me that Lord Castlereagh may be expected soon at head-quarters.

Believe me, my dear Lord, your very faithful

CHARLES STUART.

The French Commissioners to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Louvres, ce 2 Juillet, 1815, à 5 heures.

Les circonstances sont trop graves et les momens trop précieux pour que nous ne les comptions pas avec la plus grande anxiété. Nous recevons à l'instant la lettre dont Votre Excellence nous honore, en date de ce jour, de votre quartier-général de * , à 7 heures du matin.† Nous nous flattions d'y trouver le résultat de la conférence que Votre Seigneurie s'était proposé d'avoir avec M. le Prince Blücher, et nous espérions que les hostilités allaient enfin cesser.

My Lord, la cause de la guerre est ôtée : Napoléon a perdu pour toujours le pouvoir. Il est pour jamais éloigné de la France. Pourquoi donc le sang continue-t-il de couler? La continuation des hostilités offre des maux présents qu'aucune utilité ne compense, et peut-être qu'elle en prépare pour l'avenir de plus funestes encore, et qui seraient sans remède.

Si l'éloignement de Napoléon ne suffit point au rétablissement immédiat de la paix, si des arrangemens doivent précéder ce rétablissement, et s'ils doivent être calculés de telle sorte qu'ils satisfassent en même tems à la situation morale et aux besoins de la France que les Puissances Alliées ne connaissent peut-être pas assez, à son indépendance, qu'elles ont promis de respecter, et à ce que l'Europe peut être en droit de désirer pour sa propre sécurité, comment serait-il possible de parvenir au but sans s'entendre, ou de s'entendre sans poser au moins momentanément les armes ?

Les triomphes qui naissent de la force ne sont pas, My Lord, ceux que votre âme ambitionne. Votre Seigneurie sait trop que ce qui n'a de fondement que la force tombe avec elle. La partie de votre gloire qui vous est sans doute la plus chère est celle qui repose sur le bien que vous faites, ou sur les maux que vous épargnez. Nous nous adressons donc à votre gloire lorsqu'au nom de l'humanité, et pour l'intérêt, non pas de la France seulement, mais nous ôsons le dire de toute l'Europe ; car toutes les nations sont solidaires ; nous vous renouvelons avec instances la demande d'une suspension d'armes immédiate, qui permette de s'entendre et de rétablir la paix sur des bases véritablement durables.

La lettre que Votre Excellence a bien voulu nous adresser aujourd'hui, datée de 7 heures du matin, ne nous est parvenue qu'à 2 h. et ½, ce qui nous fait sentir la distance où nous nous trouvons de votre quartier-général. Nous vous prions d'agréer la demande que nous vous faisons de nous en rapprocher.

Veuillez agréer, My Lord, l'assurance de la très haute considération avec laquelle nous avons l'honneur d'être

De Votre Excellence les très humbles serviteurs,

LE COMTE BOISSY D'ANGLAS.

The French Commissioners to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Louvres, ce 2 Juillet, 1815, à 10 heures du soir.

Il nous est parvenu à six heures une dépêche de Paris sur le contenu de laquelle nous désirerions avoir l'honneur d'entretenir demain matin Votre Excellence à son quartier-général, si toutefois ses occupations le lui permettent.

Nous venons de recevoir sa réponse à la lettre que nous avons eu l'honneur de lui écrire aujourd'hui à 3 heures ½.

Quelque grande et quelque juste que puisse être notre impatience, nous nous reposons avec une entière confiance sur les soins que vous voulez bien prendre.

L'objection de M. le Maréchal Prince Blücher tirée de ce qui se passe journellement à Paris cessera, nous ôsons le croire, lorsque le Prince voudra considérer que la prolongation des négociations pour l'armistice et la position et les mouvemens des troupes Alliées occasionnent seuls l'état de choses dont il se plaint. La suspension d'armes demandée l'aurait prévenu.

Agréez, My Lord, l'assurance de la très haute considération avec laquelle nous avons l'honneur d'être

De Votre Excellence les très humbles serviteurs,

Position of the French Army at Montmartre.

Gonesse, 2 Juillet, 1815.

La gauche de l'armée est appuyée à la Seine au village de Clichy: un poste de 150 hommes de cavalerie y est cantonné. St. Ouen est occupé par environ 1600 hommes de cavalerie, ainsi que les premières maisons du faubourg qui est sur cette route, où il y a 200 hommes du 4e régiment de Hussards. Il paraît que cette cavalerie est sous les ordres du Général Pajol. Je n'ai pu pousser jusques à St. Denis, mais tous les rapports s'accordent à dire qu'il y a 4000 à 5000 hommes d'infanterie. On a travaillé à des retranchements toute la nuit. Ils ne sont pas considérables, et n'inspirent aucune confiance aux troupes. Elles en ont davantage dans l'artillerie, qui est composée de plusieurs pièces de 16 et de 24, et en une batterie de 16 pièces de 4 et de 8.

Le canal est gardé par de l'infanterie. Je n'ai pu ni en approcher ni en évaluer le nombre.

Montmartre est occupé par 700 à 800 hommes d'infanterie et 400 d'artillerie. Il y a huit pièces en batterie: on en montoit encore deux. Les cinq moulins à la droite de Montmartre sont occupés par 300 hommes des dépôts qui étoient à St. Denis. Il y a de l'artillerie et 4 pièces de canon. On travaille à des palissades, dont il n'y a pas un cinquième de placé.

Il y a dans le village de La Chapelle et environs 1200 hommes de cavalerie. C'est en partie de la jeune Garde. En avant se trouve un parc d'artillerie de 20 pièces de canon jusqu'à la barrière St. Denis, c'est-à-dire l'entrée du faubourg. Il n'y a ni palissades achevées ni canon.

Un corps peu considérable d'infanterie se trouve entre cette route et La Villette. L'entrée de La Villette est l'endroit le plus fortifié. Il y a 4 pièces en batterie sur le talus du canal. 2 plateformes s'élèvent à droit et à gauche: on y amenoit 2 pièces de canon à chacune. 2 régiments de cavalerie sont cantonnés dans La Villette. On évalue l'infanterie qui y est à 2000 hommes.

Les postes sur les deux rives du canal de l'Ourcq sont très rapprochés: on n'y laisse pas avancer. Plus près de la barrière sont des fédérés atroces dans leurs propos, mais aussi mauvaises troupes que possible.

La tête du faubourg de Meaux est fortifié par 4 pièces de canon. Il n'y a pas des palissades. La cavalerie qui se trouve dans ce faubourg est peu considérable. L'artillerie paraît assez nombreuse.

Sur les hauteurs qui sont connues sous le nom de Belleville et de Chaumont les ouvrages sont mauvais, se composent de trois et deux rangs de retranchements, mais la position du terrain les rend difficiles à emporter. On n'en laisse pas approcher. On ne connoît pas la force de ce qui y est. Il y a beaucoup de fédérés.

Il y a 100 hommes de pensionnés au pont de Charenton. Le reste de l'artillerie est disposée sur le canal. On ne peut dire le nombre : les soldats l'estiment à 50 pièces.

Il se trouve en avant de la butte Montmartre deux petites redoutes. Les soldats sont découragés au dernier point. Il n'y a d'essentiellement déterminés que ceux qui ne reviennent pas de l'armée : ils sont d'un très mauvais esprit.

Lieut.-Gen. Comte de Gneisenau to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord-Duke, Versailles, ce 2 Juillet, 1815.

Monsieur le Maréchal Prince Blücher étant déjà couché, et les propositions dont vous, My Lord Duc, avez bien voulu faire part à Monsieur le Maréchal, demandant une mûre délibération, je dois différer jusqu'à demain à demander les ordres de M. le Maréchal regardant son opinion sur vos propositions. Votre Grâce veuille agréer ce délai.

Nos troupes ont aujourd'hui combattu glorieusement ; et les ont, toujours en nombre inférieur, culbuté l'ennemi sur tous les points où elles ont attaqué ; et elles ont chassé devant elles les Gardes Impériales. Beaucoup de monde était sorti hors de Paris pour voir le combat, et les Parisiens ont été témoins de la défaite de leurs troupes. La position que deux de nos corps d'armée ont occupé aujourd'hui est le plateau de Meudon ; position très forte.

Veuillez agréer, My Lord Duc, l'expression de mes sentimens respectueux.

Comte de Gneisenau.

Prince Metternich to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Monsieur le Duc, Au Quartier Impérial à Sarrebourg, ce 2 Juillet, 1815.

Les Commissaires Français envoyés près des Alliés sont arrivés inopinément au quartier-général des trois Souverains, qui se trouvait avant hier à Hagenau. Ils avaient été conduits par un aide-de-camp du Maréchal Blücher à M. le Maréchal Barclay de Tolly, qui nous les a envoyé.

Votre Excellence connaissant la lettre dont ils étaient porteurs pour les Cabinets Alliés, je n'en envoye point de copie avec la présente expédition.

Il a été décidé que les chefs des cabinets Autrichien et Russe, les seuls présens au quartier-général, n'auraient pas de communication avec ces Commissaires, mais qu'il leur seraient envoyé des individus chargés d'écouter les explications qu'ils devaient avoir à faire en vertu de leur lettre de créance.

Ces Commissaires furent, pour l'Autriche, le Lieut.-Général Comte de Walmoden; pour la Russie, le Comte Capo d'Istria; pour la Prusse, le Général de Knesebeck. LL. MM. ayant désiré qu'un envoyé Anglais prit part à l'entretien, My Lord Stewart accompagna nos Commissaires.

Le résultat d'un entretien de plusieurs heures fut la conviction que les meneurs en France paraissent persuadés que leur cause est perdu. Ils désirent capituler, et les Commissaires parurent personnellement fort disposés à soutenir toute cause qui emporterait des garanties de tranquillité et des sûretés contre des réactions.

Les Commissaires Alliés, après avoir fait leur rapport, reçurent l'ordre de faire aux Commissaires Français la réponse que V.E. trouve ci-jointe en copie. Ces derniers ayant témoigné le désir d'ôser prendre note de son contenu, elle leur fut dictée en forme de note verbale.

Je profite de la présente occasion, qui cependant ne me paraît pas encore parfaitement une, pour prier Votre Excellence de bien vouloir faire parvenir à M. de Vincent l'incluse, qui renferme les mêmes renseignemens que je m'empresse de donner directement à Votre Excellence.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec une haute considération, Monsieur le Duc,

De Votre Excellence le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

METTERNICH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

OUVERTURE faite par les COMMISSAIRES des trois Cours d'Autriche, de Russie, et de Prusse, Comte WALMODEN, Comte CAPO D'ISTRIA, et Général KNESEBECK, aux Commissaires Français à Hagenau, le 1er. Juillet, 1815, à 9 heures du matin.

Les traités d'alliance portant que l'une des parties ne négociera jamais séparément et ne fera ni paix ni trève que d'un commun accord, les trois Cours présentes ici ne peuvent pas entrer en négociation. Les Cabinets vont se réunir dans le plus court délai possible.

Les trois Souverains regardent comme une condition préalable et essentielle de toute paix et d'un veritable état de repos que Napoléon Buonaparte soit mis hors d'état de troubler désormais la tranquillité de la France et de l'Europe. Après ce qui s'est passé au mois de Mars dernier, les Puissances doivent exiger qu'il soit confié à leur garde.

The Duc d'Otrante to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Paris, 3 Juillet, 1815.

Si je pouvois avoir un entretien avec votre Seigneurie, nous serions bientôt d'accord.

La France toute entière veut être en paix avec l'Europe: elle ne de-mande que son indépendance comme nation, et des institutions fortes dans son intérieur, pour garantir sa liberté.

Le porteur est chargé d'exprimer à votre Seigneurie tous mes sentimens de la plus haute considération.

LE DUC D'OTRANTE.

H. Macirone, Esq., to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Advanced post in front of Bourget, 3rd July, 1815, ½ past 6 P.M.

MY LORD DUKE,

The despatch which I send your Grace is merely ostensible. I have a verbal communication to make to your Grace, together with arrangements which, from the suspicious jealousy of the army, cannot be conducted by writing. Fouché and the rest of the well disposed leaders have hitherto been overawed by the army. At present Marshal Davoust, the Commander in Chief, has been gained over to the King's party by Fouché. All the army will yield if assurances of lenity are resorted to. Davoust assures your Grace that it will easily even become devoted to the King. Fouché and Davoust engage to send the army from Paris to occupy any position your Grace will point out at any distance from Paris. The army and the Chambers once separated, both will instantly agree to the propositions of M. Fouché and M. Caulaincourt, to recognise the King, provided he will engage to guarantee them, according to the Charter lately promised them. In order to obtain a good understanding, your Grace will condescend to explain your wishes. If your Grace will consent to the removal of the army, the Chambers will directly agree to anything else. Let the King promise a general forgiveness and amnesty.

I would wish to be allowed the honour of speaking with your Grace, as I could then more fully explain all points; and I answer for it that what your Grace would require should be put immediately into execution.

I earnestly pray that your Grace would allow me to repair to headquarters, in order that your Grace may perfectly understand my mission, which is a far more important one than I had when I had the honour of dining with your Grace last Wednesday.

I have the honour to be
Your Grace's most obedient and most humble servant,

H. MACIRONE.

Ratification of the Military Convention. *

3rd July, 1815.

Nous, Maréchal d'Empire, Ministre de la Guerre, Commandant en Chef l'armée Française sous Paris, avons nommé et nommons par les présentes Monsieur Bourjon, chef de la division du Nord, au Département des Affaires Etrangères, pour procéder à l'échange des ratifications de la suspension d'armes signée aujourd'hui par la Commission désignée à cet effet par nous et par leurs Excellences les Généraux commandans les armées Anglaises et Prussiennes.

En foi de quoi nous avons signé les présentes, à Paris, le trois Juillet, mil huit cent quinze.

LE MARÉCHAL PRINCE D'ECKMÜHL.

Viscount Castlereagh to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Bavay, 4th July, 1815, 11 P.M.

I am just arrived here, having landed yesterday at Ostend. The two couriers, carrying the intelligence of your being at Paris, passed me on the other side of Mons; but, as they went by unobserved, I know no details.

I hope to see you Thursday night. As the roads are bad, and post-horses uncertain, it may possibly be Friday morning before I reach Paris.

Accept my congratulations.

Ever, my dear Lord, most sincerely yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

Prince Augustus of Prussia to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Cosseret, près de Maubeuge, le 3 Juillet, 1815.

J'espère que votre Altesse voudra bien pardonner que je m'adresse directement à vous, pour vous demander de vouloir bien m'envoyer le plutôt possible l'artillerie, les munitions, et tous les autres objets nécessaires pour entreprendre un siége en forme, que vous avez eu la bonté de me promettre à la conférence de Châtillon-sur-Sambre. Avec mon artillerie de campagne et quelques obusiers que nous avons pris à Avesnes, j'ai bombardé Maubeuge et brûlé une partie de la ville et des magasins; mais malgré cela le commandant ne paroît pas disposé à se rendre, et je serais obligé d'entreprendre un siége en forme. Comme je ne puis disposer que de 25 pièces d'artillerie de siége, je serois hors d'état de l'entreprendre si votre Altesse ne m'en fournit pas les moyens.

Apprenant que 50 pièces d'artillerie de siége, avec les munitions nécessaires, se trouvent à Mons, je prie votre Altesse de vouloir bien ordonner qu'elles soyent d'abord transportées ici le plus promptement possible, et mises à ma disposition.

En demandant à votre Altesse de me donner par le porteur de cette lettre une réponse positive sur les secours que je pourrais attendre de votre part, je vous demande de recevoir l'assurance de la haute estime et du sincère dévouement avec lequel je suis,

Monsieur le Duc,

Votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

AUGUSTE, PRINCE DE PRUSSE.

General Walterstorff to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Gonesse, ce 4 Juillet, 1815.

Je m'empresse d'avoir l'honneur de prévenir votre Excellence que mon courrier est revenu hier de Copenhague, et m'a apporté les pleinpouvoirs nécessaires pour signer avec elle le traité de subsides, tel qu'il a été proposé par votre Excellence. Le Roi m'a en même tems envoyé sa ratification du dit traité.

Le corps auxiliaire Danois, qui pourra se mettre en marche dans le courant de ce mois, est composé de 10 bataillons, 14 escadrons, et 40 pièces de canon. Sa force totale est de 15,000 hommes et de 5100 chevaux.

Votre Excellence me permettra, j'espère, de l'entretenir plus en détail de cette affaire lorsqu'elle sera un peu moins occupée qu'elle ne doit l'être dans ce moment.

Je suis, avec un attachement respectueux, et avec la plus haute considération,

Monsieur le Duc, de Votre Excellence

Le très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

WALTERSTORFF.

The Duke of York to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD DUKE, Horse Guards, 4th July, 1815.

I have had the pleasure to receive your Grace's letter of the 28th ultimo, and I have to assure you that I will not fail to give my utmost consideration to, and to consult with the Secretary of State upon, the modification you propose in the Order of the Bath. I quite agree with you upon the establishment for the second class being too extended when confined to General Officers and Admirals; and indeed if it were not necessary, or rather convenient, to have a bar against importunity, I think it would be better only to grant the Order in proportion to the claims of individuals for distinguished services.

I have the pleasure to acquaint you that your idea of granting a medal to all concerned in the battle of Waterloo had already been in contemplation, and I am in hopes that it will be immediately acted upon.

As a further reward and encouragement to the non-commissioned officers and privates, it is in contemplation to grant those who have shared in the battle two years' time towards a claim for increase of pension, and pension for length of service, without, however, giving the limited-service men any claim for discharge before the expiration of the period for which they have been enlisted.

It is also proposed that progressive increase of pension shall be attached to the case of all officers wounded on this occasion, either by the loss of a limb or an injury equal to it, by granting an augmentation equal to the several ranks they may hereafter attain, instead of being confined to the pension allotted to the rank in which they got the wound. I shall also propose that the Waterloo subalterns shall have two years allowed for that battle towards the attainment of the additional shilling per day which they now receive after seven years' service.

I remain, my dear Lord Duke, yours sincerely,

FREDERICK.

The Duc d'Otrante to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, Paris, le 4 Juillet, 1815.

Une convention signée entre les Généraux des Puissances belligérantes vient arrêter l'effusion du sang. Il reste à jeter les fondements d'une paix stable: c'est votre vœu, c'est le mien; c'est celui de l'humanité. Tout ce qui pourra hâter l'accomplissement de ce noble dessein aura l'assentiment de toutes les nations.

Je désire que votre Seigneurie me désigne un lieu où je puisse librement épancher mon âme dans la sienne. My Lord, quand vous connaîtrez bien notre situation, nous nous entendrons promptement sur ce qui convient le mieux aux grands intérêts de la France et de l'Europe.

Je prie votre Seigneurie de recevoir l'assurance de ma plus haute considération.

Le Duc d'Otrante.

P.S.—Je vous adresse cette lettre par le Général Trommelin, et je le charge d'exprimer à votre Seigneurie toute la confiance que j'ai dans la loyauté de son caractère.

M. Antheaume de Surval to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

Gonesse, ce 4 Juillet, 1815.

Antheaume de Surval, en vertu des pouvoirs dont il est porteur, et qu'il jouit au présent, a l'honneur de solliciter sa Seigneurie Monsieur le Duc de Wellington de vouloir bien donner des ordres pour que le dépôt-général de la cavalerie Anglaise établi à Chantilly soit changé de cantonnement. Ce dépôt, se composant à peu près de 900 chevaux et 500 hommes, employe toutes les écuries de S.A.S. Monseigneur le Prince de Condé, sur le point d'arriver à Chantilly; et les réquisitions nécessaires pour fournir à la subsistance des chevaux et des hommes ruinent totalement le village, naturellement pauvre, et qui ne subsiste ordinairement que par les dépenses qui y sont faites par Monseigneur le Prince de Condé.

[Je ne peux pas ôter le dépôt de Chantilly.

Wellington.]

Le soussigné a également l'honneur d'exposer à sa Seigneurie que le maître de la poste aux chevaux du même village a été requis de fournir seize chevaux et quatre voitures pour le service du transport de l'armée Anglaise; que depuis trois jours ces chevaux sont obtenus sans qu'il puisse les recouvrer, ce qui le met dans le cas de ne pouvoir faire son service avec régularité, dans une circonstance surtout où il vient de recevoir une invitation d'envoyer le tiers de ses chevaux à Senlis pour le passage du Roi. Sa Seigneurie est donc suppliée d'avoir la bonté de donner des ordres pour que ces chevaux soient restitués à leur maître, qui d'ailleurs est un officier de la maison de S.A.S. Monseigneur le Prince de Condé.

[Let the Commissary-General send back the post-horses, and no requisition of post-horses must be made.

WELLINGTON.]

Le soussigné a en outre l'honneur d'exposer à sa Seigneurie que S.A.S. Monseigneur le Prince de Condé est propriétaire de deux autres villages aux environs de Chantilly : 1, celui d'Enghien-Montmorency ; 2, celui d'Ecouen : qui, de même que celui de Chantilly, courent le danger d'être pillés par les traîneurs de l'armée. Celui d'Ecouen l'a même déjà été en partie. Je prie donc sa Seigneurie de mettre le comble à sa bonté en veuillant bien donner l'ordre qu'une compagnie ou demie compagnie de sauvegarde soit mise dans chacun des villages de Chantilly, Ecouen, et Enghien.

ANTHEAUME DE SURVAL.

[Let them catch the plunderers, and send them to me.

WELLINGTON.]

[913.*] G. O. Neuilly, 5th July, 1815.

Thanks of the House of Lords to the Army.

Die Veneris, 23° Junij, 1815.

Resolved, nemine dissentiente, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Thanks of this House be given to the General Officers, Officers, and Men of the Allied Forces serving under the immediate command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, for the distinguished valour and intrepidity displayed by them upon the 18th of June.

Die Lunæ, 26° Junij, 1815.

Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That his Grace the Duke of Wellington be requested to signify the said Resolution to them.

GEORGE ROSE, Cler. Parliamentor.

The Speaker of the House of Commons to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

My Lord, House of Commons, 23rd June, 1815.

In the name and by the command of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, I have the honour to transmit to your Grace their unanimous Thanks for the consummate ability, unexampled exertion, and irresistible ardour displayed by your Grace on the 18th of June instant, on which day the decisive victory over the enemy commanded by Buonaparte in person was obtained by your Grace with the Allied troops under your command, and in conjunction with the troops under the command of Marshal Prince Blücher, whereby the military glory of the British nation has been exalted, and the territory of His Majesty's ally the King of the Netherlands has been protected from invasion and spoil.

I am also commanded to transmit the unanimous Thanks of this House to the several General Officers named in the enclosed Resolution, and the Officers under their command, for their indefatigable zeal and exertions upon that memorable day; requesting your Grace to signify the same to all the Officers therein named, except Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Clinton, K.G.C.B., and Major-General Lord Edward Somerset, K.C.B., they being members of this House. And at the same time I have to communicate to your Grace the unanimous vote of this House, acknowledging and highly approving the distinguished valour and discipline displayed by the Non-commissioned Officers and Private Soldiers of His Majesty's forces serving under your Grace's command in that glorious victory.

I am further commanded to transmit to your Grace their unanimous Resolution of Thanks to the General Officers, Officers, and Men of the Allied forces serving under your Grace's immediate command, for the distinguished valour and intrepidity displayed by them in that hard-fought battle.

The House of Commons has also deemed it to be their indispensable duty upon this glorious occasion to give their unanimous Thanks to Marshal Prince Blücher and the Prussian Army for the cordial and timely assistance afforded by them on the 18th of June instant, to which the successful result of that arduous day is so mainly to be attributed; and the House of Commons, desirous that such an acknowledgment on their part should be delivered in the manner most acceptable to Marshal Prince Blücher and the Prussian Army, have directed me to request of your Grace to take that charge upon yourself.

In the execution of these commands which I have received from the House of Commons, it is impossible for me not to embrace the same opportunity of expressing my own happiness in having to congratulate your Grace upon this greatest of all your triumphs, which leaves the nations of the world no longer in doubt to what name they must henceforth ascribe the pre-eminence for military genius and unconquerable valour.

I have the honour to remain ever,

With the sincerest respect and devotion, my Lord,

Your Grace's most faithful servant,

Charles Abbot, Speaker.

Thanks of the House of Lords to Marshal Prince Blücher and the Prussian Army.

Die Veneris, 23° Junij, 1815.

Resolved, nemine dissentiente, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the Thanks of this House be given to Marshal Prince Blücher and the Prussian Army under his command for the cordial and timely assistance afforded by them on the 18th of June, to which the successful result of that arduous day is so mainly to be attributed.

Die Lunæ, 26° Junij, 1815.

Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That his Grace the Duke of Wellington be requested to convey to them the said Resolution.

GEORGE ROSE, Cler. Parliamentor.

Thanks of the House of Commons to the Duke of Wellington and the Allied Army.

Veneris, 23° die Junij, 1815.

Resolved, nemine contradicente, That the Thanks of this House be given to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, for the consummate ability, unexampled exertion, and irresistible ardour displayed by him on the 18th of June, on which day the decisive victory over the enemy commanded by Buonaparte in person was obtained by his Grace, with the Allied troops under his command, and in conjunction with the troops under the command of Marshal Prince Blücher, whereby the military glory of the British nation has been exalted, and the territory of His Majesty's ally the King of the Netherlands has been protected from invasion and spoil.

Resolved, nemine contradicente, That this House doth acknowledge and highly approve the distinguished valour and discipline displayed by the Non-commissioned Officers and Private Soldiers of His Majesty's forces serving under the command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington in the glorious victory obtained upon the 18th of June; and that the same be signified to them by the Commanding officers of the several corps, who are desired to thank them for their gallant and exemplary behaviour.

Resolved, nemine contradicente, That the Thanks of this House be given to the General Officers, Officers, and Men of the Allied forces serving under the immediate command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, for the distinguished valour and intrepidity displayed by them on the 18th of June; and that his Grace the Duke of Wellington be desired to signify the same to them accordingly.

Resolved, nemine contradicente, That the Thanks of this House be given to Marshal Prince Blücher and the Prussian Army, for the cordial and timely assistance afforded by them on the 18th of June, to which the successful result of that arduous day is so mainly to be attributed; and that his Grace the Duke of Wellington be desired to convey to them the present Resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do communicate the said Resolutions to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

J. DYSON, Cl. D. Dom. Com.

General Müffling to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUC, Neuilly, 5 Juillet, 1815.

Le Prince Blücher m'a chargé de dire à votre Grâce :—

1. Combien il étoit enchanté de voir par votre lettre d'aujourd'hui que vos idées s'accordoient parfaitement.

2. Qu'il n'avoit pas envie de donner aux Français le spectacle d'une entrée solennelle à Paris, mais qu'il croyoit qu'il étoit en règle d'occuper demain au cours de l'après dîner militairement la ville de Paris.

3. Le Prince prie votre Grâce d'occuper demain midi les barrières, comme vous l'avez proposé, depuis la Seine vers le Montmartre, et les hauteurs de Belleville.

4. Comme il y a beaucoup de choses sur lesquelles il est nécessaire de se concerter, surtout en fait de politique, j'ai prié le Général Comte Gneisenau de venir demain, à dix heures, vous voir.

Souffrez, My Lord Duc, l'assurance de mon profond respect.

LE BARON DE MÜFFLING.

The Prince d'Eckmühl to M. le Maréchal de Camp d'Aumesnil, Commandant du Château de Vincennes.

GÉNÉRAL, Paris, le 5 Juillet, 1815.

Le château de Vincennes n'a pas été compris dans la convention conclue avant-hier pour l'évacuation de Paris, et conséquemment vous devez y rester avec votre garnison, et faire rentrer aujourd'hui et demain les denrées dont vous pouvez avoir besoin pour compléter votre approvisionnement de bouches.

La convention porte suspension d'armes et armistice jusqu'à la paix, à moins que la rupture n'en soit dénoncée 10 jours à l'avance. Cette clause concerne le château de Vincennes, comme toutes nos autres places fortes de l'intérieur et des frontières.

Vous devez, en conséquence, vous abstenir de toute acte d'hostilité envers les troupes des Puissances coalisées, et donner les ordres les plus sévères pour empêcher qu'on se tire sur elles. Mais il est aussi de la plus grande importance de vous tenir sur vos gardes de crainte de surprise, d'exercer la plus grande surveillance aux environs du château, et de mettre à l'abri dans les souterrains et le donjon toutes les poudres et munitions confectionnées qui existent dans la place. Si l'ennemi vient à vous attaquer, vous lui enverrez un parlementaire pour reclamer l'exécution de l'armistice, dans lequel vous êtes comprise. S'il continue néanmoins ses attaques, vous y répondrez en vous défendant jusqu'à la dernière extrémité.

Si l'ennemi se borne à vous sommer de rendre la place, vous invoquerez l'exécution de l'armistice, et vous déclarez que vous ne la remettrez que par les ordres du gouvernement qui sera reconnu en France.

L'objet important est de ne pas rendre cette place aux ennemis, qui enlèveroient tous les effets précieuses d'artillerie qui s'y trouvent, et de faire tout votre possible pour la conserver au gouvernement Français, quel qu'il soit.

Votre conduite en semblable circonstance vous a mérité l'estime générale, et elle vous trace celle que vous avez à tenir aujourd'hui.

Faites-moi connoître, dans la journée, ce qui pourroit vous manquer pour assurer une bonne défense au poste qui vous est confié, et je ferai en sorte que l'on vous envoie demain tout ce que vous demanderez.

Recevez, etc.

LE PRINCE D'ECKMÜHL.

The French Commissioners to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Porte Maillot, le 5 Juillet, 1815.

C'est avec la plus profonde douleur et la plus vive indignation que nous avons appris l'accident arrivé hier au soir à Messieurs vos Commissaires, au faubourg de La Villette, et à leur suite. Nous avons fait prendre sur-le-champ tous les renseignemens qu'on a pu se procurer sur cette malheureuse affaire, et nous nous sommes convaincus qu'elle n'a point eu lieu avec préméditation, et que c'est un délit particulier, qui ne peut être imputé à l'armée Française. Le poste de la barrière de La Villette avait reçu régulièrement et admis dans nos lignes vos Commissaires avec les égards dûs à leur caractère. Des Polonais, dont le corps était dans le voisinage, pris de vin, se sont attroupés, et ont insulté ces Messieurs. Quelques mauvais sujets se sont joints à eux, et le malheur a voulu que vos Commissaires, arrivés à la nuit, n'ont pu faire connaître leur mission. L'aide-de-camp que la Commission avait envoyé pour accompagner Messieurs les Commissaires Anglais a lui-même été fort mal traité par cet attroupement. On lui a tiré deux coups de pistolet à bout portant et donné deux coups de sabre. Vous voyez, my Lord, qu'il était aussi impossible de prévoir cet événement que de l'empêcher. M. le Prince d'Eckmühl vient de nous écrire qu'il fait faire une enquête pour découvrir les coupables, et qu'ils seront traités selon toute la rigueur des lois militaires si on parvient à les découvrir.

Agréez, my Lord, l'expression de tous nos regrets, et l'hommage de la haute considération avec laquelle nous avons l'honneur d'être,

My Lord, de votre Excellence

Les très-humbles et très-obéissants serviteurs,

LE LIEUT.-GÉN. CUIRREAU,
LE LIEUT.-GÉN. CORBINEAU,
BARON GRUNDLER,

Les Commissaires chargés de l'exécution de la Convention.

ETAT Approximatif des Débris de l'ARMÉE du NORD au 5 Juillet, 1815, et des Corps d'Armée dispersés dans l'Intérieur.

Au 5 Juillet dernier l'armée sous les murs de Paris, aux ordres du Prince d'Eckmühl, se composoit des deux corps des Généraux Vandamme et Gérard, qui n'avoient pas été entamés, de la cavalerie du Maréchal Grouchy, des débris de la Garde, et de tous les corps qui avoient été réunis sous Laon et Soissons. Toutes ces troupes avoient été remises en ordre sous les murs de Paris. Leur habillement et armement avoient été complété; le soldat avoit reçu des magasins tout ce qui s'y trouvoit amassés, et qu'on craignoit de ne pouvoir emporter dans le cas d'une évacuation.

Dès le 19 et 20 les ordres avoient été donnés d'évacuer sur la Normandie le matériel et le personnel des dépôts de cavalerie et d'infanterie qui se trouvoient placés depuis la Flandre jusqu'à Paris. Ces dépôts étoient riches en hommes, chevaux, et effets de confectionnement. Le Prince d'Eckmühl a eu soin de renforcer son armée de tout ce qui était disponible dans les dépôts, tant en hommes qu'en chevaux. Cette armée ne peut être évaluée au dessous de 65 mille hommes présens sous les armes; sa cavalerie peut monter de 13 à 14 mille sabres; les débris de la Garde à 11 à 12 mille hommes. Dans ce calcul n'entre pas les ressources en hommes et chevaux qui ont été tirées des dépôts.

Le matériel de cette armée est magnifique et complet: il se compose de celui des corps Vandamme et Gérard, et de tout ce qui a été enlevé dans Paris, et dans les fortifications qui l'entourent. Les équipages de cette armée au moment de son départ et son grand parc étoient ceux d'une armée d'une force triple. Elle a emmenée 350 pièces attelées, et les caisses et munitions en proportion.

Armée de la Vendée.

Le Lieutenant-Général Lamarque peut réunir dans la Vendée et départements environnants de 20 à 24 mille hommes, en enlevant les garnisons des places. Dans ce corps d'armée il faut compter plusieurs régiments de la Garde. Le Général Lamarque peut effectuer en très peu de jours sa jonction par la Loire avec le Prince d'Eckmühl. Le Général Corbineau, aide-de-camp de Buonaparte, et qui vient de traverser ces deux armées, disoit le 12 au matin qu'elles étoient animées du plus ardent esprit de résistance, et que, les autres jonctions faites, il ne doutoit pas qu'elles n'opérassent un grand changement dans les affaires.

Armée du Maréchal Suchet.

Le Maréchal Suchet n'a pas plus de 20 à 22 mille hommes de troupes de ligne avec lui. Son armée étoit beaucoup plus forte en nombre, mais il n'y a nul doute que les bataillons de Gardes Nationaux mobiles n'ayent quitté cette armée. Ce Maréchal, s'il évacue Lyon, peut facilement faire sa jonction avec le Prince d'Eckmühl ; mais la jalousie du commandant s'opposera à cette mesure, et il est à présumer que le Maréchal Suchet s'empressera de s'accommoder avec le gouvernement.

Armée du Général Clausel.

Le Général Clausel, en raison de l'étendue de son commandement, avoit un corps d'armée évalué à 30 mille hommes, mais très disséminé. Ce corps n'a aucunement souffert, et Clausel peut le réunir à volonté et marcher au devant du Prince d'Eckmühl. Ce Général a des opinions très exaltées : sa conduite à Bordeaux le portera à soutenir le gagneur. Il sera certainement l'un des plus acharnés à soutenir la cause de l'armée. Au moindre ordre qu'il aura reçu du Prince d'Eckmühl, il se sera mis en marche pour se réunir à lui.

*Corps d'Armée de Rapp et Le Courbe.

Ces deux corps réunis doivent présenter un effectif réel de plus de 80 mille hommes de troupes de ligne, et un matériel en grand complet. Ces deux corps d'armée ont eu des affaires avec les armées du Prince de Wrede. On ignore ce qu'elles ont pû perdre dans ces engagements, mais on estime ces pertes à peu de choses. On ne connoit pas non plus pour le moment la position de ces deux corps, comme les chefs ne correspondent plus ici. On ignore si les armées alliées sont tellement placées qu'elles puissent s'opposer au mouvement de jonction qu'ils pouvoient tenter. Le Courbe est celui qui tient le plus en mesure d'exécuter ce projet par le Bourgogne.

Ce tableau, rigoureusement exact, présente encore, en en réunissant toutes les parties, le moyen certain de porter les forces disponibles de l'armée Française à plus de 200 mille hommes. Ce serait livrer la France à des nouveaux déchirements pour l'intérêt particulier de quelques désespérés.

Nul doute que le gouvernement d'accord avec les Souverains alliées ne déjouent ces sinistres projets, mais on doit observer que les corps Prussiens détachés vers la Loire sont absolument insuffisans.

On avait oublié d'observer que le Prince d'Eckmühl a emporté avec lui une grande quantité de fusils neufs et beaucoup d'approvisionnement pour l'habillement et l'équipement.

---

* Les corps de Le Courbe et Rapp comptent beaucoup de bataillons de Gardes Nationaux mobilisés des départements de la Lorraine et de la Franche Comté. Ces bataillons ont bien fait la guerre, l'esprit de ces départements étant tout à fait contraire à la maison Royale.

STEPHEN G. ADYE,
Lieut.-Col. Royal Artillery.

Lieut.-Gen. Lord Stewart to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, Imperial Head-quarters, Nancy, 6th July, 1815.

It appears by accounts received here this day that General Count Bubna made an armistice with Marshal Suchet, which, under certain considerations, General Frimont thought fit to ratify. What principally induced the General to this measure was, that it would enable him to pass his army across the Jura, which has been put in such defence that the passage is not to be accomplished without much difficulty and loss. The idea of this measure on the part of General Frimont, however wisely intended, occasioned considerable sensation and discontent in these head-quarters; but I am happy to have it in my power to assure your Lordship that this proceeding is entirely at an end, which you will perceive by the copy of a letter from General Frimont to Marshal Suchet, which I herewith annex.

The French, with their usual dexterity, seem to have mutilated the convention of armistice by publishing it in part, without the conditions, to make a false impression, and derive advantage from it. I trust this despatch may reach your Lordship in time entirely to reassure you on the subject.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest truth and respect,

My Lord, your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

STEWART.

P.S. I annex a Piedmontese Gazette, which contains the convention of armistice.

S.

[ENCLOSURE.]

General Frimont to Marshal Suchet.

Au Quartier-Général, Chênes,
MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL, le 30 Juin, 1815.

La convention à laquelle j'avais donné ma ratification ne m'offrait d'autre avantage et d'autre garantie que la cession de Jura : puisqu'il n'est pas libre à

V.E. de stipuler pour cette partie ce que vous exclue cet article de la convention, je dois la déclarer comme non avenue, et je donne à tous mes corps l'ordre de reprendre des hostilités, qui continueront jusqu'à ce que des ordres supérieurs viendront les suspendre. Je désire ce moment autant que vous, M. le Maréchal; et je regrette que vos pouvoirs et les miens soient bornés de manière à ne pas en d'avancer l'instant.

Agréez, &c.,

FRIMONT.

Baron Evain à MM. les Commissaires chargés de l'Exécution de la Convention du 3 Juillet.

MESSIEURS, Paris, le 6 Juillet, 1815.

J'ai l'honneur de vous prévenir, en réponse à votre lettre de ce jour, que depuis plus de vingt ans il n'y a jamais eu de dépôts d'armes à Paris. Les gouvernemens qui se sont succédés depuis cette époque ont toujours craint qu'une émeute populaire ne mit entre les mains des malveillans les armes qui auraient existées à Paris, &c. Napoléon depuis son retour avait spécialement ordonné de n'avoir jamais aucune arme en magasin à Paris. Aussi toutes celles qui étaient fabriquées ou réparées chaque jour étaient-elles envoyées chaque nuit au dépôt général de Vincennes.

Les ordres à cet égard sont précis; et je peux en donner la preuve.

Quand dans ces derniers jours on fit venir quelques milliers de fusils de Vincennes à Paris, ces fusils furent mis en dépôt près de Clichy, à Cliquancourt, à Belleville, à Charonne, et à l'Ecole Militaire, et furent distribuées: ceux qui restèrent sans emploi ont été donnés à la garde nationale de Paris.

Il n'y a donc à Paris aucun magasin d'armes. Je ne puis vous fournir l'état que vous me faites l'honneur de me demander.

J'ai l'honneur, &c.,

BARON EVAIN.

General Morgan to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Paris, le 7 Juillet, 1815.

Je ne puis abuser de vos moments dans une circonstance où Votre Seigneurie est occupée de plus importans intérêts. Je le prie seulement de méditer sur les deux points que je soumets à son examen.

Il me semble, My Lord, que les Alliés et le Roi, chacun séparément, ou même cumulativement, n'ont point une idée juste de la situation de la France, de l'esprit de la capitale, de celui des départemens; que l'armée, et les chefs surtout, ne sont appréciées en raison des conséquences, en bien ou en mal, qu'ils peuvent produire. On n'a pas calculé non plus, ce me semble, My Lord, les rapports établis depuis dix jours entre toutes les fractions de cette armée disséminée sur la France et l'autorité centrale qui existe aujourd'hui à Paris, autorité qui, quand bien même elle serait dissoute demain par la force, n'en continuerait pas moins de jouir de la plus grande influence. Ce peu de lignes, My Lord, vous doit donner beaucoup à méditer, et demanderait des développements trop volumineux pour le moment ; mais voici le résultat inévitable de cet état de choses, c'est que la position du Roi aujourd'hui, 7 Juillet, est moins avantageux à ce Prince que celle du 20 Mars dernier, qu'il quitta sa capitale. Quant aux Alliés, leur situation sur le point de vue de la force est certainement la plus respectable, mais ces avantages disparaîtraient après un très court espace de temps.

Les déchiremens inévitables dont la France est menacée sont hors de tous calculs humains : nulle puissance n'arrêtera ce débordement dans sa furie. Je dois rappeler à Votre Seigneurie la traité de Barrière, à la suite de celui d'Utrecht en 1714. Il doit, My Lord, vous être bien connu : profitez en comme d'un exemple qui vous fournira au moins une garantie pour la tranquillité d'une partie de l'Europe. Cette idée n'a besoin que de vous être signalée, My Lord, pour que vous y adoptiez les développements nécessaires.

Il s'est fait une cruelle révolution dans l'esprit de la nation Française depuis peu de jours ; la boîte de Pandore est ouverte sur ce malheureux pays, et il faudrait au Dieu même pour arracher ce peuple à la destinée qui le poursuit.

Craignant d'importuner Votre Seigneurie, je le prie de m'excuser si je ne me rends pas tous les jours chez elle, mais je me rendrai à ses ordres au premier signe.

Veuillez, My Lord, accueillir en bienveillance l'hommage de mon admiration pour votre noble caractère, ainsi que celui de mon respect.

LE GÉNÉRAL MORGAN.

Lieut.-Col. Sir A. Dickson to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Mons, 7th July, 1815, 4 P.M.

An aide-de-camp of Prince Augustus of Prussia delivered to me late last night your Grace's letter of the 5th inst., and early this morning I proceeded in consequence to Requignies, near Maubeuge, where the Prince has his head-quarters, and was immediately introduced to His Royal Highness, who communicated to me the proposed plan of attack, by which I found a number of pieces of ordnance required, particularly mortars. I proposed to His Royal Highness to place 50 pieces at his disposal, of such calibre as he might select, in addition to those he already has ; but the Prince expressing a strong desire to increase the number to 60, I acquiesced in his wish, to which I was the more induced by the account I received of the ordnance already in their possession, which, it was stated to me, consisted of the heavier field pieces and howitzers of the corps, some 12-pounders, brass, brought from Avesnes, and a few 5½-inch mortars lately received, for all which generally there is a deficiency of ammunition.

I proposed, therefore, to appropriate as follows—

30 24-pounders
9 10-inch mortars
9 8-inch mortars
6 8-inch howitzers

heavy . . . 54

with a few small 5⅘-inch mortars for close operation; and this evening a proportion of the same will march from Mons, viz.:—

20 24-pounders
6 10-inch mortars
6 8-inch mortars
6 5⅘-inch mortars

with ammunition for two days.

His Royal Highness asked about artillerymen, but was not urgent on that score. It however gave me the opportunity to propose that a detachment of forty or fifty British artillerymen should remain in the park for the purpose of fitting out the guns, &c., previous to being sent to the batteries, and also for filling cartridges, which will better enable me to regulate the consumption of powder. This proposal met the entire concurrence of the Prince, and was particularly desired by the Prussian commandant of artillery.

Every arrangement shall be made for keeping up the supply of ammunition, and I will do myself the honour of reporting to your Grace my progress as well as that of the operation.

I have the honour to be, with great respect,
Your most obedient servant,
A. DICKSON.

The Duc d'Otrante to the King of France.

Extract.

7 Juillet, 1815.

Ce n'est pas Votre Majesté que l'on redoute : elle a vu pendant onze mois que la confiance dans sa modération et dans sa justice soutenait les Français au milieu des craintes que leur inspiraient les entreprises d'une partie de sa Cour.

Tout le monde sait que ce ne sont ni les lumières ni l'expérience qui manquent à Votre Majesté ; elle connaît la France et son siècle ; elle connaît le pouvoir de l'opinion ; mais sa bonté lui a trop souvent fait écouter les prétentions de ceux qui l'ont suivie dans l'adversité. Dès lors il y a eu deux peuples en France. Il était pénible, sans doute, à Votre Majesté d'avoir sans cesse à repousser ces prétentions par des actes de sa volonté : combien de fois elle a dû regretter de ne pouvoir leur opposer des lois nationales !

Si le même système se reproduit, et que, tirant tous ses pouvoirs de l'hérédité, Votre Majesté ne reconnaisse aucun des droits des peuples autres que ceux qui leur viennent des concessions du trône, la France, comme la première fois, sera incertaine dans ses devoirs; elle aura à hésiter entre son amour pour la patrie et son amour pour le Prince, entre son penchant et ses lumières. Son obéissance n'aura d'autre base que sa confiance personnelle dans Votre Majesté; et si cette confiance suffit pour maintenir le respect, ce n'est pas du moins ainsi que les dynasties s'affermissent et qu'on en écarte tous les dangers.

Sire, Votre Majesté a reconnu que ceux qui entraînaient le pouvoir au delà de ses limites sont peu propres à le soutenir quand il est ébranlé; que l'autorité se perd elle-même dans le combat continuel qui la force de rétrograder dans ses mesures; que moins on laisse de droits à un peuple plus sa juste défiance le porte à conserver ceux qu'on ne peut lui disputer, et que c'est toujours ainsi que l'amour s'affaiblit, et que les révolutions se préparent.

Nous vous en conjurons, Sire, daigner cette fois ne consulter que votre propre justice et vos lumières; croyez que le peuple Français met aujourd'hui à sa liberté autant d'importance qu'à sa propre vie: il ne se croira jamais libre s'il n'y a pas entre les pouvoirs des droits également inviolables. N'avions nous pas sous votre dynastie des états-généraux qui étaient indépendants du monarque?

Sire, votre sagesse ne peut attendre les événemens fâcheux pour faire des concessions; c'est alors qu'elles seraient nuisibles à votre intérêt, et peut-être même plus étendues.

Aujourd'hui les concessions rapprochent les esprits, pacifient et donnent de la force à l'autorité Royale; plus tard, les concessions prouveraient sa faiblesse: c'est le désordre qui les arracherait; les esprits resteraient aigris.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Downing Street, 7th July, 1815.

Your Grace will receive a separate despatch on the subject of the 12th Article of the Convention. I do not think that it can be construed by any one in the way in which the apprehensions of some induce them to construe it, as binding the King to an act of unqualified indemnity towards the greatest traitors. We are all so convinced that some examples must be made, that many will not allow themselves to judge of the 12th Article but in the way which would preclude the King from any such exercise of his authority; and it may be as well that we should take the earliest opportunity of stating and placing on record our understanding of the Article, in case any persons in France should attempt to give this construction to it.

I am, my dear Lord, yours very sincerely,

BATHURST.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, War Department, 7th July, 1815.

Although your Grace has stated distinctly that the convention entered into by you and Marshal Prince Blücher on the one hand and certain

French authorities on the other, upon the 3rd instant, while it decided all the military questions, had touched nothing political; and although it cannot be imagined that in a convention negotiated with these authorities by Prince Blücher and your Grace you would enter into any engagement whereby it should be presumed that His Most Christian Majesty was absolutely precluded from the just exercise of his authority in bringing to condign punishment such of his subjects as had by their treasonable machinations and unprovoked rebellion forfeited all claim to His Majesty's clemency and forbearance, yet, in order that no doubt should be entertained as to the sense in which this Article is considered by the Prince Regent, in conveying his entire approbation of the Convention, I am commanded to state that His Royal Highness deems the 12th Article of it to be binding only on the conduct of the British and Prussian commanders and the commanders of such of the Allies as may become parties to the present Convention by their ratification of it.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

Earl Cathcart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR LORD, Head Quarters, Void, 7th July, 1815.

I have again to offer my warmest congratulations on your success, and the glorious manner in which all your operations have been conducted, which, while it has raised the reputation of His Majesty's arms to an unexampled pitch of renown, has, I trust, been the instrument of restoring peace and tranquillity to Europe.

These armies are advancing as expeditiously as it is possible for the men to move. Barclay de Tolly at St. Mihiel. This column of Russian troops at Void. The Austrian reserve at Neufchâteau. Colloredo's corps at Héricourt. Prince of Wurtemberg on the march to follow; the reserve being relieved in the blockade of Strasburg by Prince Hohenzollern. You will see by the enclosed letter that the Sovereigns are likely to go forward when escorts are provided.

Ever, my dear Lord, most faithfully yours,

CATHCART.

Earl Cathcart to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, Head Quarters, Void, 7th July, 1815.

General Pozzo di Borgo's courier, with the report of the surrender of Paris, met the Allied Sovereigns on the march from Nancy to this village this morning; and I have on my arrival here been honoured by your Grace's note of the 4th inst., covering a copy of your despatch to His Majesty's Secretary of State, for the information of the Emperor of Russia.

The Emperor received this news with the greatest joy, and did not fail to express himself in the strongest terms of congratulation and applause.

The Emperor of Russia and the other Sovereigns will probably proceed to Paris more expeditiously than troops can march; and to render this practicable and safe, orders will forthwith move to Field Marshals Barclay de Tolly and Wrede to station cavalry at all the stages from hence to Meaux, and a request has been made to me on the part of the Emperor to propose to your Grace to furnish detachments from Meaux by Claye and Bondy to Paris, and to continue them for the passage of all their Majesties.

I will write again as soon as I have seen the Emperor on the subject of your Grace's despatch; but I must close this to go with the letters sent to Marshals Barclay and Wrede.

The Emperor's quarters move to Ligny to-morrow.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and regard, my Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,

CATHCART.

The Commissioners appointed to demand the Evacuation of Vincennes to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington and Prince Blücher.

Paris, ce 7 Juillet, 1815.

Chargé de demander aux Commissaires Français nommés pour l'exécution de ce convention l'évacuation de la place de Vincennes comme appartenante à la ville de Paris, ils ont répondus que cette évacuation ne pouvait avoir lieu, puisque la place de Vincennes devait être regardée comme une place forte, tout à fait séparée de la ville de Paris, dont la garnison n'a point fait partie de l'armée Française sous les murs de Paris.

La décision de cette question se trouve par conséquent être du ressort de la commission qui a rédigé la convention.

Lorsque nous avons demandé aux Commissaires Français si des troupes ou du matériel de l'armée Française comprise par la convention ont été dirigés sur Vincennes, ils ont répondu, qu'à l'égard du matériel ils ne pouvaient rien dire de positif; à l'égard des troupes, le Général Corbineau a positivement assuré que rien n'avait été jeté dans la place.

R. TORRENS, Lieut.-Colonel.
DE PHUEL, Colonel.

Private Intelligence from Paris.

Paris, 7th July, 1815.

I arrived at Boulogne on the 28th of June in the evening, and met there Count Otto, with his Secretary. The Count was anxious to ascertain the prevailing opinion in England with regard to French affairs. In a private conversation with me, which took place at his request, he assured me that Buonaparte was on the point of embarking for America. Lucien Buonaparte had been with Count Otto on the morning of the same day, arriving from Paris, but had set off again immediately; I could not learn for what place. The Count gave me a letter for Baron Bignon, charged, ad interim, with the portfolio of Foreign Affairs.

On the 30th I arrived at Moiselles, six leagues from hence, and was detained there till the 5th of July, not being able to obtain horses to proceed with, on account of the military operations carrying on before Paris. My accidental presence at that village saved it from pillage by the Prussian light troops, whose conduct makes them detested and dreaded throughout the country. At day-break on the 5th I passed the British outposts, in consequence of a permission from General Hill. At 7 o'clock I reached this city.

During the whole day troops were defiling, and cried "Vive l'Empereur!" as they passed along the Boulevard.

There had been some disturbances during the night preceding, but of no consequence. A great number of the shops even now remain shut.

Buonaparte, before his departure, had a long conversation with M. Bonpland, the travelling companion of Alexander Humboldt in South America, and tried much to prevail on him to go with him.

Since my arrival here I have seen a great many persons—Peers, members of the Lower House, gentlemen in office, citizens of all descriptions: I have also found two of my former acquaintances, who have watched and followed the late events, and observed the state of the public mind, with the most careful attention. It seems to be generally admitted that the Bourbons could not have maintained themselves above a few weeks longer, even if Buonaparte had not made his appearance in the month of March last. Several parties were at work to effect their overthrow, and took up Buonaparte to effect that common purpose; but, as he soon showed a disposition to act in his old overbearing and despotic manner, a great many forsook him immediately, and wished that he could be disposed of also.

There are two opinions with regard to the late battles, which at once opened and terminated the campaign. Those who still adhere to Buonaparte, or at least feel regret on his subject, would ascribe all his disasters to treason. They go so far as to say that Fouché made him lose the battle of the 18th; that already on the 16th an attempt was made to disconcert the troops by false alarms, but failed, because made in the day-time; that it was successfully repeated on the 18th in the evening; that Ney himself, by traitorous and unsupported movements, contributed to the fatal result, &c. They go so far as to say that Fouché was, and remains, sold to Louis XVIII.

It is more generally, and, no doubt, more correctly believed, that Buonaparte's discomfiture must be ascribed to his own faults, and to the superior conduct of the British Commander; that the defects of Buonaparte's intellectual organisation, of which there were always some symptoms, had of late much increased; that his impetuosity, his obstinacy, his belief in fate, on this occasion hurried him on to precipitate and ill concerted manœuvres, of which the Duke of Wellington had so well known to take advantage. But it can also not be denied that Fouché's report of the internal situation of France was written with a view to Buonaparte's dethronement, should he be beat, and that his defeat was expected. Buonaparte returned to Paris with an intention to dissolve the Chambers, and to pursue the war to the last extremity, but found himself too weak to effect his purpose, and was forced to abdicate.

With regard to the important concerns of the day, I have not found one sensible man yet who does not consider the reinstatement of the Bourbons, said to be on the point of taking place, as the certain signal for civil war and destruction. Their extreme inefficiency is known. Their passions and inimical disposition with regard to liberal ideas and forms of government must have much increased. At Marseilles nearly 300 persons have already been massacred at their own houses by the Royal party. In the proclamation of Louis XVIII. it is declared that the principal ones of the late actors on the political theatre will be prosecuted. On the other hand a powerful army is assembling behind the Loire. It will be large enough to provide for its own support. It may cut off, particularly with regard to meat, the principal supplies of Paris. Carnot will go with it. All who have committed themselves in the recent occurrences will there take refuge. It seems inevitable that the nation should not be lost, as the expression here is, between the white and red bonnets.

There can be no doubt that Louis XVIII. must be speedily overthrown unless foreign armies remain to fight his battles. Will they do so? How and when would this end?

The Bourbons have in their favour neither the greater nor the better part of the nation. Marseilles alone is decidedly on their side. All other towns, even Bordeaux, are at least divided, like Paris itself. The pretended popular enthusiasm in the towns Louis passed through is little more than the noise of the idle, or the outcry of those who have no opinion, and are always ready, particularly here in France, to do what suits the moment. The rich, chiefly the great merchants, are with them; still more the priests; few of the middle classes and the poor; none, almost, of the military and the learned. They return under the most invidious circumstances; but Talleyrand preaches the doctrine of legitimacy, and they have for the moment the support of an enormous foreign army.

On the other hand, the Chambers conceive that they have no authority to choose a Sovereign; and the last article of the "Acte Additionnelle," pronouncing against the re-establishment of the Bourbons, though ratified by eight millions of signatures, will be considered of no weight. Those also who would prefer the Duke of Orleans, though a large majority, in and out of the two Chambers, dare not declare themselves, for fear of becoming objects of persecution and vengeance.

Thus the public welfare seems to be in a deplorable way, unless indeed the Allied Powers, instead of passing over Louis XVIII. to the French nation, and suffering him to reinstate himself under their wings as he seems disposed to do, without any further ceremony, should go so far as to declare that they could not consider France and Europe settled if the sense of the French nation with regard to its future Sovereign had not been freely taken, and then recommend the proper measures to be adopted for that purpose.

Whether the Allied Powers will think it advisable to act in this manner is the great question. Great Britain in particular, it is feared, will be averse to it, as she may conceive to have an interest that a rival nation should not be well governed. Yet she may have a greater, and particularly a more immediate, more urgent interest in the permanent settlement, the general tranquillity, and the prosperity of Europe. It cannot be well imagined how Germany can disarm, or the Continental governments retrieve a little their distressed circumstances, while France remains disturbed.

The necessity of a Sovereign who should come a new man to a new state of things, and allow all to feel under him, and with him, permanently safe, is so generally felt, that even Eugène Beauharnois, who would be much liked, even the King of Saxony, the Archduke Charles, have been mentioned. The Duke of Orleans is most generally looked to. No man in his sound senses, particularly when here on the spot, can possibly call in question that the forcible reinstatement of the Bourbons and a new long train of trouble and bloody scenes are inseparable.

It would require a great man, greatly surrounded, to maintain himself under circumstances like those in which Louis XVIII. will be placed. A weak, broken, and superstitious man like him, and with such followers as his, can stand no chance.

It seems of vast importance that the work of the Allied Sovereigns should not be half done or badly done this time. If passion prevails instead of reason, there is ground to fear they will too late discover that they have waded through blood and treasure to little or no purpose.

The above is a statement of the principal facts which have come hitherto under my notice, and of the impressions they made on me. These impressions have been strengthened by a number of others, too trifling to be detailed, but of much weight en masse.

E. B.

8th July, in the morning.

P.S.—Yesterday in the afternoon Fouché mentioned to a gentleman of my acquaintance in private conversation, that the Allied Powers had resolved to replace Louis XVIII. on the throne by main force. In the evening the same was announced by the provisory government to the Lower Chamber.

The Lower Chamber has resolved not to yield except to physical force actually employed against it.

All the officers of the national guard have pledged to each other their word of honour never to put down the national colours.

Marshal Macdonald has yesterday solicited, has implored Louis XVIII. to adopt the national colours, as he could not answer for the consequences if he did not. The King refused.

Accounts from Marseilles state that the anti-Royalists in their turn got the upper hand, and murdered many of their opponents.

Several regiments under way for Paris, and coming from Lyons, have joined those assembling on the Loire. A great many papers have been taken from the public offices and sent off. The archives of the Legion of Honour have been removed entirely. The last sou has been taken out of the treasury. The despatch of business will experience the greatest difficulties.

The accounts of the endeavours of the British government to intercept Buonaparte have been so generally spread, and he has travelled so slowly, that it is thought by many not improbable he will at once appear with the army on the Loire.

On the principal public squares, before the Tuileries, in the gardens adjoining the Legislative Palace, &c., foreign troops are stationed. Cannon are placed on the bridges, and at the corners of the main streets.

Attempts have been made by some "de la Maison du Roi" to make the crowd exclaim "Vivent les Bourbons!" Only solitary voices joined. Some cried "A bas les Bourbons!" It was on the point of coming to blows. The gendarmes interfered, and the white cockades had to quit the ground.

Louis XVIII. is expected to make his entrance to-day or to-morrow. Only hired people and old women will endeavour to set up an enthusiastic reception.

Even decided Bourbonists, even some of the principal bankers, have expressed their astonishment at, and profess to be scandalized by, the measures taken and about to be adopted.

So inconceivable seems this enormous aberration from what would have appeared to be the dictates of political wisdom under similar circumstances, that many suppose Fouché to play even now a deep game: they imagine he has availed himself of the consummate folly of the one, and of the exaltation of success of the other, to involve the Bourbons in certain and final destruction.

In February last some of the most distinguished members of the National Institute were to be expelled that body for having voted for the death of Louis XVI. Now Fouché is made minister of Louis XVIII. Fouché and Talleyrand embraced each other at St. Cloud.

The indignation of all respectable men is inconceivable. Bloody scenes are expected to take place on this very day. Tranquillity may, however, be preserved as long as the foreign bayonets, at the points of which Louis takes possession of his capital, remain here. What will become of him after they have withdrawn?

The most improbable things sometimes occur; but all political calculations must be deemed nonsense, if, in this instance, the conduct of the Bourbons and their protectors does not bring on events the most sad and deplorable.

E. B.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Earl of Liverpool.

MY DEAR LIVERPOOL, Paris, 7th July, 1815.

I send you such private letters as I have received.

There is a good deal of fermentation here, but it will subside.

I consider the King's decision to employ Fouché a great point gained, and his means of acting to have been essential to His Majesty's restoration.

The army are gone off in the worst temper: including some Fédérés and National Guards, they carried with them between 70,000 and 80,000 men. You may estimate the efficient troops at 60,000, of which near 15,000 cavalry.

I understand the Assembly of Representatives is now sitting (12 at night), with closed doors, upon the alternative of dispersing or retiring to Orleans. There is a desperate party, but it must end in smoke. The difficulty is not their force, but the absence of force on the King's side.

I fear all prospect of Buonaparte's retreat is now reduced to the chance of capture at sea.

The town is quiet.

I am, dear Liverpool, ever yours,

CASTLEREAGH.

I never saw the Duke in better health or spirits.

The impression towards him and his army is indescribable. The conduct of our troops has been as exemplary on the march as in the field.

The Earl of Liverpool to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY DEAR CASTLEREAGH, Fife House, 7th July, 1815.

The Duke of Wellington's letters of the 2nd and 4th, enclosing the Capitulation of Paris, were received last night. I confess I am glad that Paris has been taken by a military convention rather than by a capitulation to the King, as it will leave us more unfettered as to the conditions on which peace is to be restored.

I hope the 12th Article of the Convention has reference only to the foreign military authorities, and is not considered as granting an indemnity to all persons in Paris, whatever their offences may have been against the legal national tribunals, either civil or military.

It is in vain to conceal from ourselves that the situation of the King will become very critical as soon as the Allied armies are withdrawn from France; and it is even doubtful how far his authority can be established, under present circumstances, on such a footing as to secure it against another revolution. There are three questions which occur to every person one meets: What is to become of Buonaparte? What course is to be adopted with respect to those who assisted him in resuming his authority? What is to be done with the French armies?

If these three points cannot be solved in a satisfactory manner, the country will expect—and justly, I think, expect—further securities for the continuance of peace and an improved frontier; and they will, above all, expect that, having been at so considerable an expense in the renewal of the war, and having wasted so much of the best blood of the country in the operations of it, we should not lose the hold we have now of France until we have brought the arrangements which may be judged necessary to a satisfactory conclusion. I am not insensible to all the difficulties which must arise in settling so many nice and important points; but we never can hope to have another opportunity of negotiating with so much advantage as at the present moment.

I conclude the Emperors and King will come to Paris as soon as they hear of the capitulation. By that time we shall be able to form some judgment of the probable fate of Buonaparte. If he sails from either Rochefort or Cherbourg, we have a good chance of laying hold of him. If we take him, we shall keep him on board ship till the opinion of the Allies has been taken. The most easy course would be to deliver him up to the King of France, who might try him as a rebel; but then we must be quite certain that he would be tried in such a manner as to have no chance of escape. Indeed, nothing could really be necessary but the identification of his person. I have had some conversation with the civilians, and they are of opinion that this would be in all respects the least objectionable course. We should have a right to consider him as a French prisoner, and, as such, to give him up to the French government. They think likewise that the King of France would have a clear right to consider him as a rebel, and to deal with him accordingly.

If it is asked why so much importance is attached to one man, it is because I am thoroughly convinced that no other man can play the same part as he has done, and is likely to play again if he should be allowed the opportunity. Independent of his personal qualities, he has the advantage of fourteen years' enjoyment of supreme power. This has given him a title which belongs to no other man, and which it would be very difficult for any one to acquire.

I need hardly remind you of the slave trade. I should hope Louis XVIII. can have no difficulty in confirming, in some way or other, what has been done by Buonaparte on this subject. He owes it to us, who will have restored him to his throne; and, indeed, if he does not meet our wishes on this point, I do not see how we ever shall be able to satisfy the country of the sincerity of our exertions.

Believe me, &c.,

LIVERPOOL.

Earl Bathurst to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD, War Department, London, 7th July, 1815.

In the course of last night I had the honour to receive your Grace's despatches (as noted in the margin *) as well as the despatch No. 37, of which Lord Arthur Hill was the bearer.

I am commanded by the Prince Regent to convey to you his entire approbation of your Grace's conduct in all the proceedings, political as well as military, which have been adopted by your Grace since the memorable battle of Waterloo.

His Royal Highness has seen with the highest satisfaction the judgment with which you have essentially improved, by actively following up, the advantages to be derived from that most important achievement.

You have so pressed upon the enemy as never to leave him time to rally; you have so met the various political approaches which have been made to you as to baffle the designs of those who made them; and you have taken without the loss of a single British soldier the proud capital of the enemy, at the expiration of little more than a fortnight after the commencement of hostilities which were peculiarly directed against the army placed under your Grace's command.

I will not waste your Grace's time by enlarging on all the brilliant glory and solid advantages which this country cannot fail of deriving from the auspicious termination of your march upon Paris; and shall conclude with begging you to convey to the officers and men under your Grace's command the satisfaction which His Royal Highness experiences in hearing of the discipline observed by the army during their advance into France.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,

BATHURST.

LETTERS BY GENERAL DUMOURIEZ ON THE CONDUCT OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1815.

General Dumouriez to

MONSIEUR ET CHER AMI, Le 28 Mars, 1815.

Je reçois dans le moment vos deux billets d'hier, 27; et comme je ne veux pas manquer notre rendezvous, je me rendrais chez vous Lundi, à l'heure ordinaire. En attendant, voici le premier numéro ou paragraphe du mémoire militaire auquel je travaille sur cette guerre, malheureusement inévitable et décisive. Je vous prie de le faire passer tout de suite à Lord Castlereagh, comme Ministre de l'Angleterre qui doit diriger une grande guerre, dont elle paye les principaux frais, et comme ayant par son excellente conduite et son habileté à Vienne mérité d'avoir l'influence prépondérante sur les Souverains que l'Angleterre doit faire agir.

Ce premier numéro n'est que l'introduction du plan de campagne que d'après mon expérience je crois que les Puissances pourront adopter. Je vous porterai Lundi le second numéro, qui sera l'examen détaillé des différentes branches d'opérations à commencer par le Nord. Je réserverai pour le dernier les ressources du Roi en France, et les moyens de sa coopération, dans laquelle la déclaration du 13 Mars annonce que son rétablissement est l'objet principal. Tout ce que nous apprenons de France est vague. Le Duc de Feltre lui-même n'a pu donner que des aperçus conjecturels, puisque les défections continuent tous les jours avec une progression effrayante. Si comme en 1805 Lord Castlereagh voulait me faire passer bientôt sur le Continent, je connaîtrais très vite le fonds des ressources du parti Royaliste, et je lui en rendrais compte de manière à ce qu'il ne fut pas trompé, étant assez avant dans la confiance du Roi des Pays-Bas, et lié intimement avec Wellington. Je ne désirerais y aller que comme simple voyageur. Parlez en avec Lord Castlereagh, qui fait cas de ma pénétration et de mon expérience.

Nous en parlerons Lundi matin, et vous me direz ce qu'il en pense.

No. 1.

La France est affligée de deux maladies mortelles à la fois, l'une physique, l'autre morale. On ne peut atteindre au foyer de la dernière qu'après avoir guéri la première par les opérations les plus violentes de la chirurgie, par l'amputation du membre gangrené, qui est son armée. Cette armée contient à elle seule tous les vices des Gardes Prétoriennes, des Janissaires, et des Strelitz.

' Sous un Roi pacifique elle s'énerverait dans la mollesse, et finirait par n'être dangereuse qu'à lui-même, et au repos intérieur de son gouvernement. Si ce Roi pacifique suivait constamment un système profond en politique et énergique en exécution, il réussirait en peu d'années à changer sans secousse l'esprit dangereux de cette armée, à la purger des individus qui peuvent la soulever contre l'autorité légale, à la faire rentrer dans l'ordre des citoyens, à la rendre, ce qu'elle devrait être, l'instrument de la force publique, au lieu d'être elle-même un corps oppressif plus puissant que le Souverain et la nation réunis ensemble. On a fait la triste épreuve d'opposer la force civique à la force militaire. Les Gardes Nationales se sentant trop faibles pour résister à des vétérans qui ne respirent que le carnage et à la rapine, non seulement n'a présenté aucune résistance au chef de cette armée, mais s'est empressée de se joindre à elle pour adorer le chef redoutable aux crimes duquel elle s'est identifiée par cette monstrueuse amalgame. Le mot de ralliement qui opère cette fusion est "la gloire." Le peuple Français, léger, vain, turbulent, croit tous ses excès légitimés par la gloire nationale. La France entière est devenue un camp, le peuple Français entier est devenu une armée, dont l'armée de ligne est la Garde Prétorienne.

Sous un Empereur doué du génie et des talents les plus dangereux, d'une ambition sans bornes, d'une âme dure et inflexible, tiré du sein de cette Garde Prétorienne de quatre cent mille hommes, toujours recrutée, de gré ou de force, par une immense population, aveuglée et exaltée par l'illusion de la gloire, la France est l'ennemie irréconciliable de toute l'Europe. Tant que cet Empereur et cette armée existeront, il n'y a plus aucune sûreté pour les Souverains légitimes, pour les peuples, pour le pacte social.

Il ne s'agit plus de délibérer si l'on fera la guerre en France, mais comment on l'y conduira, car il n'y a plus de paix à espérer de ce conquérant, parceque si, par impossible, son insatiabilité de conquêtes était assouvie, il serait forcé pour sa propre sûreté de suivre l'impulsion qu'il a lui-même donné à cette immense Garde Prétorienne, et de la conduire de nouveau à "la gloire," c'est-à-dire à la conquête et au pillage, pour sauver la France et sa propre dynastie de la fureur de leurs armes.

La partie civile de la nation Française est nulle. Sa force militaire, représentée par la Garde Nationale, n'ayant ni le courage, ni l'ensemble, ni la vertu de résister à l'armée de ligne, a déguisé sa pusillanimité sous les mots illusoires de liberté, patriotisme, gloire nationale. Il existe sans doute individuellement encore en France de l'honneur, du bon sens, de la probité, enfin des vertus morales. Mais quand dix mois de règne du modéré, du vertueux Louis XVIII. n'ont pas pu réunir une force suffisante pour arrêter un chef audacieux, pour défendre au moins quelque tems la capitale; quand, au contraire, toute la nation, enivrée par les cris magiques de "Grand Napoléon," "Grande Nation," "Gloire," "Victoires," "Vengeance," ne respire que la guerre, il ne reste aux Puissances coalisées d'autre ressource pour éviter leur propre ruine qu'une invasion subite sur tous les points de la France où on pourra atteindre, profiter de la confusion inséparable d'une pareille révolution, protéger les restes éparpillés du parti des Bourbons avant qu'il soit entièrement éteint, sauver quelques places de la Flandres, surtout Douai, grand dépôt d'artillerie, Lille, et Dunkerque, et en infligeant de nouveau les calamités de la guerre sur cette nation coupable et versatile, la guérir de son fol enthousiasme pour ce fléau de l'humanité et pour ses féroces satellites, ramener les Gardes Nationales au vrai patriotisme, leur inspirer de la confiance dans leur propre force, qui, autorisée par les loix constitutionnelles, dirigée par le gouvernement légitime, encouragée par le voisinage et l'appui des grandes armées alliées, est en état d'anéantir cette armée, dont une partie, égarée plus que coupable, reviendra sous les drapeaux de son Roi à la voix de ses concitoyens, et désarmera ou anéantira le nombre inférieur des brigands qui resteront attachés à la fortune de l'aventurier, mis ainsi qu'eux hors de la loi, et qui redeviendra sous peu l'objet de l'horreur publique.

Le retour au bon sens et à l'honneur sera le premier pas pour la guérison de la maladie morale de la France, qui intéresse toute l'Europe, parcequ'elle est contagieuse. C'est du succès de la guerre qui va commencer que dépend le sort de l'Europe. La déclaration des Puissances du 13 Mars en est le début. Il s'agit à présent de discuter les différentes branches de cette guerre pour la rendre grosse et courte.

Si on ne réussissait pas par une invasion prompte et générale à concentrer la guerre en France, si elle s'étendait au dehors, si elle se prolongeait, la grande confédération se diviserait nécessairement, soit par des aberrations politiques, soit par épuisement, soit par des embarras suscités, à plusieurs puissances chez eux-mêmes.

MON CHER ET RESPECTABLE AMI, Le 30 Mars, 1815.

Voici le second numéro de mon mémoire sur la guerre de France, que je vous prie de donner à Lord Castlereagh. Je vous enverrai, à la fin de la semaine, le troisième numéro, qui traitera, ainsi que les suivants, les opérations militaires à commencer par le Nord. Je me présenterai chez vous Lundi matin, et je vous parlerai aussi des deux affaires de St. Martin et de Pierreville, qui m'intéressent fort, et qui m'inquiéteraient si vous n'étiez pas là pour les décider. Parkinson m'a dit que vous vous en occupiez.

No. 2.

Cette guerre est ad internecionem. Les Puissances liées par la déclaration du 13 Mars ne peuvent plus ni retirer ni retarder la sentence d'outlawry qu'ils ont lancée contre Buonaparte, qui les punirait les uns après les autres s'ils se séparaient. J'espère que les deux Empereurs et le Roi de Prusse se réuniront sur le champ à Francfort pour surveiller et diriger les opérations des armées. C'est ce que notre Ministre ne manquera sûrement pas de leur suggérer.*

Cette guerre se divise naturellement en deux parties, par terre et par mer.

La partie navale regarde l'Angleterre seule, et c'est essentiellement dans la Méditerranée qu'elle doit en supporter le poids, parceque sa tâche est de détruire la flotte de Buonaparte, ou dans Toulon ou en mer, s'il ose l'en faire sortir. Qu'on n'oublie pas qu'elle est armée dès à présent.

Certainement le gouvernement aura chargé son Amiral de s'emparer sur le champ de l'Ile d'Elbe, dont toute l'Europe a méconnu l'importance lorsque les Souverains en ont donné la propriété à Buonaparte. Il faut se dépêcher de tirer de ses mains cette station navale et celle de l'Ile de Corse. L'Ile d'Elbe doit être occupée par l'Angleterre, au moins pendant toute cette guerre. Si l'esprit d'insurrection éclatait en Italie, si Buonaparte y trouvait un allié, il faudrait joindre à cette possession celle de Porto-Ercole et de l'état degli Presidi, à titre de confiscation sur la famille Napoléon ; mais en effet, pour couper l'Italie par son centre, pour arrêter le progrès de l'incendie. Les troupes Anglaises, qui sont assez déplacées à Gênes, sont toutes portées dans la Méditerranée pour former la garnison de l'Ile d'Elbe.

* Le Roi de France peut se rendre aussi à Francfort ; c'est sa vraie place ; mais point aux armées, où son physique ne serait qu'un impedimentum belli, et ne représenterait pas la nation Française.

Il est aussi nécessaire d'enlever le plutôt possible à Buonaparte la Corse, et de la faire occuper par les troupes du Roi de Sardaigne, à qui elle convient, tant pour assurer sa possession de l'Ile de Sardaigne que pour tenir en bride le peuple de Gênes, et pour oter à la marine de Toulon cette seconde station navale, et la donner à la marine Anglaise. Ainsi il paraîtrait important sous la protection et à l'aide de l'escadre de la Méditerranée de transporter le plutôt possible en Corse une armée de 10 à 12 mille Piémontais pour occuper cette île pendant toute cette guerre, et en assurer, s'il est possible, la propriété au Roi de Sardaigne, lorsque le Congrès arrangera le sort définitif de l'Italie. C'est le moment de séparer à jamais l'Ile de Corse de la France, qui n'en a pas besoin, et qui est pour elle un embarras depuis plus de quarante ans. La Corse ne peut être annexée sans inconvénient ni à la France, ni au royaume de Naples, ni au royaume d'Italie, ni à l'Espagne, ni à l'Angleterre : elle ne convient réellement qu'au Roi de Sardaigne pour assurer la tranquillité de la portion méridionale du Continent.

La révolution qui ramène si rapidement Buonaparte sur le trône doit produire une très forte sensation en Amérique. Si elle avait eu lieu deux mois avant la signature du Traité de Gand, ou si Madison avait pu la prévoir si prochaine et aussi complette, la guerre d'Amérique aurait certainement été continuée par les Etats Unis ; et nos deux défaites de Champlain et New Orleans enflant leur présomption, les auraient rendus intraitables. Les événements actuels justifient pleinement la sagesse du gouvernement Anglais dans le parti qu'elle a pris de terminer cette guerre.

Mais dans les circonstances présentes l'esprit malveillant du parti qui avait été poussé à cette guerre par l'espoir de l'appui de Buonaparte peut engager le gouvernement des Etats Unis à relever cette guerre par le moyen des chicanes qui suivent toujours les explications et les arrangements définitifs d'un traité de paix. Il n'est donc pas douteux que notre Ministre aura jugé d'avance qu'il doit conserver un état militaire respectable en Canada pendant toute la durée de la guerre de France, qu'il est déterminé à ne pas dégarnir de troupes cette contrée et ces mers des vaisseaux, et qu'il surveillera avec la plus grande attention la conduite et les sentiments des Américains.

Il lui reste disponible dans les Antilles et dans le Golfe de Mexique la petite armée revenue de la malheureuse expédition de New Orleans, et une escadre suffisante pour reprendre le plutôt possible les îles Françaises de la Martinique et de la Guadeloupe, les garnisoner, et les garder pour le Roi de France, si on parvient à le rétablir, ou à en disposer d'après les arrangements définitifs de la paix générale.

Il n'est pas douteux non plus que le gouvernement Anglais ne prenne les mêmes mesures à l'égard des établissements Français de l'Afrique, surtout pour l'île de Goree, qu'il est à désirer que l'Angleterre puisse conserver, comme indemnité, en toute propriété, par les arrangements définitifs de la paix générale, pour assurer l'abolition de la traite des Noirs. De même pour les possessions Françaises dans les mers de l'Inde.

No. 3.

Guerre de Terre—Invasion en France.

Cette guerre, si elle est conduite avec beaucoup de troupes, de bonne foi, et de promptitude, doit déterminer en une seule campagne le sort de la France et de l'Europe entière. Il ne faut pas se dissimuler que Buonaparte réunira et concentrera de beaucoup plus grands moyens que ceux qu'il a pu opposer en 1814. Trois cent mille prisonniers, la plupart vétérans, qui sont rentrés en France, le mettent en état d'entrer en campagne à la tête d'au moins 400 mille hommes de troupes de ligne, perpétuellement recrutés par toute la nation en délire. Ainsi il peut ouvrir la campagne, soit offensive, soit défensive, avec trois grandes armées presque égales au trois grandes armées qui doivent chercher à pénétrer en France par le Nord, l'Est, et le Sud; car tout l'Ouest depuis Bayonne jusqu'à Brest, et le Nord-Ouest depuis Brest jusqu'à Dunkerque, ne sont susceptibles d'aucune invasion importante. On ne peut d'abord aucune diversion inquiétante contre Buonaparte que lorsque les Alliés auront déjà pénétré par la ligne de l'Est, et que les peuples, effrayés de les voir déjà au delà des places fortes, soit en forçant quelques-unes, soit en les dépassant comme en 1814, se désenivreront de leur frénésie guerrière, abandonneront l'un après l'autre la cause de leur sanguinaire idole, et, animés par le désespoir, se prononceront par des insurrections partielles, qui réduiront le monstre à ses seuls satellites; les rangs de ces bandits s'éclairciront de jour en jour par le fer, la famine, et la désertion, lorsque les ressources pécuniaires et de subsistance s'épuiseront, plus ou moins vite, selon le plus ou moins de rapidité et de vigueur des progrès des armées alliées.

Je partagerai les mouvements des Alliés comme j'ai déjà fait ceux des campagnes de 1812, 1813, et 1814, en Droite, Centre, et Gauche. J'examinerai ensuite à part les mouvements du Sud par l'Italie, sous le titre Armée d'Italie; ceux du Sud-Ouest par les Pyrénées, sous le titre Armée du Sud-Ouest; ceux de l'Ouest et du Nord-Ouest, ou Côtes de la Manche, sous le titre Diversions et Mouvements Intérieures.

Les opérations sur la ligne de l'Est, depuis Dunkerque jusqu'à la Suisse et la Savoye inclusivement, se partageront naturellement, comme en 1814, en trois divisions, ou grandes armées, Droite, Centre, et Gauche, que je vais détailler séparement dans le même ordre.

Armée de Droite.

Cette armée, composée de 40 mille Russes, de 40 mille Prussiens, de 20 mille Hessois et autres contingents du Nord, de toutes les forces du Souverain des Pays-Bas, et de l'armée Anglaise, doit présenter en ce moment une masse de 100 mille hommes, et dans deux mois presque le double, qui, sous les ordres du grand Wellington, auront à remplir la tâche la plus difficile, mais aussi la plus importante et la plus décisive, de cette guerre.

Wellington aura à traverser une triple ligne de places fortes pour pouvoir pénétrer par les départements du Pas de Calais et de la Somme jusqu'à Paris. Son invasion se subdivisera elle-même en deux ou trois corps d'armée, tendans tous à la même direction, dont il arrangera les mouvements sur la force, les points de rassemblement, et les combinaisons d'attaque et de défense de l'armée Française que lui opposera Buonaparte.

Il sera peut-être forcé de débuter par quelques siéges. Nous savons positivement, qu'excepté Lille, les autres places fortes du département du Nord et du Pas de Calais sont à présent délabrées et hors d'état de défense, notamment le Quesnoi, Avesnes, et Landrecies; que même Maubeuge et Valenciennes sont en très mauvais ordre, et mal réparés.

Il semble au premier aperçu que, laissant un corps d'observation chargé de surveiller par Menin et Tournay les troupes Françaises rassemblées dans les places du département du Nord, il serait possible de jeter la plus grande partie de l'Armée du Nord dans la trouée du triangle que forment Maubeuge, Landrecies, et Avesnes, ne s'attachant à prendre que les deux dernières, pour pénétrer de là dans le plat pays du département de l'Aisne et de celui de la Somme.

Mais il est possible que cet habile Général préfère et trouve plus facile de faire son invasion par la Basse Flandres, laissant Lille à sa gauche, partant de Menin pour entrer par le département de Calais, où la ligne des places est très faible et en très mauvais état, menaçant par la direction apparente de son invasion Dunkerque, Calais, et St. Omer, se dirigeant ensuite sur le département de la Somme par Amiens, ou sur Calais et Boulogne, et gagnant rapidement la Normandie, s'éloignant ainsi de l'Armée du Centre, et opérant seul avec les ressources en tout genre que lui fournirait cette province riche, qui a été intacte en 1814, avec la communication par mer et l'avantage d'une place d'armes aussi importante que Rouen, qui lui fournirait argent, subsistance, habillement, enfin tous les moyens de maintenir la guerre sans frais, et aux dépens du pays.

Les Normands, plus flegmatiques, plus réfléchis, plus intéressés, moins enthousiastes que les habitans des autres provinces, se détacheraient plus aisement et plus vite de la cause de Buonaparte; et le grand Wellington, dont le caractère inspirerait autant de confiance que son génie répandrait de terreur, pourrait vraisemblablement organiser l'insurrection des Normands, et les employer à sa droite, mais séparement, entre Seine et Loire, pendant qu'il menacerait lui-même Paris entre la Seine et la Somme.

Une armée de 100 mille hommes, commandée par Wellington, maître de la Haute Normandie, occupant dès son arrivée le pays de chicane nommé le Bocage, le Pont de l'Arche, Rouen, le Havre, et Dieppe, recevant par mer des renforts et des munitions de guerre, car les subsistances et l'argent lui seraient abondamment supplées par le pays même, éloignée de Paris seulement de trente lieues, répandant dans cette capitale la consternation et l'esprit d'insurrection, marchant en avant, ou circonscrivant ses mouvements d'après les progrès plus ou moins rapides de l'Armée du Centre, serait la branche de cette guerre la plus décisive, et ce serait encore au gouvernement Anglais, et à cet immortel Général, que l'Europe devrait son salut.

Son armée pourrait être composée des Anglais et Hanovriens, d'un corps des troupes Belges, pour les éloigner de leur pays, de quelques Prussiens ou Hessois, et de 40 mille Russes, ce qui ferait monter sa force au moins à 100 mille hommes, dont un cinquième de cavalerie.

Le Roi des Pays-Bas resterait chargé de la défense de la Belgique, avec sa propre armée, d'à peu près 40 mille hommes, et 60 ou 80 mille Russiens, pouvant même agir offensivement sur le département du Nord, dès que les Français diminueraient leur armée de Flandres et affaibliraient leurs garnisons pour courir d'un côté à la défense de la Normandie contre Wellington, de l'autre à celle des trois départements des Ardennes, de l'Aisne, et de la Manche contre l'Armée du Centre.

On aurait, par ce plan, tourné le département du Nord, hérissé de places fortes, dont la défense opiniâtre pourrait au moins prolonger, et peut-être mettre au hasard, cette campagne d'invasion. Par ce moyen les deux armées du Nord et du Centre, se combinant sagement, se trouveraient peut-être ensemble devant Paris, ayant chacune une supériorité très décidée sur ce que Buonaparte pourrait leur opposer de forces, sur deux points isolés et éloignés d'abord, dont celui de la Normandie serait à peu près imprévu, si le secret était bien gardé et l'opération bien masquée et rapide.

Certainement Buonaparte quitterait tout pour aller défendre la Normandie et en chasser Wellington; mais comme ce cas serait prévu, on dirigerait par mer les contingents Suédois, Anséatiques, etc., pour renforcer successivement son armée, pendant que les armées du Centre, de l'Est, et d'Italie, trouvant moins d'opposition, précipiteraient leur marche sur Paris.

DUMOURIEZ.

Armée du Sud-Ouest.

On ne peut pas faire un grand fonds sur l'Espagne pour une invasion en France, combinée avec celle des Puissances Alliées au Nord, à l'Est et au Sud-Est de la France. Il est inutile d'entrer dans le détail des causes de la faiblesse de ce royaume, épuisé d'armées et d'argent, dont le gouvernement ne jouit pas de la confiance de la nation, et est lui-même inquiet et soupçonneux.

Certainement l'intérêt de l'Espagne dans la révolution qui replace Buonaparte sur le trône de France est bien plus important que celui d'aucune des puissances voisines de cette France si fortement armée, gouvernée par un despote couvert de crimes et de gloire. Le Roi d'Espagne a trop éprouvé personnellement sa perfidie pour croire à toutes les protestations de modération et d'amour de la paix qu'il prodigue dans ce moment-ci pour suspendre la guerre, avoir le tems de réorganiser son armée, diviser les Alliés, et choisir ensuite sa victime.

Quand même son âme de bronze se serait amollie, quand, changeant subitement de caractère, il désirerait sincèrement de changer de conduite, il n'en serait pas le maître. La guerre est l'élément de son armée: cette soldatesque féroce, qu'il a accoutumée à vivre de sang et de pillage, elle l'entraînerait ou le renverserait s'il prétendait devenir un souverain pacifique. Ainsi il n'est pas à présumer qu'aucun des Souverains de l'Europe soit sa dupe.

Mais l'existence de Buonaparte sur un trône n'est aussi dangereuse pour aucun d'eux que pour celui d'Espagne. C'est dans la Péninsule que ses drapeaux ont été le plus flétris, lorsque la constance Espagnole, guidée par le génie de Wellington, a faite fuir sa vile dynastie pour remettre sur le trône la dynastie légitime de ses Rois.

Ferdinand VII. ne peut plus être sûr de sa couronne que lorsque par le concours des autres Souverains et par ses propres efforts il verra la branche aînée de sa vénérable et malheureuse race solidement rétablie sur le trône de France par l'extirpation du monstre qui l'occupe. Il est le plus menacé de tous si Buonaparte se soutient. Isolé au bout de l'Europe, sans soutiens au dedans, sans alliés positifs au dehors, il peut en une campagne voir son royaume en-vahi, le plat Joseph polluer de nouveau son palais, et cette fois ce serait pour toujours, car les circonstances qui l'ont replacé sur son trône ne se représenteraient plus.

Mais son gouvernement est si peu populaire, si faible, si ombrageux, qu'on ne peut en attendre aucun grand effort, malgré l'énergie caractéristique de sa nation. Ces gouvernements faibles ressemblent aux autruches: ils cachent leur tête pour ne pas voir en face le danger, et laissent tout leur corps exposé à l'atteinte du chasseur.

Les Gazettes annoncent que le Roi d'Espagne, en apprenant la nouvelle de la révolution de France, fait ses dispositions pour assembler deux armées de 60 mille hommes chacune sur les Pyrénées. C'est une grande mesure de défensive, et il est à craindre qu'elle ne soit exagérée. Mais cet état de défensive serait très insuffisant et très dispendieux s'il n'en mettait pas en action en France au moins 40 mille d'élite pour coopérer effectivement avec les armées des autres Puissances par une diversion vigoureuse sur les parties du Sud de la France qui sont à sa portée, nommément sur le Roussillon.

En attendant que le moment soit venu d'opérer en France, il paraît convenir à la politique la plus sage de protéger fortement les insurrections qui certainement auront lieu, surtout en Languedoc, en Béarn, en Guyenne, lorsque les armées alliées inonderont la France au Nord, à l'Est, et au Sud-Est. Il semble que Ferdinand VII. peut et doit, même dès à présent, non seulement tolérer, mais autoriser les mouvements des Royalistes Françaises qui à ce moment arriveront pour s'adosser aux Pyrénées, les nourrir, les vêtir, les armer, veiller sur leur sûreté, sur leur organisation, en un mot les préparer d'avance à devenir l'avant-garde de son armée, destinée à relever le parti Royaliste dans les départements du Midi, et en même tems à forcer Buonaparte à s'affaiblir au Nord et à l'Est pour tenir au Midi un gros corps de ses vétérans, pour assurer ces provinces contre l'incendie rapide de l'insurrection, qui sera plus violent et plus prompt dans l'Ouest et le Sud que dans le Nord et l'Est, quand des Princes de la maison de Bourbon y reparoîtront avec la confiance d'être soutenus par l'Italie et l'Espagne.

La Régence de Portugal sera certainement toute prête à donner, sur la demande et avec les moyens de l'Angleterre, un contingent de 20 mille hommes sous les ordres du Maréchal Beresford, soit pour se joindre à l'armée Espagnole des Pyrénées et en former l'aile gauche, menacer Bayonne, ou le dépasser, comme en 1814, par la route de Dax sur la direction de Bordeaux, soit pour être transporté par mer, et employé plus directement et plus utilement sur les côtés de l'Ouest, si l'insurrection Royaliste prend en Guyenne, Saintonge, et Poitou assez de consistance pour y former une armée en faveur de Louis XVIII. Il serait utile en ce cas de joindre au corps d'armée Portugais 2 ou 3 mille Anglais, pour lui donner encore plus de solidité, d'après l'ancienne habitude.

General Dumouriez to

MON CHER ET RESPECTABLE AMI, 5 Avril, 1815.

Voici encore un numéro. Je copie en ce moment le 8me, qui était difficile et délicat à faire: c'est celui des diversions ou mouvements en France. La mesure qu'on a prise d'envoyer Montalembert est très bonne pour savoir au juste l'état des affaires, et sur quoi on peut compter dans l'Ouest; car on ne peut pas se fier aux rapports des émigrés, qui sont toujours exagérés et vagues, et on ne peut pas calculer juste. En tout les insurrections en France sont encore in limbo; elles auront lieu, seront partielles et décousues : ce n'est point aux Puissances étrangères à en fixer l'organisation et la marche ; cela regarde le conseil de Louis XVIII. Mais nous connaissons ce qui environne ce respectable et malheureux Monarque : il est à souhaiter qu'un homme de grande expérience, et accoutumé à voir en grand, paraisse, ne fut ce qu'un moment, près de ce Prince, développer ses vraies ressources en écartant les espérances chimériques et les exagérations ; que ce personnage soit Français, mais indépendant, et qu'il ne soit pas membre de ce conseil et de cette cour, pour pouvoir conserver sur le Roi même l'influence utile qu'il perdrait bien vite s'il en faisait partie ; et qu'enfin il soit l'homme du gouvernement Anglais, puisque c'est ce gouvernement qui doit principalement diriger tous les mouvements de cette guerre, pour la terminer plus vite.

Je vous porterai moi-même demain ou Vendredi matin ce 8me numéro. Quant au 9ème, qui sera une récapitulation ou la conclusion de ce mémoire sur la guerre de France, j'attendrai quelques jours pour l'écrire, pour être encore plus positivement instruit. Vale.

No. 8.

Diversions, Mouvements en France.

On ne peut rien dire que de conjectural sur la possibilité de relever en France le parti du Roi. Les soldats en France sont devenus moins citoyens qu'en tout autre pays, mais ils sont les maîtres. La nation abasourdie d'une révolution aussi extraordinaire n'ose en ce moment ni avoir un sentiment, ni annoncer une opinion. Elle craint une guerre civile, et elle sacrifie à cette crainte un Monarque vertueux qu'elle n'a pas osé défendre. C'est moins le prestige de la gloire de Napoléon qui lui fait crier " Vive l'Empereur !" que la crainte de cette armée terrible, qui ne respire que guerre et pillage, à qui il serait égal de verser le sang de ses concitoyens ou des étrangers.

Mais le moment n'est pas éloigné où cette nation avilie se révoltera contre les excès d'une soldatesque insolente, qui déjà l'accable des plus dures réquisitions, pour se mettre à peu près en état de défense contre les nombreux ennemis qui menacent déjà toutes les frontières à la fois, ou de courir à des nouvelles conquêtes, si les Souverains de l'Europe, chargés de la vengéance des peuples, sont assez mal conseillés pour écouter les insidieuses négociations du plus fourbe des hommes, qui ne cherche qu'à gagner du tems.

La position de Buonaparte n'est rien moins qu'assurée. La France depuis la révolution est divisée en quatre partis ou factions bien connus :

1. L'armée, qui ne soutient le chef de son choix que parcequ'elle se croit sûre de lui, et qui soudain se tournera contre lui si elle s'aperçoit qu'il peut conserver la paix, car alors elle n'aurait rien de plus à gagner avec lui qu'avec le pacifique Louis XVIII.

2. Un second parti, qui le mine sourdement, qui, presqu'autant que l'armée, le tient dans sa main depuis son retour de l'Ile d'Elbe : c'est celui des Grands Jacobins, ou Républicains, dont les " sans culottes " n'ont été pendant longtems que les instruments aveugles. Les Grands Jacobins sont bien habillés, riches ; ils sont devenus les grands dignitaires, les sénateurs, les généraux, les juges, les financiers, les administrateurs, les fournisseurs ; ils occupent toutes les grandes places dans les conseils, dans les armées, dans le civil, dans le clergé.

Plus adroits, plus Machiavelistes que la tourbe féroce et stupide qu'ils ont agitée, ils ont surnagé sur la révolution en se pliant aux circonstances. Farouches Républicains sous Robespierre et les Directeurs, ils sont devenus courtisans rampants sous Buonaparte, qu'ils avaient porté à la suprême magistrature, ne prévoyant pas que son caractère inconciliable l'éleverait sur leurs épaules au pouvoir absolu. Ensuite quand la victoire a abandonné ses drapeaux, quand les Alliés l'ont suivi jusque sous les murs de Paris, ils l'ont trahi et ont soutenu la cause des Bourbons. Le bon Roi a cru devoir les conserver dans leurs dignités et dans leurs places. Dès lors ils ont méprisé un gouvernement faible, qui, par un mélange bizarre de l'ancien régime avec le nouveau, ne montrait qu'une intention faible et maladroite de parvenir par une amalgame mal conçue et inexécutable à rétablir la vieille monarchie.

Dès lors ils ont trahi à son tour le Souverain trop bon pour un peuple entièrement démoralisé. Ils ont comploté avec l'ancien usurpateur, et moitié dominés par la frénésie de l'armée qu'ils ont été forcés de seconder, moitié guidés par une profonde politique, ils sont parvenus à le conduire, malgré ses principes et son caractère, jusqu'au point de reconnaître la souveraineté du peuple, de descendre de la dignité d'Empereur autocrate, qu'aucun Souverain n'avait jamais portée aussi haut que lui, pour se déclarer simplement le premier magistrat de la République, d'abjurer ses projets d'empire universel et de conquêtes. C'est ainsi qu'en le mettant en contradiction avec lui-même, ils affaiblissent son influence sur l'armée que sa conduite politique contrarie et aliène.

Cet état indécis auquel ils l'ont réduit ne peut pas durer longtems ; il doit cesser au moment où les Alliés entreront en France : ou l'armée regagnera son général, qui par elle s'affranchira du joug des Républicains, ou ils resteront maîtres de sa personne et de sa volonté, et alors ils tenteront peut-être de rétablir leur projet favori, quoiqu'insensé, de la République. S'ils ne se croyent pas assez forts vis à vis de l'armée et de la nation, ils auront recours à leur guerre secrète pour le faire échouer une seconde fois dans la défense de sa couronne. Ils affaibliront par l'importance de ses revers l'illusion magique de l'armée sur ses grands talents et sa fortune. Ils flatteront et accroîtront la haine que la nation lui porte, en démontrant la nécessité de l'abattre sans retour pour obtenir une paix durable.

Ce seront encore vraisemblablement ces Jacobins politiques qui traiteront avec les Puissances qu'ils chercheront à diviser, en présentant aux uns l'upas de la Régence, aux autres le rétablissement des Bourbons, en ayant la perfidie de jeter dans cette famille des semences de discorde sur le choix de la branche ou de l'individu, espérant dominer de nouveau, ou sous la régence d'un enfant, ou sous le Souverain qu'ils auront choisi ou replacé.

S'ils sont pénétrés et écartés, ils se replieront sur la monarchie légitime, et se joindront avec l'apparence de bonne foi à la nation et aux Royalistes, parce qu'ils voudront conserver ce qu'ils ont acquis, et ils attendront que de nouvelles fautes de ce gouvernement leur procurent de nouvelles occasions de regagner du terrain.

3. Le troisième parti, la nation en masse, est purement passif. Ce qui l'affaiblit encore c'est qu'il se divise en deux fractions très difficile à réunir, les anciens propriétaires et les acquéreurs des biens nationaux. Il y aurait un moyen d'y parvenir, mais cela ne regarde que le gouvernement de Louis XVIII. quand il sera rétabli. La nation, malgré l'apathie avillissante où elle semble plongée par la peur qu'elle a de l'armée et d'une guerre civile, à laquelle cependant elle sera forcément entraînée par l'invasion des Alliés, qui sera le châtiment céleste de la violation de ses serments et de son enthousiasme sacrilége pour le soldat couronné qu'elle fatigue de ses adorations banales, qu'elle a pareillement prodiguées à Louis XVI., à Robespierre, aux cinq Directeurs, à Buonaparte, à Louis XVIII., et de nouveau à Buonaparte—cette nation n'est pas aussi indifférente qu'elle le paraît au sort de l'antique et vénérable maison de Bourbon. Elle aime et respecte personnellement le Roi; elle déteste, craint, et méprise Buonaparte. Ces sentiments comprimés semblent prêts à se développer quoiqu'ils soient encore arrêtés par la terreur des brigands enrégimentés. Mais dès que l'invasion sera commencée, la nation reprendra l'énergie qu'elle n'aurait pas dû perdre si le gouvernement eut été lui-même énergique, actif, vigilant, et fidèle. Abandonnée par des chefs et des ministres faibles, imprudents, ou perfides, elle s'est tournée vers le soleil levant pour se tirer des ténèbres qui environnaient le château des Tuileries; toute autre nation en aurait fait autant. On ne peut pas excuser le crime de sa défection, mais il est juste d'en adoucir le blâme : elle n'a pas pêché par perfidie, mais par terreur; elle était sous le gloire, elle y est encore. Elle ne peut sortir de l'esclavage militaire que lorsque les armées étrangères seront en France. C'est alors seulement qu'elle pourra se lever avec espoir de succès. Quoique disent, quoique promettent les adhérents du bon Roi, il ne faut faire entrer en ligne de compte les ressources à tirer des bonnes intentions de la nation que lorsque les armées alliées seront dans l'intérieur. C'est alors seulement qu'on pourra arranger des diversions dans l'intérieur, pas avant.

4. Le parti Royaliste se divise en deux, les Royalistes Purs, les Royalistes Constitutionnels. Les premiers ont été très nuisible au Roi, et ont contrarié tout ce qu'il faisait, ou projettait, pour le bonheur de son peuple, parcequ'ils n'étaient susceptibles d'aucune idée libérale, surtout ceux qui sont rentrés avec, ou en même tems que, lui, après avoir végété pendant 25 ans dans une dure émigration, sans retremper leur âme dans la fournaise du malheur : ne rapportant en France que des préjugés et des prétentions, ils ont causé dans la nation une animadversion et une méfiance générale, qui sont retombées sur cet excellent Roi.

Les Constitutionnels, tout aussi attachés au Roi, mais dans un sens différent, ont été écartés de sa personne surtout et des emplois où ils auraient servi fidèlement par la jalousie des Purs, qui se sentant eux-mêmes incapables du fardeau du gouvernement, toujours égoïstes, toujours valets, ont choisi pour remplir avec eux les places de confiance, des Républicains, tout aussi habiles caméléons de Cour, aussi avides d'honneurs et d'argent, qui ont pris leur masque pour mieux les tromper. Les Constitutionnels ont gémi, tout en cherchant à faire passer au Roi des avis importans, qui n'ont jamais pu pénétrer au travers de l'épaisse colonne de ces hommes imprudents, ou coupables, qui obsédaient cet excellent et malheureux Monarque, et le gardaient à vue, et déjouaient ses vues bienfaisantes, par leur conduite insolente, téméraire, et indiscrète. Dès qu'on a vu un tel état des choses, on a dû prévoir la révolution.

On ne peut donc prendre aucune confiance aux belles promesses des Royalistes, ainsi divisés entr'eux. Il faut garder cette ressource, quelque magnifique qu'on la présente, comme un mémorandum jusqu'à l'époque de l'invasion : c'est seulement alors qu'on pourra en faire usage.

Si par le secours des Puissances Alliées, pour le salut de la France et le repos de l'Europe, Louis XVIII. remonte sur son trône, il sentira d'après sa propre expérience que, des quatre partis qui divisent la France, il faut dénaturer ou anéantir le premier; écarter des places et du pouvoir, démasquer et punir sans miséricorde le second; rendre l'énergie et la confiance au troisième, qui est la vraie force de l'état; comprimer le zèle du quatrième, pour que son indiscrétion ne soit plus nuisible; refondre les Purs avec les Constitutionnels, pour que, ces soubriquets n'existans plus, ils deviennent également et ensemble les appuis du trône, et le bataillon sacré de la nation.

Etablir la justice impartiale, sévère, et prompte; mettre des bonnes étroites aux entreprises du clergé, qu'il ne faut pas confondre avec la religion; éloigner les favoris; écarter les priviléges et la clientèle, sources d'injustice et de corruption; récompenser le mérite dans toutes les classes; exclure des places de tout genre les sujets ineptes ou justement suspects, car les places n'étant pas vénales, ne sont point des propriétés héréditaires; n'accorder aucunes survivances, ni double emploi; maintenir l'égalité aux yeux de la justice, sans acception de nobles et de riches, sans exception de petits et de pauvres; consulter l'économie dans les dons, la largesse dans les récompenses; ne point avilir les titres et les ordres en les prodiguant pour se faire des créatures; se tenir strictement à la bonne Constitution, ouvrage de la sagesse du Roi, sans la changer, mais en perfectionnant quelques articles d'après l'expérience: telles sont les bases fondamentales sur lesquelles sont fondés le bonheur, le retour aux bonnes mœurs, aux vertus sociales du peuple Français, et la solidité du trône.

DUMOURIEZ.

General Dumouriez to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MON TRÈS AIMÉ ET RESPECTÉ DUC,' Little Ealing, le 9 Juin, 1815.

Je vous remercie de la promptitude que vous avez mise à me répondre,* et du désir, très honorable pour moi, que vous témoignez de continuer notre correspondance. Vous me laissez dans l'incertitude sur l'assurance qu'on m'avait donnée que mon mémoire donné par parties dans les premiers jours d'Avril, ainsi que mes notes du 17 et 24 Avril, du 4, 6, et 11 Mai, vous avaient été envoyés directement et à mesure.

Quant au désir que j'avais d'aller passer deux ou trois mois dans les Pays-Bas, sur lequel Lord Castlereagh devait vous avoir consulté, je vous assure qu'il n'était fondé sur aucune prétention de me mettre en avant, et de donner mes opinions à aucun autre qu'à vous, que j'aime et respecte. J'avais à traiter avec le Prince de Metternich une affaire de grand intérêt pour moi, sur laquelle il m'avait promis ses soins, et m'avait donné l'espoir d'un prompt succès, lors de son passage à Londres. Il s'agissait du rétablissement d'une pension viagère de trois mille florins que l'Empereur d'Autriche m'avait accordée en 1800, à laquelle par délicatesse j'avais renoncé par écrit en 1807, lorsque la Cour de Vienne, changeant de système politique, s'était liée étroitement avec Buonaparte, et était devenue ennemie de l'Angleterre, ma patrie adoptive. J'espérais que l'Empereur et son ministre venant à Francfort, ma présence faciliterait le rétablissement de cette pension, qui avec huit années d'arrérages m'aurait mis à mon aise pour le reste de ma vie. J'espérais même, en vous voyant, vous engager à joindre vos soins pour me faire obtenir cette grâce. Si même vous me mandez que vous soyez disposé, et à même, de me rendre ce service, en mon absence, je vous enverrai une note sur cette affaire, à laquelle vous ne pouvez vous intéresser que par amitié pour moi. Au reste, je ne vous fais ce détail que pour que vous sachiez bien positivement que mon désir ne portait sur aucun objet d'ambition, qui ne convient plus à mon âge, mais sur un intérêt pécuniaire, qui convient à la médiocrité de ma fortune et aux besoins de ma vieillesse.

* For reply to this letter, see Wellington Despatches, 1st edition, vol. xii., p. 490; letters dated 14th and 20th June, 1815.

Après cette digression que j'ai cru nécessaire, venons aux affaires. Vous allez sous peu, ou offensivement ou défensivement, commencer les opérations militaires. Buonaparte s'est débarrassé des obstacles politiques par la farce du Champ de Mai, qui n'a pas interrompu un moment les préparatifs formidables qu'il fait. Au contraire, même cette représentation a augmenteé sa force, en nationalisant ses mesures. On croit que les deux Chambres vont lui montrer les dents, et lui donner de nouvelles entraves. Malheureusement je n'en crois rien. Quoiqu'il ait peut-être été gêné dans la composition de la Chambre des Pairs, ils sont trop coupables pour travailler contre leur chef, et trop lâches pour lui présenter une opposition dangereuse. Quant à la Chambre des Représentants, quoiqu'élus en apparence avec liberté, ce sont des chiens souples et vils, auxquels il jetera des os à ronger pour les faire taire. Ainsi cet habile scélérat, par son machiavelisme souple et adroit, s'est rendu maître de la nation, la conduit à son gré, et va l'employer toute entière, sans qu'aucune faction puisse se montrer, au moins jusqu'à ce que les armées Alliées ayent dépassé les frontières.

Vous ne pouvez donc compter que sur vos forces et sur votre promptitude à les réunir sur un centre commun par des marches combinées avec précision et par des grands efforts. C'est surtout contre l'armée de ligne que vous les dirigerez d'abord, car c'est elle seule qui fait sa force réelle. Les troupes nationales ne sont qu'une masse plus imposante en apparence qu'en réalité; mais c'est une pépinière de jeunes soldats, qui recruteront avec enthousiasme l'armée de ligne, si vous n'avez pas contre celle-ci un succès décidé dès le débût de la campagne.

Le premier contact est donc presque décisif; il est préparé d'avance des deux côtés; et on a trop peu de distance à parcourir de part et d'autre, pour que celui des deux adversaires qui se déterminera à être l'assaillant n'oblige pas, presque par sa première marche, son ennemi à recevoir la bataille à laquelle tous deux s'attendent d'avance, et se sont arrangés en tirant de la nature et de l'art tout le parti possible dans un pays hérissé de places fortes qu'on a eu le temps de mettre en état de défense, de rivières coulant en lignes parallèles avec une frontière déterminée, bornée au nord-est par la mer, par des canaux, des watergans, des inondations, et au sud-est par une forêt que les Français ont eu le temps de rendre presque impassable. C'est de la portion d'attaque dont vous êtes personnellement chargé que je parle: c'est elle qui m'occupe particulièrement.

Vous serez dans le cas d'employer plus de force que d'art pour percer cette ligne, où vous êtes attendu partout, où vous ne pouvez ni surprendre, ni tourner, ni vous développer, avant d'avoir enfoncé l'obstacle, où toutes vos manœuvres sont prévues et la défense préparée d'avance.

A la vérité le mouvement de l'armée du centre, qui manœuvrera simultanément, et presque contiguement sur votre gauche, occupera et distraira une partie considérable des forces de votre adversaire, et tirera le même avantage du mouvement de la troisième armée qui débouchera vers la Suisse. Chacune de ces trois armées étant plus fort que celle que Buonaparte peut lui opposer, doit naturellement pousser audacieusement devant elle avec un très grand espoir de succès.

C'est de ce mouvement général et simultané qui doit s'étendre jusqu'à l'Italie que je serais très inquiet si vous n'en aviez pas arrangé le plan, et si vous n'en dirigiez pas la branche principale. Mais j'ai une confiance entière dans mon héros, qui a réuni dans toutes ses campagnes l'audace à la prudence, et j'attends avec plus d'impatience que d'inquiétude ce premier coup de collier, qui va peut-être d'ici à trois semaines décider le sort de la France.

Quelques préparatifs que Buonaparte ait fait pour défendre l'intérieur, et surtout la capitale, c'est sur la ligne frontière que doit porter toute sa résistance. Si une fois elle est pénétrée et dépassée, l'effet moral lui sera funeste, toute sa machine de gouvernement s'écroulera, son sénat, son corps législatif, ses gardes nationales se tourneront contre lui et contre son armée de ligne, qui elle-même l'abandonnera, lorsqu'il n'aura plus d'argent pour les payer, ni la ressource des provinces pour la recruter, la remonter, l'habiller, l'armer, et la nourrir.

C'est alors seulement que je mets en ligne de compte la diversion du parti du Roi ; car tout ce qui se fait en attendant dans l'intérieur par un zèle précipité ne fait qu'affaiblir sa cause, et la détruirait d'avance, si on retardait encore les opérations militaires des Alliés.

Je suis pour la vie votre fidèle serviteur et ami,

DUMOURIEZ.

General Dumouriez to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MONSIEUR LE DUC, Le 15 Juin, 1815.

J'ai lieu de croire que Lord Castlereagh vous envoie, par l'occasion la plus prochaine, un mémoire que je remets au ministère, avec prière de vous le communiquer tout de suite. J'attache à cette pièce la plus grande importance : elle est le produit de toute ma réflexion et mon expérience. Je vous prie, malgré vos grandes occupations, de la lire avec attention, et de la faire parvenir directement et promptement dans les mains de Louis XVIII., qui y est le plus intéressé, car il s'agit de se donner le moyen d'affermir son trône quand les Alliés l'y auront fait remonter.

Je n'ai pas voulu l'adresser moi-même au Roi, parce que j'ai la certitude qu'il ne l'aurait pas reçue, ou qu'on l'aurait dénaturée par les commentaires, au lieu qu'on respectera le canal par lequel elle arrive. Je vous prie donc de rendre ce service au Roi, à ma patrie, et aux autres Souverains de l'Europe, car on ne peut pas jouer cette tragédie tous les ans.

Je ne vous dis rien sur ce qui vous occupe, car je ne connais que vaguement les positions d'attaque et de défense, et j'ignore absolument vos plans et ceux de Buonaparte.

Si les Français défendent des lignes, vous les percerez ; s'ils attaquent, ou sont attaqués en rase campagne, leur cavalerie ne résistera pas à votre supériorité ; mais rappelez-vous que son infanterie est excellente, que sa méthode ordinaire est de faire sur-le-champ des fortes colonnes sur le centre pour attaquer le centre de l'ennemi, le percer, le séparer, et tomber ensuite sur une des ailes. Il a employé avec succès cette manœuvre, qui n'est pas sans danger, à Austerlitz, Marengo, Eylau, Friedland, Rivoli, Ercole, et a toujours réussi, parce qu'on ne lui a opposé que des lignes. Si j'avais à le combattre, je lui opposerais à cette attaque de centre des colonnes médiocres en échiquier, pour pouvoir se remplacer en cas qu'il fit des progrès, sans gêner la retraite des battus; je placerais derrière les intervalles de mes colonnes, à cinquante ou cent pas, des escadrons isolés de cavalerie, surtout lanciers, de manière à ce qu'ils fussent masqués jusqu'au moment du choc à la baïonnette, pour se lancer sur l'ennemi par l'intervalle de l'infanterie; et je partagerais presque toute ma seconde ligne en réserves, dont une partie en ordre perpendiculaire entre les deux lignes, pour faire face sur les deux flancs en cas que l'ennemi eut fait une trouée.

Pardonnez-moi la hardiesse d'énoncer mon opinion à mon héros.

Votre fidèle DUMOURIEZ.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Earl of Clancarty.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 3rd April, 1815.

I enclose the copy of a private overture received from Napoleon through Mr. Craufurd, who has been long resident at Paris.*

You will communicate this overture in confidence to the Ministers of the other Powers assembled in Congress, and acquaint them that the Prince Regent's government does not consider this proposal as coming to them in a form sufficiently regular to require from them a specific reply, which would in no case be other than that they could entertain no proposition of this nature except upon communication and in full concert with their Allies.

I am, with great truth and respect, my Lord,

Your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Q. Craufurd, Esq., to Viscount Castlereagh.

MY LORD, London, 1st April, 1815.

Shortly before my leaving Paris, I was very unexpectedly applied to to take charge of a communication to His Majesty's Ministers from Napoleon Buonaparte; but, lest my accepting such a commission should, at first view, appear extraordinary to your Lordship, I request your indulgence, before I enter on the matter itself, to state the circumstances that led to my being applied to. Your Lordship must have been informed that, without any previous notice being given to the foreign Ministers at Paris, His Christian Majesty quitted it privately on the 20th March, at two in the morning, and that Buonaparte arrived at the Tuileries at between eight and nine in the evening. The passports that had been given by the late authorities became of no longer use. Myself and others applied for fresh passports, without being able to obtain them. The recollection of what had happened in 1803 naturally occasioned some anxiety. I applied to Madame de Souza, and her son General Flahault, aide-de-camp to Napoleon, to use their endeavours to procure one for me, which they both promised to do. On the 24th I found that Madame de Souza had, in the course of the morning, whilst I was abroad, been twice at my house to inquire for me. I soon after received a note from her, requesting to see me. I accordingly went to her. She told me that the Emperor had sent for her that morning; that on her arrival at the Palace she was immediately introduced into his Cabinet; that after thanking her for the zeal she had shown in his cause, and speaking for a few minutes on indifferent subjects, he said, "You know M. Craufurd?" "Yes; for many years past." He said, "He wishes to return to England." She answered, "He does," and that she had applied for a passport for me. "Oh! he and every one may have passports without any difficulty." He was then pleased to add expressions of personal esteem for me; said that my having been detained in France when hostilities broke out in 1803 was a general measure that was thought necessary at that time, but things of that nature would no longer be repeated; that he had had a long time for reflection, undisturbed by daily occurrences; that he now wished universal peace to be maintained; and concluded by desiring her to apply to me to bear a communication from him to that effect to my government; and that if I consented to do so, he should immediately send a person to me to state what he wished to be communicated. She desired to have my answer immediately, but I begged to be indulged with an hour or two to consider it.

* See page 699 of present volume.

Had any one proposed to me interference in any shape in affairs of a public nature where there was any one invested with an official character, I should have considered it an insult to me; but in the extraordinary circumstances of the moment the case was different. By the departure of the King, no Minister who had been sent to His Christian Majesty could possibly, I thought, have intercourse with those who had by violence taken possession of his throne; but a private communication, made by means of an individual, appeared to me to be exempt from any inconvenience. His Majesty's Ministers were under no necessity of taking notice of it. I next thought whether I should mention the circumstance to Lord FitzRoy Somerset: but I thought it unfair to seek his advice on the conduct to be observed by me, lest it should afterwards be condemned; blame might be incurred by refusing to take charge of the commission, blame by accepting it; but as it now stands, if I have done wrong, I am alone accountable for it. It likewise occurred to me, that from the communication itself, and from what might be learnt in the course of the transaction, some useful light might be perhaps obtained. After weighing all circumstances, I informed Madame de Souza I should receive the person proposed to be sent to me. General Flahault came shortly afterwards. He said that he was authorized by the Emperor Napoleon to say: "Que quoique Sa Majesté n'eut pas cru, peut-être, de sa gloire de consentir au traité de paix du 30 Mai dernier, entre la France et l'Angleterre, cependant comme ce traité avait été sanctionné et ratifié par la nation, elle (Sa Majesté) était disposée à l'observer, et à en faire exécuter toutes les conditions: et animée du désir de la tranquillité générale, elle espère trouver dans la Cour de Londres les mêmes sentimens pacifiques; qu'elle chargera une personne de lui faire officialement ces propositions, aussitôt qu'elle aura la certitude que cette personne sera reçue."

I wrote down what he had said, desiring to know if what I stated was precisely what he meant to say. He carried my note (which was in the form of a letter) to Napoleon, by whose orders he wrote me as follows:

"MONSIEUR, "Paris, le 25 Mars, 1815.

"J'ai reçu la lettre que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire dans l'intention d'établir exactement ce que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous dire hier. J'ai trouvé que vous avez parfaitement saisi les idées que je vous ai expliquées.

"J'ai l'honneur d'être, &c."

I was informed, on the 24th March, I think, that the Austrian Minister, General Baron Vincent, had had a secret interview with Flahault and afterwards with Caulaincourt, and that they both appeared, or affected to appear, extremely pleased with what had passed at these two conferences. Vincent is a very able man, and I hope and, as far as I can judge, believe, that he is incapable of acting a double or deceitful part.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

Q. CRAUFURD.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Earl of Clancarty.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 3rd April, 1815.

Your Excellency will receive enclosed the copy of a message which the Prince Regent intends should be presented on Wednesday next to both Houses of Parliament.

Your Excellency, in communicating this document to the Ministers of the other Powers assembled in Congress, will renew to them the assurance of His Royal Highness's fixed resolution vigorously to co-operate with them in such measures as may best secure the tranquillity and independence of Europe upon a solid basis.

Should the determination of the Allied Sovereigns to resist by arms the re-establishment of Napoleon's authority in France remain unaltered by recent events, your Excellency will represent to them the importance of accelerating the advance of their forces into France with as little delay as may be consistent with military prudence.

All the information we receive from the interior of France represents that, as yet, Napoleon's power is but very imperfectly established; that the prevailing sentiment of the nation, although submissive to the troops, is favourable to the King; that the army is neither numerous nor well equipped for active service; and that his means of calling forth the resources of the country are still uncertain. In proportion as hostilities are delayed, and as the nation can be impressed with an idea that Buonaparte is likely to maintain his situation and may give them peace, whatever may be their preference for the authority of their lawful Sovereign, they will submit themselves without reserve to the will of the person who wields de facto within the country the power of the sword.

To counteract this increasing danger, and to cripple Napoleon's power at the outset of the contest (if war is the policy decided on), not only by withdrawing from his grasp the greatest possible proportion of the resources of France by a rapid advance into the interior, but also by rendering his influence and authority as feeble as possible in the remainder of the kingdom, your Excellency will impress upon the Allies the great importance of saving time, whilst the mind of the nation yet hesitates with respect to the authority to which it shall pay obedience.

I am, with great truth and respect, my Lord,
Your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant,
CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE.]

The Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, thinks it right to inform the House of Commons that the events which have recently occurred in France, in direct contravention of the engagements concluded with the Allied Powers at Paris in the month of April last, and which threaten consequences highly dangerous to the tranquillity and independence of Europe, have induced His Royal Highness to give directions for the augmentation of His Majesty's land and sea forces.

The Prince Regent has likewise deemed it incumbent upon him to lose no time in entering into communications with His Majesty's Allies, for the purpose of forming such a concert as may most effectually provide for the general permanent security of Europe; and His Royal Highness confidently relies on the support of the House of Commons in all measures which may be necessary for the accomplishment of this important object.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Earl of Clancarty.

MY LORD, Foreign Office, 8th April, 1815.

I send your Excellency a copy of my private letter with its enclosures to the Duke of Wellington.

You will fully appreciate the importance of not having it imputed to the Treaty of Vienna that Louis XVIII., by being made an ally against Buonaparte, has been made master of the confederacy for his own restoration. His Majesty cannot wish the British government to feel more decisively the importance of his restoration than they do, and most assuredly every effort will be made so to conduct the war as to lead to this result; but they cannot make it a sine quâ non. Foreign Powers may justly covenant for the destruction of Buonaparte's authority as inconsistent with their own safety, but it is another question avowedly to stipulate as to his successor. By a despatch from Sir Charles Stuart, it appears the King of France perfectly enters into this distinction.

I am with great truth and respect, my Lord,
Your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,
CASTLEREAGH.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Earl of Clancarty.

My Lord, Foreign Office, 8th April, 1815.

I herewith enclose copy of an overture this day received from M. de Caulaincourt, with the answer returned. You will communicate the same to the Allied Sovereigns and Plenipotentiaries at Vienna.

I have the honour to be, with great truth, My Lord,

Your most obedient humble servant,

Castlereagh.

[Enclosures.]

I.

The Duc de Vicence to Lord Viscount Castlereagh.

My Lord, Paris, le 4 Avril, 1815.

L'Empereur a voulu exprimer directement à Son Altesse Royale le Prince Régent les sentimens dont il est animé, et lui faire connaître tout le prix qu'il met au maintien de la paix heureusement existante entre les deux pays. Je suis chargé en conséquence, My Lord, de vous adresser la lettre ci-jointe, et de prier Votre Excellence de la présenter à Son Altesse Royale.

Le désir le plus vif de l'Empereur étant que le repos de l'Europe ne reçoive aucune atteinte, Sa Majesté s'est empressé de manifester les mêmes dispositions aux Monarques encore assemblés à Vienne, et à tous les autres Souverains.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, &c.,

Caulaincourt, Duc de Vicence.

II.

Viscount Castlereagh to the Duc de Vicence.

Monsieur le Duc, Downing Street, 8th April, 1815.

I have been honoured with two letters from your Excellency, bearing date the 4th inst., from Paris, the one covering a letter addressed to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

I am to acquaint your Excellency that the Prince Regent has declined receiving the letter addressed to him, and has at the same time given me his orders to transmit the letters addressed by your Excellency to me to Vienna for the information and consideration of the Allied Sovereigns and Plenipotentiaries assembled at the Congress.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

Castlereagh.

N.B. The sealed letter from Buonaparte to the Prince, of which no copy was sent to Lord Castlereagh, was returned unopened.

APPENDIX.

NAPOLEON'S PROCLAMATION.

NAPOLÉON, par la Grâce de Dieu et les Constitutions de l'Empire, Empereur des Français, etc., etc., à l'Armée.

Du Golfe Juan, ce 1 Mars, 1815.

Soldats! Nous n'avons pas été vaincus! Deux hommes * sortis de nos rangs ont trahi nos lauriers, leur pays, leur prince, leur bienfaiteur.

Ceux que nous avons vus pendant vingt-cinq ans parcourir toute l'Europe pour nous susciter des ennemis, qui ont passé leur vie à combattre contre nous dans les rangs des armées étrangères, en maudissant notre belle France, prétendraient-ils commander et enchaîner nos aigles, eux qui n'ont jamais pu en soutenir les regards? Souffrirons-nous qu'ils héritent du fruit de nos glorieux travaux? qu'ils s'emparent de nos honneurs, de nos biens, qu'ils calomnient notre gloire? Si leur règne durait, tout serait perdu, même le souvenir de ces immortelles journées.

Avec quel acharnement ils les dénaturent! Ils cherchent à empoisonner ce que le monde admire, et s'il reste encore des défenseurs de notre gloire, c'est parmi ces mêmes ennemis que nous avons combattus sur le champ de bataille.

Soldats! dans mon exil j'ai entendu votre voix, je suis arrivé à travers tous les obstacles et tous les périls.

Votre Général appelé au trône par le choix du peuple, et élevé sur vos pavois, vous est rendu: venez le joindre.

Arrachez ces couleurs que la nation a proscrites, et qui, pendant vingt-cinq ans, servirent de ralliement à tous les ennemis de la France. Arborez cette cocarde tricolore: vous la portiez dans nos grandes journées!

Nous devons oublier que nous avons été les maîtres des nations, mais nous ne devons pas souffrir qu'aucune se mêle de nos affaires. Qui prétendrait être maître chez nous? Qui en aurait le pouvoir? Reprenez ces aigles que vous aviez à Ulm, à Austerlitz, à Jena, à Eylau, à Friedland, à Tudela, à Eckmühl, à Essling, à Wagram, à Smolensk, à la Moscowa, à Lutzen, à Vurtchen, à Montmirail. Pensez-vous que cette poignée de Français, aujourd'hui si arrogans, puissent en soutenir la vue? Ils retourneront d'où ils viennent, et là, s'ils le veulent, ils règneront comme ils prétendent avoir régné pendant dix-neuf ans.

Vos biens, vos rangs, votre gloire, les biens, les rangs, et la gloire de vos enfans, n'ont pas de plus grands ennemis que ces princes que les étrangers nous ont imposés: ils sont les ennemis de notre gloire, puisque le récit de tant d'actions héroïques qui ont illustré le peuple Français combattant contre eux pour se soustraire à leur joug, est leur condamnation.

Les vétérans des armées de Sambre-et-Meuse, du Rhin, d'Italie, d'Egypte, de l'Ouest, de la Grande Armée sont humiliés; leurs honorables cicatrices sont flétries, leurs succès seraient des crimes, ces braves seraient des rebelles, si, comme le prétendent les ennemis du peuple, des souverains légitimes étaient au milieu des armées étrangères. Les honneurs, les récompenses, les affections sont pour ceux qui les ont servis contre la patrie et nous.

* Augereau et Marmont.

Soldats! venez vous ranger sous les drapeaux de votre chef. Son existence ne se compose que de la vôtre, ses droits ne sont que ceux du peuple et les vôtres: son intérêt, son honneur, sa gloire, ne sont autres que votre intérêt, votre honneur, et votre gloire. La victoire marchera au pas de charge; l'aigle, avec les couleurs nationales, volera de clocher en clocher jusqu'aux tours de Notre-Dame: alors vous pourrez montrer avec honneur vos cicatrices; alors vous pourrez vous vanter de ce que vous aurez fait; vous serez les libérateurs de la patrie!

Dans votre vieillesse, entourés et considérés de vos concitoyens, ils vous entendront avec respect raconter vos hauts faits; vous pourrez dire avec orgueil: Et moi aussi, je faisais partie de cette Grande Armée qui est entrée deux fois dans les murs de Vienne, dans ceux de Rome, de Berlin, de Madrid, de Moscou, qui a délivré Paris de la souillure que la trahison et la présence de l'ennemi y ont empreinte. Honneur à ces braves soldats, la gloire de la patrie, et honte éternelle aux Français criminels, dans quelque rang que la fortune les ait fait naître, qui combattirent vingt-cinq ans avec l'étranger pour déchirer le sein de la patrie!

The Prince of Orange to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY DEAR DUKE, Bruxelles, 17th March, 1815.

Having heard to-day from Lord Bathurst that your Grace is to take the command of this army, which I will be happy to give over to you, although I cannot deny that I would under the present circumstances do it with reluctance to anybody else, I send you the returns and state of the army, and the arrangement made for it, as well as the copy of a letter I caused General Lowe to write yesterday in my name to General Kleist,* by all of which you will see our exact situation here. I mean to concentrate the disposable British and Hanoverian troops between Tournay and Mons, and place these two places à l'abri d'un coup de main. At the same time that Mons and Tournay are placed in a defensible state, Ypres, Nieuport, and Ostend are likewise put in a state of repair.

I chose the situation between Mons and Tournay to assemble the troops because it is the most central, and near the positions of Renai and Bluton, which might be occupied according to circumstances. General Kleist, at Aix-la-Chapelle with the Prussians, will move to our assistance if required, and I have determined my father to assemble a disposable Dutch corps about Maestricht. I have given orders to form a large magazine at Antwerp, a secondary one at Bruxelles, and smaller nearer the army. My further actions must of course be guided by circumstances, but I think it of great importance for your Grace to join us as soon as possible, since Buonaparte makes great progress. The French troops will not fight against him; he is sure to be before long at Paris, and will, I am sure, lose no time to move down upon this frontier. Lieut.-Col. Hartman will transmit this letter to you.

For ever your most truly devoted,
WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE.

* See vol. ix. p. 599.

[List of Enclosures.]

No. 1. Return of British forces in Flanders, including the German Legion, under the command of His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange.
No. 2. Troops and Companies detached.
No. 3. Recapitulation of the Totals.
No. 4. Hanoverian corps, under the command of Lieutenant-General Baron Charles Alten.
No. 5. Return of Belgian troops.
No. 6. Return of Dutch troops.
No. 7. Return of field ordnance, ammunition, &c.
No. 8. Field equipment and stores in Antwerp.

Remarks.

The British battalions are in good order, but the non-commissioned officers and privates are young soldiers, and few of them have ever been on service, except during the last campaign in Holland, in 1814.

The battalions of Guards are nearly composed of recruits, but they have about 400 men which are not fit for active service.

The German Legion, infantry and cavalry, are in the best order. The whole are well clothed, except two regiments of cavalry.

The Hanoverian field battalions and Landwehr are well equipped, but move badly, and are like all young troops commanded by officers without experience.

The Belgian officers may be depended on, and most of the men have served under Buonaparte.

Antwerp, Ostend, Nieuport, and Ypres will be provisioned in 16 days.

The Commissary-General has collected at Antwerp 100,000 rations of flour, and a sufficient quantity of wood and spirits, for a siege, and for the supply of the army.

10,000 rations of biscuit are baked daily (commencing from the 16th inst.) at Antwerp.

The Commissary-General has received instructions to form the principal magazines at Antwerp, and small dépôts will be formed at Halle and Ath.

It is intended that the garrison of Antwerp shall consist of one British brigade (General Mackenzie's) and two Hanoverian brigades, and that two British regiments and two Hanoverian regiments shall remain at Ostend, and two British regiments at Nieuport.

The repairs at Ypres and Tournay have been begun, and for the present 2 Hanoverian battalions will be posted at the former place.

The disposable force will amount to about—

4,000 British infantry.
3,600 German Legion, infantry.
2,400 ,, cavalry.
6,800 Hanoverian infantry.
500 ,, cavalry.
5,000 Belgian infantry.
1,900 ,, cavalry.

The whole of which will be concentrated, in the first instance, at Ath and the neighbourhood.

And a proportion of artificers of different trades, amounting to 17 in number.

To be demanded.

1 troop of horse artillery.

100 drivers (with a proportion of officers and non-commissioned officers) for the 200 horses ordered to be purchased by His Royal Highness the Commander of the Forces.

50 drivers and 100 horses.

Which, with the 100 drivers and 200 horses already mentioned, will form a reserve of 150 drivers and 300 horses.

A brigade of 24-pounders on travelling carriages, similar to that latterly attached to the Duke of Wellington's army in the south of France.

Also a brigade of 18-pounders, also to move with the army.

The companies of artillery, horses, and drivers, &c., &c., that will be required for these brigades are not included in the numbers already mentioned as demanded.

2 clerks of stores and 6 conductors.

Memorandum relative to the Rocket Troop.

The number of rockets that can be carried on the present carriages is	1044
The troop has only	550

A large reserve of rockets is also highly necessary, as the greatest effect of this arm is produced by firing them in heavy volleys.

30 horse artillery drivers and 50 horses are required for the Rocket Troop.

THE COMMISSARY-GENERAL'S REPORT ON THE STATE OF PROVISIONS.

Bruxelles, 23rd March, 1815.

100,000 lbs. of biscuit are equal to the rations of 12,000 men for eight days; and at the baking of 40,000 lbs. per day, in addition to the above quantity, there will be in twenty-five days 980,000 lbs. more of biscuit, or a total quantity of 1,080,000 lbs., which are sufficient to the consumption of 12,000 men for 3 months.

400,000 lbs. of meat are equal to the rations of 12,000 men for 33 days; and calculating after the rate of salting 50,000 lbs. per day, in addition to the above quantity, there will be in 14 days 680,000 lbs. more of meat, or a total quantity of 1,080,000 lbs., which are sufficient to the rations of 12,000 men for 3 months.

Independent of the above provisions there are at this moment 15 days' rations for 12,000 men in Antwerp. Orders have been given to provide for the same period rations for 8,000 men at Ypres, 4,000 men at Ostend, and 1,500 men at Nieuport. Measures have also been adopted for storing all th other magazines of the contractors with rations for 5,000 men and 2,000 horse for 15 days in advance.

The Duke of Brunswick to Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington.

MY LORD DUKE, Brunswick, 25th March, 1815.

I am informed by Count Münster of your Grace's intention to settle at Bruxelles the military course which the German Princes allied to Great Britain will pursue, and I lose no time to enclose the return of my corps, of which you will observe that the same is stronger, as the earlier state of the German military constitution, before the French Revolution, had required; but observing that the military means to support the welfare of Germany may require new sacrifices, I brought the same to the present state.

I am by those means favoured to support the good cause; but not having the means to furnish in time of war, and out of the country, from the public income the wants of my troops, I request your Grace to interfere by government, that during the war a subsidy may be granted to me as a support for my effective corps, which I may furnish in the field, and which may be paid in such a manner as your Grace and His Majesty's government may think proper, but commencing from the period of the corps leaving my dominions. The corps will act in concert and under a chief whom His Royal Highness the Prince Regent may think proper to appoint, and as an auxiliary corps would be under the same command.

I have authorised Colonel de Herzberg, the bearer of this letter, to receive your Grace's intentions, and the direction of operation which your Grace may fix upon. I shall have my troops in such a state of readiness, that from the day of your Grace's decision which you may give, they shall be put in motion, and to arrive at its destination in the shortest possible time.

I have the honour to be, my Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

WILLIAM, DUKE OF BRUNSWICK.

WILLIAM, DUKE OF BRUNSWICK.

MEMORANDA ON THE FIELD WORKS IN PROGRESS IN THE NETHERLANDS.

Bruxelles, 27th March, 1815.

Within these few days the following works have been undertaken by the Engineer department:—

Ostend.

The earthworks to be repaired. The palisading completed and renewed where necessary. The outwork at the Bruges Gate finished. The breach in the curtain between bastions 10 and 11 entrenched until it can be repaired. This breach is an opening made by the French to introduce a supply of fresh water. As, however, it is the centre of a curtain, and has two wet ditches in front of it besides the inundation, it is not of any consequence. The sandhills on the western side, which give the only approach to Ostend when the inundations are extended, are to be occupied by a sort of detached hornwork, calculated for 800 men and six pieces of ordnance. The bastions of this work will have their gorges enclosed with palisades so as to prevent their being taken in the rear, and still calculated so as to afford an enemy little advantage when got possession of.

It is hoped this work will materially lengthen the defence of Ostend. It is calculated that everything essential to Ostend will be done in a fortnight.

Nieuport.

The earthworks to be repaired and palisaded. Communications by means of flat boats established to the outworks. The gates, barriers, and bridges repaired. Splinter proofs in the detached bastions to be constructed. Nieuport can only be approached by the Dunkirk sandhills, and when repaired and properly armed may be considered strong. Thirty additional guns have been mounted.

As Nieuport does not possess the same convenience of timber and artificers as Ostend, from whence a number of articles required must be brought, perhaps the repairs in hand may require a few days longer; but three weeks must finish the essential points.

Ypres.

The repairs here are heavy. There are, however, 2000 men at work. A very considerable breach was to be repaired, which is completed, palisaded, and fraised. The earthworks are to be repaired and palisaded; gates, drawbridges, platforms, and communications to the outworks repaired or made.

The outworks here are so numerous, that instructions have been given to the officer in charge to repair the body of the place only, with the detached bastions and ravelins which cover it, and to level the large hornwork near the Canal de Boussinghue and the advanced lines beyond the inundation. These works would require an army to defend them, and if not occupied, materially injure the defence otherwise to be expected from Ypres.

By means of the inundation and its large ditches, Ypres is at this moment defensible. It, however, wants arming, as it has but very few guns. Before everything proposed at Ypres can be done, I am afraid it will take three or four weeks; but if the guns arrive and are mounted, it may be very well defended in its present state. Every exertion is making to get on here.

Oudenarde.

At Oudenarde that portion of the ancient fortifications on the left bank of the Scheldt is repairing, so as to form a tête-du-pont for the protection of the bridge over the river at this place. The flanks of the works are upon the river. By means of the sluices within the town, the course of the Scheldt can be stopped until a very considerable inundation is formed up the valley of the Scheldt nearly to Tournay. These works will have a wet ditch, and will be palisaded.

To prevent the troops defending the tête-du-pont being taken in the rear, should an enemy contrive to pass the river above or below Oudenarde, a strong redoubt will be constructed on the heights commanding Oudenarde, and two emplacements for heavy guns, palisaded in the rear and protected by the redoubt. These batteries will command the chaussée leading from Oudenarde to Ath, Tournay, &c.

The works at Oudenarde were only commenced on Sunday, and will require a fortnight or three weeks. A thousand peasants were ordered to be employed upon them.

Tournay.

At Tournay the parapet of the citadel is to be repaired. The parapet of the chemin des rondes re-established, and a row of strong palisades placed between them, which will effectually prevent an escalade. Four log-houses constructed, each capable of holding 200 men. Those fronts facing the town which are of earth to be fraised and palisaded.

The parapet of the town wall to be repaired and cut straight, so that men can fire over it. Flèches to be constructed in front of the gateways.

Embrasures to be opened for guns to flank the gateways and approaches. Traverses constructed.

Thirty guns are ordered to Tournay, one-half of which will be mounted in the citadel.

It is hoped that in a fortnight a very considerable progress will have been made at Tournay, although it may perhaps require some little time more to finish everything completely.

Mons.

On Mount Palisel three redoubts are constructing, which are already about three feet high: they are to be fraised, palisaded, and the principal one will be a very strong work. Mons itself can hardly be made more than tenable against a surprise. The parapet of the town will, however, be repaired and the gates secured by traverses. That part of Mons which is completely open will be secured by flèches in front of the canal, having their flanks on its banks. It is proposed to mount a few guns to defend the gates and the approaches. The inundations are ordered to be extended, but not to their complete effect unless circumstances render it immediately necessary.

One of the redoubts on the hill completely commands the approach from the town to the hill, so that any troops in Mons, if obliged to evacuate the town, will have their retreat to Mount Palisel secure.

The redoubts will be finished in twelve days. The works in the town will require some little time longer.

Antwerp.

The works of Antwerp are in a very good and defensible state. No repairs are required but the common renewal of platforms, palisades, &c., which have been ordered to be forthwith done to the body of the place, the citadel, Forts Lillo and Liefkenshoeck, the Tête de Flandres, and the two redoubts on the dikes on the left bank of the river.

Nearly at the termination of the inundation on the left bank of the river, on the Ghent road, the French had commenced a very large work, called Fort Hingel. With a view to the defence of Antwerp, it has not appeared to me at all necessary that this work should be completed. To keep an enemy at a distance from the river, the basin, and the dock-yard, was the great object of the French, and they had proposed to surround Antwerp by strong detached works. For the defence, however, of Antwerp as a fortress, I do not conceive anything further necessary.

The Tête de Flandres can only be approached by the dike on each side of it when the inundation is extended. These approaches are each defended by a strong redoubt, with a bombproof tower within it.

On the narrow space of a dike an overwhelming fire cannot be brought against these redoubts, and they would be difficult obstacles to overcome. Until they are taken, not a shot can be fired at the Tête de Flandres. But even supposing an enemy in possession of the whole of the country on the left bank, including these redoubts and the Tête de Flandres, he would be very little advanced towards the capture of Antwerp.

Whilst we are masters of the citadel we are masters of Antwerp, and the citadel can only be attacked by regular approaches on the land side. The only advantage an enemy would gain from being master of the left bank of the river would be that of being enabled to bring an additional weight of fire on the citadel in aid of his regular attack. His fire upon the town could never hurt the troops in the casemated flanks and in the citadel. He could moreover be replied to by as heavy if not a heavier fire from the citadel, Fort du Nord, and as many sand-bag batteries as we thought proper to make along the quay or wharf of the town facing the Tête de Flandres.

I have entered into this detail about the left bank of the Scheldt in consequence of an idea having gone abroad that an enemy in possession of the Tête de Flandres, Antwerp is lost; whereas it is my decided opinion that an enemy attacking Antwerp from the left bank of the river could only bombard the town, and ought never to enter it.

From the above memoranda it may, I hope, be inferred that Antwerp is at this moment perfectly defensible, and that in three weeks Ostend, Nieuport, and Ypres will require an enemy to undertake a serious siege—the two first certainly; that Tournay will be a very good post or entrenched camp, before which ground must be broke to have any prospect of success; that Mons will be secure against a surprise, the retreat of the garrison secured, and an enemy prevented from drawing supplies from it until the redoubts on the hill are taken, which cannot be done in a hurry and without heavy guns; also that we will have Oudenarde secure and the bridge preserved for the movements of the army, and such operations as may be judged necessary. I hope I am not too sanguine in thinking that in three weeks all the above particulars will be completed, or nearly so.

Lieut.-Col. Sir G. J. Hartmann to Lord FitzRoy Somerset.

My Lord, Bruxelles, 30th April, 1815.

According to orders received yesterday by Sir George Wood, I have the honour to transmit a return of the Royal Hanoverian Artillery in this country, to which I have added a memorandum, and I request you will be good enough to lay both before his Grace the Duke of Wellington.

I have the honour to be, my Lord, your most obedient servant,

G. J. Hartmann.

* This does not include the veteran battalions, &c., now preparing for garrison duty.

An Estimate of the Monthly Expenditure (on the spot) of 75,000 Men upon the British Establishment in Active Service in Flanders.

An army of 75,000 may be supposed to consist of—

Infantry	60,000
Cavalry	15,000
	75,000

This number will draw daily rations of—

Provisions		100,000
Forage for the cavalry	15,000
For the train, transport, &c.	10,000
		25,000

	Monthly.
100,000 rations of provisions will cost at the existing prices in Flanders	£120,000
Add probable increase of price	30,000
	150,000

25,000 rations of forage at the present prices	£50,000
Probable increase	12,500
		62,500
Expenses of transport by land and water		50,000
Bât and forage		20,000
Contingencies and hospital		25,000
		307,500

Pay.

Ordinaries for 75,000 men, with the pay of the train department	200,000
	507,500
Loss by the exchange, say 25 per cent.	125,000
	£632,500

In the foregoing estimate it is to be apprehended that the augmentations of prices, by the increase and movements of the army, are underrated. They are certainly the lowest that can be assumed.

On the other hand, the whole number of 75,000 men is supposed to be on the British establishment. If it is partly to consist of foreign troops to be hired by contract with a foreign government, but subsisted by the British Commissariat, the expense would be somewhat smaller.

If the British government were to contract at a fixed rate in lieu of pay and provisions to such troops, the expense would be still further diminished.

Suppose 30,000 men on the British establishment, and 45,000 men engaged for a fixed sum.
	75,000

	Per Month.
Rations, &c., for 30,000 men, one-fourth cavalry ..	£100,000
Ordinaries	75,000
Train and transport, including forage for 5000 horses	50,000
Bât and forage, hospitals and departments	20,000
	245,000
45,000 German troops—
At 1·13 per man for 36,000 infantry	54,000
At 2·4 per man for 9000 cavalry	20,000
	£319,000
Adding loss by the exchange	£400,000

It is presumed that if the British army should pass the frontiers of Flanders, it would at once be reduced very considerably, as it would then be subsisted by requisitions in the same manner as the armies of the Allies. The expense might in that case probably not exceed 250,000*l.* per month.

It will be seen by the annexed estimate that half a million of specie is the least that will be required monthly for carrying on the service in Flanders upon the scale of an army of 75,000 men, and that it would probably cost 625,000*l.* to collect that amount.

Independently, however, of the cost, the difficulty of procuring that amount in specie (in addition to what is required for the current expenditure in the Peninsula and Mediterranean, not less than 400,000*l.* per month) is greater under the present circumstances of Europe than what any man could undertake with much confidence to overcome.

If, indeed, a considerable aid could be given in the first instance from this country, so as to start with two months' supply and thereby give some little time for the collection of money on the Continent, the difficulty would be materially lessened; but the London market affords no resource at this moment, and it appears to be deemed unadvisable to take from the Bank any large sum in guineas to meet the pressure of this emergency.

The chest in Flanders is at this time very ill provided, having been lately supplied from month to month only with the requisite funds, in order to avoid much pressure upon the exchanges in the north, while we were operating so much upon those of the south, in order to secure the punctual discharge of the debt in the Peninsula at the rate of 250,000*l.* per month. But the campaign which is now contemplated ought to be opened with, at least, a three months' supply of specie in the chest. It seems, however, literally impossible to procure immediately 1,500,000*l.* in hard money for the purpose.

In the mean time every effort is making to secure what can be got, and there is strong reason to hope that 500,000*l.* will very speedily be poured into the chest in various French and German coins, in consequence of the directions given upon the receipt of the first intelligence of Buonaparte's landing in the south of France. If Paris had remained open a few days longer, the order would have been completed before this time.

The foregoing observation and estimate apply solely to the expenditure in specie abroad for the proposed force. The expenses of the various departments at home connected with it* will remain to be added to the cost of the specie, estimated at 625,000*l.* per month.

There is another branch of expenditure alluded to in the last advices from the Commissariat in Flanders which may become very heavy (particularly as it would require further supplies of hard money), but which cannot be estimated without further information; that is, the works for the repair or strengthening of the fortresses.

It is further to be observed that the commencement of the campaign will be attended with some considerable expenses in the way of outfit—as in the purchase of horses, waggons, harness, and other materials for the service of the various departments, which will necessarily absorb large sums of money on the spot.

CORPS D'ARMÉE FRANÇAIS qui se forment aux Frontières de la Belgique et de l'Allemagne.

Mai, 1815.

1er Corps d'Observation :

Quartier-général, Lille. Commandé par le Lieutenant-Général Comte d'Erlon.

4 divisions d'infanterie, commandé par les Généraux Lefal, Dufour, et Vathier St. Alphonse. Cantonnant près de Cambrai et Douai.

2 divisions de cavalerie.

2e Corps d'Observation :

Quartier-Général, Valenciennes. Commandé par le Lieutenant-Général Reille.

1 division à Valenciennes, sous le Général Barrois.

1 division (la 5e) à Maubeuge, sous le Général Bachelu.

1 division (la 7e) à Quesnoy, sous le Général Lamarque.

Plusieurs régiments d'infanterie de ligne dans les environs de Landrecies, sous les Généraux Demanget et Colbert.

Cavalerie, sous les Généraux Excelmans et Clary.

Les journaux Français font monter ces deux corps d'armée au delà de 60,000 hommes.

D'après les renseignements plus particuliers, il y avoit, environ vers le 21 du mois d'Avril, entre la Sambre et la Mer du Nord, une armée de 9 divisions d'infanterie, chaque division composée de 4 régiments, le total de la division de 5000 hommes; et puis 6 divisions de cavalerie, chaque division composée de 4 régiments, la division de 1200 chevaux; ce qui donneroit le total de 45,000 hommes d'infanterie, et 7200 chevaux.

Le 17 et le 18 Avril il partait encore 2 régiments d'infanterie de ligne de Sédan et de Mézières, pour se rendre à Lille.

On nomme le Maréchal Ney comme désigné à commander ces deux corps d'armée.

3e Corps d'Observation :

Quartier-général à Charleville. Commandé par le Général Vandamme.

1 division à Rocroi, Général†

Chef d'Etat-Major, Colonel Rapatel.

* Transport, Victualling, Navy, Storekeeper-General, Commissary in Chief.

† Blank in manuscript.

1 division à Mézières, sous le Général Anell.
1 division à Givet, sous le Général Charbonnier.
Ce corps peut s'évaluer, vers la fin d'Avril, à 14,000 hommes.
Le Duc de Plaisance se trouve de même à Charleville, pour veiller à la fabrication d'armes. On prétend qu'il y a là près de 40,000 canons de fusils et platines, et du bois pour en monter plus de 100,000.

4e Corps d'Observation :

Quartier-général à Metz. Commandé par le Lieutenant-Général Comte Gérard.
2 divisions d'infanterie.
1 division de Cuirassiers, sous le Général Roussel.
1 division de Dragons, sous le Général Maurice.
Les journaux Français évaluent ce corps à 12,000 hommes.
Le Général Huge se trouvoit, le 20 Avril, à Thionville.

5e Corps d'Observation :

Quartier-général à Strasbourg. Commandé par le Maréchal Suchet.
Le Général Rapp commande sous le Maréchal Suchet.

Dans les environs de Paris il se forme une armée de réserve, que le Lieutenant-Général Comte Lobau commandera. Les Généraux Morand et l'Abbé auront un commandement dans ce corps. L'artillerie sera sous les ordres du Lieutenant-Général Nourrit.
Le Lieutenant-Général Clausel rassemblera un corps sous le nom d'Armée d'Observation de la Gironde. Cette armée montera à 4 divisions d'infanterie, et 1 division de cavalerie. Le Général Freesygnet y commandera 1 division.

STRENGTH AND SPIRIT OF THE FRENCH GARRISONS.

Mai, 1815.

Monsieur de Gir, qui a été, depuis le 23 Avril, dans les villes ci-après mentionnées, fait le rapport ci-joint, qui est confirmé par d'autres reçus par nous et par les généraux de la garnison.

	Hommes.
St. Amand (du 23) est assez froid pour l'un et l'autre partie. Les Gardes Nationales ne veulent pas marcher. Il y a un bataillon du 81e de ligne et quelques compagnies de cavalerie légère	600
Valenciennes (23) n'est point encore mis en état de siége. Il y a cependant quelques canons sur les remparts. Cette ville n'est pas aussi bonne que beaucoup d'autres de ce département, surtout les environs de Condé, qui est détestable. Cependant on ne croit pas qu'on parvienne d'avantage à réunir la Garde Nationale. La garnison est composée de 2 régiments d'infanterie, et des dépôts du 3e Lanciers et 7e Housards, estimé à..	3,000
Les escadrons de guerre de ces 2 régiments n'excèdent pas 300 hommes chacun. Il n'y a pas d'avant-postes en avant de cette ville.

Douai (24). Il y a 2 régiments d'infanterie de ligne, un d'artillerie à pied (le 6e), un peu d'artillerie à cheval, estimé à	3,500
Il y a dans les environs, et surtout vers Cambrai, de la cavalerie, qui est disséminée dans les villages. Les corps changent souvent de garnison.
L'esprit de cette ville est bon dans le peuple, et assez partagé dans la classe élevée. M. de Beaumet, Procureur-Général, est à la tête des Royalistes. Le premier Président, M. de Warenghien, est très mauvais. Les campagnes pensent bien, et refusent absolument de marcher.
Arras (25). Il y a le 8e et le 29e de ligne. Ces régiments étaient il y a peu de tems à Valenciennes. Comptant peu sur leur dévouement ça a été la cause de ce changement. Le colonel du 29e a été destitué. La force est, y compris un régiment de Dragons, de..	2,500
L'esprit de cette ville et des environs est très exalté pour le Roi. Les jeunes gens de famille refusent de se faire remplacer dans la Garde Nationale, afin d'éviter les remplaçants de marcher; et les pauvres refusent absolument de le faire.
M. de Roujoux, préfet, est très mauvais. Il a fait des proclamations dans le style de Robespierre. Le commissaire extraordinaire du gouvernement, M. Costaz, est depuis longtems dévoué au tyran. On craint que ces 2 satellites n'établissent la terreur comme il y a 22 ans.
Bethune. Il y a un bataillon du 79e de ligne, et le 8e de Dragons, estimé à	800
Cette ville pense très bien. La Garde Nationale ne se réunit pas.
On vient d'y former des cadres des officiers à la demie-paye, et des sous-officiers en congé.
Aire. Le 2e bataillon du 79e régiment, de	400
L'esprit y est très bon, d'autant plus qu'il est soutenu partout, ce qui tient à la classe aisée. Il s'y trouve plusieurs personnes sur lesquelles on peut compter à la vie et à la mort.
St. Omer. Il y a un régiment de Mineurs (le 1er), qui pense fort mal. Le dépôt du 28e y est aussi	1,500
L'esprit y est très bon. Personne ne veut marcher. A la plus petite espérance on se déclarera pour le Roi.
Dunkerque. Les 2 bataillons de campagne du 28 y ont été envoyés depuis la tentative de M. de Lescours, ainsi que le 4e Lanciers. Son colonel, M. Deschamps, passe pour bien pensant. Il vient d'être mandé à Paris, avec celui du 28e. On estime la garnison à..	3,000
Même esprit qu'à St. Omer.

Observations.

Il paraît que le corps se compose de trois divisions d'infanterie, deux de cavalerie et d'artillerie.

Les régiments d'infanterie ont deux bataillons de guerre et un de dépôt; ceux de guerre ont 6 compagnies de 80 à 90 hommes chaque, ne peuvent être évalué à plus de 500 combattans; ceux de dépôt sont incomplètes. Ils ne peuvent être compté, ayant été renvoyé dans l'intérieur. Un régiment n'a donc que 1000 à 1100 baïonnettes.

Les régiments de cavalerie de 4 escadrons de 150 hommes chaque, mais ils manquent de chevaux, et ne forment que environ trois petits escadrons de 110 à 115 chevaux. Un régiment ne doit donc être compté que pour 300 ou 350 chevaux en campagne.

Les compagnies d'artillerie ont ordinairement 6 pièces, dont 2 obusiers.

COMPOSITION AND FORCE OF THE FRENCH CORPS, AS THEY HAVE BEEN PUT TOGETHER BY GENERAL GNEISENAU.

19th May, 1815.

I.

Le 8 de ce mois le Maréchal Vandamme a passé en revue un corps de 3800 hommes d'infanterie, près de Rocroy. Le même jour cette place a été déclarée en état de siége, cependant il n'y a que peu d'artillerie pour le moment.

Les entrées de Mariembourg sont défendus par des palissades ainsi que par un fossé large et profond. A Couvin, près de Mariembourg, il y a 600 hommes d'infanterie et 1 compagnie de chasseurs à cheval, qui pendant la journée mettent en faction quelques hommes sur les hauteurs de Mariembourg.

Toutes les nouvelles s'accordent à dire que l'ennemi, par le moyen d'abattis ou de fossés, a rendu impraticables toutes les routes qui conduisent de Beaumont à l'intérieur de la France. Entre Sivry et Ranie, Ranie et Aine Sauvage, Aine Sauvage et Liessy, il y a de grands abattis à travers de la route.

Dans les environs de Courtonnant, entre Ranie et Beaumont, ainsi que près de Felleries entre Solre-le-Château et Avesnes, les routes sont fermées par des traverses ainsi que par un fossé de 12 pieds de largeur. On dit qu'à Courtonnant il y a 5 pièces de canon et 2 obusiers.

Le Général Charbonnier, commandant de Givet, vient d'être suspendu de ses fonctions il y a deux jours.

D'après le rapport d'un espion nouvellement arrivé il y a sur les remparts de Maubeuge 80 pièces d'artillerie; et à Rousies, près de Maubeuge, on travaille à un camp retranché, ce qui occupe journellement 400 pionniers.

TABLEAU DE L'ARMÉE FRANÇAISE.

Namur, le 17 Mai, 1815.

1er Corps d'Observation.

Commandant, Lieutenant-Général Comte Erlon.

Généraux de Divisions : Lefal, Dufour, Girardin, Vathier St. Alphonse.

Le quartier-général à Valenciennes, vraisemblablement, car les troupes y sont arrivé du voisinage de Lille.

Divisions.—4 d'infanterie ; 2 de cavalerie.

Régiments.—19e, 21e, 23e, 28e, 50e, 76e, 77e de ligne.

D'après les renseignements sur la force des divisions, ce corps consisterait de 24,000 à 25,000 hommes.

Artillerie.—A la première formation chaque corps devait avoir 4 batteries, mais comme ils ne devoient consister alors que de deux divisions d'infanterie chacun, je présume que la force de l'artillerie a été augmentée aussi.

Il y avoit, le 10 du mois de Mai, deux parcs d'artillerie près de Valenciennes, l'un avec 30, l'autre avec 20 pièces de canon. C'est incertain s'ils appartiennent au 1er ou au 2e corps.

2e Corps d'Observation.

Commandant, Lieutenant-Général Reille.

Généraux de Divisions : Lamarque, Barrois, Bachelu, Rey, Excelmans, Colbert.

Généraux de Brigades : Lawoy, Corsin, Dananget, Clary.

Le quartier-général à Marvilles, près de Landrecies.

Divisions.—6 d'infanterie ; 3 de cavalerie.

Régiments.—81e de ligne, appartenante à la division Lamarque (7e). Le 81e étoit à Englefontaine le 11 de Mai. 8e de ligne, 11e de ligne, 42e de ligne, à la division Bachelu (5e) ; 57e de ligne, le Général de Brigade Lawoy se trouve à Beaumont ; 18e de ligne, avec 800 hommes, et appartient vraisemblablement à ce corps ; 1er, 11e infant. légère. 8e de Dragons, 5e de Lanciers, 1er, 4e, 9e de Chasseurs, 4e d'Hussards.

D'après les renseignements sur la force des divisions, ce corps serait de 35,000 hommes : plusieurs rapports y sont d'accord. Cependant, Messieurs les Commissaires du Roi de France ne donnent que 2400 hommes à chaque division d'infanterie, et 1000 à 1200 à ceux de cavalerie, ce qui ne donnerait en tout que 18,000 hommes. J'en doute cependant très fort.

Deux bataillons de ce corps se trouvent à Quesnoy. Le 14 de Mai 30,000 hommes, avec 60 pièces de canon, se trouvoient dans le voisinage de Maubeuge. 8 généraux étoient logés à Avesnes. 45 pièces de canon étoient attendu de Paris.

Les feuilles Françaises, vers la fin d'Avril, donnaient 60,000 hommes au 1er et au 2e corps, mais d'après des renseignements très sûr, il n'y avoit le 21 d'Avril entre la Sambre et la Mer du Nord que 9 divisions d'infanterie de 5000 hommes chacune, et 6 divisions de cavalerie, chacune de 1200 chevaux. Total, 45,000 hommes d'infanterie, et 7200 chevaux.

On a fait sauter le pont de pierre de Merbie, et établie un pont de bateaux, gardé par 150 grenadiers.

Artillerie.—4 batteries (voyez le 1er corps). Commandant, Général Tirley. Général du Génie, Haxo.

3e Corps d'Observation.

Commandant, Lieutenant-Général Vandamme.

Généraux de Divisions : Le Moine (Colonel Ropatel est chef d'état-major du Général Le Moine), Ameil (?), Charbonnier, D'Omon, Ameil (?).

Généraux de Brigades : Francini, Changon, St. Genils, Gobricht.

Quartier-général à Mézières. On dit que le quartier-général dans ce moment est attendu à Givet, mais ce n'est pas sûre.

Divisions.—3 d'infanterie ; 2 de cavalerie.

Régiments.—12e, 22e, 32e, 33e, 52e, 75e, 89e de ligne ; 9e infanterie légère ; 8e Cuirassiers, 1er Dragons, 5e et 2e Lanciers, 4e et 11e Chasseurs, 5e Hussards.

D'après quelques rapports il s'y trouve aussi le 1er de Carabiniers, 2e et 11e Cuirassiers.

L'on donne à ce corps 20,000 hommes, quelquesuns même 30,000.

Dans ce moment un rapport sait que 25,000 hommes doivent prendre un camp entre Charleville et Givet.

10,000 hommes de ce corps sont à Mézières et Charleville ; 6000 y compris un régiment de Carabiniers à Rocroy, avec le Général Francini. Le Général Le Moine s'y trouve vraisemblablement aussi. Dans 5 ou 6 villages entre Charleville et Rocroy il y avoit un bataillon dans chacun d'eux.

Les feuilles Françaises publiaient vers la fin d'Avril, que 25 divisions, tant d'infanterie que de cavalerie, se trouvoient entre Philippeville et Dunquerque. Cette nouvelle est à peu près d'accord avec nos renseignements sur le 1er, 2e, et 3e corps.

Artillerie.—4 batteries (voyez le 1er corps).

4e Corps d'Observation.

Commandant, le Lieutenant-Général Gérard.

Généraux de Divisions : Bourmont, Lanusse, Roussel (une division de Cuirassiers), Maurice (une division de Dragons).

Quartier-général à Metz.

Divisions — 2 dinfanterie, peut-être 3 ; 2 de cavalerie.

Régiments.—6e, 8e Chasseurs; 1er, 6e d'Hussards.

La force de 15,000 à 20,000 hommes. Une autre nouvelle porte les troupes entre Metz et Thionville au nombre de 25,000, mais c'est exagéré.

Artillerie.—4 batteries (voyez le 1er corps). Commandant, Maréchal de Camp Bathur. Général du Génie, Valazé.

Au commencement du mois de Mai une batterie d'artillerie volante et une d'artillerie à pied sont parties pour St. Arold, et 4 compagnies d'artillerie à pied de ce corps pour Varennes.

5e Corps d'Observation.

Commandant, Lieutenant-Général Comte Rapp.

Général de Division, Albert.

Le Général Molitor organise la défense des frontières de l'Alsace, et est chargé du commandement des Gardes Nationales du 3e division militaire.

Quartier-général à Strasbourg.

Divisions.—Infanterie, le nombre en est incertain; cavalerie, le nombre incertain.

Régiments.—17e, 31e, 35e, 37e, 38e, 68e de ligne à Strasbourg; 6e infanterie légère; 5e de Cuirassiers, 2e, 6e de Chasseurs.

Artillerie.—4 batteries (voyez le 1er corps).

L'on ne sait rien de sûre sur la force de ce corps.

6e Corps d'Observation.

Commandant, Lieutenant-Général Comte Lobau.

Généraux de Divisions: Morand, L'Abbé, Feste, Piré, Nourrit. (Le Général Nourrit a été nommé pour commander toute la cavalerie du corps. Cette nouvelle est fausse. Voyez l'Artillerie.)

Général de Brigade, Estève.

Quartier-général à Paris ou à Laon. Ce corps est nommé aussi l'Armée de Réserve.

Divisions.—Infanterie, le nombre des divisions incertain; cavalerie, le nombre des divisions incertain.

Régiments.—(Blank.)

Le Général Feste avec une division d'infanterie, et le Général Piré avec une de cavalerie, sont parties de Paris le 30 d'Avril.

La 1e division de ce corps, faisant l'armée de réserve, est à Laon et environ, s'étendant jusqu'à Marles. Cette division, dont l'un des généraux est Estève, se compose de 3 régiments d'infanterie de ligne et un régiment d'infanterie légère. Une division de cavalerie étoit composée d'un régiment d'Hussards et de 3 régiments de Dragons.

La 2e division de ce corps étoit à Paris, la 3e à Orléans. Aucun de ces régiments n'étoit complet.

Artillerie.—Gén. Nourrit.

7e Corps d'Observation.

Quartier-général à Chambéry.

Divisions.—2 d'infanterie; 1 de cavalerie.

8e Corps d'Observation.

Commandant, Lieutenant-Général Clausel.

Général de Division, Fressignet.

Quartier-général à Bordeaux.

Divisions.—4 d'infanterie; 1 de cavalerie.

Régiments.—61e, 62e, 78e de ligne.

Ces nouvelles diffèrent de ceux que Son Altesse le Duc de Wellington vient de nous envoyer dans les points suivants :—

1er Corps d'Observation.—Les noms de quelques généraux de divisions et de brigades manquent dans le tableau du Duc de Wellington.

La force totale du corps est moins de 12,000 hommes dans le tableau du Duc de Wellington.

2e Corps d'Observation.—La force totale du corps est moins de 5000 hommes dans le tableau du Duc de Wellington que dans le nôtre.

3e Corps d'Observation.—Les noms de quelques généraux manquent dans le tableau du Duc de Wellington, et la force de ce corps aussi y est estimé moins de 5000 hommes que dans le nôtre.

4e Corps d'Observation.—Le tableau du Duc de Wellington nomme le Général Rapp commandant de ce corps. Cependant, nous savons, par des nouvelles officielles, qu'il est commandé par le Général Gérard. Le Général Rapp se trouve encore toujours à Strasbourg, ce qui nous donne lieu de croire avec beaucoup de vraisemblance qu'il commanderait le 5e corps d'observation, qui se trouve dans ces contrées.

La force de ce corps encore est moins de 4000 hommes dans le tableau du Duc de Wellington que dans le nôtre.

5e Corps d'Observation.— Le commandant du corps n'est pas nommé dans le tableau du Duc de Wellington. Nous avons lieu de croire que c'est le Général Rapp.

6e Corps d'Observation.—Nos notices sont plus spéciales sur les cantonnements de ce corps que ceux du Duc de Wellington, qui n'en nomme que Laon.

7e Corps d'Observation.—Il n'y a pas de différence.

8e Corps d'Observation.—Il n'y a pas de différence.

9e Corps d'Observation.—Pas de différence.

Remarque Générale.

Notre tableau porte les noms de plusieurs régiments dans chacun des corps qui manquent entièrement dans celui du Duc de Wellington.
